COLUMBIA LIBRARIES OFFSITE
AVERY FINE ARTS RESTRICTED
AR01397435

AVERY ARCHITECTURAL AND FINE ARTS LIBRARY
GIFT OF SEYMOUR B. DURST OLD YORK LIBRARY

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2013

http://archive.org/details/historyofwestche00scha

J. Thomas Scharf.

Engd by H.B. Hall & Sons 18 Bercliff St. N.Y.

HISTORY

OF

WESTCHESTER COUNTY,

NEW YORK,

INCLUDING

MORRISANIA, KINGS BRIDGE, AND WEST FARMS,

WHICH HAVE BEEN ANNEXED TO NEW YORK CITY.

BY

J. THOMAS SCHARF, A. M., LL. D.

Author "History of Maryland," "Chronicles of Baltimore," "History of Baltimore City and County," "History of St. Louis City and County," "History of the City of Philadelphia, Pa.," etc., etc. Corresponding Member of the Historical Societies of New York, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Virginia, Georgia, South Carolina, Historic and Genealogical Society of New England, Philosphical Society of Ohio, etc., etc.

ASSISTED BY A STAFF OF CAREFULLY SELECTED EXPERTS IN EVERY DEPARTMENT.

IN TWO VOLUMES, ILLUSTRATED.

VOL. I.

PHILADELPHIA:

L. E. PRESTON & CO.

1886.

OFFSITE
F
127
.W5
S3
v.1

Copyright, 1886,

By L. E. Preston & Co.

All Rights Reserved.

PRESS OF
JAS. B. RODGERS PRINTING COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA.

PREFACE.

In presenting this "History of Westchester County" to the public, the Editor believes, no apology is necessary. It is a new and trustworthy history of the county, founded upon the best authorities, and the most authentic documents and authoritative records. In no sense of the word is it built up out of, or repeated from, any previous one on the same subject, or any of its branches.

The plan of the work is to a large extent novel—the grouping of so many representative writers, to tell so interesting a story as that of the origin, career and significance of Westchester County, has no parallel in the history of any other county in the United States. To present the principal historical phases of the several towns, and the county's life and development, together with the traces of previous occupation and the natural history of the county, the various chapters were assigned to writers, most of them well known in their respective spheres, and some of them of national reputation, who, from study and association, were in a measure identified with their subjects. Their treatment of these topics is such that what they have written may be taken as the best comprehensive expression of existing knowledge, put together with that authority which comes from special study. In the diversity of authors there will, of course, be variety of opinions, and it has not been thought ill-judged, considering the different points of view assumed by the various writers, that the same events should be interpreted sometimes in varying, and perhaps opposite, ways. The chapters may thus make good the poet's description,— and may not be the worse for each offering a reflection, according to its turn to the light, without marring the unity of the general expanse. The Editor has endeavored to prevent any unnecessary repetitions, and to provide against serious omissions of what might naturally be expected in a history of its kind. In more than one instance he has been constrained by his deference to local authority upon strictly local subjects, and by yielding to the testimony of experts in matters which they alone are supposed to know thoroughly, to hold back his own judgment in regard to certain subjects, and permit the local writer and the expert to tell the whole story their own way. The result has sometimes been clash, confusion and contradiction; for there is nothing about which local authorities and experts differ so much among themselves as those particular events and things in regard to which they collectively consider it the height of presumption for "outsiders" to disagree with them. Where the subject happened to be one of moment and importance, the author has cut the Gordian knot and stated things to suit himself; but in indifferent or trivial concerns he has simply stood aside and let each writer give his own version.

"Distinct as the billows, yet one as the sea,"—

Some space has been given to biographical sketches of leading and representative men, living and dead, who have borne an active part in the various enterprises of life, and who have become closely identified with the history of the county. The achievements of the living must not be forgotten, nor must the memories of those who have passed away be allowed to perish. It is the imperative duty of the historian to chronicle the public and private efforts to advance the great interests of society. Their deeds are to be recorded for the benefit of those who follow them,—they, in fact, form part of the history of their communities, and their successful lives add to the glory of the county.

The Editor would be unjust to himself and the county whose history he has compiled, if he did not acknowledge, with feelings of profound gratitude, the cordial aid extended to him and his undertaking by the respective writers and by the people of Westchester County. They have given him the fullest encouragement throughout, and have helped him materially in elaborating and perfecting the work. Important and valuable assistance and information have been received from the following persons, to whom also particular recognition is due:—James Wood, Franklin Crouch, Rev. David Cole, D.D., Rev. John A. Todd, Thomas C. Cornell, Joseph Barrett, Frederick Whittaker and Josiah S. Mitchell.

The scope and method of this history of Westchester County, is best understood by the table of contents, and the names of the writers annexed. It is sufficient to demonstrate the broad taste and judiciousness of selection on the part of the Editor. Without their indispensable aid and invaluable stores of material on the history of this interesting county, which they have been diligently collecting for years past, it would have been impossible to present this history in the satisfactory shape it now assumes.

To the publishers of this history, the Editor on behalf of himself and his collaborators, must gratefully pay the meed, thrice deserved, of most hearty and effective co-operation with him and them throughout the undertaking. They have most liberally met every desire of the writers in respect of letter-press and engravings of portraits, views, maps and other illustrations; they have spared no expense or effort to make the mechanical execution of the volumes equal to the subject, and to the Editor's ambition, and they have helped him in every difficulty and sought to remove every obstruction from his path while the work was in progress.

To the subscribers of the work, who, by consenting to take it unseen on the Editor's own recommendation and the strength of his and the publisher's reputation, have secured its successful completion and publication, the Editor renders his most grateful thanks, with the earnest hope that nothing in the volumes and nothing omitted from them may cause them to regret their confidence and their liberality.

J. THOMAS SCHARF.

BALTIMORE, July 6, 1886.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I.

CHAPTER I.

PAGE.

TOPOGRAPHY, BOUNDARIES AND GEOLOGY, ... 1–9

BY J. THOMAS SCHARF, A. M., LL.D.

CHAPTER II.

THE INDIANS OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY, 9–20

BY JAMES WOOD.

CHAPTER III.

THE DISCOVERY AND SETTLEMENT OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY, ... 20–31

BY JAMES WOOD.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF MANORS IN NEW YORK, AND IN THE COUNTY OF WESTCHESTER, ... 31–160 a

PARTS:

1. The Indian Owners of New Netherland and of Westchester.
2. How the Indian Title vested successively in the Dutch West India Company, the British Crown, and the Independent State of New York.
3. The Dutch in New Netherland.
4. The Colonization by the West India Company.
5. The Nature of the Dutch System of Government and Law, established in New Netherland, and of the Patroonships.
6. The Patroonship of Colen-Donck.
7. The Capture of New Netherland from the Dutch, and the Creation of the English 'Province of New York.'
8. The English System in the Province of New York under the Duke of York as Lord Proprietor.
9. The Manors in New York, what they were not, and what they were.
10. The Franchises, Privileges, and Incidents, of Manors in the Province of New York, and in the County of Westchester, and the Parishes in the latter.
11. The Church of England Parochial Organization in Westchester County, and its Relations to the Manors.
12. The Manors and the County in their Mutual Relations, and the Origin and Formation of the latter.
13. The Manor of Cortlandt, its Origin, Special Franchises, Division, First Lord and his Family, Particular History, and Topography.
14. The Manor of Scarsdale, its Origin, Local History, Adjoining Patents, its First Lord and His Family, Division, and Topography.

BY EDWARD FLOYD DE LANCEY.

CHAPTER V.

PAGE.

THE COLONIAL PERIOD, 1683–1774, . 161–177

BY REV. WILLIAM S. COFFEY, A. M.

CHAPTER VI.

WESTCHESTER-COUNTY, NEW-YORK, DURING THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. 177–457

BY HENRY B. DAWSON.

CHAPTER VII.

EARLY MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE PEOPLE OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY, 457–472 j

BY J. THOMAS SCHARF, A. M., LL.D.

CHAPTER VIII.

GENERAL HISTORY FROM 1783 TO 1860, 473-490

BY REV. WILLIAM S. COFFEY, A. M.

CHAPTER IX.

THE CIVIL WAR FROM 1860 TO 1866, 490–516

BY CAPT. FREDERICK WHITTAKER.

CHAPTER X.

WESTCHESTER COUNTY AT THE PRESENT DAY, ... 516–525

BY J. THOMAS SCHARF, A. M., LL.D.

CHAPTER XI.

THE BENCH AND BAR, ... 526–568

BY HON. ISAAC N. MILLS.

CHAPTER XII.

PAGE.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION, ... 568–598

BY GEORGE JACKSON FISHER, M. D.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE LITERARY MEN AND LITERATURE OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY, . 598–639

BY J. THOMAS SCHARF, A. M., LL.D.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE CIVIL HISTORY, ... 639–657

BY REV. WILLIAM J. CUMMING.

CHAPTER XV.

SCARSDALE, ... 657–685

BY ALLEN M. BUTLER, M. D.

CHAPTER XVI.

NEW ROCHELLE, ... 685–701

BY REV. CHARLES E. LINDSLEY, D. D.

CHAPTER XVII.

PELHAM, ... 701–714

BY REV. CHARLES E. LINDSLEY, D. D.

CHAPTER XVIII.

PAGE.

WHITE PLAINS, ... 714–744

BY JOSIAH S. MITCHELL.

CHAPTER XIX.

KINGS' BRIDGE, ... 744–768

BY THOMAS H. EDSALL.

CHAPTER XX.

WESTCHESTER TOWN, ... 768–822

BY FORDHAM MORRIS.

CHAPTER XXI.

MORRISANIA, ... 822–836

BY FORDHAM MORRIS.

CHAPTER XXII.

WEST FARMS, ... 836–846

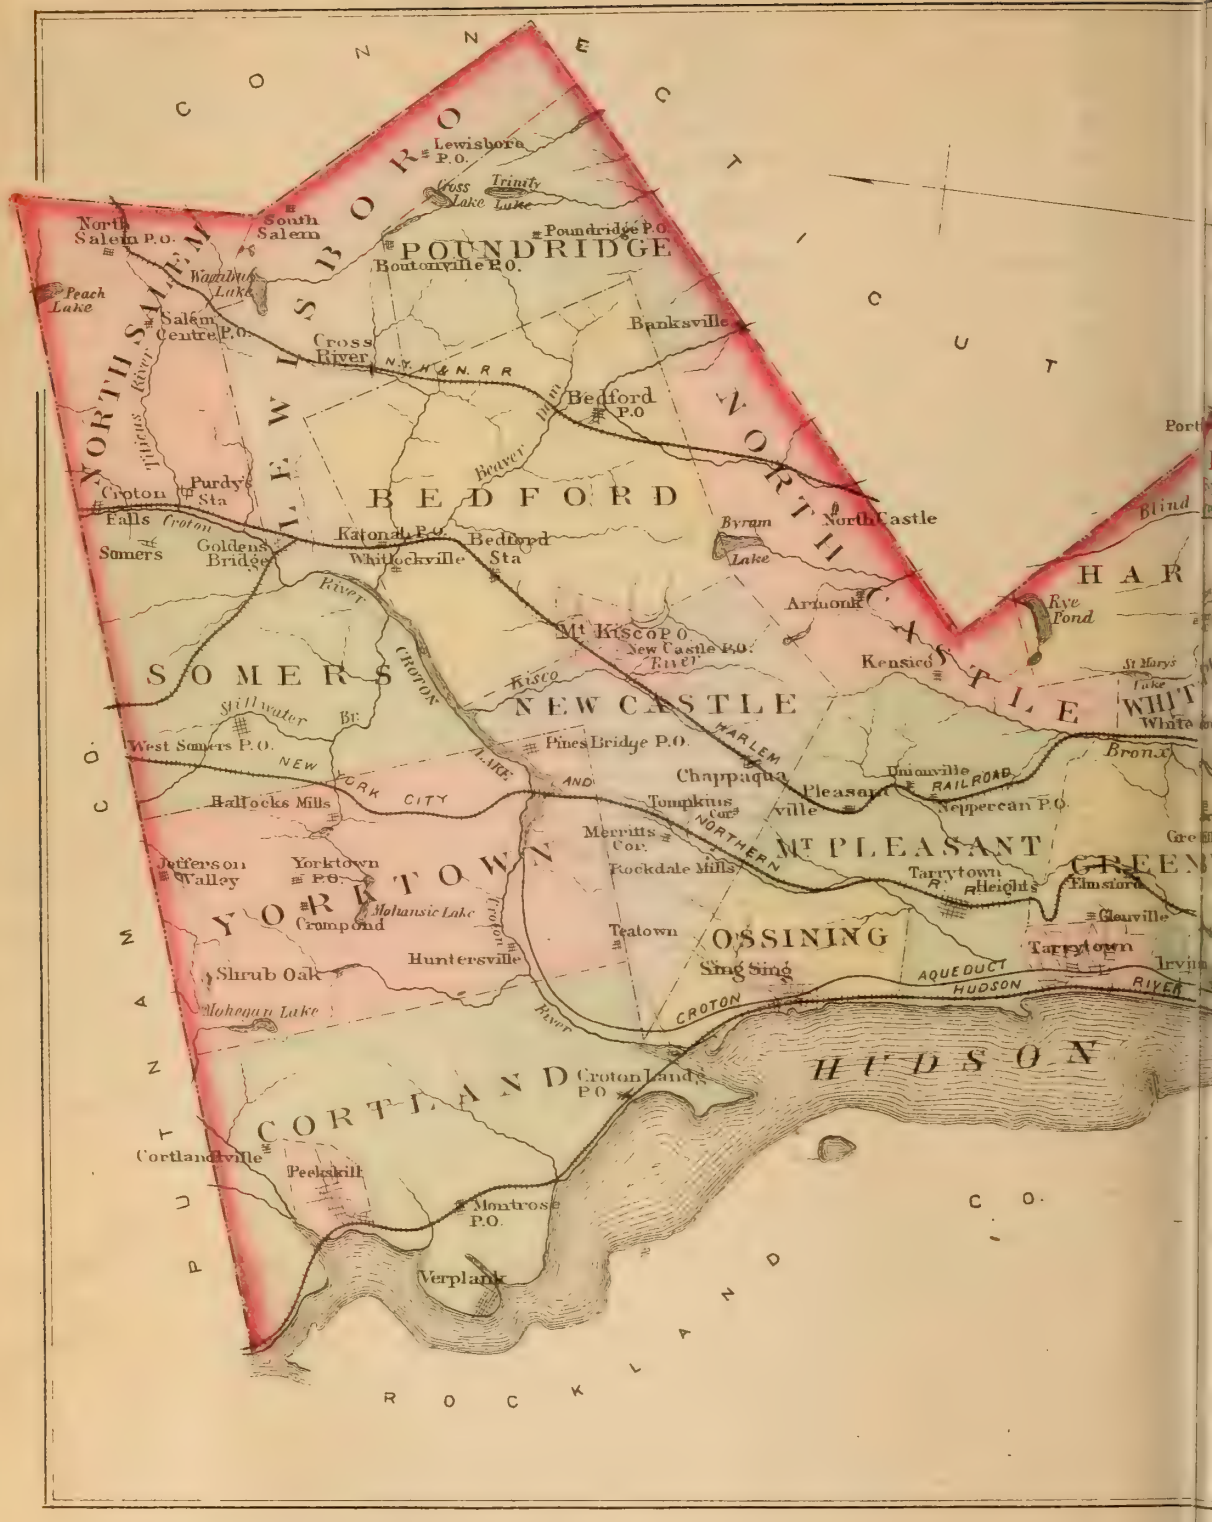
BY FORDHAM MORRIS.

CHAPTER XXIII.

MAMARONECK, ... 846–888

BY EDWARD FLOYD DE LANCEY.

ILLUSTRATIONS.



VOLUME I.

	On or opposite page
Autographs of Supervisors	474
Bailey, N. P., Residence of	754
Baird, Charles W., Portrait of	620
Banta, Mathias, Portrait of	563
Bartlett, W. H. C., Portrait of	622
Bathgate, James, Portrait of	592
Beach, W. A., Portrait of	559
Beal, W. R., Portrait of	834
Bixby, S. M., Portrait of	832
Blue Bell Tavern	472j
Brewster, Joseph B., Portrait of	701
Brown, Nehemiah, Portrait of	528
Butler, Allen M., Autograph of	684
Camp, Hugh N., Portrait of	835
Carpenter, Jonathan, Residence of	698
Carpenter, Jonathan, Portrait of	699
Carpenter, W. J., Portrait of	598
Cauldwell, William, Portrait of	624
Cheese-Press, Primitive	472a
Church, Old Dutch, at Fordham	620
"Clermont," The Steamer	471
Cobbling-stone	8
Coffey, William Samuel, Autograph of	177, 490
Coffey, William Samuel, Portrait of	634
Coffin, Owen T., Portrait of	550
Cole, David, Portrait of	630
Colgate, Robert, Portrait of	766
Colgate, Robert, Residence of	766
Continental Currency	472f
Cooper, J. Fenimore, Portrait of	609
Cornell, Benjamin, Portrait of	675
Cornell Homestead, Residence of R. C. Cornell	696
Court-House, Westchester County, 1886	729
Cumming, W. J., Autograph of	657
Curry, Rev. Daniel, Portrait of	621
Cromwell, C. T., Portrait of	552
Cromwell, C. T., Residence of	552
Cromwell, David, Portrait of	740
Dawson, Henry B., Portrait of	612
De Lancey, Edward F., Autograph of	888
De Lancey, Right Rev. William H., Portrait of	867
Depew, Chauncey M., Portrait of	557
De Vries, David Pietersen	35
Dickel, C. W., Residence of	664
Disbrow House	856
Doctor of Olden Time	468
Drake, Joseph R., Portrait of	616
Dyckman, Isaac M., Portrait of	765
Dyckman, Isaac M., Residence of	765
Dyckman, J. O., Portrait of	534
Dyckman, John H., Portrait of	765
Dyckman, William N., Portrait of	764
Edsall, Thomas H., Autograph of	761
Evans, Oliver	469
Evans' Steam Carriage	470
Evans, W. W., Portrait of	699
Evans, W. W., Residence of	699

	On or opposite page
Ewen, John, Portrait of	767
Faneuil, Peter, Portrait of	711
Fellows, E. B., Portrait of	842
Ferguson, Geo., Portrait of	700
Fireships, The American	391
Fisher, G. J., Portrait of	581
Fisher, G. J., Autograph of	581
Fitch's First Steamboat	470
Flagg, Levi W., Portrait of	587
Flying-Machine, The	472
Fort Washington, 1886	517
Fountain, Hosea, Portrait of	585
Fountain, James, Portrait of	577
Fox, William W., Portrait of	845
Fuller, Mrs. J. M., Residence of	682
Franklin, Benjamin, Portrait of	171
Franklin's Cream Pot	641
Garth, D. J., Residence of	681
Gedney, Bartholomew, Portrait of	743
Gedney, Bartholomew, Residence of	743
Gifford, Silas D., Portrait of	532
Goodridge, Frederic, Residence of	759
Graystone, Residence of S. J. Tilden	554, 555
Griswold, R. B., Portrait of	597
Guion, Place, View of	685
Haerlem, View of, from Morrisania, 1765	394
Hague, William, Autograph of	713
Hall, H. B., Portrait of	836
Hall, Ernest, Portrait of	562
Hand, N. H., Residence of	740
Hand, N. H., Portrait of	741
Hasbrouck, Joseph, Portrait of	587
Hasbrouck, Stephen, Portrait of	586
Haskin, John B., Portrait of	561
Havemeyer, F. C., Portrait of	818
Head Costumes	462, 463
Head Dress, 1776	464
Heathcote Hill, View of	854
Heathcote, Caleb, Portrait of	152
Hoe, R. M., Portrait of	833
Hoffman, A. K., Portrait of	588
House in which Poe wrote "The Raven"	618
Hudson, Henry, Portrait of	21
Huguenot House, old	691
Huguenot Street, New Rochelle, 1798	686
Huntington, C. P., Portrait of	820
Huntington Homestead, Views at	822
Huntington Homestead	821
Huntington, H. K., Portrait of	595
Indian chief	32
Indian family	33
Indian fort	34
Indian relics and specimens	14, 15, 16
Irving, Washington, Portrait of	610
Jay, John C., Portrait of	582
Johnson, Isaac G., Portrait of	768
Johnson, S. W., Portrait of	564

	On or opposite page
Johnson & Co.'s Works	769
Larkin, Francis, Portrait of	558
Lester, Simeon, Portrait of	698
Lester, Simeon, Residence of	698
Lewis, Joseph H., Residence of	734
Lindsley, Charles E., Portrait of	694
Lovatt, E. T., Portrait of	568
Macomb's Dam, 1850	758
Map, Attack on Fort Washington	790
Map, boundary lines between New York and Connecticut	3
Map, Cortlandt Manor	140
Map, Carpenter's, of White Plains	718
Map, Frog's Neck to Croton River	415
Map, Geological, of county	6
Map, Historical, of King's Bridge	747
Map, Manors of Westchester County	30
Map, Manor of Phillipsburg	161
Map, Manor of Scarsdale	141
Map of Mamaroneck	849
Map, Outline, of county	1
Map of Bronckslaud	769
Map of Bronx Neck	780
Map of Fordham and the Meadows	775
Map, Roads about White Plains	732
Map, Sauthier's, published by Faden	403
Map, White Plains, 1721	720
Map, White Plains, 1776	727
Mapes, Daniel, Portrait of	841
Mills, Isaac N., Autograph of	550
Mitchell, Josiah S., Autograph of	740
Morris, A. Newbold, Portrait of	829
Morris, Fordham, Autograph of	817
Morris, Gouverneur, Portrait of	603
Morris, James, Portrait of	827
Morris, Lewis, Portrait of	826
Morris, L. G., Portrait of	829
Morris, L. G., Residence and Views at	830
Morris, W. H., Residence of	826
Morris, W. H., Portrait of	828
Mortar and Pestle	13
Mott, Jordan L., Portrait of	831
Mt. St. Vincent, Academy of	760
Nordquist, C. J., Portrait of	589
Oliffe, W. M., Portrait of	744
Old Clock	460
Paine, Thomas, House of	690
Paine, Thomas, Monument of	689
Paine, Thomas, Portrait of	602
Peale, C. W.	466
Pillory, The	472i
Poe's Home at Fordham	619
Popham, Lewis C., Portrait of	674
Popham, L. C., Residence of	680
Popham, W. H., Portrait of	673
Popham, W. H., Residence of	672
Popham, W. S., Portrait of	672
Purdy, Samuel M., Portrait of	558
Putnam, A. E., Residence of	758
Reinfelder, M. I., Portrait of	596
Reynal, J., Residence of	724
Robertson, W. H., Portrait of	530
Sands, D. Jerome, Portrait of	590
Scharf, Autograph of	9
Scharf, J. Thomas, Portrait of	Frontispiece.
Schmid, H. Ernest, Portrait of	588
Scribner, G. Hilton, Portrait of	565
Scribner, James W., Portrait of	593
Scrugham, William W., Portrait of	545
Secor, Francis, Portrait of	678
Smith, Chauncey, Portrait of	567
Smith, J. Malcom, Portrait of	560
Sone, L. V., Residence of	722
Stage wagon	173
Stamp, British	176
Stocks, The	472h
St. Thomas' Church (old)	873
St. Thomas' Church (new)	874
Stuyvesant, Peter, Portrait of	24
Sully, Thomas	465
Swift, Samuel, Portrait of	594
Swinburne, John, Portrait of	606
Tea Service, Old Style	459
Tilden, S. J., Portrait of	554
Tilford, J. M., Portrait of	742
Tilford, J. M., Residence of	742
Tompkins, Daniel D., Portrait of	671
Truman, Norman K., Portrait of	591
Van Cortlandt, A., Portrait of	762
Van Cortlandt Manor-House, King's Bridge	764
Van Rensselaer, W. P., Residence of	553
Van Rensselaer, W. P., Portrait of	553
Van Wyck, P. C., Portrait of	595
Varian, William A., Portrait of	584
Washington's Headquarters, White Plains	728
White Plains, 1855	730
Whittaker, Frederick, Autograph of	515
Wilkins, Isaac, Portrait of	601
Williams, Isaiah T., Portrait of	548
Wells, James L., Portrait of	843
Wood, James, Autograph of	20, 31
Wright, Green, Portrait of	679
Yonkers, View of	518
Young, John W., Portrait of	742

CONNECTICUT
LEWISBORO
NORTH SALEM
POUNDRIDGE
BEDFORD
NORTH CASTLE
HARRISON
SOMERS
NEW CASTLE
YORKTOWN
MT PLEASANT
OSSINING
CORTLANDT
HUDSON
PUTNAM CO.
ROCKLAND CO.
WESTCHESTER CO.
Lewisboro P.O.
Trinity Lake
Cross Lake
North Salem P.O.
South Salem
Poundridge P.O.
Boutonville P.O.
Peach Lake
Wauwinet Lake
Salem Centre P.O.
Cross River
N.Y. H. & N. RR
Banksville
Bedford P.O.
Beaver Dam
Purdy's Sta
Croton Falls
Somers
Goldens Bridge
Katonah P.O.
Whitlockville
Bedford Sta
Byram Lake
North Castle
Armonk
Rye Pond
Rye Lake
Mt Kisco P.O.
New Castle P.O.
Kensico
Blind Brook
St Marys Lake
White Plains
Bronxville
Croton River
Kisco River Stillwater Br.
West Somers P.O.
Pines Bridge P.O.
Harlem River
New York City Lake and Railroad
Chappaqua
Pleasantville
Unionville
Mt Pleasant Railroad
Neppercan P.O.
Tompkins Cor.
Merritts Cor.
Northern Railroad
Rockdale Mills
Tarrytown Heights
Elmsford
Glenville
Tarrytown
Irvington
Hallocks Mills
Jefferson Valley
Yorktown P.O.
Crompond
Mohansic Lake
Teatown
Sing Sing
Aqueduct
Hudson River
Shrub Oak Huntersville
Croton River
Mohegan Lake
Croton Landing P.O.
Cortlandville
Peekskill
Montrose P.O.
Verplanck

OUTLINE MAP
OF
WESTCHESTER CO.
NEW YORK
Showing relative position of Towns

Prepared for Scharf's History of Westchester County

THE

HISTORY OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY.

GENERAL HISTORY.

CHAPTER I.

THE BOUNDARY, TOPOGRAPHY AND GEOLOGY OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY.

BY J. THOMAS SCHARF, LL.D.

THE American people, their lives, their institutions, and their civilization are so entirely different from what is presented elsewhere that as they make their history, so they must preserve its records. Never fettered by axioms, they avoid all prejudices that come from the past; not more attached to one line of operation than another, they are not prone to employ an old method rather than a new; without rooted habits, they easily shake off the influence which other nations might exercise. Their firm conviction is that their country is unlike any other, and that their situation is without a precedent in all the history of the world. No natural boundary restrains, in this country, the efforts of man, and what is not yet done is only what he has not yet attempted to do.

"The perpetual change," remarks De Tocqueville, "which goes on in the United States, the frequent vicissitudes of fortune, accompanied by such unforeseen fluctuations in private and in public wealth, serve to keep the minds of the citizens in a perpetual state of feverish agitation, which admirably invigorates their exertions, and keeps them in a state of excitement above the ordinary level of mankind. The whole life of an American is passed like a game of chance, a revolutionary crisis or a battle. As the same causes are continually in operation throughout the country, they ultimately impart an irresistible impulse to the national character. The American, taken as a chance specimen of his country, must then be a man of singular warmth in his desires, enterprising, fond of adventure, and above all of innovation. The same bent is manifested in all that he does; he introduces it into his political laws, his religious doctrine, his theories of social economy, and his domestic occupations; he bears it with him into the depth of the backwoods, as well as into the business of the city. It is this same passion, applied to maritime commerce, which makes him the cheapest and quickest trader in the world."

The inner life, the domestic history of any portion of a people which thus impressed the shrewdest and most philosophical of all European writers on America, requires and deserves a more detailed examination and presentation than is possible to the historian writing the social and political history of a nation, or even of one presenting the annals of a State. It is in the private life, in the principles that impress individual action, in the moral character of the men of business, in the purity of social life and in the virtues which embellish the home, that depend the value of our civilization and the permanency of our political institutions. Mr. Alison, in his "History of Europe," prophesied that "democratic institutions will not and cannot exist permanently in North America. The frightful anarchy which has prevailed in the Southern States since the great interests dependent on slave emancipation were brought into jeopardy, the irresistible sway of the majority, and the rapid tendency of the majority to deeds of atrocity and blood, the increasing jealousy, on mercantile grounds, of the Northern and Southern States, all demonstrate that the Union cannot permanently hold together, and that the innumerable millions of the Anglo-American race must be divided into separate States, like the descendants of the Gothic conquerors of Europe. Out of this second great settlement of mankind will arise separate kingdoms, and interests and passions, as out of the first. But democratic habits and desires will still prevail, and long after the necessity and the passions of an advanced stage of civilization have established firm and aristocratic governments, founded on the sway of property in the old States, republican ambition and jealousy will not cease to impel millions to the great wave that approaches the Rocky Mountains. Democratic ideas will not be moderated in the New World till they have performed their destined end, and brought the Christian race to the shores of the Pacific." All the convulsions thus predicted have taken place with even greater force and consequences than the historian contemplated, and yet our Union is preserved in greater strength and more apparent durability than was thought possible by its most enthusiastic admirer. The practical common sense, the wise and exalted patriotism of the people, have brought order out of confusion, removed obstacles to progress, destroyed institutions inimical to liberty, and placed their country, its institutions and its government upon a higher plane of progress and duration than was thought to be possible by the wisest of its founders. All the causes and consequences of our general history fall properly within the scope of the political historian,—it is our more limited and restricted duty to collect and preserve the data of a small, yet mighty, part of the whole country, and to show what exists to-day in a single county of a great State, what forces in the past produced that wonderful wealth and civilization, that wise and exalted patriotism, that tact and shrewdness in business, that astounding material development, which illustrates the wealth and wisdom of Westchester County.

Boundary.—The northern boundary line of Westchester County, as it is at present marked, was fixed at the time the county was erected November 1, 1683, and at the same time Long Island Sound was designated as the southern boundary, and the Hudson River as the western boundary. The line between New York and Connecticut has for more than two centuries been a matter of dispute between the two States, and consequently the Eastern boundary line only has a history to be traced.

In the times of the Dutch possession of New York, the question of boundary between that province and the colony of Connecticut arose. It grew out of the conflicting charters granted by the Dutch and English governments. The States-General of Holland on October 11, 1614, gave a three years' monopoly of trade between Virginia and New France, from fortieth to forty-fifth degrees of north latitude to the United Company of Merchants. This same year a trading port was established by Christiænsen on Castle Island south of Albany. June 3, 1621, the Dutch West India Company was chartered with the exclusive privilege of traffic and planting colonies on the coast of America from the Straits of Magellan to the remotest north. Under this charter settlements were made by the Dutch in what was then called New Netherland. In 1632 the arms of the States-General were erected at Kierit's Hoeck (now Saybrook), at the mouth of the Connecticut, which had been discovered by Adriaen Block in 1614, and called the Freshwater. The river had been periodically and exclusively visited by the Dutch traders for many years. Van Twiller, in 1633, purchased from the Indians an extensive tract of land, called the Connittelsock, lying on the west bank of the river and sixty miles from its mouth. At this point was established a trading post, called "The House of Good Hope." November 3, 1620, King James I. incorporated "The Council established at Plymouth, in the county of Devon, for the planting, ruling, ordering and governing New England in America" (commonly called the Plymouth Company). The charter conferred upon them the territory lying between the fortieth and forty-eighth degrees of north latitude, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The Earl of Arundell, president of this company, in 1631 granted to Robert, Earl of Warwick, the country from the Narragansetts along the shore forty leagues, and westward to the Pacific Ocean. The Governor of Massachusetts Bay protested against the establishment of "The House of Good Hope" as an encroachment on English rights, and Van Twiller responded, October 4, 1633, that Connittelsock belonged to the Dutch by right of purchase. An expedition from the Plymouth colony had already landed about a mile above the Dutch trading post, and what is now Connecticut was soon settled at various points by the English.

Before the opening of controversy between the Dutch and English colonists, a similar one was going on on the other side of the ocean. The Plymouth Company complained to the privy council about "the Dutch intruders," and as early as February, 1622, we find the British ambassador at the Hague, Sir Dudley Carlton, claiming New Netherland as a part of New England and requiring the States-General to stay the prosecution of their plantation. To this remonstrance no attention was paid. May 5, 1632, the West India Company reported to the States-General that "the English themselves, according to their charter (of Massachusetts Bay), place New England on the coast between the 41st and 45th degrees of latitude. But the English began in the year 1606 to resort to Virginia, which is south of our Territory of New Netherland, and fixed the boundaries, according to their charter, from the 37th to the 39th degree. So that our boundaries according to their own showing should be from the 39th degree inclusive to the 41st degree, within which bounds we are not aware that they ever undertook any plantation. What boundaries Your High Mightinesses have granted to your subjects, can be seen by the charter issued in the year 1615," which date appears to refer to the charter of October, 11, 1614, which went into effect January 1, 1615.

The remonstrance of New Netherland of July 28, 1649, maintains their right of possession by virtue of discovery made by the ship "de Halve Maen" belonging to the General East India Company, whereof Henry Hudson was master; and that its boundaries were "the ocean or great sea which separates Europe from America, by New England and Fresh (Connecticut) River, in part by the river of Canada (the St. Lawrence) and by Virginia."

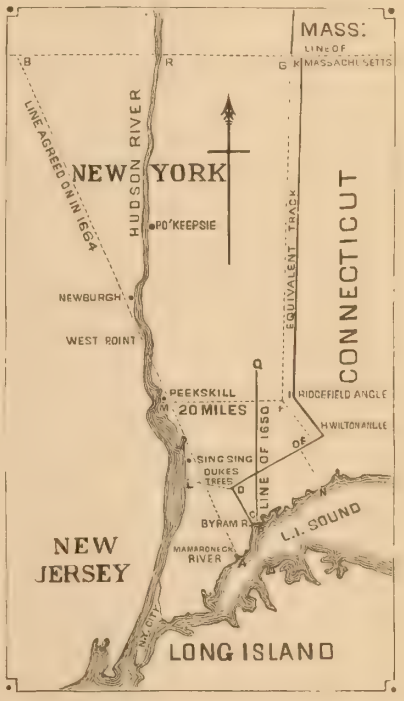
England was equally pertinacious in her claim over Connecticut, resting it upon the discoveries of the Cabots in 1494 and 1497, and upon that of Gosnold in 1602, as well as upon the denial of the right of the Dutch. Hudson never made any sale to the English. It was upon the validity of this sale, in connection with the voyage of the Dutchman, Adrian Block in 1614, through Hell Gate and along the coast of Connecticut to Fisher's and Block's Island, and Cape Cod that the claim of the Dutch to Connecticut rested.

The claim of the Dutch to the coast of Connecticut was maintained in 1646 by Governor Kieft, who threatened Governor Eaton, of Connecticut, with war if that colony did not respect Dutch rights. All offers to settle the dispute by arbitration were refused by the Dutch.

In 1650, Peter Stuyvesant, on behalf of the colony of New Netherland, had a conference with the authorities of Connecticut at Hartford, which resulted in a provisional treaty on the boundary that the line should "begin at the west side of Greenwich Bay, being about four miles from Stamford, and so run a northerly line twenty miles up into the country, until it shall be notified by the two governments of the Dutch and of England, provided the said line come not within ten miles of the Hudson River." This agreement was never sanctioned by the home governments, and thirteen years later, on the 13th of October, 1663, a second conference was held at which Connecticut proposed "that West Chester and all ye people and lands Between that & Stamford shall belong to their colony of Connecticut till it be otherwise issued," which proposition was refused by the agents of Governor Stuyvesant, who proposed that "West Chester, with the land and people to Stamford, shall Abide under the government of Connecticut tell the tyme that the bounds and limits betwixt the Above-said collonij and the province of New Netherlands shall be determined heare [by our mutual Accord or by persons mutually chosen, margin] or by his Royal Majesty of England and other high and mighty lords of the estates of the united provinces."[1]

War breaking out between England and Holland, this agreement or treaty was never ratified by the home governments.



King Charles II., on the 23d of April, 1662, granted to the colony of Connecticut the following boundary:

"All that part of our dominion in America bounded by Narraganset Bay, commonly called Naragonsit Bay, where the said river falleth into the sea, and on the north by the line of the Massachusetts plantation, and on the south by the sea; and in longitude as the line of the Massachusetts colony, running from east to west; that is to say, from the said Narragansett Bay on the east to the south sea on the west part; with the islands thereto adjoining, etc."

[1] Colonial boundaries, Hartford (M.S.), vol. ii., doc. 4, quoted in "History of Rye," by Rev. Charles W. Baird, D.D.

That most comprehensive grant not only covered the disputed territory, but took in the greater part of the Dutch claim on the Hudson. King Charles granted to his brother, the Duke of York and Albany, on the 24th of March, 1664, all of New Netherland from the Delaware to Cape Cod. This grant embraced Connecticut east of the Connecticut River—with some variations of the boundaries—and also the whole of Long Island, "together with all the river called Hudson River, and the lands from the west side of Connecticut River to the east side of Delaware Bay."

By the charter and patent issued within less than two years of each other, nearly all of New York was granted to Connecticut, and most of Connecticut given to New York. On the 18th of September, 1664, Colonel Richard Nicolls, the representative of the Duke of York, received the surrender of the city of New Amsterdam, and the whole of the New Netherlands accepted the situation of an English colony by the 12th of October following

THE DIFFERENT BOUNDARY LINES BETWEEN CONNECTICUT AND NEW YORK.[2]

Notwithstanding the charter of Connecticut was older than the patent to the Duke of York, no little alarm was taken when it was known that their boundaries had been disregarded by the King in his patent to his brother. Delegates were dispatched by the authorities of Connecticut to the Governor of New

[2] This map is copied by permission from Rev. Charles W. Baird's "History of Rye," p. 105.

York for the purpose of congratulation and settlement of the boundary line. These delegates and the commissioners appointed by the Governor of New York met on the 28th of October, 1664, and came to the understanding that the boundary limit between the two claimants should be fixed at a distance of twenty miles east of the Hudson River, and running parallel with that river northward from Long Island Sound. This agreement was not signed, and a few weeks later it was ordered and declared,—

"That ye Creeke or ryver called Momoronock wch is reported to be about thirteen myles to ye east of West Chester, and a lyne drawne from ye east point or Syde where ye fresh water falls into ye salt, at high water marke, north northwest to ye line of ye Massachusetts be ye westerne bounds of ye said Colony of Connecticut."[1]

The line thus established proved fruitful of civil strife, which will find its fuller detail when the eventful story of Rye comes to be written. The Connecticut officials induced Nicolls to believe that Mamaroneck was twenty miles east of the Hudson. Nicolls trusted them and hence arose the trouble, the real distance of Mamaroneck from the Hudson being only about ten miles, instead of twenty. The intention was that this line, twenty miles east of the Hudson, should continue at that distance until it struck the boundary line of Massachusetts; but being given a "North Northwest" direction, it intersected the Hudson River at West Point, and cut off a large part of New York west of that river. On the 24th of November, 1683, negotiations were again undertaken to fix the boundary line, and articles were concluded between Governor Dongan and Council of New York, and the Governor and delegates of Connecticut, that the line should run as originally intended, twenty miles east of the Hudson River. But upon it becoming evident that such a line would deprive Connecticut of several towns which she had planted, it became necessary to vary the line in parts so that these towns should remain in Connecticut; hence the zig-zag boundary line at the southern end between the two States; and as an offset for the territory thus given to Connecticut, an "equivalent tract" was taken from Connecticut at the northern part of the line, and "The Oblong," of 61,440 acres, or a tract of land two miles in width and fifty in length, was given to New York from Ridgefield to the Massachusetts line.

The boundary thus agreed upon began at the mouth of Byram River at a point thirty miles from New York, and following that stream as far as the head of tide-water, or about a mile and a half from the Sound, to a certain "wading-place," where the common road crossed the stream at a rock known and described as "The Great Stone at the Wading-Place." From that stone the line was to run northwest till it should reach a point eight miles from the Sound; thence a line running eastward parallel to the general course of the Sound, and twelve miles in length was fixed upon. From its termination another line, eight miles in length, was to be run in a north-northwest direction, and from the end of that line the boundary was to extend north to the Massachusetts line, with the "equivalent tract" included.

The boundary line thus agreed upon remained as such for many years, recognized but not legally established by the concurrent action of both States. The Legislature of Connecticut, on the 8th of May, 1684, formally approved the agreement and appointed a surveyor to lay off the line. In October following, Governor Dongan's officers met the surveyor of Connecticut at Stamford, and the amount of land conceded to Connecticut was ascertained, but their survey terminated with the line drawn parallel to the Sound as far as a point twenty miles from the river. Beyond this they simply indicated what they supposed would be the extent of "The Oblong" to be laid out as an "equivalent tract."

This condition of the boundary dispute remained unchanged, when, on the 29th of March, 1700, King William III. approved and confirmed the agreement of 1683 and 1684, whereby Rye and Bedford were included in New York. The boundary dispute continued unsettled, and in October, 1718, commissioners appointed by the two governments met at Rye, but failed to agree upon a method of procedure—the New York commissioners refusing to go on with the survey because those of Connecticut were not empowered to bind their government to any line that might be settled upon. In 1719, though Connecticut appointed new commissioners with larger powers, they were still without power to agree upon a final and conclusive settlement. "A probationary act" by New York followed, providing for the appointment of a new commission by each colony, and requiring the New York commission to run all the lines in accordance with the agreement and survey of 1683 and 1684, and this duty was required to be performed, though no commission from Connecticut should be appointed. This act was conditional on the royal approbation. This proposition was not responded to by Connecticut until October, 1723, when a commission with full powers was appointed, and the two commissions met at Rye in April, 1725. Their work began at "the great stone at the wading-place," and extended to the "Duke's trees," at the northwest angle of the town of Greenwich, where three white oaks had been marked in 1684, as the termination of the survey of that year. Here want of funds suspended the work, which was not resumed until 1731, when the survey was completed to the Massachusetts line; the "equivalent tract" or "oblong" was measured and set off to New York, and the line designated by monuments along its course. This survey was ratified as to the oblong by both governments, and remained unquestioned until May, 1855, when Connecticut opened the subject again, because "ranges of marked trees had long since disappeared. Many of the heaps of stones originally erected had been scattered. Traditions were found inconsistent and contradictory, varying the line in places to a considerable extent. Along the whole distance the greatest uncertainty existed, and a distrust and want of confidence in all the supposed lines, rather than a disposition to contend for any. Residents near the border refrained from voting in either State; while officers of justice and collectors of revenue from both hesitated to exercise their authority up to any clearly-defined limit. These circumstances were taken advantage of by those who desired to evade the payment of taxes or the severity of the law."

[1] Boundaries of State of New York, vol. i. p. 25.

To this statement of facts New York responded by the appointment, in January, 1856, of Mr. C. W. Wentz, of Albany, an engineer of established reputation, to survey, ascertain and mark the boundary line. No difficulty intervened from the initial point at the "wading stone," to the Ridgefield angle, but from thence to the Massachusetts line a radical difference interposed between the commissions.

The representatives of Connecticut contended for a straight line between the two extreme points, fifty-three miles apart, because the old monuments and marks upon the line were generally removed, and the original line could not be traced with any certainty by reference to them. On the other hand, the commissioners of New York considered their authority limited to "ascertaining" the boundary as originally defined; no agreement was reached, and in August, 1859, each State appointed new commissioners; but at their conference at Port Chester, on 13th September, of that year, the same difference of views confronted the commission, and the conference resulted in no practical work. On the 3d of April, 1860, New York passed an act empowering the commission formerly appointed to survey and mark with suitable monuments the "line between the two States as fixed by the survey of 1731." Under this authority the New York commission fixed and marked the boundary line between the two States, placing monuments along the line at intervals of one mile from the Massachusetts line to the mouth of Byram River. The work was completed in the autumn of 1860.

Still unsettled, the question came up by Connecticut threatening to contest her claims, and in 1878 and 1879 both States appointed commissioners to establish the boundaries. An agreement was made, December 5, 1879, whereby the western boundary of Connecticut was fixed as the ex parte line surveyed by New York in 1860, which was the old line of 1731. Connecticut, therefore, gave up her claim to the twenty-six hundred acres in dispute, between the straight line and the line of 1731 as reached, in exchange for her southern boundary extended into the sound. That agreement was ratified by the Legislatures of both States and confirmed by Congress during the session of 1880–81.

TOPOGRAPHY.—The topographical features of the county present much that is strikingly beautiful in scenery, as well as useful in agriculture and manufactures. The surface is broken by ranges of hills running in a direction generally parallel to the Hudson River, and separated by valleys. Of the two general ranges, one borders close upon the Hudson, and the other along the Connecticut boundary line; besides these, many minor ridges and hills diversify the surface, and give to the water-courses a general direction north and south. The heights of the hills range between two hundred and one thousand feet. The continuous valleys, extending north and south have been availed of by the railroads which intersect the county, while other roads in every direction have made the means of inter-communication easy and convenient. These features give to the roads running north and south a generally level character, while those extending across the country east and west are a constant succession of ascents and descents. Occasionally abrupt and rocky hills break the surface, and present obstacles to travel, sometimes inconvenient, but nowhere insurmountable.

The eastern bank of the Hudson River affords a landscape of surpassing beauty, varying with undulating hills and gentle slopes, where countless numbers of villas, cottages, palaces of wealth, clustering villages, and busy towns attest the residence of wealth and taste. Into the Hudson flow all the streams of the county whose water-shed trends to the westward. The hills along the eastern bank of the Hudson rise from three hundred and fifty feet near Hastings to one thousand two hundred and twenty-eight feet at Anthony's Nose promontory, in the northwest corner of the county. The valley of the Bronx River, in the middle section of the county, shows a depression of surface extending from near the centre of the county southward to the Sound. Still farther to the east the Mamaroneck River, emptying into the Sound, as well as the Blind Brook Creek, show a succession of hills and valleys throughout the southern and eastern sections of the county. In the northern part of the county the Croton River and its tributaries, flowing in a southwesterly direction to the Hudson River, at Tappan Bay, mark another valley depression which extends over a large portion of the Northern part of the county. These depressions have in several places created small lakes, of which Croton Lake is entirely artificial. Byram Lake, in Bedford and North Castle, Rye Pond in Harrison (covers two hundred and ten acres), Cross Lake and North and South Ponds, in Poundridge, Waccabuck Lake (covers two hundred and twelve acres), in Lewisboro', Peach Lake, in North Salem, Mohegan and Mohansic Lakes, in Yorktown, and smaller bodies of fresh water in other localities indicate a formation of surface rolling and broken in character, and picturesque and beautiful in landscape. The largest body of water in the county is Croton Lake, artificially formed by the Croton Dam, five miles from the mouth of the Croton River, for supplying the city of New York with water.

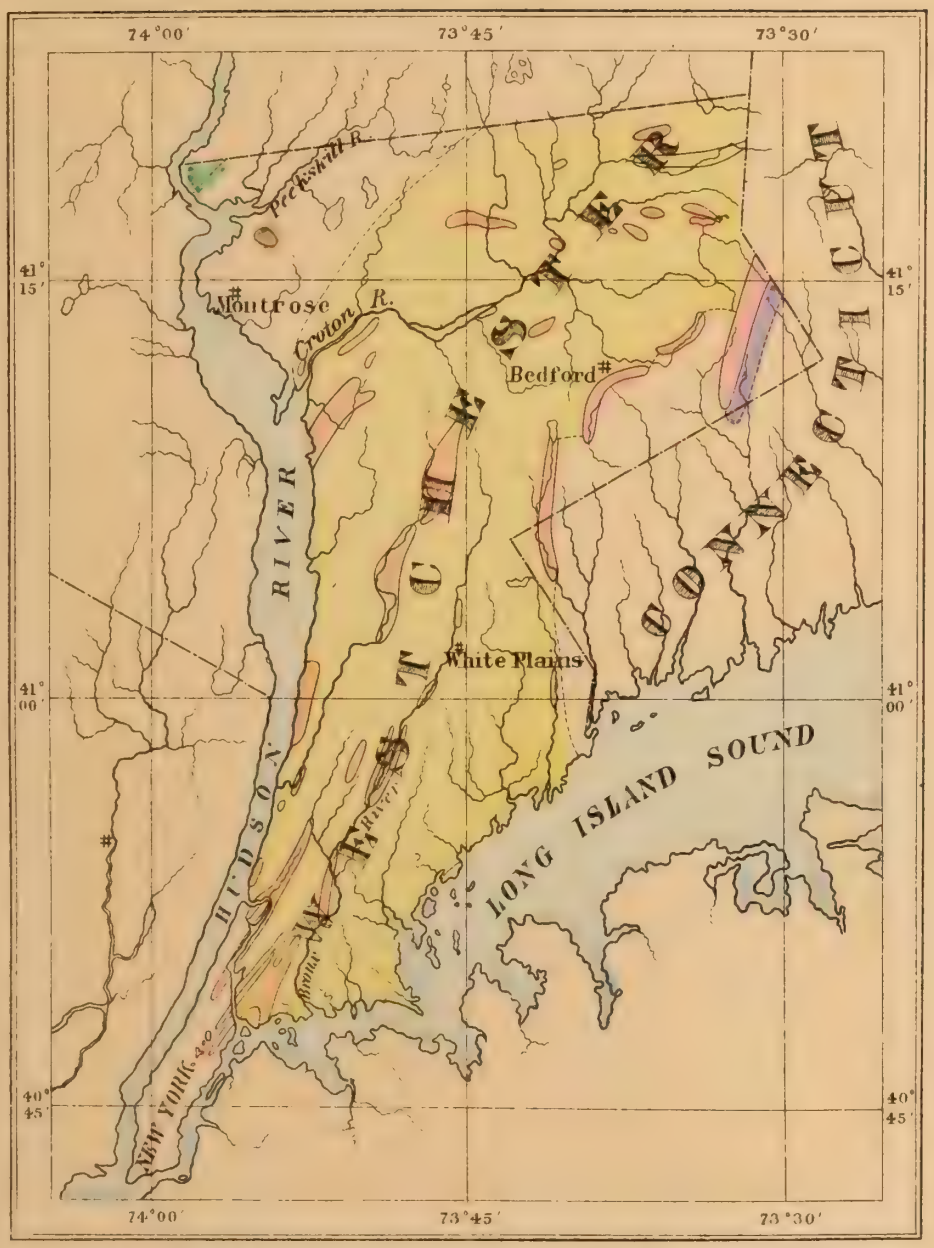
The Croton River, rising in Dutchess County, flows through Putnam County, and entering Westchester directly and through its tributaries drains Somers and part of Yorktown by the Muscoot branch, North Salem, by the Titicus River, Lewisboro', Poundridge and a part of Bedford by the Cross River, and portions of Bedford and New Castle by the Kisco River, and flowing southwesterly, enters the Hudson River at Tappan Bay. The Peekskill Creek, in the northwest corner of the county, flows among the many hills that stud that section and finds its outlet in the Hudson near Peekskill. Furnace Brook, in Cortlandt, is another small tributary of the Hudson. Pocantico River, rising in New Castle, forms the dividing line between Ossining and Mount Pleasant, and through Sleepy Hollow, finds its outlet in the Hudson at Tarrytown. Neperhan, or Saw-Mill River, rises in New Castle, and flowing through Mount Pleasant, Greenburgh and Yonkers, discharges its waters into the Hudson at the city of Yonkers. Tibbitts' Brook, a small stream in Yonkers, empties into the Spuyten Duyvil Creek.

The streams which find their outlet in the Sound are: The Bronx River, which rises in the hills of Mount Pleasant, and North Castle, and flowing southerly, drains a large portion of the southern-middle section of the county. The Westchester Creek, a tidal stream, drains a small part of the southern end of the county and empties into Westchester Bay, an estuary of the Sound. Hutchinson River, rising in Scarsdale, flows southward into Eastchester Bay, on the Sound. Mamaroneck River, rising near White Plains and Harrison, flows into Mamaroneck Harbor, on the Sound. Byram River and Blind Brook are streams which also discharge their waters into the Sound, the former at Port Chester, after draining portions of Bedford, North Castle and Rye, and the latter at Milton, after draining portions of Harrison and Rye. The Maharness, rising in North Castle, and Stamford Mill River, rising in Poundridge, flow into Connecticut and thence to the Sound.

The southern or Sound shore of the county is indented with bays and estuaries, of which Westchester or Pelham Bay and Mamaroneck Harbor are the largest. Peninsulas stretch out into the Sound, of which Throgg's Neck, Pelham's Neck, Davenport's Neck and DeLancey's Neck are the most important. Islands are numerous along the shore of the Sound. The largest are City, Hunter's, David's, Huckleberry and Manaessing Islands.

The railroads that traverse the county are: The New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, which extends along the eastern bank of the Hudson River through the whole length of the county, entering it at Spuyten Duyvil, and leaving it at Anthony's Nose, at the corner of Putnam. At Spuyten Duyvil Creek the main line connects along the north bank to Harlem River Bridge, with the Grand Central Depot, at Forty-second Street. Riverdale Station, the first station in the present Westchester County, presents a beautiful prospect of Yonkers on the north, the Palisades across the river, with the Ramapo range of hills in the distance. Yonkers, Hastings-on-the-Hudson, Dobbs Ferry, Abbotsford, Irvington, Tarrytown, Sing Sing, Croton, Crugers, Verplanck and Peekskill, are the principal stations along the line of this road.



The New York and Harlem River Railroad extends through the central portion of the county, through Morrisania, West Farms, Eastchester, Scarsdale, White Plains, Mount Pleasant, New Castle, Bedford, Lewisboro and North Salem. Mount Vernon, White Plains, Pleasantville, Mt. Kisco, Katonah, and Croton Falls, are the principal villages along its line. At William's Bridge, the New York and New Haven Railroad branches and runs through Eastchester, Pelham, New Rochelle, Mamaroneck, Harrison and Rye.

The New York City and Northern Railroad enters the county in Kingsbridge, and diverging there from the Hudson River Road, passes through Van Cortlandt, South Yonkers, and North Yonkers, up the Neperan Valley through Odells, Ashford, Elmsford or Hall's Corners, and leaves the valley at East Tarrytown; thence by Tarrytown, North Tarrytown, Tarrytown Heights, Whitson, Merritt's Corners, Croton Lake South, Croton Lake North, Yorktown, Amawalk, West Somers, Baldwin Place, Lake Mahopac, Carmel, Tilly Foster's, and terminates at Brewster, where connection is made, via Danbury, with the New England system.

GEOLOGY.[1]—The rocks which compose New York Island, and underlie the adjacent country on the north and east, are chiefly gneiss and mica-schist, with heavy, intercalated beds of coarse-grained, dolomitic marble and thinner layers of serpentine.[2] These are all distinctly stratified, and, according to Prof. Dana, have once been sedimentary beds deposit-

[1] The accompanying geological map of Westchester County was prepared by the officers of the United States Geological Survey, at Washington, D. C., from data prepared by Professor Dana, and presents the latest conclusions of that school of geologists who agree with Prof. Dana as to the Lower Silurian age of the Westchester County rocks. The geological portion of this chapter was written at the office of the Geological Survey, at Washington, and submitted to Prof. McGee, the chief geologist of the survey, and he has approved it as correct and as full as the present information about the section of country will admit. Prof. McGee says that very little is known of the geological age of Westchester County, and that even that little is not accepted by all geologists. Prof. Newberry, differing with Prof. Dana and the United States Survey, holds that the county belongs to the Laurentian age, while the other side place the county region on the Upper Silurian age. We have given the views of both, and followed with the map. We have used Prof. James D. Dana's account of the limestone beds as the most important feature and value which geology points out for the county. Of course we had to abridge as much as possible in order to keep within the limits of our work.

[2] Prof. I. S. Newberry, in Popular Science Monthly, for October, 1878.

Geologic Map of Westchester County, N.Y.

MILES

Metamorphic, Hudson River shales (?)

Metamorphic, Trenton Calciferous limestones (?)

Metamorphic, Potsdam sandstone (?) with associated schists

Georgia slate

Archean

ed horizontally—sandstones, shales and limestones—but now, upheaved and set on edge, are by metamorphism converted into compact crystalline strata, with the obliteration of all fossils—if fossils they contained. The age of these rocks has not yet been accurately determined, although they have been supposed to be Lower Silurian, and a continuation of those which contain the marble beds of Western Massachusetts and Vermont. There are some reasons, however, why they should be regarded as still older. That they do not form the southern prolongation of the marble belt of Vermont is indicated by the facts that both the marble beds and the rocks associated with them are so unlike in the two localities that they can hardly be parts of the same formation. In Vermont the marbles occur in what is essentially a single belt, are fine-grained, unusually banded and mottled, are nearly pure carbonates of lime, and the rocks immediately associated with them are gray siliceous limestones, quartzites and slates. In Westchester County and on New York Island, on the contrary, the marbles are very coarsely crystalline dolomites (double carbonates of lime and magnesia), which occur in a number of parallel belts, are generally of uniform white or whitish color, and have no rocks associated with them that can represent the quartzites and argillites of Vermont.

On the east bank of the Hudson, at and above New York, we have: 1st. A belt of crystalline rocks forming apparently a continuous series to and beyond the Connecticut line; 2d. Strata set nearly vertical, once forming high hills or mountains, now worn down by long exposure to a more rolling surface; 3d. The series composed chiefly of gneiss and crystalline schists, with heavy beds of dolomite marble and thinner bands of serpentine; and 4th. Containing in its western portion, where it adjoins the New Jersey iron-belt—with which it is inseparably connected—important beds of magnetic iron-ore, while apatite is one of the most common disseminated minerals. For these and other reasons Mr. Newberry regards the New York rocks as belonging to the Laurentian age.

On the other hand, Prof. James D. Dana[1] holds that Westchester County is comprised within the Green Mountain region, that it borders the southern side of the Putnam County Archæan, as Dutchess County does the northern, and resembles in its order that part of the Green Mountain region which now makes Western Connecticut. The topographical features of the county owe much to the lime-stone belts, which, by their easy erosion, have determined the courses of river valleys, and the lines of marshes along such valleys, as well as located many of the lakes. The beds of this soft rock stand nearly vertical, thus favoring the excavation of deep channels. The valleys are sometimes abrupt on both sides, but usually have one side high, precipitous and rocky, and the other gently sloping; and this is largely due, in connection with the erosion, to the pitch or dip of the beds. But the pitch of the beds may not have been the only cause of the form of the valleys. Prof. Dana holds that the throw of the waters against the right bank of a stream (the western if flowing south, or the northern if flowing west), in consequence of the earth's rotation, may have had its effects, and may possibly account for the cases in which the western side is the steep one, notwithstanding a vertical or even a high eastern pitch.

The lime-stone belts of the county are divided by Prof. Dana into: 1st, the Southern section of the county, from New York Island to White Plains; 2d, The Middle section, from White Plains to Croton Lake; and 3d, the Northern section, north of the Croton Lake.

The southern section is composed of three areas or belts which, commencing in New York Island, extend for two or three miles into Westchester County. The first of these areas, the Tremont, extends from Fordham southward to Harlem River, and thence into New York Island. It reaches the Harlem River by two lines—a western at Mott-Haven and an eastern at the mouth of Morris Hill Brook, west of Brooke Avenue. The second belt of the southern section, that of "the Clove" follows Cromwell's Creek, north of Central (or McComb's Dam) Bridge and the brook emptying into it. The most southern outcrop occurs about a mile north of the Bridge; it again outcrops near the "Club House." This belt probably continues southward into New York Island. The third area of the southern section is a prominent feature of the north end of New York Island, from which it extends three miles northward into Westchester County along Tippitt's Brook. The Harlem River makes a deep cut through it at Kingsbridge; and where the abutments of High Bridge rest, disappearing there, outcrops at points in Tippitt's Valley as far as nearly three miles from Kingsbridge. Just above the point of junction of the Harlem and New Haven Railroads ledges of lime-stone are visible, and were cut into in grading the railroad tracks.

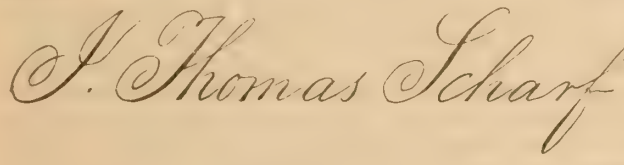
The areas of serpentine, with some calcareous material, appear at New Rochelle and Rye. At Yonkers the lime-stone area follows the course of a north and south bend on Saw-Mill Creek, with a width of at least one hundred feet. There are indications of a more eastern belt along the Saw-Mill River Valley just north of the city. On Grassy Sprain Brook a small area exists with a width to the south of five hundred yards. On the Bronx River a lime-stone belt begins near Bronxville, and tapers out to the south, while to the north, and for the most of its course, it is divided into two parts, separated by a band of mica-schist and gneiss. The Hastings belt occurs along the Hudson to the north of Yonkers.

[1] Paper on the Geological Relations of the Lime-stone Belts of Westchester County, N. Y., American Journal of Science.

In the middle section of the county, in the Saw-Mill River Valley, a large lime-stone area commences about two and a half miles north of Ashford, and widening at East Tarrytown, continues northward to a near junction with the Pleasantville area. This last-mentioned area is also broad and sinuous in its course, terminating just north of Chappaqua Depot. The Sing Sing belt commences south of the depot on the Hudson and extends north-northeast nearly to the boundary of the town of Ossining; it also branches eastward up a small valley towards the Camp Woods. Half a mile east of the village of Croton occurs a small area without distinguishable features, and south of the Croton River a narrow area extends from near "Quaker Bridge" to the forcation of the river at Huntersville. At Merritt's Corner, and on the east border of Croton Lake, as well as near Bedford Station, small areas of lime-stone are indicated. East of the Pleasantville belt, on the border of New York and Connecticut, lies a lime-stone area, which extends along the course of Byram River to its source in Byram Lake. To the northeast of Byram Lake, following a valley along the head-waters of Mianus River, as well as another along that of Stone Hill River, the outcroppings of lime-stone indicate an area which completes the list of areas in the middle section of the county.

THE COBBLING-STONE, IN SOMERS.

The areas of the northern section of the county to some extent tend toward the east and west in trend and in the strike of the beds. The large eastern area of the northeast extends into Connecticut; that at Cruger's Station lies mostly to the south and east of the station. At Verplanck's Point, and up Sprout Brook Valley or Canopus Hollow, extends an area nearly five miles in length.



Prof. Dana regards Westchester County as topographically a southern portion of the Green Mountain elevation; that the grade of metamorphism follows the same rule as to the north—that is, it is of greatest intensity to the eastward and to the southward. It is in accordance with this that the least degrees of metamorphism are found in the lime-stone and associated schists of the vicinity of Peekskill, in the northwest corner, while along the central and eastern portions of the county, and in the western, also, south of the Croton, the crystallization is commonly very coarse; that the lime-stones have the same kind of associated rocks—that is, of mica-schists and gneisses—as the eastern and more metamorphic portions of the region in Connecticut; that the lime-stones have a like paucity in disseminated minerals and similar occurring species with those of Connecticut; and that the ordinary normal trend of the rocks—north 10° east to north 20° east—is very nearly the average trend of the beds of lime-stone and associated rocks in the Green Mountain system.

Prof. Dana's conclusions are that: "The lime-stone of Westchester County and New York Island and the conformably associated metamorphic rocks are probably of Lower Silurian age."

The soils of the county are made up of the abrasions and disintegration of the gneiss, feldspar and lime-stone rocks, with considerable districts largely composed of sand and more limited areas of clay. As a whole, the soil may be called a light loam. It is generally favorable to the growth of cereals. The valleys have the addition of vegetable matter and are very productive of the rich natural grasses which abound here. The hillsides have suffered from washing by heavy rains, but yield abundant crops to good cultivation. About the hill-tops and along the summits of the ridges the rocks generally crop out, so that these localities are mostly left to be covered with forest growths, adding greatly to the beauty of the scenery. In many places in the county there are peat swamps, where ancient lakes have been filled with the accumulation of vegetable matter and the growth of sphagnum moss. This peat, when pressed and dried, makes excellent fuel. The great differences in elevation and exposure, together with the variety of soils, cause a remarkably large flora. In round numbers, about twelve hundred flowering plants and fifty varieties of ferns have been found here.

The surface of the county has been much affected by glacial action and drift deposits. Croton Point, on the Hudson, and other places in the county show evidences of glacial moraines. Deep striæ and lighter scratches still remain upon many exposed rock surfaces and others have been smoothly polished. Immense numbers of boulders are scattered over the surface. The most of these are of granite, brought from Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Some are of conglomerate from across the Hudson River and others have great numbers of shell fossils.

A remarkable boulder is found in Somers. It stands on the hill directly northeast of Muscoot Mountain in the southwestern part of Somers, and from its top can be seen the blue hills of Long Island across the sound, the northern elevations of Dutchess County and the distant lands of Connecticut. To the west it overlooks Yorktown and Cortlandt. One side of this curious rock has the appearance of an Indian's face. It is an immense mass of red granite, said to be the only specimen in the county, and is perched upon three lime-stone points, two feet or more above the surface of the ground, and four hundred feet above the Muscoot Valley. It was doubtless brought here by a glacier or dropped from an iceberg, which is mentioned in the old deeds as the "Cobbling Stone."

CHAPTER II.

THE INDIANS OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY.

BY JAMES WOOD, A.M.

President of the Westchester County Historical Society.

THE 13th day of September, 1609, marked the point of division between the pre-historic and the historic periods of the district of country now known as Westchester County. On that day Henry Hudson, the intrepid English navigator, anchored his vessel, the "Half-Moon," in the newly-discovered river, near the site of the present city of Yonkers. The dawn of the following day disclosed the residents of the village of Nappeckamak gathered upon the eastern shore, and viewing with wonder, but with a kindly interest, the strange revelation before them. We now know much, although far too little, of what has since transpired here; but we know almost nothing of the events of the untold centuries that preceded that day.

The European discoverers of North America found the continent peopled with millions of human beings, of types analogous to those of the Old World, and with characteristics almost equally varied. In stature they covered a wide range, from the dwarf-like denizens of the far north to the vigorous inhabitants of other sections, whose height averaged, in the men, fully six feet. In activity and courage they excited the admiration of their discoverers. Their color was unique, and was imagined to resemble that of copper; but further investigation showed that this color varied greatly. Some of the natives were found to be nearly as dark as negroes, while in other sections they were almost as light as Caucasians. They spoke many hundred different languages, which showed striking analogies in their grammatical construction, with equally striking disparity in their vocabulary. The goal sought by these discoverers was India, and, imagining that they had found its outlying provinces, they called the inhabitants of the new land Indians.

It would be the merest conjecture to attempt to state how long man had occupied the American continent. Apart from the length of time required for producing new languages, or even dialects, and from all ethnological considerations, there are facts connected with his existence here that indicate a period of almost incalculable antiquity. Of the animals found in the New World, none were identical with those known in the Old, and in the vegetable kingdom the same rule held almost as absolutely. Maize and tobacco were cultivated in every portion of the country where the climate suited their requirements, while cotton was grown in a section necessarily more limited in area. We may reasonably suppose that man existed here for a long time before he discovered the fitness of maize for food, and for a much longer period before he began its cultivation; and then it must have required centuries to introduce it to general cultivation over nearly a hundred degrees of latitude in the two continents. It is well known that plants change their character very slowly; but maize, tobacco and cotton had so long been subjected to the transforming influences of cultivation as to have lost all resemblance to their original forms, so that they could no longer be identified with the wild species. The force of this consideration is heightened when we remember that, in this transformation, these plants became entirely dependent upon cultivation for their existence.

In some portions of the continent the great antiquity of man is proven by the remains of his structures still existing; but as none of these were found in this section, the subject need not be considered here.

Closely connected with the question of the time of man's existence here is that of his origin. How came he here? The question has received much consideration. The attempts to designate particular nations as the original peoplers of the American continent, whether they were the Lost Tribes of Israel the Phœnicians or the Chinese, have so utterly failed to convince inquirers, that they have been generally abandoned. The autochthonic theory, the theory of indigenous origin, has had many strong arguments produced in its favor. Some of its advocates suppose that the Creator placed an original pair of human beings here, as Holy Scripture teaches that He did in the Eastern Hemisphere. But these arguments come short of conviction. The advocates of the theory of development that would find the ancestor of man in the monkey, have abandoned all idea of the change having taken place here, as the American continent has furnished no species of the apes, nor the remains of any such species from which man could have been developed.

They all admit that narrow-nosed apes could alone have been the ancestors of man, and no such apes—no catarrhine simiadæ—have existed here.

When we look at the conditions on either side of the continent, we cannot suppose that it was at all impossible for men, at any indefinitely remote period, to have found their way hither. The climatic changes of past periods, at some time, may have made the route by Behring's Straits entirely practicable. The route by the Aleutian Islands is not difficult now to canoe navigators. The Pacific currents frequently cast the wrecks of Japanese vessels upon our northwestern shores. The islands of the South Pacific afforded a probable way of communication, and it is believed that many have disappeared, comparatively recently, beneath the surface. On the Atlantic side the difficulties were by no means insurmountable, even if we ignore "the lost Atlantis." The trade-winds and equatorial currents carried Cabral and his Portuguese fleet, bound around the Cape of Good Hope, to the American shores, and led to the accidental discovery of Brazil. On his second voyage Columbus found, in a house on the island of Gaudaloupe, the stern-post of an European vessel. In various periods of the past the same forces may have brought men to these shores.

It is probable that America was peopled from various sources, and at widely separated periods. These must have been very remote to afford time for the production of the conditions found existing here.

The aborigines of Westchester County belonged to the great family of Indians called the Algonquin Lenape. Their connection with the Mound-Builders of the Mississippi Valley, with the Aztecs of Mexico, or with the builders of the wonderful structures found in Central America, if any ever existed, must have been extremely remote. Their traditions referred in a very vague way to long journeys from the northwest, and great suffering from cold on their way hither, and of contests with a people who occupied the country before them. Of their own history they were lamentably ignorant. Their computation of time by moons and revolving cycles led all investigations into inextricable confusion. Any event beyond an individual's recollection floated vaguely in the boundless past. No records of any kind were made. For these reasons the Europeans were able to obtain from this people very little information of themselves or their fathers. They existed here for unnumbered centuries, and then passed away, leaving behind them no sign to mark their occupation of the country, save a few simple implements of stone, and no structure of any kind memorializes their power or attests their strength or skill. We are thus singularly destitute of nearly all means for acquiring accurate knowledge of this people's history.

The Algonquin tribes occupied nearly the whole Atlantic seaboard, and their language necessarily was widely diffused. It has been found more fertile in dialects than any other aboriginal speech. It was strangely agglutinative, and gave expression to thought by stringing words together into an extended compound. It was the mother-tongue of those who greeted Raleigh's colonists on the Roanoke, of those who boarded the "Half-Moon" on the Hudson, and of those who welcomed and fed the Pilgrims at Plymouth. It was heard from the land of the Esquimo to the Savannah River and from the Bay of Gaspe to the Mississippi.

It is not necessary to investigate the national divisions of the Algonquins further than to state that the Mohegans occupied the country along the left bank of the Hudson River, called Mahicannittuk, and eastward to the Connecticut, and from Long Island Sound northward to the mouth of the Mohawk, and perhaps to Lake Champlain. Their country was called Laaphawachking. North and west of the Mohegans were the powerful and warlike Iroquois, their immediate neighbors being the Horicans and Mohawks. Across the Hudson, below Catskill, were tribes belonging to the Delaware nation, and east of the Connecticut were the Pequots. Long Island was occupied by Mohegan tribes. It has been stated that at the time of discovery the Mohegans were under military subjection to the Iroquois, and were compelled to pay an annual tribute to them. This is not substantiated by investigation, for we find no reference to it in any of the treaties made by these tribes with the whites, nor was such a thing ever alluded to in all the protracted negotiations between them.

The subdivisions of the tribes were very numerous. They had advantages for local government and the preservation of order. The form of government was very simple. Each local tribe had its ruler, called the sachem. He was also their representative in the general councils, which were composed of the representatives of the smaller tribes of the nation. They were presided over by the national grand sachem, who occupied the position of a sovereign. These councils assembled only in cases requiring concerted action, as in a general war. In all other matters the local tribes were independent, and declared war for themselves, or made peace without consulting their brother tribes. The national obligation was imperative, and treason to the decisions of a council was punished with death. Each nation had its emblem, or totem, which served the purpose of the flag of a civilized nation. These were used in times of war, and were drawn upon trees and rocks to indicate that the tribes had taken up the hatchet and had gone upon the war-path. The Mohegan totem was a wolf, and in declaring war the animal was represented with its dexter paw raised in a threatening manner. The name Mohegan meant "Enchanted Wolf." Their military forces had regular forms of organization and discipline. The companies from the local tribes had their commanders, who were selected for their prowess and achievements in arms. The united forces were commanded by chiefs who had obtained military distinction, and these stood in rank according to their services and their reputation for bravery, prudence, cunning and good fortune.

There was but little need for civil government, as their chief possessions were held in common, and where personal property existed, the owner's rights were recognized.

It is probable that these local tribes were communities of blood relations, who readily recognized the patriarchal authority of their sachem and who held their lands in common. Doubtless, they closely resembled the clans and septs of Great Britain and Ireland, without the land being held either by tanistry or gavel-kind. The sachems received their support by the free contributions of the community. The ownership of land depended upon conceded original occupation or upon conquest. If obtained by conquest, all original rights became vested in the conquerors, and if it was re-conquered, these returned to the original owner. They had but little idea of title to land. They valued only its occupation and use. The game that filled the forests and the fish that swarmed in the waters gave a value that they well appreciated, and they also prized their cultivable tracts.

There is much uncertainty regarding the subdivisions of the tribes in any given district, and if the question of their location were left to the statements and maps of the early European settlers, it well might be abandoned as hopeless. Fortunately, the title-deeds given to the settlers supply considerable information, which, though not perfect, enables us to locate the sub-tribes with tolerable accuracy. Yet the boundaries of such tracts as were sold by the aborigines were designated with much uncertainty by the Indian names of rivers, brooks and rivulets, hills, ponds and meadows, which are sometimes difficult to locate. Treaties made between the settlers and the Indians assist us in the undertaking.

The island upon which the city of New York has been built was occupied by the Manhattans. Their territory also extended along the Mahicanituk, or Hudson River, northward to the Neperhan, or Saw-Mill River, and eastward to the Aquehung, or Bronx River. Between the Neperhan and the Pocantico were the Weckquaesgeeks. The Sint Sinks occupied the land between the Pocantico and the Kitchawan, or Croton River. North of the Croton were the Kitchawancs, whose lands extended to Anthony's Nose and the Highlands, and eastward across the northern portion of Westchester County. East of the Manhattans, occupying the territory along the Sound, were the Siwanoys, who also occupied the southwestern portion of Connecticut. North of the Siwanoys were the Tankitekes, occupying the central and eastern portions of the county. The western end of Long Island was occupied by the Canarsees. The Rockaways, Merricks, Marsapequas, Matinecocks, Corchangs, Manhassets, Secatogues, Patchogues, Shinnecocks and Montauks extended eastward, in the order named. West of the Hudson were the Navesinks, Raritans, Hackinsacks, Tappans and Haverstraws. Above the Highlands, upon the eastern side of the river, were the Nochpeens and the Wappingers. Eastward, in Connecticut, was the large chieftaincy of the Sequins.

That the Indians of Westchester were very numerous is proven by the fact that over fifteen hundred warriors were at one time in arms against the whites, and also by the number of their large villages. These villages were located where there were special advantages for fishing, or where a light and easily-worked soil was favorable for cultivation.

The Manhattans had three villages upon Manhattan Island. Their largest village in this county was Nappeckamak, which occupied the site of the present city of Yonkers. At the southern end of the original township of Yonkers, overlooking the Hudson River (Mahicanituk) and Spuyten Duyvil Creek (Papirinimen,) they had a fortress which they called Nipinichsen.

The Weckquaesgeeks had their principal village at the mouth of Wysquaqua, where the village of Dobb's Ferry now stands. It was called by the tribal name. Until recently its site was designated by extensive shell-beds. They had another village at the mouth of the Pocantico, on the site now occupied by Tarrytown. This village was called Alipconck. They had another village by the Neperhan, west of White Plains.

The Sint Sinks had a village called Ossing-Sing, where "The Kill" empties into the Hudson at Sing Sing. They had a smaller village at the mouth of the Kitchawan or Croton River.

The Kitchawancs had a large village upon Van Cortlandt's Neck, connecting Croton Point with the mainland. They had here the strongest fortress of any in the county. Like Nipinichsen, it was a heavily-palisaded stockade. They had another village upon Verplanck's Point and a larger one called Sackhoes, where Peekskill now stands.

The Siwanoys were a numerous tribe. They had a village upon Pelham Neck, in the present town of Pelham; another on Davenport's Neck, in New Rochelle; and their largest settlement upon the shores of Rye Pond, in the present town of Harrison. Here was a very extensive burial-ground. There was also a settlement near Rye Beach. They had another village in the southern part of the town of Westchester, near Bear Swamp. They had an important castle upon what is still known as Castle Hill, west of Westchester Creek.

The Tankitekes had a village by Wampus Lake, in the town of North Castle, where the Sachem Wampus resided. They also had a village near Pleasantville, in the town of Mount Pleasant. There was a settlement by the Mehanas River, near the present village of Bedford. There was also a village where the Cross River (Peppensghek) unites with the Croton or Kitchawan, near the present site of Katonah. Here are still visible the remains of extensive stone fish-weirs, in the bed of the Croton River, that were built by the Indians. Besides the villages named, there were doubtless many more of whose existence no account has come down to us.

That the Indians occupied this section in great numbers is rendered probable by the character of the country and its surroundings. The whole county is remarkably well watered and its soil produced an abundance of rich natural grasses. These conditions caused an abundance of game. The lands bordering the Beaver Dam River in Bedford were called "the deer's delight." The numerous lakes and streams throughout the county were well stocked with fish. These were taken with lines and nets, the cordage of which was made of twisted fibres of the dogbane and the sinews of the deer. Hooks were fashioned of the sharpened bones of fishes and birds. Weirs, fish-traps and spears were also employed. Deer and other game were taken by other means besides hunting with the bow and arrow. The English settlers found in good preservation, in the town of Poundridge, an extensive trap which they called a pound, and from which the township had its name. It was situated at the south end of the ridge, not far from the present village, and inclosed the spring of water which still flows there. It was built of logs held together by what the English called saddle-stones, was twelve or fourteen feet high, and inclosed an acre or more of ground. From its narrow entrance there extended palisaded wings in each direction, so as to cross the valley and run up the adjacent hillsides. The valleys from the south and southwest come together here by the subsidence of the intervening ridges. The Indians in considerable numbers would start in the early morning many miles away, and would "beat the bush" with hideous yells, working in the direction of the trap, while parties ran along the ridges on the right and left to prevent lateral escapes, and thus they drove before them the game of every description until they came to the wings of the trap, which led everything into the inclosure. Then the entrance was closed and all secured. In this way great numbers of deer and other game were taken.

Important as were the food supplies obtained from the forests and streams, they were greatly increased by those from the surrounding waters. The Hudson River and the Sound make the situation of the county a remarkable one. These waters teemed with fish, which furnished the attraction to the villagers living upon their shores. In seasons of abundance, like the running of the shad in the spring-time, quantities of fish were dried and smoked, and thus preserved for future use. Shell-fish were extensively used. Along the Sound the numerous shell-heaps attested the Indians' appreciation of the oyster. These shell-heaps resemble those of European countries, which, with the "kitchen-middens," have received so much attention from archæologists. So extensive were these shell-heaps upon City Island, now forming part of the township of Pelham, that they gave to the surrounding waters the name of "the great bay of the island of shells." Similar heaps were found upon Berrian's Neck, in the township of Yonkers, and at the various village sites along the Hudson. The largest of these were upon Croton Point, where considerable areas are still covered with them to the depth of two or three feet.

This beautiful projection of land was called Senasqua, one of the softest of Indian names, and in the adjacent waters of Tappan and Haverstraw Bays great quantities of oysters are still found and are taken elsewhere for increased growth. Before the country was settled by the whites and the forests were cleared away, a much greater percentage of the rain-fall evaporated from the surface of the land and less flowed away in the streams. On this account, the water of the Hudson was much more salt than now, and more favorable to the oyster's development. To overlook and protect the important oyster-beds of this wide portion of the river, the fort upon Van Cortlandt's neck was erected. It is an interesting fact that where these shells have remained undisturbed they are nearly all found whole, showing that the Indians opened the oysters without breaking them. It was probably accomplished by exposure to the sun. None of them have been exposed to fire. A remarkable number and variety of stone implements have been found here, and here a place of burial has been recently discovered.

But the aboriginal inhabitants of Westchester did not depend alone upon the food derived from the chase and taken from the waters. They cultivated the land much more extensively than is generally supposed. The European navigators of the Hudson were impressed by the extent of the fields of maize. Suitable lands along the Sound were similarly used, and throughout the interior the early white settlers found their difficulties greatly lessened by the extent of the lands already cleared and prepared for their immediate use.

The Indian's success in the cultivation of land was remarkable, when we consider the disadvantages under which he labored. It must be remembered that he had taught no animal to assist him in his labor. He had no flock or herd, nor any kind of poultry. His dog was a worthless creature, resembling a cross between the fox and the wolf, and was only the lazy sharer of his cabin or the playmate of his children, and was not trained to usefulness in the chase. He had no iron nor any other metal, except rare specimens of native copper, brought from the shores of Lake Superior and worn as ornaments, or, perhaps, fashioned into highly-prized spear-heads. In the present "iron age," when every required tool is ready-fashioned to our hand, it is difficult for us to imagine such a situation. How could he work the soil? How attack a tree? How obtain an implement of any description? In his various operations he had three agents—stone, wood and fire. He sometimes employed the first in the cultivation of his crops, but more often his only implement was a poor hoe made from the shell of the clam or the shoulder-blade of the deer.

On this account he worked no soils but those that were light and easily stirred. Unfortunately, such were quickly exhausted, and then failed to yield abundant returns for his labor. His only means of restoring fertility was in the use of fish as a manure. Menhaden were his chief reliance for this purpose, and on this account the corn-fields were most extensive near the shores. His most important crop was maize, and upon this he relied, very largely, for his subsistence in winter. It was roasted while young, and when matured and dry was ground into meal by stone pestles and mortars, and when this was moistened with water and baked upon heated stones the product was called "nookhik," from which have come "nocake" and "hoe-cake." The grain was preserved after harvest by being buried in the dryest places under a thatch of coarse grass and boughs. Next in importance to maize was the sieva bean. It was extensively raised and boiled alone or with the green-corn. The latter dish was called "succotash." The boiling was accomplished in bowls of steatite, or in vessels of rude pottery. In addition to these, pumpkins were grown. These were readily baked before the fire. Wild fruits and nuts, in their seasons, also contributed to his support and enjoyment. Tobacco was also grown here, but we cannot learn how extensively. With their requirements for food thus met, the Indians here were not destitute of the means of comfortable clothing. The country abounded with fur-bearing animals. Beavers were very numerous. The names of Beaver Meadows, scattered throughout the county, and that of Beaver Dam River, in the upper portion, attest this. Van der Donck, the patron of Yonkers, wrote, in 1656, that eighty thousand of these were annually killed in this quarter of the country. In November, 1624, among the cargo of the first laden vessel from New to Old Amsterdam were 7246 beaver-skins, 675 skins of otters, 48 of mink, 36 wild-cat and various other sorts. In Wassenares' "History of the New Netherlands," it is narrated: "The tribes are in the habit of clothing themselves with otter-skins, the fur inside, the smooth side without; which, however, they paint so beautifully that at a distance it resembles lace. When they bring their commodities to the traders, and find they are desirous to buy them, they make so little matter of it that they rip up the skins they are clothed with and sell them also, returning naked to their homes. They use the beaver-skins mostly for the sleeves and the otter for the rest of the clothes." Their most elegant garments were mantles made of feathers, overlapping each other, as upon the birds themselves. Sometimes these were artistic productions of real beauty. They made leggins and moccasins of deer-skins. The men always went bare-headed, and, in the summer, wore nothing beside a short garment about the loins, called, by the white settlers, "Indian breeches." The women dressed their glossy hair in a thick, heavy plait. Their dress usually consisted of two garments, —a leather shirt and a skirt of the same material fastened around the waist, with a belt and reaching below the knees. From these various considerations, we can understand how a large population could exist in comparative comfort in this section.

MORTAR AND PESTLE[1]

Found near Croton River, in Yorktown. The pestle is 18 inches long.

The Indian houses were made by planting poles in the ground and binding them together at the top. These were covered with bark or thatched with reeds and rushes, so as to be impervious to rain. Their beds were made of evergreen boughs, covered with skins and furs. Their furniture was extremely simple. Besides the before-mentioned pots for cooking, they had wooden bowls for holding their food and wooden spoons for handling it. Mats made of rushes sometimes covered the floors of their huts. They had buckets ingeniously made of birch-bark, so as to be water-tight, and baskets of various sizes, made of splints, rushes or grass. Their villages were composed of houses closely huddled together about a central space, which was used for the transaction of public business, for ceremonies and amusements. Besides the manufactures already named there were others that attested the Indian's skill. He made boats of two kinds. One consisted of a light, wooden frame, covered with birch-bark, skillfully and tastefully fastened at the seams; this boat was peculiarly valuable on long journeys, as its lightness allowed it to be easily carried from the waters of one stream to those of another. The other boat was a much heavier affair, fashioned from the trunk of a tree. The wood was charred by heated stones and then scraped away with stone gouges. These boats were sometimes thirty or more feet in length, and were capable of carrying a considerable number of passengers. In some of the sales of land to the white settlers along the Sound the Indians reserved "the white-wood trees, suitable for making canoes of."

[1] The Indian specimens illustrating this chapter are from the interesting and valuable private collection of Mr. James Wood, of Mt. Kisco, Westchester County.

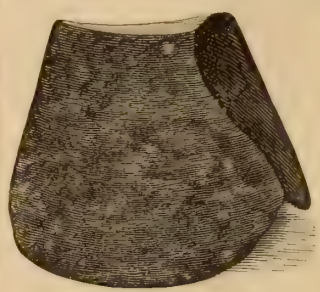
PARTLY DRILLED PIECE OF STEATITE.[1]



In nothing was the Indian's skill more strikingly shown than in his manufacture of implements of stone. These were mortars and pestles, axes, hatchets, adzes, gouges, chisels, cutting tools, skinning tools, perforators, arrow and spear-heads, scrapers, mauls, hammer-stones, sinkers, pendants, pierced tablets, polishers, pipes and ceremonial stones. Specimens of all these have been found in Westchester County. The mortars were usually bowl-like depressions worn into some rock beside the village site, where the women could conveniently resort to grind the corn. Sometimes they were made in portable stones. The pestles were from two to three inches in diameter and from six to twenty inches in length, and generally of fine sandstone, greenstone or hornblende. Axes were made of varieties of greenstone, syenite, granite, porphyry and sandstone. They may be described as wedges, encircled by a groove near the heavy end. They varied in weight from half a pound to six or eight pounds. The groove was made for securely fastening the handle. This was bound with pieces of raw hide, or sometimes a young tree was cleft while yet growing, and the axe, being inserted, was left in the proper position until the growth had closely formed about it. Adzes, gouges and chisels were made of tough greenstone and hornblende, and were used in the manufacture of their canoes. The cutting tools were leaf-shaped implements made of flint or jasper, finely chipped to an edge, which combined in its cutting the principles of the saw and the knife. There were also flakes of obsidian that had sharp cutting edges. Skinning tools, or celts, were wedge-shaped implements made of many kinds of stone, worked to a fine edge at one end, and generally polished. Perforators were delicately wrought of flint or jasper. Scrapers, were small implements of flint used in dressing skins. Arrow and spear-heads form the best known class of Indian implements, and have been found here in great numbers. They were made of flint, jasper, chert, hornstone, quartz and a variety of other stones. The spear-heads were from two to eight and ten inches in length, while the arrow-points were smaller and lighter, and many specimens of each were beautifully wrought. Some were worked by blows and some by dropping water upon the heated stone. Occasionally throughout the county quantities of flint chips are found on some Indian village site, where the ancient arrow-maker had his workshop. Mauls and hammer-stones were made of several varieties of tough stones. The former were grooved for hafting, and the latter were

HORNBLENDE AXE.
Found in Bedford.

POLISHED FLESHER.

FLESHER WITH HANDLE.

[1] With black flint drill found in hole. These specimens were found at Croton Point, and Mr. James Wood says they are unique.

circular or elliptical, two and a half inches in diameter, or three in greatest length, and an inch in thickness, with slight depressions worked at the middle of the sides for the thumb and finger. They usually show

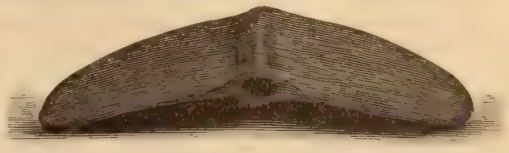
GROOVED HAMMER,
With castle.

POLISHED AXE.

evidences of wear at the circumference or ends. Large numbers of these have been found along the Hudson. Sinkers were used in weighting the nets, and were simple flat stones, notched at the opposite edges.

HOE OF GREY FLINT, 7¼ BY 5½ INCHES.

Pendants were pear-shaped, pointed at one end and grooved near the other. Pierced tablets were used in twisting the bow-strings or worn as ornaments. Some remarkable specimens of these, notched as if kept as



FLINT KNIFE,
8¼ by 3 inches.

FLINT KNIFE,
8 by 3¼ inches.

records, have been found here. Pipes have not been found in great numbers, but some of the specimens are very interesting. They are made of greenstone, steatite and sometimes were fashioned of clay. They represent birds, or the heads of birds, turtles and various animals, the beaver more frequently than others. Ceremonial stones were the most finely wrought of all the Indian's stone-work. They were carried as evidences of rank, or to excite a superstitious reverence. They were wrought from serpentine or a fine and beautiful striped slate, and were drilled so that they could be carried upon a rod or handle. This striped slate, so far as is known, was nowhere found nearer than Canada. The few specimens of obsidian found here must have come from the Rocky Mountain region. Three or four spear-heads, hammered from native copper, that have been found here must have been brought from the shores of Lake Superior, while the flints and jaspers, from which so many arrow-heads were made, must have been brought a considerable distance. These facts prove that the Mohegans carried on commerce of exchange with other tribes, and thus obtained articles that had been brought from very remote localities.

CEREMONIAL STONE OF GREEN.

PIERCED RECORD TABLET.[1]

Holes were drilled through stones for ornament or use by a drill of flint, or a reed with water and sand. These were worked by a bow-string.

The bow was an important article of the Indian's outfit, and was his chief weapon in war and in the chase. It was skillfully fashioned from ash or hickory-wood, and was strung with the sinews of the deer.

Another important article of manufacture was wampum, which was their medium of exchange, or money. It was made from the shell of the quohog, or hard-shell clam. It was cylindrical in form, a quarter of an inch long, and in diameter less than a pipe-stem, drilled lengthwise, so as to be strung upon a thread. The beads of a white color rated at half the value of the black or violet, made from the portion where the contracting muscle of the clam is attached to the shell. They were used for ornament as well as for coin, and ten thousand or more were sometimes wrought into the belt of some great chieftain. The district about Byram Lake was called Cohemong, which meant the place where wampum is made.

GROOVED HAMMER.

[1] Six by two inches, found in Bedford.

There have been but few unbroken specimens of Indian pottery found in Westchester County, but BIRD AND TORTOISE PIPE.

Found in New Castle.

DUCKS' HEAD PIPE.
Found in Bedford.

numerous fragments, some of considerable size, are in existence. These are all quite rude, although some show attempts at ornamentation. On Croton Point, where the clay was favorable for this manufacture, a trench has been discovered containing numerous fragments of earthen vessels, along with charcoal, indicating that here may have been a simple kiln for burning pottery.

In the manufacture of all these various articles, some of which required a great amount of labor, besides the time necessarily taken in hunting and fishing and in the cultivation of their crops, our Indians must have been pretty fully occupied, and we can scarcely believe them to have spent so much time in idleness as is generally supposed.

BLACK FLINT KNIFE.

In their domestic relations the Mohegans were not depraved. The lover courted his chosen maiden with presents of ornaments, and won the favor of her parents with gifts of wampum. The consent of the sachem was obtained to their marriage, and he usually joined their hands together and they went away as man and wife. The man had but one wife, unless he was a sachem or occupied an exceptionally high position. The marriage tie was respected, and unfaithfulness was looked upon as a crime. In cases of separation the wife was given her share of the goods and departed, being then at liberty to marry again. The Mohegans were never charged with licentiousness, as were Indians elsewhere. The women were described as modest and coy in their behavior, and they indignantly repelled all improper advances made by the whites. There is no account of any insulting treatment having been offered to female white captives. Children were kindly treated, but knew little of parental restraint. The girls were early taught quiet submission to the labors of their position, and the boys were encouraged to independence, and trained to become skillful in the chase and in war.

FLINT PERFORATOR.

FLINT SKIN SCRAPER.

If any deformed children were born, they must have died in infancy, for the European visitors stated that none were cross-eyed, blind, crippled, lame or hunchbacked; and that all were well-fashioned, strong in constitution of body, well-proportioned and without blemish. They were kind in their treatment of the sick. They had learned the medicinal virtues of many herbs and of a few other simples. They bound up wounds with mollifying preparations of leaves. They treated fevers by opening the pores of the skin with a vapor bath; but their chief reliance in many diseases was upon supernatural cures. Their medicine-man, or pow-wow, excited their superstitious susceptibilities and worked upon their imaginations, using, with great solemnity, the ceremonial stones already described to assist in his work. Their reliance upon faith-cures was complete.

HAND-MADE AND FINGER-MARKED VESSEL OF POT TE

ORNAMENTAL POTTERY.
Found in Pelham in Indian grave.

It is not known that there were formal ceremonies for burying the dead. The bodies were usually interred in a sitting posture, facing the southwest. With the dead were buried their arms, ornaments, useful utensils, wampum and parched corn for food.

Of the religious belief of the Mohegans we have very little testimony, and even such as we have cannot be considered reliable. In the compass of human thought there are no ideas requiring so clear an expression to be correctly understood as those pertaining to religion. The Indian endeavored to express these in a language imperfectly understood by the whites, and naturally the hearers interpreted these expressions according to their own predilections. It is not strange, therefore, that very little has come to us that can be implicitly accepted. But all our witnesses unite upon this important point,—there was no kind of idolatry practiced among the aborigines here. They believed in one all-wise, all-powerful and beneficent Being, whom they called the Great Spirit, and to whom they offered prayer. They also believed in an evil spirit. The former they knew under the name Cantantowit, and the latter under that of Hobbamocko. The former had sent them their corn and beans. A crow first brought a grain of corn in one ear and a bean in the other, from their heaven, which they called the happy hunting-grounds, located in the far southwest. Their highest conceptions of a place of blessings were associated with the southwest, because the wind from that quarter is soft and balmy and an indicator of fair weather. The dead were buried with their faces toward the abode of the blessed.

[1] This is of doubtful origin; found deeply buried in a spring near the Indian path "Succabonk," in Bedford.

They believed in rewards and punishments hereafter, and they held that after death the souls of the good went to the home of Cantantowit, far away in the good southwest. There they were delivered from every sorrow and preserved from all suffering. The pleasures they there enjoyed were similar in character with those they had known here, but their perfection was more complete and their abundance exhaustless. The wicked knocked also at the same door, but were denied admittance, and, being turned away, they wandered forever in a state of horror and restless discontent.

It is extremely difficult to form a correct estimate of the Indian's character before that character became changed by contact with the Europeans. History teaches us how quickly an inferior race becomes impressed by the traits of a stronger people coming among them. Unfortunately, that which is evil is much more quickly imitated than the noble and good. Before the European became sufficiently acquainted with the Indian to be capable of judging of his character, that character had been changed by contact with the observer himself, so that he saw, in part, the reflection of himself in the subject before him. At best, there was presented only a dissolving view that was transformed before the observer's gaze. The Indian was immediately called a drunkard, and yet he had no beverage whatever that could intoxicate, and no drug that answered any similar purpose. The first Indian who felt the influence of alcohol found it in the cabin of the "Half-Moon." So, also, with other vices. True, the Indian was a barbarian. He showed no evidence of having been in any way better or more civilized in the seventeenth century than he may have been in the tenth or fifth. With him, might made right. He imposed upon his women and made them his slaves. He had no intellectual exercise, and possessed not even the rudest culture. He was selfish, took pride in the lowest cunning and had no idea of honor, and, of course, no word for expressing it. And yet, bad as he was, on the one hand, he should not be held responsible for the European vices that were engrafted upon him, nor upon the other, should he be judged by standards resulting from centuries of a foreign civilization, or held responsible for the violation of laws of which he had no knowledge.

With the coming of the white man came the fatal sorrows of the Indian. All his world was overthrown. New vices came to his character and new dangers surrounded his home. The one fixed, unchanging and unchangeable factor in his existence, upon which he could implicitly rely, was the land; and now this was snatched from him by devices of which he was totally ignorant. The term "title" conveyed no meaning to his understanding. Acting under the laws of his fathers, and doing only what he had always been taught was right, he found himself accused of gross wrongs under another set of laws of which he had never heard, and whose claim to equity he could not understand. Under the pretense of right, he found himself most grievously wronged, and we cannot wonder that, between such opposite rules of action, the collision of principles quickly resulted in collisions of arms. The contest was inevitable, and, whether it was carried on under the name of war or in the more quiet forms of peace, it was a contest of races, a contest of civilization against barbarism, and the result was inevitable,—the Indian disappeared from the land.

When the "Half-Moon" lay at anchor off the village of Nappeckamak, the Indians soon overcame the terror that naturally accompanied so strange an apparition, and, putting off in their canoes, went on board in large numbers. Their curiosity knew no bounds, and was only restrained by their dread of the supernatural powers the strangers might possess. By Hudson's own statement, he himself first violated faith with them. He detained two of their number on the vessel, and, although they soon jumped overboard and swam to the shore, his act was nevertheless an outrage upon the universal rules of hospitality. He recorded that, when they reached the shore, they called to him "in scorn." Hudson ascended the river to Albany, holding communication with the Indians along the way; and so kind was their disposition toward him, that he wrote of them as "the loving people." On his return he came through the Highlands on the 1st of October, and anchored below the village of Sackhoes, on whose site Peekskill has been built. Here "the people of the mountains" came on board and greatly wondered at the ship and weapons, the color of the men and their dress. Descending the river, Hudson found that the Indians at Yonkers were prepared to resent his treatment. The young men whom he had attempted to kidnap came out with their friends in canoes and discharged their arrows at the "Half-Moon," "in recompense whereof six muskets replied and killed two or three of them." The Indians renewed the attack from a point of land (perhaps preceding the vessel to Fort Washington), but "a falcon shot killed two of them and the rest fled into the woods; yet they manned off another canoe with nine or ten men," through which a falcon shot was sent, killing one of its occupants. Three or four more were killed by the sailors' muskets, and the "Half-Moon" "hurried down into the bay clear of all danger."

Hudson returned to Holland, and reported his discoveries to his employers, the Dutch East India Company. During the following ten or twelve years many voyages were made to the shores of the Hudson and the Sound for purposes of trade with the Indians, for their furs and to explore the country. In 1621 the Dutch West India Company was incorporated. Two years afterward it formed trading-stations at New Amsterdam and at Fort Orange, and considerable settlements were made on the sites of the future cities of New York and Albany. In 1626 Manhattan Island was sold by the Indians. In 1639 the first sale of land in Westchester County was made. It included the northern shore of Spuyten Duyvil Creek. Other sales were made by the Indians to the Dutch until, on the 8th day of August, 1699, the Sachems Sackima, Corachpa, Wechrequa, Monrechro and sundry other Indians gave a general deed confirming numerous smaller sales made to Stephanus Van Cortlandt and others, and conveying the lands that were afterward known as Cortlandt's Manor.

In the mean time the Indians were beset on the eastern side of the county as well as the western. The English settlers in Connecticut gradually pushed westward, and coveted the lands of our eastern border. On the 1st of July, 1640, Ponus, sagamore of Toquams, and Wascussue, sagamore of Shippan, sold to Nathan Turner, who acted for the people of New Haven, the tract known to the Indians as Rippowams, and which included the greater portion of what is now Fairfield County, in Connecticut, and a considerable area of the adjoining lands of Westchester. On the 11th of August, 1655, Ponus and Onox, his eldest son, confirmed this sale to the inhabitants of Stamford. Subsidiary to this great sale, numerous others were made,—some of lands included in the above, and others of lands adjacent thereto, like the one made to Thomas Pell, of Fairfield, Conn., in 1654, and to Edward Jessup and John Richardson, in 1663, of tracts adjoining those sold to the Dutch in the southern part of the county. By these sales the Indians disposed of the entire area of Westchester County, except a few insignificant reservations and the right to plant corn upon certain portions for a term of years. Many of these deeds overlapped each other, so that some of the land was sold two or three times. This was done without any dishonest intent on the part of the Indians. They never understood, when giving these deeds, what they meant. As has been already said, they had no comprehension of what we call the title to land. They understood the right of occupation and use, and nothing more. The written deed had no special force in their eyes. Its phrases were incomprehensible. By their law the ownership ceased when the premises were deserted. If the land was not at once occupied, they could sell it again to others. If they drove the new purchasers away by force, they thereby regained ownership. Therefore, in many cases, they insisted, the settlers thought dishonestly, that their original rights remained vested in themselves, and the purchaser was compelled to repeat his purchase for the purpose of obtaining a quit-claim.

It is not necessary here to specify the considerations named in the several deeds, as this matter was the work of the settlers, and will be more fully considered in their connection. They consisted of a few hoes, hatchets, knives, kettles, articles of clothing, rum and "divers other goods." These seem very insignificant to us; but, in justice to the settlers, it must be remembered that values were very different then from what they are now. But the Indian's position is easily understood. He had no correct ideas of value. This coat would make him a king; this knife would be the pride of his life; these trinkets delighted his eyes, or, if a worthier reason influenced him, he remembered how the squaws had toiled in cultivating the corn with a miserable clam-shell, and he rejoiced at the thought of their labor being lightened by the iron hoe that was offered him. By simply placing his mark upon this meaningless paper, all these were secured. At best he but made a virtue of necessity, and was happy to secure these coveted trinkets, the nominal price for giving a nominal consent for the white man to occupy the land.

When Henry Hudson sailed away from the river he had discovered, its shores re-echoed with the war-cries of a people whose confidence he had abused and whose kindred he had slain. The hostility he had awakened was not mitigated by subsequent events, and when, afterward, the traders came, mutual suspicion and distrust were not long in bringing the clash of arms. So soon as the Dutch had made a settlement, their cattle were allowed to run at large for pasturage, and "frequently came into the corn of the Indians, which was unfenced on all sides, committing great damage there. This led to complaints on their part, and finally to revenge on the cattle, without sparing even the horses." In 1626 a Weckquæsgeek Indian, from the vicinity of Tarrytown, while on his way to Fort Amsterdam to exchange his furs, was robbed and killed by men in the employ of Peter Minuit, the first Dutch Director. The Weckquæsgeek was accompanied by his nephew, who was a boy, and another Indian. The Dutch were not aware of this outrage till long afterward. The boy, true to the principles of his race, treasured a revenge which he believed it to be his duty to exact in manhood. He waited no longer than to reach a warrior's age of seventeen, when he took some beaver-skins to barter, and, stopping at the house of a Dutchman, he killed him while examining the goods. Having thus secured the blood atonement required for the death of a relative, he returned to his home. Governor Kieft demanded the surrender of the offender; but the Weckquæsgeeks refused to give him up. There was great excitement in New Amsterdam. Expeditions to exterminate the Indians were organized; but they accomplished nothing. Finally, a treaty was concluded between the Dutch and the Indians, the former agreeing to some matters required by the latter, on condition that the murderer should be surrendered. But the treaty was never fulfilled by either party. It was a very difficult matter to have an Indian arrested whose actions had been in strict accordance with the laws and customs of his race. Against the advice of the chief men of Manhattan, Governor Kieft had sent a company of eighty men against the Weckquæsgeeks in March, 1642, and although they did little damage, the Indians were greatly incensed thereby. Various causes of irritation had brought the Dutch and Indians into violent collision west of the Hudson, and finally those Indians made common cause with the Weckquæsgeeks, and the Dutch were swept from Westchester, and compelled to take refuge in Fort Amsterdam. "From swamps and thickets the mysterious enemy made his sudden onset. The farmer was murdered in the open field; women and children, granted their lives, were swept off into long captivity; houses and boweries, hay-stacks and grain, cattle and crops were all destroyed." The Indians were now satisfied, and on the 22d of April, 1643, they made a treaty of peace, in which it was declared that "all injuries committed by the said natives against the Netherlanders, or by the Netherlanders against said natives, shall be forgiven and forgotten forever, reciprocally promising one the other to cause no trouble the one to the other." But, in September of that year, war again broke out, beginning with the capture, by the Indians, of two boats descending the river from Fort Orange, and again the Dutch settlers were all driven into Fort Amsterdam. The Weckquæsgeeks attacked the residence of Anne Hutchinson, who had been driven out of New England by the Puritans, and had settled within the present bounds of Pelham, and killed her, her daughter and her son-in-law, and carried her young granddaughter into captivity. She remained with the Indians four years, and was then sent to her friends. She had forgotten her native tongue, and was unwilling to leave the Indians.

Throgmorton's settlement, on Throg's Neck, was also attacked and its buildings burned, while the people escaped in their boats. The position of the Dutch was perilous in the extreme, and had the Indians known their power the whites would have been swept away. Governor Kieft now solicited aid from New England, offering a large sum for men and arms and proposing that New Netherland should be mortgaged to secure the payment of the money. They received the aid, however, of only a few English volunteers. Two companies, one of sixty-five and one of seventy-five men, were soon organized, and the work of retaliation commenced. Quantities of corn were captured upon Staten and Long Islands and an expedition sailed to Greenwich, in Connecticut, and marched through our eastern borders, but accomplished nothing beyond the burning of two forsaken castles and some corn. From these expeditions prisoners were taken to Fort Amsterdam, where they were treated with shocking cruelty, as is recorded in the "Breeden Raedt." A more formidable expedition was then organized. Hearing that a large number of Indians were assembled at their village on the Mehanas, near the present village of Bedford, the force was taken in sailing-vessels to Greenwich and then marched through the snow to their destination, which was reached about midnight. The village consisted of three rows of houses ranged in streets, each eighty paces long. The village was surrounded, the surprised Indians were shot down as soon as they appeared and the houses were set on fire. The inmates preferred to perish in the flames rather than to fall by their enemy's weapons. In this merciless manner five hundred human beings were butchered. Other statements carry the number to seven hundred. The military power of the Indians was now broken and thereafter warlike operations ceased. On the 30th of the following August, 1645, a general treaty of peace was concluded between the Dutch and the Indians of the Lower Hudson, and signed by their respective chiefs—Aepjen, the grand sachem of the Mohegans, representing his people. This treaty was an equitable agreement and was carefully respected. Thus was ended a war which had been carried on for over five years and in which, it was said, over sixteen hundred Indians perished. The Dutch recorded: "Our fields lie fallow and waste, our dwellings and other buildings are burnt, not a handful can be planted or sown this fall on all the abandoned places. All this through a foolish hankering after war, for it is known to all right-thinking men here that these Indians have lived as lambs among us until a few years ago, injuring no one and affording every assistance to our nation."

There are traditions of the slaughter of large numbers of Indians at other points in the county, but they are believed to be unfounded. Mount Misery, near the Sound, has long been said to have derived its name from the slaughter of Indians there by the Huguenots of New Rochelle. There is no record of such an engagement, and the story is altogether improbable.

The Indians of Westchester took no part in the Esopus wars of the succeeding years farther up the Hudson, nor did they engage in the French and Indian Wars which rolled so frightfully along the borders of Massachusetts and Connecticut, nor in other wars that followed elsewhere.

The last appearance of Mohegan Indians under arms in Westchester County was during the Revolutionary War, when a company under their chief, Nimham, joined Washington's forces. On the 31st of August, 1778, they took part in the engagement at Tibbet's Brook, on the Van Cortlandt's estate, in Yonkers. They fought bravely and over forty of their number were killed. When Nimham saw that they were surrounded by the British horse, he called to his followers to fly, exclaiming, "I am old and will die here." Ridden down by Colonel Simcoe, he wounded that officer, and was on the point of pulling him from his horse, when he was shot by Simcoe's orderly.

After their great loss, in 1645, the Indians felt that they must inevitably seek other homes. Year by year the increasing tide of settlers was incompatible with Indian occupation, and, although considerable numbers continued for a long time to remain upon the lands they had sold to the whites, they gradually wasted away, many of them moving among their friends farther north, and making Stockbridge, in Massachusetts, the headquarters of the tribe, and finally the remnant that remained was removed thence to the State of Michigan. Their exit from Westchester County was very gradual, for they "loved to linger where they loved so well." At a few points they remained for a long time in considerable numbers, and Indian Hill, in Yorktown, became memorable as the last spot in Westchester County inhabited by a band of aborigines. Yet individual families remained still longer elsewhere.

The Indians vanished from Westchester as noiselessly as the morning mists disappear before the advancing day, inclosed valleys and hidden nooks retaining remnants after the great body had gone. They left behind them so few material evidences of their existence here that we find them only by accident or by careful search. But many of the names applied by them to mountains, streams and localities have been fortunately retained by the white settlers and their descendants, and in their associations and appropriateness add an interesting variety to our local nomenclature.

CHAPTER III.

THE DISCOVERY AND SETTLEMENT OF WESTCHESTER COUNTY.

BY JAMES WOOD, A.M.
President of the Westchester County Historical Society.

EUROPEANS first came to the section of country now known as Westchester County in the vain endeavor to find an easy sea-way to India and Cathay that received so much of the attention of maritime nations in the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The wealth of those far-distant lands had for many ages been borne by slow caravans across the weary stretches of Central and Southern Asia, and had built prosperous cities wherever their rich spices and costly fabrics and precious jewels had found a trading-place. These visible realities had been supplemented by extravagant fables of the riches of the East, until the minds of navigators were inflamed with an eager desire to reach these inexhaustible treasures and bring them quickly home in their ships of the sea, instead of upon the "ships of the desert," as they had so slowly come before. This desire led to great events. It developed navigation into a science. It took the Portuguese around the southern extremity of Africa, to which they gave its auspicious name, because it furnished a good hope of reaching India by sea. It brought Columbus across the Atlantic to discover a new world. It brought great and intrepid navigators to explore the coast of North America from Greenland to the Gulf of Mexico, and, finally, in 1609, it brought Henry Hudson into the river that bears his name, and revealed our beautiful hills and fertile valleys to the gaze of civilized men.

Europeans were very slow to reap a profit, in any intelligent manner, from the discovery of America. Spain first sought to gain some advantage to herself, and, in the blindest way, filled her coffers with treasure and destroyed the peoples who produced the wealth. Caring only for immediate gain, she despoiled the Incas and overthrew the institutions of the Aztecs, and everywhere turned prosperity into ruin. Later, she made a settlement in Florida, whose monuments still remain. The daring fishermen of France sought the shores of Newfoundland in the pursuit of their vocation, and were followed into the St. Lawrence by the flag and arms of their country, where they so tenaciously remained. England waited for the reign of Elizabeth for the enterprise that developed her greatness in every direction and planted colonies in North Carolina and Virginia, and later, showed her energy and colonizing power in the planting of New England. It was reserved for the people of the youngest nation in Europe to occupy the territory between the English settlements which Hudson had first discovered, and here to trade in equity with the aborigines, and to form a settlement of sturdy and intelligent people whose descendants and institutions still remain. In making their settlements, Spaniards, Frenchmen and Englishmen made lofty professions of their desires to convert the heathen to the Christian faith, and, with the utmost inconsistency, they employed the musket and the sword to accomplish their purposes. The Dutch professed only a desire for trade with the Indians, with the same propriety that the most Christian nations to-day seek to extend their commerce, and by treating them with a reasonable show of justice, they found no severe difficulties in their enterprise, while they put to shame the hollow pretensions of their ambitious neighbors.

The long and harassing war by which the Netherland provinces achieved their independence of the Spanish crown had been one of the most remarkable in the world's history. The wealth and power of Spain were considered almost boundless. The revolting provinces were small in area and in population. The contest seemed most unequal, but the same energy, persistence and skill that had wrested their fertile land from the sea defeated the armies of Spain and wore out the endurance of her sovereigns, until, on the 9th of April, 1609, the protracted struggle ended and the independence of the Netherlands was practically acknowledged. During all the contest the Dutch had shown their superiority upon the ocean. Their vessels carried on a profitable commerce in every sea and pushed into that rich trade with the East which had been especially denied them by Spain. To carry on this important trade the East India Company had been incorporated in 1602. Profitable as were their voyages around the Cape of Good Hope, they yet dreamed there might be a shorter route for their vessels, and one in which they would be less exposed to attack. The long-cherished possibility of a northwest passage to the Indian seas was still entertained. Opportunely, an English navigator, Henry Hudson, who had made two voyages to this ever disappointing field of discovery, offered his services. The offer was accepted, and a yacht of eighty tons burden, the Half-Moon, was equipped for a voyage, manned by a mixed crew of Dutch and English sailors, numbering twenty, and sailed from Amsterdam on the 4th of April, 1609, five days before the truce with Spain was signed. Striking the American coast at Nova Scotia, Hudson skirted the shores of Maine and Cape Cod and next reached the mouth of Chesapeake Bay, and, turning northward, passed the coast of Maryland and entered Delaware Bay. Again standing northward, on the 2d of September he sighted the highlands of Navesinck, "a very good land to fall in with and a pleasant land to see," and on the following day he rounded Sandy Hook and entered the lower bay. Hudson spent ten days in exploring the adjacent waters. Then, proceeding up the majestic river that opened before him, on the 13th the Half-Moon was anchored opposite the site of the present city of Yonkers. The voyage was continued as far as the river was found navigable, when Hudson returned, having considerable intercourse with the Indians by the way, until, as he passed our shores and re-entered New York Bay, his men wantonly killed nine of their number. Just one month from the day Hudson arrived inside Sandy Hook the Half-Moon sailed out again to the ocean. On the 7th of November they reached Dartmouth, in Devonshire, England, and there the Half-Moon wintered, Hudson sending a report of his discoveries to his employers in Holland. England, becoming jealous of the advantages that might accrue to her maritime rival by these discoveries, prevented Hudson from returning to Holland, and his connection with the East India Company ended. He never revisited the river that makes his name immortal, but under English patronage he continued the vain search for a sea-way to India and lost his life in Hudson's Bay in 1611. The company abandoned all effort to discover a northwest passage, and made no attempt to utilize the discoveries that had thus been made. The Half-Moon, surviving her famous commander, was subsequently sent upon a voyage to the East Indies, and was wrecked in 1615 on the island of Mauritius.

CAPTAIN HENRY HUDSON.

Although the East India Company gave no further attention to the region their enterprise had discovered, it was impossible for the active Hollanders not to make an effort to gain some advantage from it. The fur trade had already become an important interest with the Dutch. During the war with Spain they had opened and developed a profitable interchange of commodities with the countries of the Baltic, and they had become the chief distributors of Russian furs to the countries of Europe. Naturally, they soon turned their attention to the prosecution of the fur trade with the Indians of the Hudson River, where beaver, otter and other valuable fur-bearing animals were abundant.

Merchants fitted out vessels and sent them across the ocean under such skillful commanders as the former mate of the Half-Moon and Captains Christiaensen, Block, De Witt and May. Further explorations of the coast were made, as well as valuable cargoes obtained. Depots for the collection of furs, and a friendly and advantageous intercourse with the Indians, were established. Captain Block's vessel, the "Tiger," was accidentally burned in New York Bay, in 1613, and, without aid from Holland, the intrepid commander and his crew built the first vessel, the 'Restless," ever launched upon American waters. To shelter them, while engaged in the work, the first houses were erected upon Manhattan Island. During the winter the Indians supplied them "with food and all kinds of necessaries."

In the "Restless" Block sailed boldly through the rushing currents of the East River, naming its most dangerous portion "Hell Gate," after a similar situation in a branch of the Scheldt, near Hulst, in Zealand, called "Hellegat." He explored our shore of Long Island Sound, and continued eastward to Cape Cod. The importance of these enterprises increased so that the States-General passed ordinances regulating the trade, and, in 1614, granted a charter to the traders, in which the country was first called "New Netherland." The merchants to whom the charter was granted were not united as a corporation, but were merely participants in a limited monopoly, which they enjoyed in common. They had no powers of government, as they did not contemplate any permanent colonization. Their charter expired by its own limitation on the 1st of January, 1618. By that time trading ports had been established on Manhattan Island and upon Castle Island, near Albany, and doubtless considerable trading had been done with the Indians of Westchester County, but no attempt at settlement had yet been made. There was now much uncertainty as to the best course to pursue in relation to this new territory, whose importance to the traders was daily increasing. Various propositions were considered and dismissed, until, in 1621, the West India Company was organized, and received a charter of almost unlimited powers of government, while it was required to "advance the peopling of this fruitful and unsettled part, and do all that the service of those countries and the profit and increase of trade shall require." The internal organization of the company proved a tedious matter, and it was not until June, 1623, that the plans were perfected and the articles of government were approved by the States-General. Then active preparations were made for the increase of the trade with the Indians and for making a permanent settlement upon the yet unoccupied lands.

Circumstances at home had provided excellent emigrants to undertake the hardships of a settlement in the New World. The protracted struggle with Spain had aroused strong religious animosities. The contest had been largely limited by religious sentiment. Spain was closely attached to the Catholic Church, and so were the southern Netherland provinces of Namur and Hainault, Luxemburg and Limburg, which had refused to join Holland and Zealand in forming the United Netherlands. The northern provinces, which had gained their independence, were strongly Protestant. The Protestants of these Belgic provinces were compelled to leave their homes and seek a residence elswhere. Where should they go? Many established themselves in England and enriched that country with their profitable industries. Opportunely, the West India Company invited settlers to New Netherland. Considerable numbers embraced the offer, and thus the Walloons became the first permanent residents upon the shores of the Hudson, and the first tillers of the soil. They spoke the French language, and were chiefly united with the Hollanders in their common hatred of the Spanish rule. They came here to establish homes for themselves and their children, while the Dutch were chiefly interested in the profits of the fur trade. It thus occurred that the first New Netherland settlement was in its character more Walloon than Dutch.

The refugees from the southern provinces, with a number of Huguenots from France, at first desired to join one of the English settlements in America, and made overtures to this end, but these were not favorably received. When the West India Company gladly accepted them as emigrants to their domain, speedy preparations were made for their departure, and in March, 1623, the new ship "New Netherland," under Captain May, sailed from the Texel with a company of thirty families on board. They reached their destination early in the month of May, in good time to plant such crops as would supply them with necessary food. The few huts erected by Block, ten years before, afforded them shelter. Having the interest of the fur trade more in view than the welfare of the colonists, the members of the company were, unfortunately, dispersed, some going to the South, or Delaware River, and others to Castle Island, near Albany, where Fort Nassau was soon afterward built. May had been appointed Director. The settlers who went to the South River soon returned. Other Walloons came from Holland. In December, 1625, Peter Minuit, himself a Walloon, was appointed Director-General, and Manhattan Island and the adjacent lands soon contained an energetic colony of about three hundred souls.

It is probable that the settlers soon tilled the lands upon the northern shores of the Harlem River, as well as the upper portions of Manhattan Island. In the year 1628, Jonas Michaelius, a clergyman of the Reformed Church, came to New Amsterdam and held religious services in both the Dutch and French languages. He wrote of the settlers and their church attendance:—"Some of them live far away and could not come on account of the heavy rains and storms." This, doubtless, referred to those who lived along the Harlem, as well as those from across the East River. Unfortunately, no records of the colony, for the first fifteen years after its establishment, have been preserved, so that we are forced to draw inferences from such collateral statements.

Minuit showed energy and vigor in his administration. To assist him, a council was appointed, with legislative and judicial powers. There was also a secretary of the province and a sheriff. It was soon seen that the rights of the Indians must be respected, as being superior to any European right of discovery and occupation. Minuit, therefore, very justly opened negotiations with them for the purchase of Manhattan Island, and they relinquished their claims thereto "for the value of sixty guilders," which was equivalent to about twenty-four dollars of our money In the light of subsequent events this sum seems most absurdly insignificant, but, under the circumstances, the amount was reasonable and the transaction honorable.

The West India Company wisely encouraged emigration. They brought over horses, cattle and poultry for the use of the settlers. Their farms, called "boweries," showed prosperity. An English observer wrote that the emigrants, "though they be not many, are well chosen, and known to be useful and serviceable, and they (the company) second them with seasonable and fit supplies, cherishing them as carefully as their own families." But the enterprise drew heavily upon the company's treasury, and they soon began to devise means by which private parties might be induced to aid emigration on their own account. At length, for this purpose, it was concluded to endeavor to plant in America a modified feudalism. The feudal system had not flourished in Holland. The free spirit and intelligence of its people were adverse to it. True, the land was mainly in the hands of great owners, but those who occupied them paid a rental, instead of military service, and regarded the owner merely as a landlord, and not as a master. With the increase of wealth from trade and manufactures, the rich merchants were unable at home to satisfy their desires for landed estates, and hence it was proposed to offer them lands in New Netherland. On June 7, 1629, the West India Company issued its "Charter of Privileges and Exemptions," by which any member of the company who should purchase land of the Indians, and found a colony of fifty persons over fifteen years of age, should have a grant of sixteen miles along one bank or eight miles on each bank of any navigable river, and as far inland as the situation would permit. They received the title of Patroon, and were the lords of the people, as well as of the land. The Patroon's authority over his manor was similar to that of a baron in the Middle Ages. He could engage in every trade except that in furs, which was reserved for the company exclusively. The Patroons were required to make prompt provision for the support of a minister and a schoolmaster.

This creation of a second monopoly, within that of the company itself, proved most unfortunate. The wealthy directors took immediate advantage of the company's action before the other share-holders could avail themselves of its privilege, and at once the most desirable territory was seized by a few. Disagreements and dissensions speedily followed. Intelligent emigrants were afraid to place themselves under the control of such grasping masters. Instead of encouraging the settlement of the country, it greatly retarded it, and probably deferred for fifty years the considerable peopling of Westchester County along the Harlem and Hudson Rivers. Manhattan Island was reserved for the company.

The first purchase of Indian lands north of Harlem River was made by the West India Company in 1639. Its bounds were poorly defined. White settlers speedily occupied portions of this tract. They made another purchase of land to the east of this tract in 1640. Herr Bronx made a purchase along the river that bears his name in the following year. The next purchase was made in 1646 by Adriaen Von der Donck, who had been educated at the University of Leyden, and had been admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of Holland. He was the first lawyer who came to New Netherland. He at once received a patent from the company, his lands extending for sixteen miles along the Hudson north of Manhattan Island, and eastward to the Bronx River. It was called Donck's Colony, and its proprietor, invested with all the rights and privileges contained in the charter of 1629, became a member of the order of Patroons. In 1650 a contract was made by the West India Company, with Van der Donck and others, for the transportation of two hundred persons to New Netherland. Yonkers soon became a place of considerable trade with the Indians, and vessels were here loaded for old Amsterdam.

Disputes between the company and the Patroons now became frequent and bitter. Van der Donck, from his legal skill, was prominent in these, and, in 1652, he repaired to Amsterdam to personally appear before the college of the company. It was soon found that the privileges conferred upon the Patroons had been too liberally bestowed. Good Peter Minuit was recalled in 1631 on the charge of having been too easy with the newly-created nobility. He was succeeded by Van Twiller, and he, in turn, by William Kieft.

During Kieft's administration an Indian war, resulting from the murder of an Indian, as is related in the previous chapter, befel New Netherland, and drove the white settlers from Westchester County and threatened the complete destruction of the colony.

Kieft's administration proved unfortunate for the company. It was considered that he had unnecessarily brought on the disastrous war with the Indians, and he had done nothing to remedy the difficulties with the Patroons. The financial affairs of the colony were also unsatisfactory. Very serious were the discussions in the college of the company as to the correction of the existing evils. Finally new regulations were adopted, and Peter Stuyvesant was appointed Director-General. It was hoped that he would also prove a "Redresser-General." He came to New Netherland in 1646 and assumed the reins of the government as the successor of Kieft.

Stuyvesant's administration was an energetic one on the part of the Director-General, but he was beset with difficulties on every hand. He was anxious to insist on the Dutch claim to all the territory from the Connecticut to the Delaware Rivers, which the English settlers were as emphatic in denying. The English pushed their settlements almost to the Harlem River. On Long Island they claimed entire independence of New Netherland. Stuyvesant had further troubles with the Indians up the Hudson. The internal affairs of his government were very jarring. Jealousies and disputes were frequent. He was stern in his assertion of authority, but that authority was but poorly respected. To add to his difficulties, he was very insufficiently supported by the college of the company in Amsterdam. The unfortunate organization of the company became more and more apparent. New Netherland was a financial burden. When, therefore, in 1664, in utter disregard of the rights and authority of the Dutch, the King of England gave to his brother, the Duke of York and Albany, the territory between the Connecticut and Delaware Rivers, and Richard Nichols, as lieutenant-governor, with a fleet of four ships and four hundred men, appeared before New Amsterdam, the colony was ripe for a change, and, despite the earnest protests of Stuyvesant, quietly surrendered, and the Dutch authority ceased. It was restored, for a short period only, in 1673.

PETER STUYVESANT.

Although the English now ruled, and New Netherland became New York, the Dutch inhabitants and Dutch institutions remained, and the English were careful to respect the rights and privileges that had existed under their government. The grants made to the Patroons were not interfered with. Adriaen Van der Donck died in 1655, leaving to his wife the colony of Yonkers. She subsequently married Hugh O'Neale. In 1666, Governor Nichols granted a patent to Hugh O'Neale and Mary, his wife, confirming the rights of Van der Donck. There were a number of subsequent transfers of the title to these lands, until they became vested in Frederick Philipse, and a royal charter confirming the same was granted in 1693. Frederick Philipse was from East Friesland, in Holland, and had emigrated to New Amsterdam at an early day, becoming a successful merchant there. He purchased land of the Indians north of Yonkers in 1681, 1682 and 1684, including the present township of Greenburgh. In 1680 and 1684 he purchased portions of the township of Mount Pleasant, and in 1685 he purchased the lands of the present township of Ossining. Thus the great tract of the Philipse manor was brought into an individual ownership.

North of the Croton River the Indians sold lands to a number of parties at various dates. The titles to the most of these lands were afterward secured by Stephanus Van Cortlandt, and were confirmed to him by royal charter in 1697. The Van Courtlandt manor, containing eighty-three thousand acres of land, was thus established, and was held by feudal tenure, requiring an annual payment to the crown.[1]

Under the fostering care of the Philipse and Van Courtlandt families, the settlement of the lands along the Hudson rapidly progressed. English families mingled with the Dutch to a considerable extent, but the Holland emigrants greatly outnumbered them, so that, in the people and their habits, customs and character, the settlements along the Hudson were active with the occupations and reflected the quiet scenes of the homes that had been left behind the dykes that inclosed the mouths of the Rhine and shut out the North Sea.

The Dutch settlers in Westchester County brought hither many of the best qualities that contribute to good citizenship. They were an industrious race, and the situation of their country at home had compelled them to keep their native industry in constant exercise. Their frugality equaled their industry. No one lived beyond his means, and each year something was added to the accumulated capital. The individual was self-reliant, and yet knew the advantages of concerted action for the common good. Their honesty was proverbial. They were thoroughly imbued with the democratic spirit that, with the freedom of the individual, respected fully both the natural and the acquired rights of others. They valued education. In Holland their free-school system was the best in Europe. Women occupied an exceptionally honorable position, both in society and in the management of affairs, so that they ably assisted in the business of the family in training their children to usefulness and in contributing to the welfare of the community. The Dutch were steadfast in their religious faith, and had a high regard for morality.

[1] The regulations of the manors and their history will be given in a subsequent chapter, prepared by Edward F. de Lancey.

Such a people lay solid foundations for their social and political institutions, and they stamped most wholesome and enduring impressions upon the settlements of Westchester County.

The English Settlement.—The introduction of the Reformation into England by Henry VIII. was more nominal than real, and left to succeeding reigns the settlement of many of the great questions involved. The reign of Elizabeth saw the storm steadily gathering, while that of James I. was a time of continual turmoil and strife. The chief disputes were among the Protestants themselves, and mainly concerned the extent to which the changes should go. The people abandoned themselves to the consideration of questions of civil and religious liberty. Dissenters returning from the Continent threw their advanced ideas into the arena of public discussion. During the Commonwealth the spirit of controversy seemed to possess all classes. Questions of religion divided the time with state affairs in the discussions of Parliament. This spirit separated the English people into hostile camps and produced a numerous brood of religious sects.

One of the most important results of all this turmoil was the banishment from England, in the early part of the seventeenth century, of a ship-load of yeomen.

Among the Dissenters, those taking the most extreme positions were called Puritans, because of their efforts to purify the Protestant Church. Compelled to leave their homes, a little company of these sought refuge in Holland. There they remained for twelve years, secure in religious liberty, but dissatisfied with their situation. At one time they looked toward emigrating to New Netherland, and at another to Virginia, but, finally, arrangements were completed for a more northern location, and, in 1620, they crossed the Atlantic and commenced the Massachusetts settlement. Their trials and sufferings in the new home were varied and severe. The settlement grew, however, and it was not long before the spirit of adventure and the desire for better lands led some of them to look for homes in other sections. The Indians had told them of the fertile soil along the Connecticut River, and, in 1633, a few of their number came hither. Lord Say and Seal, Lord Brook and others obtained a patent from the British crown for this region, and, in 1636, under their authority, John Winthrop, son of the Governor of Massachusetts, brought a well-equipped company, who formed settlements along the river. In 1637 a fresh colony from England arrived in Boston. It was under the general charge of Theophilus Eaton, with John Davenport, a clergyman of some note from London, as their spiritual adviser. They were a company of wealth and respectability. Remaining but a short time at Boston, they came to Connecticut and securely planted the New Haven colony in the spring of 1638. The land had been purchased from the Indians in the preceding autumn. So soon as they were comfortably established they desired to enlarge their borders, and on the 1st of July, 1640, Nathan Turner, on behalf of the people of New Haven, purchased of the Indians the tract known as Rippowams, extending westward along the Sound and sixteen miles inland. It included a portion of Westchester County.

A settlement was soon made at Stamford and another at Greenwich. On November 14, 1654, Thomas Pell, of Fairfield, Conn., purchased of the Indians the lands lying immediately east of those occupied by the Dutch, and which were afterward included in Pelham manor. The Dutch were greatly disturbed thereby. Thirty years later the Indians conveyed a portion of these lands to the inhabitants of Westchester. In 1660, 1661 and 1662, John Budd, Peter Disbrow, John Coe and Thomas Stedwell made purchases from the Indians of lands along the Sound, west of Greenwich, included in the southeastern portion of Westchester County. In 1661, John Richbell, of the island of Barbadoes, West Indies, purchased of the Indians a tract lying between the lands purchased by Pell and those just mentioned, and extending a long distance inland. His title to this was confirmed by letters patent issued by Governor Lovelace in 1668. In 1696 the widow of John Richbell conveyed these lands to Colonel Caleb Heathcote, who also made additional purchases of the Indians. All these were confirmed by a royal patent in 1701, creating the lordship and manor of Scarsdale, which included the present towns of Mamaroneck and Scarsdale and portions of White Plains, North Castle and New Castle.

We thus see that all the lands of the county bordering upon Long Island Sound had come into the hands of the English proprietors, regardless of the claims of the Dutch West India Company, under their purchase from the Indians in 1640.

These purchases were followed by the coming of English settlers, nearly all of whom were from Connecticut. But they had been preceded by others who had here sought a refuge from religious intolerance and persecution. Anne Hutchinson, with her husband, William, and their children, had come to Boston in 1634. She was the daughter of the Rev. Francis Marbury, of Lincolnshire, England. By her mother, she was connected with the family of the poet Dryden. Her religious views did not harmonize with those of the Puritans, and she was driven out of the colony. She first went to Rhode Island, but afterward sought peace and security near the Dutch settlement in New Netherland. She settled with her family upon Pelham Neck in 1642. Soon afterward John Throckmorton and thirty-five families, who found the intolerance of the Puritans unendurable, asked permission of the Dutch authorities to settle near them. Their request was granted, and they located upon what is now known as Throg's Neck, in the town of Westchester. The Dutch called this section Vredeland—the land of peace. In the disastrous Indian war, that threatened the destruction of the Dutch settlement and so alarmed Governor Kieft, the Indians murdered Mrs. Hutchinson and her family, except a young granddaughter, who was carried into captivity, but was afterward restored. They also attacked Throckmorton's settlement, destroyed the buildings and cattle and compelled the people to flee to their boats for safety.

The English settlements along the Sound steadily grew and soon assumed considerable importance. Locations were chosen at the heads of the numerous bays putting in from the Sound, where water communication was available and where the surrounding lands could be easily reached. The old "Westchester Path" had long been used by the Indians and furnished the whites with the best inland communication. The fields that the Indians had cultivated were already cleared for the whites, and enabled them at once to raise the necessary food for their support. Gradually the settlers pushed inland and made additional purchases from the Indians. In 1683 the inhabitants of Rye bought lands about White Plains. Their claims to these were disputed by John Richbell; but Rye settlers went upon them and considered White Plains a portion of their territory.

While the southeastern portions of Westchester County were being peopled from Connecticut, the more northern portions also received similar attention. The people of Stamford followed the Indian trail leading inland, and came to the attractive lands at the bend of the Mianus River, near the present village of Bedford, where the Indians had a village and cultivated their fields of maize, pumpkins and sieva beans. They purchased of the Indians, in 1655, lands about Bedford in addition to those purchased by Nathan Turner, in 1640, and, subsequently, other minor purchases were made. In 1680 the tract known as the Hop Ground was bought, and John Cross, going up from Stamford to inspect it, described the river that has since borne his name. In the spring of 1681 twenty-four Stamford men and their families moved to these lands, and the village of Bedford was begun. Poundridge and Salem were settled from the same source.

While the growth of these settlements was not rapid, it was steady and healthful. The people gradually became rooted to the soil. After wandering so far, they were content to remain in the quiet enjoyment of their new homes. Nearly all those who settled in the eastern portion of the county were Dissenters, who afterwards became Presbyterians when that order of church government was established. They considered themselves a part of the colony of Connecticut and their location within the Connecticut jurisdiction. The boundary between the two colonies was not then established, and when New York attempted to enforce its claim to this section, the people of Rye, White Plains and Bedford stoutly protested. They long sent delegates to the Connecticut Assembly and were an integral portion of that people. Continued controversies with the Dutch and with the English authorities of New York had led them to entertain no friendly feeling toward that colony, and when at length they were compelled to submit to its authority they felt sorely aggrieved. They were an intelligent, sturdy, enterprising and pious people, with the true Puritan sternness of morals and devotion to duty. Wherever they located, the church and the school-house were immediately erected. England never sent across the Atlantic better material for planting her colonies and extending her civilization.

Beside the Puritans, who came from Connecticut, another English element came into Westchester County after the transfer of New York to the English, in 1664. The Governors sent over by the Duke of York were accompanied by numerous officers and retainers, who were no sooner established in their new positions than they began to look about them for lands for themselves and their families. Naturally, Westchester County offered an inviting field for their purpose and many of them settled there. They were nearly all Episcopalians, and through their influence many of the Protestant Episcopal Churches upon Manhattan Island and in this county were established.

They were compelled to purchase lands from those who had obtained titles before them. The Philipse and Van Cortlandt manors occupied the territory along the Hudson and across the northern portion of the county, north of the Croton River, and the New England purchases covered all the lands along the Sound and up the Connecticut border. But the idea was somehow started among the New York officials that there was still some unoccupied and unclaimed territory in the central portion of the county. This was hastily sought for by numerous parties, and land grants and patents were obtained far in excess of the available lands, and which overlapped each other in a manner that makes it impossible now to map them. The most of these centred about the present town of North Castle.

THE HUGUENOT SETTLEMENT.—Simultaneously with Luther's work in Germany thereformed ideas were widely spread in France. They were born on French soil, but were greatly strengthened by the progress of the Reformation in Germany, and grew rapidly under the active influences of Geneva. French Protestants were not long in drawing into two classes,—the Lutherans and the Huguenots. Their numbers increased so rapidly that, in the reign of Henry II., they entertained hopes of becoming the dominant political party, aided, as they were, by the fact that several members of the royal family and numerous high officials were united with them. Their greatest strength was with the upper classes. In 1569 it was recorded that one-thirtieth of the common folk and one-third of the nobles were Huguenots. The union of political ambition and religious faith was unfortunate, but unavoidable in that age. The more nearly even the balance of power, the more eager were the rivalries and the more bitter the animosities. Now the Protestants were persecuted and then they were encouraged.

In 1572 the King's sister became the wife of Henry of Navarre, who was the Huguenot leader. The leading Protestants were invited to Paris to the nuptials, where, on the night of St. Bartholomew, a general massacre of the Protestants was begun, instigated by Catharine de Medici, the Queen mother. The Huguenots stoutly defended themselves throughout France, although great numbers were slain. The tide of their fortunes constantly ebbed and flowed. In 1598, Henry IV. issued the famous Edict of Nantes, which was helpful to both Catholics and Protestants, reproducing the more favorable and tolerant of former edicts. Under Louis XIII. their rights were again attacked, which led to an unlucky league with England, and resulted in the siege and capitulation of their city of Rochelle. Then their treatment was again tolerant, and they loyally fought for Louis XIV., which that sovereign illy repaid by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in 1685.

Before this crowning injustice great numbers had escaped from their inhospitable country. Over one million of the best and thriftiest citizens of the land now sought refuge elsewhere, and more than one-half of the commercial and manufacturing industries of the kingdom were crushed, resulting in stagnation and distress on every hand. Thus France at once suffered for her cruelty and wrong.

The Huguenots scattered throughout the world, blessing every country they visited by the addition of their intelligence, refinement, virtue and industry. Great numbers went to England, causing silk manufacture and other important industries to flourish there; others went to Ireland, making her linen and poplin manufactures the most important in the world; some went to Switzerland and some to Germany, and many crossed the Atlantic to seek peaceful homes and assured liberty in the New World.

Their trials and sufferings and heroic steadfastness, with the blessings they carried to many lands, make the story of the Huguenots one of the saddest and, at the same time, one of the brightest known to history.

Of those who crossed the Atlantic, many settled in South Carolina, and gave to that colony and State much of their prominence. A few settled in Virginia and a few in Delaware and Pennsylvania, and more in Maryland. A considerable number went to Massachusetts; an important settlement was made by them in Ulster County, N. Y., and a goodly number came to Westchester County.

As has already been stated, the purchase of lands from the Indians by Thomas Pell, of Fairfield, Conn., was confirmed to him by Governor Nichols, in 1666. In 1669, Thomas Pell devised the manor of Pelham to his nephew, John Pell, and this was confirmed by Governor Dougan in 1687. At this time a remarkable man had attained prominence in the city of New York,—Jacob Leisler—who was a native of Germany. He came to America in 1660 as a private soldier in the service of the Dutch West India Company. Leaving the army, he engaged in the Indian trade, with great success, and acquired a considerable fortune. Under Dougan's administration, in 1683, he was appointed one of the commissioners of the Admiralty Court, and, when Dougan was succeeded by Lieutenant-Governor Nicholson, Leisler, as captain of the militia, intimidated Nicholson so that he left the province and went to England.

A committee of safety appointed Leisler "Commander-in-Chief of the Province," and when, in December, 1689, a communication was received from the English crown, addressed "to such as, for the time being, takes care for preserving the peace and administering the laws in his majesty's province of New York," Leisler construed it as an appointment of himself as the King's Lieutenant-Governor. He assumed the dignity and authority of this position, and when, in the spring, Slaughter arrived with a commission as Governor, Leisler questioned his identity and refused him recognition. He was arrested and imprisoned, tried for treason, and most unjustly condemned, and was executed on the 17th of May, 1691.

On the 20th of September, while Leisler was exercising the full power of a Governor in all civil and military matters, John Pell, lord of the manor of Pelham, conveyed to him for the consideration of sixteen hundred and seventy-five pounds and five shillings sterling, "all that tract of land lying and being within said manor of Pelham, containing six thousand acres of land, and also one hundred acres of land more, which the said John Pell and Rachel, his wife, do freely give and grant for the French church erected, or to be erected," etc. This tract constitutes the present township of New Rochelle.

Leisler had shown in New York great interest in the Protestant religion, and to him a company of Huguenots, who had been eight years in England, made application to secure for them a location in the province of New York. Their attention had been attracted to this locality in previous years. Individual Huguenots had purchased several parcels of land here in 1686 and succeeding years, when their settlement began. Leisler's purchase was made for the Huguenots. In the following year he conveyed these lands to them, when his connection with the settlement ceased.

Some of the Huguenots came here by way of the West Indies, but the greater portion came from England. The main company landed at what is known as Bonnefoy's Point, in Echo Bay, adjoining Davenport's Neck. Numbers continued to arrive until the year 1700. Their new home was named in honor of that from which many of them had been driven,—the city of La Rochelle, in France.

Bound together by the memories of bitter sufferings, endured in common by their religious interests and by warm friendships, and separated from their neighbors by a different language, the Huguenots long remained a compact body in New Rochelle. In after-years numbers settled in the northern portions of the county, where many of their names are still found.

The influence of the Huguenots upon the people of Westchester County has been important. Their earnest religious faith, their sterling integrity, their energy of character and their intelligence, refinement and courtesy have left most valuable impressions that still remain.

THE QUAKER SETTLEMENT.—The Society of Friends, called Quakers, was the outcome of the religious awakening that followed the Reformation in England. The changes from the Roman Catholic Church were variously graduated by different Protestant believers. The Quakers carried the principles of the Reformation to their logical conclusion. Claiming the complete spirituality of the gospel dispensation, they denied all outward rites and ceremonies, and insisted that the types of the Jewish ritual were fulfilled and ended in Christ. They acknowledged no order of priesthood but the universal priesthood of believers. They held that Christ as the head of His church chose and commissioned whom He would to preach His gospel, and that no human ordination was of any avail; and they taught the doctrine of the immediate and perceptible influence of the Holy Spirit upon the individual soul of man. These positions were so radical that many good people thought them dangerously wild, and, as a consequence, the Quakers were almost everywhere persecuted.

George Fox, the founder of the sect, was born in Leicestershire, England, in 1624. After he began to preach, in 1647, his life was little more than a journey from one prison to another. But this attracted the public attention, so that great numbers flocked to hear him when opportunity offered. His converts came from nearly every rank of society, and the kingdom seemed to swarm with them.

Quakers first came to America in 1656. They attempted to settle in Massachusetts. The story of their persecutions there is well known. Remembering the age and the temper of the times, we must judge these persecutions leniently. From the Puritan standpoint, the Quaker had no right to go there. The Puritans had come to Massachusetts to establish a religious, not a civil, commonwealth. Only members of their church were eligible to citizenship. The Quakers claimed that, as Englishmen, they had a legal right to visit and to live wherever the English flag proclaimed English jurisdiction. This claim rested upon the clause in the Massachusetts charter which expressly guaranteed "all liberties and immunities of free and natural subjects of the realm to all Englishmen 'which shall go to and inhabit' Massachusetts, or which shall happen to be born there, or on the seas in going thither or returning from thence." The result of the contest was one of those sad episodes in history over which, in this age, it is better to throw the mantle of charity, with devout thankfulness that our lot is cast in better times.

The persecutions of the Quakers in Massachusetts turned the stream that continued to cross the Atlantic, and led to their settlement in Westchester County. That settlement was almost entirely made by the way of Long Island. Very naturally, the Quakers looked to the Dutch for religious toleration. The Puritans themselves had gone to Holland to find religious liberty when they had been compelled to flee from England. Many others besides Friends came to Long Island from Massachusetts to escape the religious restraint there. The first of these, who afterward became connected with Friends, was Lady Deborah Moody. She settled at Lynn, in Massachusetts, in 1640, and received a grant of four hundred acres of land. Governor Winthrop thus speaks of her in his journal: "In 1643, Lady Moody was in the colony of Massachusetts, a wise and anciently religious woman, and being taken with the error of denying baptism to infants, was dealt withal by many of the elders and others, and admonished by the church of Salem, whereof she was a member, but persisting still, and to avoid further trouble, etc., she removed to the Dutch, against the advice of her friends." On the 19th of December, 1645, Governor Kieft, of New Amsterdam, issued a general patent for the town of Gravesend, Long Island, to Lady Deborah Moody, Sir Henry Moody, her son, George Baxter and James Hubbard, their heirs and successors, "to have and enjoy free liberty of conscience, according to the customs and manners of Holland, without molestation." Gravesend was planted entirely by English settlers from Massachusetts, and, unlike the "five Dutch towns," which constituted the rest of Kings County, the records, which are still well preserved, were kept from the commencement of the settlement in the English language.

Friends came to Gravesend in considerable numbers in 1657. Many of the inhabitants embraced their doctrines, and their first religious meeting on Long Island was established there. It was recorded that "meetings were held at the house of Lady Moody, who managed all things with such prudence and observance of time and place as to give no offense to any person of another religion; so she and her people remained free from molestation."

Flushing was similarly settled by refugees from Massachusetts. They were careful to have inserted in their charter, granted by Governor Kieft on the 10th of October, 1645, a clause permitting them "to have and enjoy the liberty of conscience according to the manner and custom of Holland, without molestation from any magistrate or any ecclesiastical minister that may pretend jurisdiction over them." In 1657 Friends came to Flushing with several able preachers among their number. Many of the other inhabitants attended their meetings. Governor Stuyvesant had failed in his efforts to induce the people to accept and support a minister whom he had sent there, and he soon commenced a persecution of the Quakers only second to that so much better known in Massachusetts. In the official instructions given by the directors of the Dutch West India Company, the official oath required "the maintenance of the Reformed Religion in conformity to the word and the decrees of the Synod of Dordrecht, and not to tolerate in public any other sect."

In this the Governor had an excuse for his treatment of the Quakers. Some were imprisoned for a long time. Some were severely flogged, and a prominent member was sent to Holland to be tried before the company's college. He was at once released by the college and returned to his home, while a severe reprimand was sent to Stuyvesant. An ordinance of the New Amsterdam Council, enacted in 1662, provided severe penalties for holding public meetings for worship by any "besides the Reformed religion." The Quakers rapidly increased in numbers, and meetings were established at Flushing, Oyster Bay, The Farms, The Kills, Newtown, etc., in quick succession. In the year 1672, George Fox, the founder of the sect, visited America and attended the meetings on Long Island.

Flushing was the headquarters of the Quakers, and from that town the principal emigration to Westchester County took place. In the autumn of 1672 two Quaker ministers visited Rye, "in Governor Winthrop's government," and held meetings there. The first who settled here located in the town of Westchester. When the first meeting was held there we cannot learn, but one was in existence in 1685. Soon afterward numbers of Quakers settled in Mamaroneck. In 1695 a step was taken that proved of great moment in the future settlement of Friends in Westchester County. John Harrison, of Flushing, purchased of the Indians a tract of land about nine miles in length and nearly three in width, "bounded on the north by the Rye Ponds, on the east by Blind Brook, on the west by Mamaroneck River, and on the south by the lands of Joseph Budd." The Indians reserved "such whitewood trees as shall be found suitable to make canoes of." In the same year Governor Fletcher ordered the survey of the purchase, and soon after Harrison, and four others associated with him, received a patent for the whole tract. The people of Rye claimed this land as a part of their territory; but, as they had taken no patent for their lands from the government of New York, their claims was not regarded. In 1685, Governor Dongan had ordered the inhabitants of Rye to appear and prove their title to their lands; but, considering themselves under Connecticut jurisdiction, they disregarded the order. Harrison's purchase was made for the settlement of Friends from Long Island. They called it "The Purchase," and it is still so known. The emigration began as soon as the interests of the patentees who were not Friends were purchased, and the necessary arrangements completed. Large numbers then came across the Sound. In 1704 the Court of General Sessions recorded the places where the Quakers held public meetings for worship, as directed by act of Parliment for all Dissenters, as being at Westchester and Mamaroneck. Soon afterward two other meetings were established in Harrison's purchase.

As soon as the lands of Harrison's purchase were occupied, a movement began that placed the Quakers in possession of a large portion of the central line of the county. The Dutch, who had settled along the Hudson River, and the English, who occupied the towns along the Connecticut border, entertained no very friendly feelings for each other. Their enmity and jealousies kept them apart, and, on this account, a district of considerable width running north and south between them had remained comparatively unoccupied. Into this the Quakers rapidly pushed, purchasing the lands from those who had obtained titles therefor. The line of settlement ran through the present towns of Harrison, North Castle, New Castle, Yorktown, Lewisborough and North Salem, and through Putnam, Dutchess and Columbia Counties. In the town of Harrison, and in some of those just named, the Quakers constituted for a considerable time a majority of the inhabitants, while a great number afterward emigrated to the northern and central portions of the State.

NEGROES.—In the West India Company's charter of "Privileges and Exemptions" for the Patroons, for the purpose of encouraging agriculture, the company agreed to furnish the colonists with "as many blacks as they conveniently could." These they brought from the West Indies, and negro slavery existed in Westchester County almost from its first white settlement. The English settlers were not adverse to availing themselves of the supposed advantages of negro labor. The Quakers brought slaves with them from Long Island. While slavery thus existed throughout the county, the number of slaves was never large. About the year 1698 a cargo of negroes brought from the coast of Guinea was landed at Rye, in the interest of Frederick Philipse, of Philipse manor.

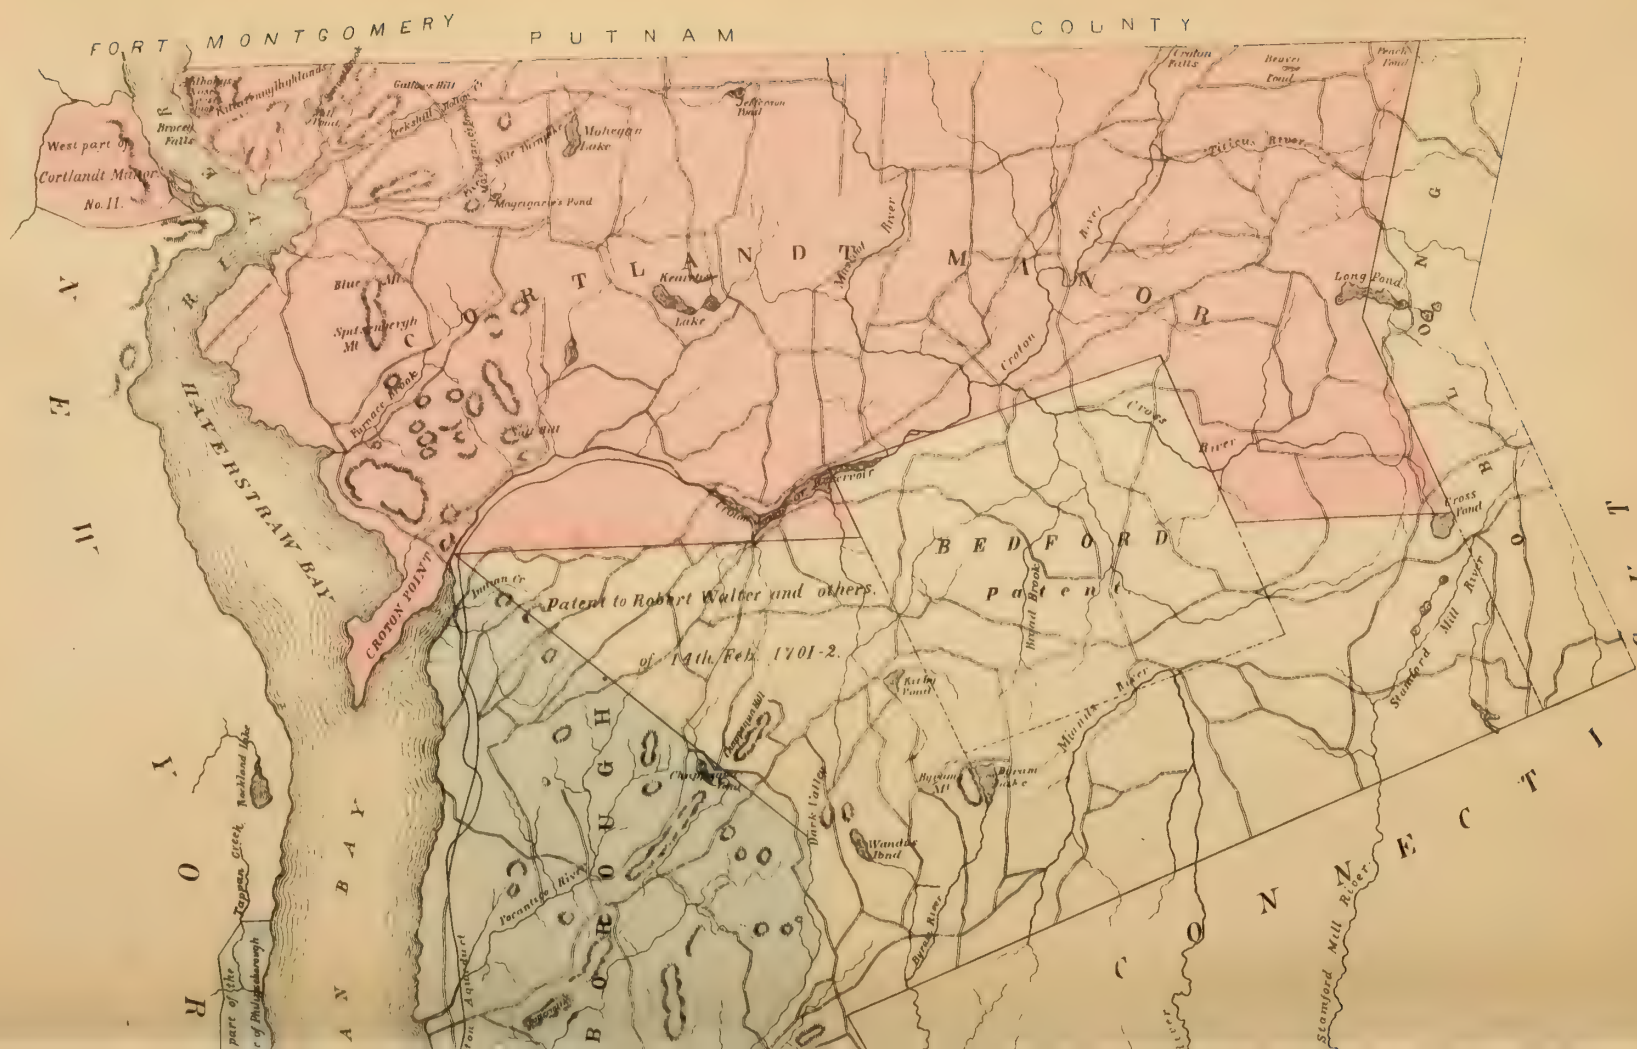
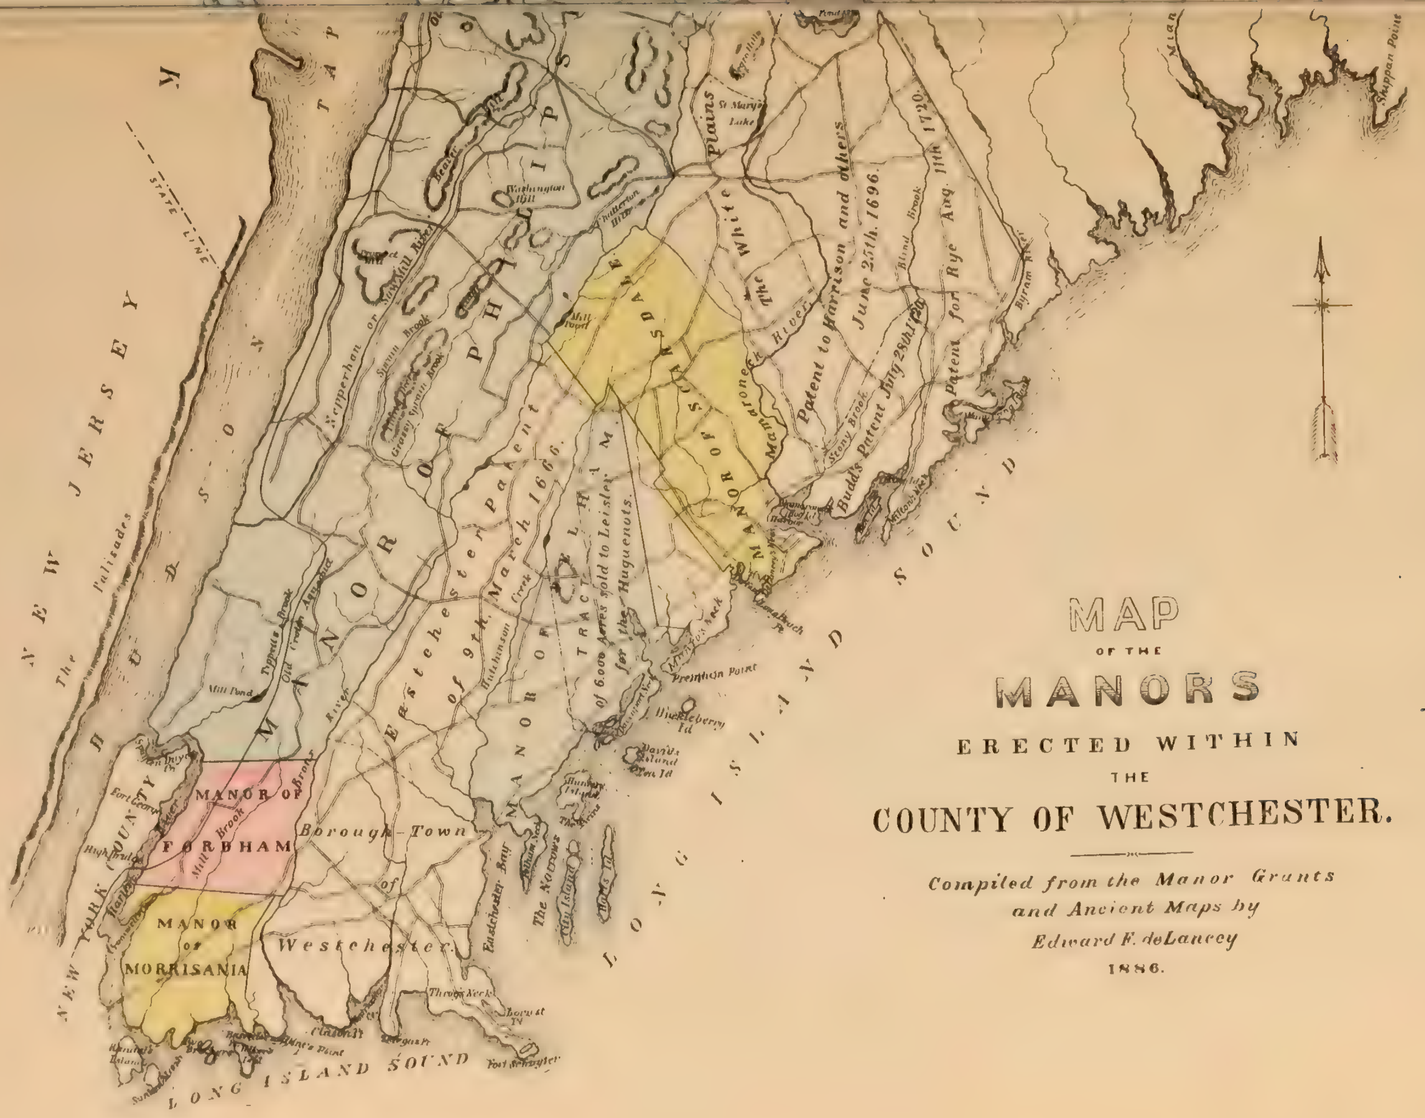
Slavery continued to exist, without any protest against it, until the Quakers took action to free the slaves held by their members. In 1767, Purchase Quarterly Meeting sent the following minute to the Yearly Meeting, then held at Flushing: "If it is not consistent with Christianity to buy and sell our fellowmen for slaves, during their lives and their posterity after them, then whether it is consistent with a Christian spirit to keep those in slavery that we have already in our possession by purchase, gift or any other ways." This was just twenty years before Wilberforce took his first step in England against the slave trade. The subject was continually before their meetings until the last slave held by a Friend was set free, in 1779. But they did not leave the matter there. In 1781, Purchase Monthly Meeting, in session at Chappaqua, decided "to appoint a number of solid, judicious Friends as a committee to perform a visit to such Friends who have set their negroes free, and inspect into the circumstances of such negroes and afford them advice, both with respect to their spiritual and their temporal good, as they may be enabled to do; and endeavor to find what in justice may be due to such negroes as may have spent the prime of their days in the service of their masters." The committee were directed to determine the amount so due, where the late masters were willing to leave it to their judgment. They were also directed to see that provision was made for the proper education of the negro youth. Reports were made from time to time of the progress of this work, until, in 1784, it was recorded that "proper settlements had been made between the Friends who had set their negroes free and the negroes so set free."

Others followed the example set by the Quakers in freeing their slaves, so that, by the end of the century, but few slaves remained in the county. All slaves in the State of New York were made free by law on 4th of July, 1827.



When the Quakers of Purchase liberated their slaves they settled them upon their rough lands in the northwestern portion of the town of Harrison, and thus the negro community, still existing northeast of the village of White Plains, was begun. Some of the slaves liberated in the northern portion of the county collected into a smaller settlement near the village of Bedford. These were the largest colonies of negroes in the county.

Occupations of the Early Settlers.—The first settlers in Westchester, like those who located elsewhere, had many difficulties to overcome besides those usually attending the occupation of a new country. Every native animal and bird was new to them and every plant unknown. The planting of every crop was an experiment, and the requirements of its successful cultivation were not understood. It is true that the cereals they brought across the Atlantic succeeded well here, but the climate was uncertain to them and the seasons differed greatly from those of their native lands.



The maize, upon which the Indians so largely subsisted in winter, was strange to them, and its preparation as food had to be learned, while their palates were slow in appreciating its excellence. The heat of summer and the continued cold of winter were found most trying. The animals they brought with them were greatly reduced by their long voyages and then had to endure the trials of acclimatization. As there were no mills for sawing lumber, the houses were constructed of stones and logs, while the necessary boards were obtained only by tedious hand labor. The shingles were riven from straight-grained chestnut timber and the laths from easy-splitting oak.

The whole country was covered with dense forests, except the parcels cleared by the Indians, and these had become exhausted of their fertility by continuous cropping with corn, and the settlers had no means of obtaining the necessary manure for their enrichment. After the trees had been removed from fresh fields the soil was generally very stony and difficult to cultivate.

When the settlers had become well established and lived in comfortable homes, their circumstances were rude and their occupations truly primitive. They had no roads other than the tortuous paths that led from one settlement to another, and over these nearly all their transportation was done by oxen, yoked to rude and cumbersome carts. The wheels were constructed from roughly-hewn oak with strong felloes, upon which pieces of iron were spiked to protect them from wear. They had no continuous tires. Wagons were very rare. Oxen also performed nearly all the animal labor of the farm. There were but few horses. These were chiefly used under the saddle, the women often riding upon pillions behind the men. Until mills for grinding grain were built, the flour was made by hand-grinding in a mortar, and afterward, the mills being few in number, much of the grain was carried long distances upon the backs of horses. Nearly everything used in the family was raised and manufactured upon the premises. Flax was an important crop and its preparation consumed much time and labor. It was dressed, spun and woven at home. During the greater portion of the year the people wore only linen garments and their beds were also furnished with linen coverings. The fleeces of their sheep were scoured, carded, spun and woven by the hands of those who wore the woolen clothes in winter and slept under the blankets they had themselves made. The loom occupied a room in nearly every house. The skins of their animals were tanned and dressed at home, the tan-vat being a nec-

FORT MONTGOMERY
PUTNAM COUNTY
CORTLANDT MANOR
West part of Cortlandt Manor. No. 11.
BEDFORD Patent
Patent to Robert Walter and others. of 14th Feb. 1701-2.
CROTON POINT
HAVERSTRAW BAY
NEW YORK
CONNECTICUT
Mohegan Lake
Croton Falls
Titicus River
Long Pond
Cross Pond
Stamford Mill River
Croton River
Cross River
Broad Brook
Byram Lake
Wampus Pond
Dark Valley
Byram River
Rockland Lake
Tappan Creek
Furnace Brook
Blue Mt
Spitzenbergh Mt
Gallows Hill
Kirby Pond
Mianus River
Jefferson Pond
Bronck Falls

MAP
OF THE MANORS ERECTED WITHIN
THE
COUNTY OF WESTCHESTER.
Compiled from the Manor Grants and Ancient Maps by Edward F. deLancey
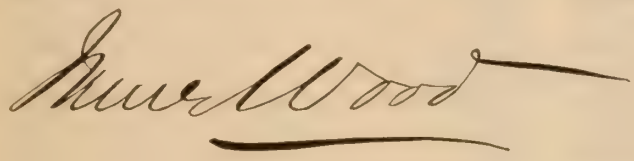
1886.
NEW JERSEY
The Palisades
STATE LINE
HUDSON
NEW YORK COUNTY
MANOR OF PHILIPSE
MANOR OF FORDHAM
MANOR OF MORRISANIA
MANOR OF SCARSDALE
MANOR OF PELHAM
TRACT of 6.000 Acres sold to Leisler for the Huguenots.
Westchester Patent of 9th March 1666.
Borough-Town of Westchester.
Patent to Harrison and others June 25th. 1696.
Budds Patent July 28th 1720.
Patent for Rye Aug. 11th 1720.
The White Plains
Mamaroneck River
Nepperhan or Sawmill River
Bronx River
Mill Brook
Stony Brook
Blind Brook
Byram River
St. Marys Lake
Mill Pond
Tippetts Brook
Old Croton Aqueduct
Hutchinson Creek
Eastchester Bay
The Narrows
Harts Id
Hunters Island
Huckleberry Id
Davids Island
Prespitian Point
Throgs Neck
Fort Schuyler
Clasons Pt
High Bridge
Fort George
Spuyten Duyvil
LONG ISLAND SOUND
Shippan Point



essary adjunct to every well-regulated establishment. The people made their own shoes or were supplied from leather of their own making by the itinerant shoemaker, who sojourned with the family till his work was completed. In the preparation and manufacture of so many articles all the members of the family were employed, and each home was the scene of busy industries, furnishing all its inmates with a practical education that made them useful and self-reliant.

Their tables were furnished with simple and wholesome food, usually served in one dish, in the centre, from which each person helped himself as he required. Many of the dishes were of wood, but most of pewter, and these were valued heirlooms in the family.

The wealthier houses had dishes of delftware which their owners had brought with them across the Atlantic.

Our fathers knew nothing of ease. Stern necessity kept them ever on the alert. By nature they were active and full of courage. Difficulties never disheartened them, but nerved them to greater effort. They manfully overcame the obstacles that beset them; from rough materials they hewed homes of comfort and contentment; they reared their families to virtue and usefulness, and their children rose up to call them blessed.

Those were rich streams that flowed into Westchester County: the Dutch, the Puritan, the Huguenot and the Quaker. Each fought its battle for civil and religious liberty. Each knew the rights of humanity, and, knowing, dared achieve them. Flowing together, they gave to Westchester more strains of good blood than any other section can boast, and they furnished an unequaled foundation stock for peopling the county and the State.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ORIGIN AND HISTORY OF MANORS IN NEW YORK, AND IN THE COUNTY OF WESTCHESTER.

BY EDWARD FLOYD DE LANCEY, ESQ.

Copyright, 1886.

1.

The Indian Owners of Westchester.

The Europeans who, it is certain, first beheld any part of what is now the County of Westchester, were Henry Hudson, and his mixed crew of Hollanders and Englishmen. They sailed up the great "River of the Mountains" in the yacht Half-Moon of Amsterdam, flying the orange white and blue flag of the United Provinces, on the thirteenth and fourteenth days of September, 1609.[1]

They were the earliest civilized men to gaze enraptured on the beautiful land of Westchester. They saw before all others, her lofty hills, rich valleys, and deep magnificent forests, glowing in the transparent air and warm sun of Autumn beneath the bright blue sky of America.[2]

They sailed up the river as far as the site of Albany and then slowly returned. On the second of October, they anchored at the historic inlet of Spyt-den-Duyvel, their progress being checked by a strong flood tide. Here, they first met the tawny, well formed, brown eyed, people, clad in skins and adorned with feathers, who then ruled over Westchester; and most unhappily as enemies. The cause was this. While still in the lower bay the Half-Moon, on the 9th of September, was threatened by some canoes full of savages. Hudson therefore detained two Indians as hostages, "putting red coats on them." Six days later, when she had got into the Highlands, the two Indians escaped through a port and swam ashore. When she stopped at Spyt-den-Duyvel on her return, one of the escaped Indians, and others, in a canoe, with some more canoes of Indians, tried to board her. Being repelled, they made an attack with bows and arrows, supported by about a hundred more Indians on shore. The fire-arms of the crew drove them off with a loss of nine or ten killed.[3]

Such was the unfortunate beginning of the intercourse of white men with the Indians of Westchester. These Indians, as well all the others with whom Hudson came in contact, belonged to a great aboriginal nation, or stock, termed the Lenni-Lenape. This was the name of that great confedera cy of Indian tribes, which, as Heckewelder states, extended from the mouth of the Potomac northeastwardly to the shores of Massachusetts Bay, and the mountains of New Hampshire and Vermont, and westwardly to the Alleghanies and the Cattskills,[4] and were afterwards known as the Delawares. Beyond the Lenni-Lenape, still further to the northeast, and extending to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and up the magnificent river of that name to the Great Lakes, was a second great nationality or confederacy of Indian tribes, that of the Hurons or Adirondacks, sometimes called the Algonquins. The term "Algonkin" or "Algonquin" is [1] Juet's Journal of Hudson's Voyage, I. N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll. Second Series, 325. These colors were those of William I., Prince of Orange—Nassau. The orange bar was changed to red after the death of William II. in 1650. As thus altered the flag of Holland continues to this day. de Jonge, cited in I. Brodhead, 325 n.

[2] That any earlier navigator sailed up the Hudson, as has lately been alleged, is, as yet, without sufficient proof.

[3] Juet's Journal, I. N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., Second Series, 324, 326, 330.

[4] Moulton's Hist. N. Y., 95 and 226.

used, however, by many writers to describe all the aborigines east of the Mississippi and south of the St. Lawrence, from the singular and very striking fact, that but one language was spoken throughout this entire region which was styled the "Algonquin" or "Algonkin." All the Indians within these limits understood each other. There were only comparatively slight local variations. They required no interpreters, except to communicate with white men.

West and northwest of the Lenni-Lenape, extending

A SUSQUEHANNA OR DELAWARE CHIEF.
(From Smith's "History of Virginia.")

from the western slopes of the Cattskills and the Helderbergs south of the Mohawk, and north of it, from the banks of the upper Hudson and the waters of Champlain to the shores of Lake Erie, and thence through the region south of that lake to the Mississippi, was the dominion of the third, and, perhaps, the most famous of the three great nationalities or races of confederated Indians, the Five (and later Six), Nations or Iroquois, and their affiliated tribes.

These were the three great stocks of aborigines, who were in possession of North America from the Potomac and Ohio on the south, to Canada on the north, and from the Atlantic Ocean on the east, to the Father of Waters on the west, at the time of Hudson's discovery of the great bay of New York and the magnificent river which bears his name.

Each of these three confederacies embraced numerous distinct tribes, sub-tribes, and smaller tribal divisions, or cantons, and chieftaincies, all having separate names, but united more or less closely by the bond of a common origin. Each tribe, or sub-tribe, possessed its own locality and specific region as its own property, which was never lost, except by voluntary migration or by conquest.

There also existed a distinguishing characteristic of a different nature in all these great Indian confederations. This was the clan or family distinction. Each confederacy was divided into tribes, families, or clans, designated by the name of some living creature, which they called their totem, or badge, the representation of which was painted upon their persons and upon their lodges. This tie, as members of the same confederacy, or even of the same totemic family, was not of itself sufficient to prevent them warring with each other in all cases. Like more civilized people they took up the hatchet against a tribe of the same stock, if occasion arose, as freely as against an enemy of another race. Conflicting claims to lands, disputed boundaries, and the rivalries of neighborhoods, not unfrequently gave rise to enmities and wars. Thus in 1609, the tribes on the western side of the bay of New York and the lower Hudson, and those on the eastern side, were bitter enemies,[1] although all were tribes and sub-tribes of the Lenni-Lenape or Delaware stock.

Among the Lenni-Lenape there were but three clans or families, designated from their totems or badges, as the Unamis, or Turtle (or Tortoise) clan, the Unalachtgo or Turkey, and the Minsi or Wolf, clans,[2] to one, or the other of which, belonged every tribe or minor sub-division of the Delaware stock. The tribes east of the Hudson, and all the sea coast tribes on both sides of Long Island Sound belonged to the Turkey clan, the tribes between the Hudson and the Alleghanies to the Minsi (sometimes termed Moncey) or Wolf clan, and those on the Lower Delaware, Lower Susquehanna, and Potomac to that of the Turtle (or Tortoise) clan.

The first writer on New Netherland, was Johan (John) de Laet, a learned man, a native of Antwerp, but a resident of the city of Leyden. He wrote in 1622, and first published in 1625, sixteen years only after the discovery, through the Elzevirs at Leyden a "History of the New World," which contains the first historical account of what is now New York. He was a director of the Dutch West India Company, subsequently one of the first patroons of New Netherland, and a personal friend of Hudson, whose private journal, as he tells us, he had before him when he wrote and from which, the extracts in his pages, are all that exist of Hudson's own account of his great discovery. At that time, de Laet says, the Indians on the west side of the Bay and River were called "Sankhicanni," or Sanhicans, and those on the east, "Mahicanni," or Mahicans, Mohicans, or Mohegans, the latter being Connecticut spelling of the word. The Dutch termed them "Mahikanders," and the natives on both sides of the Hudson collectively, the "River Indians." The Dutch word, however in general use, when speaking or writing of them was, "the Wilden," literally the wild men, or the savages.

[1] De Laet's New World, I. N. Y. Hist. Society's Coll., 2d series, 297.
[2] Ruttenber's Hist. River Indians, 47. Moulton Hist., N. Y., 35.

The Long Island Indians the Dutch called Matouwacks. They were Mohicans and were divided into twelve or thirteen sub-tribes or chieftaincies. All bore different names and possessed distinct, and different, localities. The ruling tribe were the Montauks who possessed the eastern extremity of the island. They owed their supremacy to the abundance of clams in their waters, from the shells of which they made the seawant or Indian money. This great abundance of the clam-shells enabled them to supply the Indians of all tribes westward almost to the great lakes with seawant, and thus Montauk became the seat of financial power, not only of Long Island, but of a region larger even than the Dutch Province of New Netherland.

All the natives of the main between the Hudson and the Connecticut, from the Sound on the south to the Green, and the White, mountains on the north, were Mohicans, and their great council fire was established on the Hudson, in the present town of Greenbush, nearly opposite Albany. The name of the Hudson was "Mahicannituck," or River of the Mahicans; just as the Delaware was called by them "Lenape-wchi-hi-tuck," or the rapid river of the Lenape; on the right bank of which, near where Philadelphia was afterward built, was the place of the Great Council Fire of the Lenni-Lenape confederacy.[1]

The Iroquois name of the Hudson, according to John R. Bleecker, the old Indian interpreter and surveyor of the middle and latter part of the last century, was "Cahotatea."[2] Judge Egbert Benson in his "Memoir" says, on the authority of a Palatine settler on Livingston manor, that the Hudson was also called "Shatemuc" by the Indians of that locality.[3]

The Indians of Westchester County were therefore Mahicans, or Mohicans, as it is easier to call them, of the Turkey tribe or clan of the Lenni-Lenape, or Delaware, stock of North American aborigines. They were divided into several sub-tribes, cantons, or chieftaincies, each ruled by a Sacchima, as the Dutch called the title, or Sagamore, or Sachem, and owning its own specific location.

Upon the island of New York, and in Westchester west of the Bronx, and as far north as Yonkers, were seated the Manahatas, as de Laet calls them, or the Manhattans; those of them in Westchester were also termed the Reckewacks, or Reckgawawancks, their territory, Keskeskick, and their chief village, Nappeckamak, was situated on the Nepperhaem, now Neperan, or Sawmill river, where it flows into the Hudson, the site of the present city of Yonkers.[4] The next tribe were the Wickquaeskecks, or Wickquaesgecks, or Wickerschreecks, so called from their village of that name which De Vries, writing in 1640, thus describes,—"Opposite Tappaen is a place called Wickquaesgeck. This land is also fit for corn, but too stony and sandy. We got there good masts. The [1] Moulton, 34 and 35.

DELAWARE INDIAN FAMILY.
(From Campanius' "New Sweden.")

[2] I. N. Y. Hist. Coll., 2, 3.
[3] Memoir, N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., II. series, vol. 2, p. 85.
[4] Rut⁂nber, 78. II. Col. Hist. N. Y., 2nd Series, 5.

land is mountainous." This "place" was the site of the present village of Dobbs Ferry. A few miles further up the Hudson was another town of the same tribe called Alipconck, or place of Elms, now Tarrytown. This tribe seems to have held the centre of the County from the lands of the Siwanoys on the east to the Hudson on the west. Adjoining them on the north were the Sint-sinks possessing two villages, Ossingsing now Sing-Sing, and Kestabuinck, the latter of which was inland and a little south of the Croton river.

From the Kicktawanc, or Croton, extending up the river to Anthony's Nose, and what is now the north line of the County, dwelt the Kicktawancks, or Kitchawongs, whose chief village was just above the mouth of the Croton river, on the isthmus connecting Senasqua, or Teller's Point, with the main land, and near the old Van Cortlandt Manor House. Eastwardly their lands appear to have extended to Connecticut and the lands of the Siwanoys. The Indians in the northern part of the county were also called the Tankitekes, which seems to have been a general

DELAWARE INDIAN FORT.
(From Campanius' "New Sweden.")

name for all dwellings north of the Wickquaeskecks. These last were said by Tienhoven in 1651, to have extended east to the Sound, but this being in conflict with de Laet's account of 1624, is believed to be an error. From Hellgate along the Sound, including the whole eastern side of Westchester County, and Connecticut, as far as Norwalk and its islands, and inland to the valley of the Bronx and the head waters of the Croton, a single and numerous tribe possessed all the land. These were the Sewanoes, or Siwanoys, as de Laet writing in 1624, the earliest and most trustworthy authority on New Netherland history, distinctly states.[1] They had several towns in this territory, some of which were fortified. One of the latter occupied the beautiful height in the township of Westchester overlooking the Sound, on which still stands the old seat of the Wilkins family, which from it has always borne, and still bears, the name of "Castle Hill." A village, and also a burial-place, existed on Pelham Neck, another on Davenport's Neck in New Rochelle, still another on Heathcote Hill and Nelson's Hill, at the head of Mamaroneck Harbor. A fifth, and a very large one, was on the attractive banks of Rye Lake in the northern end of the town of Harrison. Besides these there were scattered collections of a few lodges in other places chiefly resorted to in the fishing and hunting seasons. One of these was at Throg's Point, another at the extreme point of Pelham Neck, another on de Lancey's Neck at the narrowest point at the mouth of the Harbour, where a small creek running into the Harbour from the west, and a round field of upland adjacent to it, are still known as the Indian creek, and the Indian field, and the point itself as Indian Point. A fourth existed on Milton Neck, and a fifth on Manussing Island, both in the town of Rye. This account of the Westchester Indians is based upon a study of de Laet, de Vries, Van der Donck, O'Callaghan, Brodhead, Moulton, Schoolcraft, Ruttenber, and an examination of many Indian deeds, and records of councils.

From the Sakimas, Sagamores, or Sachems, of these various tribes, and some of their chief men and women, have come by deeds of conveyance the Indian titles to all the lands in Westchester County. There is no part of America of equal area, in which the Indian title was so fully and fairly extinguished. And none where in proportion to its size more Indian deeds have been given, preserved, and recorded.

There was a peculiarity in the customs of the Indians in relation to sales of lands which should always be remembered, and to their observance of which is to be ascribed the discredit sometimes attached to them in these matters. "Oh! you are an Indian giver" is sometimes heard, expressive of the idea, of giving a thing and then taking it back, which has its origin in this custom. They sometimes sold and deeded the same land more than once, in whole, or in part. This was in pursuance of a custom which with them was a law. It is thus stated by Ruttenber in his "History of the River Indians," page 80. "Lands held by them were obtained by conceded original occupation or by conquest. If conquered original right ceased and vested in the conquerors; if re-conquered, the title returned to its original owners. This rule they applied also to the sale of lands to the Dutch. [And to the English also.] As often as they sold to the latter and subsequently drove off the settlers, so often was re-purchase necessary, and if it was not made, a cause of grievance and future war remained." It was in fact, nothing but the application of their idea of the right of eminent domain. Of course there were instances of fraudulent deeds by Indians who had no power or right to convey, or who were drawn into sales when intoxicated or prisoners by designing whites. And there were some where rival Sachems claimed and deeded the same lands to different parties; but these exceptions were rare.

[1] De Laet's New World, ch. VIII.

In Westchester County the Indian title was first extinguished by purchase from the Indians pursuant to a license from the Dutch or English authorities, then Manors and Grants, by patents were obtained in the manner directed by the Dutch or English laws. And usually in the case of the Manors and larger patents, deeds of confirmation were subsequently obtained from the Indians, merely as a matter of precaution, notwithstanding the fact that the Indian title had, pursuant to the laws both of the Dutch and the English, been always extinguished by deed or deeds beforehand.

The North American Indians claimed that they sprung from the earth—that they were Antochthoni, produced from the earth itself, and hence they boasted their title to the lands could never be questioned and was indefeasible. This belief was the underlying foundation of the many curious, grotesque, and absurd, accounts of their origin given by different tribes, and different writers at different times. This is not the place to discuss the origin of the Indians, nor any of the many theories that have been broached to account for it.

But the belief above mentioned, in some form or other, always existed among themselves. Never was it more forcibly, or more eloquently expressed than by the great Tecumseh at the Council of Vincennes held by General Harrison, afterwards the ninth President of the United States, at that place in 1811. The chief of some tribes attended, to complain of a purchase of lands which had been made from the Kickapoos. The harshness of language used by Tecumseh in the course of the conference caused it to be broken up in confusion. In the progress of the long "talks," which took place, Tecumseh, having finished one of his speeches, looked around, but seeing every one seated, while no seat was prepared for him, a momentary frown passed over his countenance. Instantly General Harrison ordered that a chair should be given him. Some person presented one, with a bow, saying, "Warrior your father General Harrison offers you a seat." Tecumseh's dark eyes flashed. "My father!" he exclaimed with indignation, and extending his arm towards the heavens, burst forth "The Great Spirit is my father and the earth is my mother; she feeds and clothes me, and I recline on her bosom."[1]

2.

How the Indian Title vested successively in the Dutch West India Company, the British Crown, and the Independent State of New York.

The nature and extent of the Indian ownership, and the foundation of the title to the domain of the State of New York were settled by the principles on these subjects very early adopted and carried into effect by the different European nations which divided between themselves this western world. These principles formed the basis of a conventional international law which has been always observed in America. They define with precision, to whom the Indians could dispose of their rights to dominion and to the soil, and to whom they could not. They have been laid down by Chancellor Kent and Chief Justice Marshall in the highest courts of this State and the United States.[2]

These decisions are so admirably treated by Moulton, in that most valuable fragment of his "History of New York"[3] which is all that his early and lamented death has left to us, that his statement a little abridged will be almost all that is necessary to say on this subject here.

"Upon the discovery of this continent the great nations of Europe, eager to appropriate as much of it as possible and conceiving that the character and religion of its inhabitants afforded an apology for considering them as a people, over whom the superior genius of Europe might claim an ascendancy, adopted, as by a common consent, this principle,—

DAVID PIETERSEN DE VRIES.

"First, that discovery gave title to the government, by whose subjects, or under whose authority it was made, against all other European governments, which title might be consummated by possession. Hence if the country be discovered and possessed by emigrants of an existing acknowledged government, the possession is deemed taken for the Nation, and title must be derived from the sovereign in whom the power to dispose of vacant territories is vested by law.

"Secondly, Resulting from this principle was that of the sole right of the discoverer to acquire the soil from the Natives, and establish settlements, either by purchase or by conquest. Hence also the exclusive right cannot exist in government and at the same time in private individuals; and hence also,—

"Thirdly, The Natives were recognized as rightful occupants, but their power to dispose of the soil at their own will to whomsoever they pleased, was denied by the original fundamental principle, that discovery gave exclusive title to those who made it.

[1] Moulton's Hist. N. Y., 27.

[2] In Goodell v. Jackson, 20 Johnson, 693, and Johnson & Graham's Lessee v. McIntosh, 8th Wheaton, 543.

[3] P. 301, &c.

"Fourthly, The ultimate dominion was asserted, and, as a consequence, a power to grant the soil while yet in the possession of the Natives. Hence, such dominion was incompatible with an absolute and complete title in the Indians. Consequently they had no right to sell to any other than the government of the first discoverer, nor to private citizens without the sanction of that government. Hence the Indians were to be considered mere occupants, to be protected indeed while in peace in the possession of their lands, but with an incapacity of transferring the absolute title to others.

"Fifthly, The United States have acceded to those principles which were the foundation of European title to property in America. The Declaration of Independence gave us possession, and the recognition of Independence by Great Britain gave title to all the lands within the boundary lines described in the treaty that closed our revolutionary war, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy, and we thus became possessed of all the right Great Britain had, or which before the separation the provinces possessed, but no more. Hence the exclusive power to extinguish that right, was vested in that government which might constitutionally exercise it. Therefore each State before the Union in 1789, and each State since, (within its circumscribed territorial jurisdiction) possessed, and possesses, by its government the exclusive right to purchase from the Indians.

"Sixthly, That the allodial property in the territory of this State, or that which has become exclusively vested in the United States, is solely in the governments respectively, and that no foreign grant or title can be recognized by the Courts of Justice of this State, or of the United States.

"Spain though deriving a grant from the Pope, was compelled to rest her title on discovery; Portugal to the Brazils; France to Canada, Acadia, and Louisiana; Holland to the discoveries of Henry Hudson. England, though she wrested the Dutch possessions on the ground of pre-eminent right, asserted it on the same principle, tracing her right to the discovery of the Cabots, though they merely sailed along the coast of America, and extending her claim from 34° to 48° of north latitude. This principle of ultimate domain, founded on discovery is recognized in the wars, negotiations, and treaties of the European nations claiming territory in America. Such were the contests of France and Spain as to the territory on the north coast of the Gulf of Mexico; between France and Great Britain from their nearly contemporaneous settlements, till the treaty of Paris in 1763, when France ceded and guaranteed to Great Britain, Nova Scotia or Acadia, Canada and their dependencies. The cessions and retrocessions of the European powers in America were all made while the greater portion of the territories so ceded and retroceded were in the possession of the Indians. This was also the case when the right of ultimate dominion was asserted by actual settlement. The charter to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, renewed in that to Sir Walter Raleigh; the charters of James I. successively vacated, surrendered, annulled, or renewed, to the North and South Virginia Companies, until that to the Duke of Lenox and others in 1620; were all granted while the country was in the occupation of the Indians.

"Under the last mentioned patent, viz. to the Plymouth Company, New England has, in a great measure, been settled. They conveyed to Henry Rosewell and others in 1627, the territory of Massachusetts, who, in 1628, obtained a charter of incorporation. Having granted a great part of New England, the Company made partition of the residue in 1635, and surrendered their charter to the Crown. A Patent was granted to Ferdinando Gorges for Maine, which was allotted to him in the division of property. New Hampshire was granted to John Mason. Before the surrender by the Dutch of their colony, now New York, in 1664, the King of England had granted to the Duke of York, the country of New England, and as far as the Delaware Bay. The Duke subsequently transferred New Jersey to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret. And yet, during these events, a great proportion of the country was in possession of the Indians. In 1663 the Crown granted to Lord Clarendon and others the country lying between the 36th degree of North latitude and the River St. Mary's; in 1666 the proprietors obtained a new charter granting to them that province in the King's dominions in North America from the Atlantic to the South Sea. Thus our whole country, the soil as well as the right of dominion, was granted while occupied by the Indians. However extravagant the pretension may appear, of converting the discovery of an inhabited country into conquest, if the principle has been asserted in the first instance, and afterwards maintained; if a country has been acquired and held under it; if the property of the great mass of the community originates in it, it becomes the law of the land and cannot be questioned. . . . . The law of conquest, founded in force, but limited by that humanity or policy which incorporates the conquered with the victorious, spares all wanton oppression, and protects title to property, whether the vanquished became incorporated, or were governed as a distinct society, was incapable of application to the aborigines of this country. The tribes of Indians were fierce savages, whose occupation was war, and whose subsistence was chiefly from the forest. To leave them in possession of their country, was to leave the country a wilderness; to govern them as a distinct people was impossible, because they were as brave and high spirited as they were fierce, and were ready to repel by arms every attempt on their independence. To mix with them was impossible. The Europeans were then compelled either to abandon the country, and all claim to their discovery, remain exposed to perpetual hazard of massacre, or enforce their claim by the sword. Wars, in which the whites were not always the aggressors, ensued. European policy, numbers, and skill, prevailed. As the white population advanced, that of the Indians necessarily receded. The country in the neighbourhood of agriculturalists became unfit for them. The game fled into thicker and more unbroken forests, and the Indians followed. The soil to which the Crown originally claimed title, being no longer occupied, was parceled out according to the will of the sovereign power, and taken possession of by those claiming under it. Hence the absolute title and exclusive right of extinguishing that of the Indians having been vested in, and exercised by, the government cannot exist at the same time in private individuals, and was incompatible with an absolute and complete title in the Indians. The British government, which was then ours, and whose rights passed to the United States by, and at, the peace of 1783, asserted, and maintained, a title to all the lands occupied by the Indians in the British colonies in America, and the exclusive right of extinguishing their title by occupancy. These claims were carried to the line of the Mississippi by the terms of the treaty of 1783. Our title to a vast portion of the lands we hold originates in them. The United States therefore maintain the principle which has been received as the foundation of all European title in America."

By the treaty of peace, in 1783, Great Britain relinquished all claim not only to the government, but to the soil, and territorial rights, of the thirteen Colonies as claimed by the American negotiators of that treaty, the boundaries of which collectively were fixed by its second article. And by that treaty all the powers of that government and its right to the soil passed to the Thirteen States, not as a single Sovereignty, but as thirteen Independent Sovereignties. But neither the Declaration of Independence, nor the Treaty, could give us more than we possessed by virtue of the former, or to which Great Britain was before entitled.

New York, four years before the Articles of Confederation were adopted and became operative (which did not occur till March, 1781), adopted a constitution, at Kingston, on the 20th day of April, 1777; by the 37th Article of which (since reincorporated in all the subsequent State Constitutions), contracts for lands with the Indians in this State are made void unless sanctioned by the Legislature, and such purchases are declared to be a penal offense by a subsequent act of the Legislature; the object being the protection of the Indians in the possession of their lands.

During her whole existence as a British Colony, a period of one hundred and nineteen years, New York was a Royal Government, a Province independent in all respects except her allegiance to the British sovereign, whose representative was the Royal Governor for the time being. As such representative the Governor granted by patent all the lands which were granted in the Province, except those previously granted by, the prior Dutch government, the possession of which by their owners was duly confirmed by the Articles of Capitulation under which the Dutch surrender of New Netherland was made in 1664.

By the thirty-sixth article of the first State Constitution of 1777, all these crown grants under, through, and by Provincial Governors, prior to October 14, 1775, were declared to be valid and incontestible, and were thereby confirmed. And this declaration and confirmation have been continued and adopted in all the succeeding constitutions of New York to the present time. Consequently a grant from the British Crown is the highest source of title in this State, and one which is irrefragable, and incapable of being affected adversely in any way by any legislative, or other, act of the State government, or any decision of any Court of this State, or of the United States.

3.

The Dutch in New Netherland.

A brief statement of the dealings of the Dutch with their newly discovered country, before its colonization was actually begun, is necessary to a right understanding of the principles upon which that colonization was undertaken, and of the system of government, and laws, which that great nation established, in New Netherland.

And here let it be noted, that this name was New Netherland, not New Netherland*s*, as so often, and so wrongly, printed, written, and spoken. "Niew Nederlandt" was the term in Dutch. Adding a final "s" to the English translation, and calling it New Netherland*s*, is simply a pure New England vulgarism, and an utterly erroneous translation of the true name.

The Netherlands, in the plural, was the correct name in English of the United Provinces, from the fact that they consisted of seven Provinces, while Niew Netherlandt was but a single Province, notwithstanding its great extent, and hence was always spoken of, and written of, by the Dutch in the singular number.

The announcement of Hudson's great discovery did not produce rapid results. The extraordinary success of the East India Company at that time and the enormous dividends it declared drew the general attention to the eastern, and not to the western world. A single vessel in 1610, the year after the return of the Half Moon, made a successful trading voyage to the "River of the Mountains," returning to Holland with a valuable cargo of peltries. Two Dutch navigators, Hendrick Christiaensen, or Corstiaensen, and Adrian Block, chartering a vessel commanded by Captain Ryser, next made a voyage to the new region. In the early part of 1613, Hendrick Corstiaensen, in the "Fortune," and Block, in the Tiger, sailed again to the Manhattans, and explored the adjacent coasts and waters. Other vessels also visited the bay and river, and all returned with profitable cargoes of furs. No trouble was experienced with the natives, who were ready and willing to exchange their skins for the novel and attractive goods of Europe.

Block's vessel, the "Tiger," was accidentally burned in the Bay of New York in the autumn of 1613, and he therefore built another during the succeeding winter,[1]—the first ever constructed by white men in the waters of New York. It was a small yacht of only sixteen tons burden (English measure), which, with strange appropriateness, he named "the Onrust"—the Restless. In this yacht, in the summer of 1614, Block sailed through Hellgate and explored Long Island Sound and the adjacent coast as far east as Cape Cod, discovering the Housatonic, and Connecticut rivers, Narraganset Bay, and the island that still bears his name. He then first ascertained that Long Island was an island. The Connecticut river he ascended to a little above the present city of Hartford. He was the first European who sailed through the Sound, and the first white man who beheld the southern and eastern shores of Westchester County.

Corstiaensen finally determined to remain at Manhattan to extend the Indian trade. Turning over his own ship to Block, who left him the Onrust, the latter returned to Holland. Corstiaensen built two fortified trading-stations, one on an island below Albany, the other at the south end of Manhattan Island, and visited and traded with the Indians of all the neighboring tribes. Three other vessels, the Little Fox, the Nightingale and the Fortune, under Captains John de Witt, Rhys Volkertssen and Cornelis Jacobsen May, respectively, visited the "River of the Mountains," exploring and trading with the natives, and those of the regions adjacent.

This trade, thus begun, was so profitable that it induced these navigators, and the owners of their ships, to apply to the States-General of the United Provinces for a grant of the sole privilege of trading with the new and pleasant land beyond the ocean. They presented a memorial to this effect, accompanied by the first map ever made of the region of New Netherland—a "Carte Figuratif," as they styled it—to the States-General in the autumn of 1614. The application met their approval, and on the 11th of October, in the same year, that sovereign body made a grant to the petitioners of the privilege sought, to run for the term of three years, from the 1st of January, 1615. This grant is in the following words, and in it appears for the first time, as the name of the new region, the term "New Netherland."

"The STATES-GENERAL of the United Netherlands to all to whom these presents shall come, Greeting.

Whereas Gerrit Jacobz Witssen, antient Burgomaster of the City of Amsterdam, Jonas Witssen, Simon Morrissen, owners of the ship named the Little Fox, whereof Jan de Witt has been skipper; Hans Hongers, Paulus Pelgrom, Lambrecht van Tweenhuysen, owners of two ships named the Tiger and the Fortune, whereof Adriaen Block and Henrick Corstiaensen were skippers; Arnolt van Lybergen, Wessel Schenck, Hans Claessen and Barent Sweettsen, owners of the ship named the Nightingale, whereof Thys Volckertsen was skipper; Merchants of the aforesaid City of Amsterdam, and Pieter Clementzen Brouwer, Jan Clementzen Kies, and Cornelis Volckertssen, Merchants of the City of Hoorn, owners of the ship named the Fortuyn, wherof Cornelis Jacobssen May was skipper; all now associated in one company, have respectfully represented to us, that they, the petitioners, after great expenses and damages by loss of ships and other dangers, had, during the present year discovered and found, with the above-named five ships, certain New Lands situate in America, between New France and Virginia, the seacoasts whereof lie between forty and fortyfive degrees of Latitude, and now called New Netherland: And whereas We did, in the month of March last, for the promotion and increase of commerce, cause to be published a certain General Consent and Charter, setting forth, that whosoever should thereafter discover new havens, lands, places or passages, might frequent, or cause to be frequented, for four voyages, such newly discovered and found, places, passages, havens, or lands, to the exclusion of all others from visiting or frequenting the same from the United Netherlands, until the said first discoverers and finders shall, themselves, have completed the said four voyages, or caused the same to be done within the time prescribed for that purpose, under the penalties expressed in the said Octroy, &c., they request that we should accord to them due Act of the aforesaid Octroy in the usual form:

"Which being considered, We therefore in Our Assembly having heard the pertinent Report of the Petitioners, relative to the discoveries and findings of the said new Countries between the above-named limits and degrees, and also of their adventures, have consented and granted, and by these presents do consent and grant, to the said Petitioners now united into one company, that they shall be privileged exclusively to frequent, or cause to be visited, the above newly discovered lands, situate in America between New France and Virginia, whereof the seacoasts lie between the fortieth and fortyfifth degrees of Latitude, now named New Netherland, as can be seen by a Figurative Map hereunto annexed, and that for four voyages within the term of three years, commencing the first of January, sixteen hundred and fifteen next ensuing, or sooner, without it being permitted to any other person from the United Netherlands, to sail to, navigate, or frequent the said newly discovered lands, havens, or places, either directly or indirectly, within the said three years, on pain of confiscation of the vessel and Cargo wherewith infraction hereof shall be attempted, and a fine of Fifty thousand Netherland Ducats for the benefit of the said discoverers or finders; provided, nevertheless, that by these presents We do not intend to prejudice or diminish any of our former grants or charters; And it is Our intention, that if any disputes or differences arise from these our concessions they shall be decided by ourselves.

[1] I. Col. Hist. N. Y., 12. I. O'Callaghan's Hist. of New Netherland, 47.

"We therefore expressly command all Governors, Justices, Officers, Magistrates, and inhabitants, of the aforesaid United Countries, that they allow the said company peaceably and quietly to enjoy the whole benefit of this Our grant and consent, ceasing all contradictions and obstacles to the contrary. For such we have found to appertain to the public service. Given under our seal, paraph and signature of Our Secretary, at the Hague the xith of October, 1614."[1]

This exclusive charter expired by its terms on the first of January, 1818, and the company of merchants to whom it had been granted,—"the United New Netherland Company"—as they styled themselves, applied for its renewal. This the States-General refused, having in contemplation to charter a great military and commercial company for the West Indies similar to the great organization of that nature then existing for the East Indies. The object in view in both was the same, namely, to establish a power, which could, at the same time, maintain profitable foreign trade, and carry on military and naval enterprises against Spain, thus in both ways crippling their hereditary enemy. In the summer of 1618, Hendrick Eelkens and his partners, by special permission of the States-General, sent their ship, the "Scheldt" to the Manhattans for a single trading voyage. In 1619 Captain Cornelis Jacobsen May, who had made the voyage, a few years before in command of the "Fortune," sailed again in the ship "Glad Tidings," and explored the Bays of the Delaware, and the Chesapeake. Returning in 1620, he and his owners applied to the States-General for a special charter in their favor, and Eelkens and his partners put in an opposing petition claiming such special charter for themselves on the ground of prior discovery. The States-General tried to compel these parties to settle their differences, and unite their interests, and appointed a committee upon the subject. This committee sat for several months endeavoring, after hearing both sides, to effect this object; but finding it impossible, they so reported, and the States General refused to give either party the wished for prize. In less than seven months after this rejection, "the long pending question of a grand armed commercial organization was finally settled; and an ample charter, (bearing date the third day of June 1621) gave the West India Company almost unlimited powers to colonize, govern, and defend New Netherland."[2]

In the year 1619 Captain Thomas Dermer, a navigator in the employment of Sir Ferdinando Gorges, one of the leading corporators of the "Council of Plymouth" (as the Company chartered by James I. in 1606, was styled) who terms him "a brave stout gentleman," was sent in command of a ship of two hundred tons on a voyage to Monhegan, an island on the Coast of Maine some distance east of the Mouth of the Kennebec. One object of this voyage was to obtain a cargo of fish, another was to return to his home Squanto, one of the twenty-seven Massachusetts Indians kidnapped, carried to Malaga in Spain, and sold as slaves, late in 1614, by Hunt, the master of one of the three vessels of Captain John Smith, which that famous explorer left behind him to complete her cargo on his departure from New England in July, 1614.[3]

By the good efforts of some benevolent monks of Malaga many of the kidnapped Indians were rescued from slavery, and eventually found their way back to America. One of these was Squanto, who on reaching London, was sent by Mr. Slaney, merchant and treasurer of the Newfoundland Company to that island. There Dermer met him, on touching at the island on his way to England on a previous voyage, and carried him back to that country, as the easiest way of returning him to New England. On this, his next voyage he carried Squanto along with him. On arriving at Monhegan, and leaving his vessel there to obtain her cargo of fish, he took the ship's pinnace, an open, undecked boat, of only five tons, and with Squanto and two or three sailors departed for the home of his Indian friend. The unhappy savages so wickedly kidnapped by Hunt were natives of Patuxet on the coast of Massachusetts Bay and its neighborhood, Squanto himself having been born at that place. Dermer left Monhegan on the 19th day of May, 1619, and in his letter to the Rev. Samuel Purchas, (which the latter published in the fourth volume of his "Pilgrimage," in 1625,) says, "I passed along the coast where I found some ancient plantations, not long since populous, now utterly void; in other places a remnant remains, but not free from sickness. Their disease is the plague, for we might perceive the sores of some that had escaped who described the spots of such as usually die, (evidently the small-pox). When I arrived at my savage's native country, finding all dead, I travelled a long days journey westward to a place called Nummastaguyt (a place fifteen miles west from Patuxet) where finding inhabitants, I despatched a messenger a days journey farther west to Pocanaoket which bordereth on the sea, (now Bristol, Rhode Island); whence came to see me two kings, attended with a guard of fifty men, who being well satisfied with what my savage and I discoursed unto them—being desirous of novelty—gave me content in whatever I demanded, where I found that former relations were true.

[1] I. Col. Hist. N. Y. 11.

[2] I. Brod. 97.

[3] N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d Series. Vol. I. 347. I. Brodhead, 97.

"Here I redeemed a Frenchman, and afterwards, another at Mastachusit, who three years since escaped shipwreck at the north-east of Cape Cod."

Patuxet was the very place where on the 21st of December, 1620, eighteen months later, the Pilgrims from Leyden landed from the Mayflower, and which Captain John Smith six years before had called "Plymouth," a name which will ever be famous in New England history. Strange are the historic facts, that slaves were its first export, and those slaves Indians, that its first foreign visitors, after its discovery by Smith, were Frenchmen, the two redeemed by Dermer, who was the first to point out its advantages for a town, and that the coming there of the Pilgrims afterward was the merest accident of an accident, they having sailed for New Netherland.

Dermer reached Monhegan on his return, on the 23d of June, 1619, and after despatching his ship back to England, prepared to sail on a voyage to Virginia in his pinnace. "I put," he says, "most of my provisions aboard the Sampson of Captain Ward, ready bound for Virginia from whence he came, taking no more into the pinnace than I thought might serve our turns, determining with God's help to search the coast along, and at Virginia to supply ourselves for a second discovery if the first failed." He then sailed along the coast to Virginia arriving there on the 8th of September, 1619. Squanto terribly disappointed at finding all his people dead, remained with Dermer, till he touched on this second pinnace voyage, at Sawah-quatooke (an Indian town in the present township of Brewster on Cape Cod) "where," in Dermer's words, "he desired to stay with some of our savage friends." Subsequently Squanto, from the knowledge of English he had picked up, became of great assistance to the Pilgrims as an interpreter and his later career is well known.

Dermer stopped at Martha's Vineyard, and thence as he says, shaped his voyage "as the coast led me till I came to the most westerly part where the coast began to fall away southerly. (This was the eastern entrance of Long Island Sound.) In my way I discovered land about thirty leagues in length heretofore taken for main, where I feared I had been embayed, but by the help of an Indian I got to sea again, through many crooked and straight passages. I let pass many accidents in this journey occasioned by treachery, where we were twice compelled to go together by the ears; once the savages had great advantage of us in a strait, not above a bow-shot, [wide], and where a great multitude of Indians let fly at us from the bank; but it pleased God to make us victors. Near unto this we found a most dangerous cataract amongst small, rocky islands, occasioned by two unequal tides, the one ebbing and flowing two hours before the other." This was Hellgate, and the place were the Indians "let fly" at them was in the neighborhood of Throg's Point. Such was the voyage of the first Englishman who ever sailed through Long Island Sound, and the first who ever beheld the southern and eastern shores of Westchester County. This was five years after the Dutch skipper Block had sailed through the same Sound from the Manhattans, and ten years after Hudson's discovery of "the Great River of the Mountains." Very singular it is, that fights with the Indians, both, on the Hudson, and on the Sound, and at points nearly opposite each other, were the beginning of civilization in Westchester County; and that the first was with the Dutch and the second with the English, the two races of whites, which, in succession, ruled that county, and the Province and State of New York.[1]

Dermer spent the succeeding winter (1619-20) in Virginia, went back to New England the next summer, again visited Plymouth in June, and described its advantages for a town settlement in his letter of the 30th of that month, went again to Virginia, and there died.

On this return voyage from Virginia, Dermer, in the words of the "Brief Relation" of the Plymouth Company's proceedings from 1607 to 1622, "met with certain Hollanders, who had a trade in Hudson's river some years before that time, with whom he had a conference about the state of that coast, and their proceedings with those people, whose answer gave him good content."

This visit of Dermer to "certain Hollanders" was the first visit of an Englishman to Manhattan Island, and he was the first man of that race who trod its soil. Hudson never landed on the island, and they who first did so, and those whom Dermer found there, were Dutchmen. This voyage, however, was the basis of one of the most famous myths of American and New York history. Twenty-nine years after Dermer's visit, in the year 1648, there appeared in England a pamphlet, under the nom de plume of "Beauchamp Plantagenet, Esq.," entitled, "A Description of the Province of New Albion," in which it is stated, that Capt. Samuel Argall, on his return to Virginia from Acadia in 1613, "landed at Manhatas Isle, in Hudson's river, where they found four houses built, and a pretended Dutch Governor under the West India Company of Amsterdam," and that he (Argall) forced the Dutch to submit themselves to the King of England and to the government of Virginia.[2]

This story, often and often repeated, is not supported by any official document of the English, Virginia, or Dutch governments yet discovered to this day, and is believed by modern scholars to have been

[1] This letter of Dermer reprinted from Purchas with a learned preface, is in I. N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll. 2d Series, 343. Also in 26 Mass. Hist. Coll., p. 63.

[2] I. N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d Series, 335.

based by "Plantagenet" on Dermer's account of his voyages, somewhat dressed up. In 1613 the Dutch West India Company had not only not been incorporated. but it was not formed till 1621. That eminent American historical scholar, the late Hon. Henry C. Murphy of Brooklyn, a great lawyer, a practiced statesman, in the Dutch language profoundly skilled, and who had been minister to Holland, after a thorough investigation of this story of Argall's visit, placed in a note to his translation of Van der Donck's "Vertoogh," or "Representation," of New Netherland, published in 1849, the following emphatic opinion,—"This story is a pure fiction, unsustained by any good authority—though some writers have heaped up citations on the subject—and as fully susceptible of disproof as any statement of that character at that early period can be."[1]

It is clear that from Hudson's Discovery to the chartering of the West India Company the Dutch considered New Netherland as a colony for commercial purposes only, and maintained it simply for the profits of the fur trade with the Indians. Its true colonization, as a land to be settled by their own people, for its agricultural and other resources, and as a possible market for the productions of Holland, was gradually forced upon them by their experience of its constantly increasing value, and pleasant, and productive, climate and soil.

The first step in this direction was the chartering of the West India Company by the States General of the United Netherlands on the third of June 1621. Such an organization as an armed military trading company to Africa and Virginia, was suggested by William Usselinx, a merchant of Antwerp, in 1606, as a means of aiding the Government in the war with Spain, then raging. Some preliminary measures were taken, but before any practicable ones could be adopted, the truce of 1609 was agreed upon for the term of twelve years, and the scheme fell to the ground.

The charter of 1621 was not put into immediate operation, but was held for further consideration and discussion, during the next two years. Finally the interests of all parties were harmonized, certain amplifications and amendments were fully agreed upon, and were embodied in an "ordinance" of the States-General, which passed the seals on the 21st of June 1623, containing twelve "Articles," and which closes in these words:—

"We having examined and considered the aforesaid articles, and being desirous to promote unity and concord between the directors and principal adventurers, and the advancement of the West India Company, have with the advice of the Prince of Orange,[2] thought fit to agree to, and approve of, and do hereby agree to, and approve thereof, and direct that the same shall be punctually attended to and observed, by the directors, members, and every person concerned therein, in the same manner as if they were inserted in the charter; because we find them proper for the service of the West India Company."[3]

While these modifications were being considered the States-General authorized many special voyages to New Netherland, each under a special license, which also contained a proviso obliging the parties in interest to return with their ships by the first of July 1622. This was to avoid any interference with the West India Company, or any anticipation of the commencement of their business.[4]

The Charter of the Dutch West India Company was modeled after that of the Great Dutch East India Company, and like it was intended to promote trade, colonization, and the breaking down by armed fleets of the power and pride of the kingdom of Spain.

Both were armed commercial monopolies with most extensive powers and enormous capital. Both were established on the basis of the public law of Holland, which was simply the "Roman Law," with slight modifications. And both were supported by the assistance and strength of the Government of the United Provinces.

The West India Company's Charter consists of a preamble and forty-five articles, together with the preamble and twelve articles of the final agreement of the 21st of June 1623 above-mentioned. The central power of this vast association, as O'Caliaghan states, "was divided, for the more efficient exercise of its functions, among five branches or chambers, established in the different cities of the Netherlands, the managers of which were styled 'Lords Directors.' Of these, that of Amsterdam was the principal, and to this was intrusted the management of the affairs of New Netherland. The general supervision and government of the Company, were, however, lodged in a board, or Assembly of Nineteen delegates [briefly termed the Assembly of XIX.]; eight (changed to nine in 1629) of whom were from the Chamber at Amsterdam; four from Zealand; two from Maeze; and one from each of the chambers of Friesland and Groeningen (forming the North Department). The nineteenth was appointed [as their own representative] by their High Mightinesses, the States General of the United Provinces."

Apart from the exclusive trade of the coast of Africa, from the tropic of Cancer to the Cape of Good Hope, and of the coast of America, from the Straits of Magellan to the extreme North [Terra Nova or Newfoundland], this Company was authorized to form alliances with the chiefs of the Indian tribes, and obligated to advance the settlement of their possessions, encourage population, and do everything that

[1] II. N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d Series, 326; see also I. Brodhead, 51, and note E., p. 754.

[2] Prince Maurice.

[3] I. O'Call., Appendix "B," 408.

[4] I. Col. Hist. N. Y., 22-27.

might promote the interests of those fertile countries and increase trade.

To protect its commerce and dependencies, the Company was empowered to erect forts and fortifications; to administer justice and preserve order; maintain police, and exercise the government generally of its transmarine affairs; declare war and make peace, with the consent of the States-General; and, with their approbation, appoint a Governor or Director-General, and all other officers, civil, military, judicial, and executive, who were bound to swear allegiance to their High Mightinesses, as well as to the Company itself.

The Director-General and his Council were invested with all powers judicial, legislative, and executive, subject, some supposed, to appeal to Holland; but the will of the Company, expressed in their instructions, or declared in their marine or military ordinances, was to be the law of New Netherland, excepting in cases not especially provided for, when the Roman Law, the imperial statutes of Charles V., the edicts, resolutions, and customs of Patria—Fatherland—were to be received as the paramount rule of action.[1]

"The States General engaged, among other things, to secure to the Company freedom of navigation and traffic, within the prescribed limits, and to assist them with a million of guilders, equal to nearly half a million of dollars; and in case peace should be disturbed, with sixteen vessels of war and four yachts, fully armed and equipped; the former to be at least of three hundred, and the latter of eighty, tons burthen; but these vessels were to be maintained at the expense of the Company, which was to furnish, unconditionally, sixteen ships and fourteen yachts, of like tonnage, for the defence of trade and purposes of war, which, with all merchant vessels, were to be commanded by an admiral appointed and instructed by their High Mightinesses."[2]

Such were the great and extensive powers under which New York was colonized. And such was the basis of the legal system under which civil rule and civil law was first established within its borders; and under which it flourished and was governed, till the close of the Dutch dominion, a period of more than half a century.

4.

The Colonization by the West India Company.

In the same year, 1623, the West India Company began the colonization of New Netherland, which was then erected into a Province, by the States-General and invested with the armorial bearings of a Count;[3] the shield being, argent, a pale sable charged with three crosses saltire, argent, paleways; the crest a Beaver couchant proper.[4]

To the Chamber of Amsterdam was committed its direction and management. That body despatched the first expedition in March, 1623, under Cornelis Jacobsen May[5]—from whom the northern cape at the mouth of the Delaware is named—as the first Director-General of New Netherland. It consisted of the ship "New Netherland" of 266 tons burthen, with a cargo of supplies and tools, and thirty families of colonists, who were Protestant Walloons. These Walloons were the inhabitants of the frontier between France, and Flanders, from the river Scheldt to the river Lys, their language was the old French, and their religion the Reformed Faith of the Huguenots. Associated with this expedition, as the captain of the ship, was Adrian Joris, who had made several prior voyages to the coast of America, although he is sometimes erroneously styled "Director."[6] After a two months' voyage by way of the Canaries and the West Indies May and his colonists arrived in the bay of New York. He divided the Walloons into several parties, sending some to Albany, some to the Delaware, some to Hartford, some to Staten Island, some to Long Island—where the name of the Wallabout bay still denotes the place of their settlement—and retained others on the island of Manhattan. Thus began the real colonization of New Netherland, a region out of which was to be formed four of the Middle States and one of the New England States of the American Union. The first colonists of this region spoke no English, and knew no English law, and they were brought here by the nation which first discovered and occupied the land,[7] a nation likewise ignorant of English law and of the English tongue. The Roman law, with a few Batavian customs engrafted upon it, was the first legal system established in the entire region, and it not only governed the foundation of European rule and civilization in New Netherland, but maintained their continuous existence there, for half a century; and even then only yielded to another tongue and another legal system by the force of arms.

May administered the affairs of the new colony about a year, and was succeeded by William Verhulst as second Director-General, whose administration likewise continued only a year, when he resigned and returned to Holland. It was marked however by the arrival and introduction of the first wheeled vehicles and first domestic animals into this State. Peter Evertsen Hulst, a merchant, and a director of the Amsterdam Chamber, despatched to "The Manhadoes" three ships of 280 tons each, at his own expense and risk, in April 1625, with supplies, tools,

[1] I. O'Call. Hist., 89.

[2] Ib., 91.

[3] I. Brod., 148; I. O'Call., 99.

[4] These arms, in 1654, appear on the first seal of the Province, which in those days was also the seal of "New Amsterdam," surmounted by a mantle having in its centre the letters G. W. C., the initials of "Geoctroyeede West Indische Compagnie," the Dutch appellation of the West India Company.—III. Doc. Hist, 396.

[5] Wassenaer, III. Doc. Hist., 43.

[6] I. Brod., 156.

[7] Cabot, whose voyage along the coast of North America was the basis of the English claim to New Netherland, never landed upon nor took possession of any part of it for the King of England.

and wagons, and one hundred and three head of animals, consisting of stallions, mares, bulls, cows, swine and sheep; "each beast," says Wassenaer, in his account of the voyage, "had its own separate stall," arranged on a flooring of sand three feet deep, which was laid upon a deck specially constructed in the vessel, beneath which were stowed 300 tuns (casks) of water. Only two beasts died at sea. The rest on arriving were landed on "Noten," now Governor's, Island, then covered by a dense forest of nut trees, so thick that the pasturage was insufficient, and two days later all the animals were transferred to Manhattan Island where they throve well. These ships also brought six more families of Walloons, and a few single people, forty-five persons in all.[1]

To Verhulst succeeded, as third Director-General, Peter Minuit, of Wesel, in Westphalia, who was of French Huguenot origin. He sailed from the Texel on the ninth of January, 1626, in the ship Sea-Mew, and reached "the Manhadoes" on the fourth of the succeeding May.

The second and third articles of the Charter of the West India Company conferred upon it the power of appointing the Directors-General, and other officers, of all colonies it might establish. The Amsterdam Chamber, to which had been committed the care of New Netherland, under these powers proceeded to organize the first civil government in the new Province. The grant in the West India Company's charter is very extensive. The operative words are, "and also build any forts and fortifications there, to appoint and discharge governors, people for war, and officers of justice, and other public officers, for the preservation of the places, keeping good order, police, and justice, and in like manner for the promoting of trade; and again others in their place to put, as they, from the situation of their affairs shall see fit."

By virtue of these powers, and of the vote of the Company placing New Netherland under its sole control and management, the Amsterdam Chamber of the Company appointed Peter Minuit Director-General, and the following persons as his council, viz., Peter Bylvelt, Jacob Elbertsen Wissinck, Jan Jansen Brouwer, Symon Dirksen Pos and Reynert Harmensen. To these were added Isaac de Rasieres as Provincial Secretary, and Jan Lampo as "Schout-Fiscaal," (pronounced as if spelled "Skowt"), who was an executive officer, combining the powers of a sheriff and an attorney-general. These formed the first organized civil government in what is now this State of New York—and collectively were styled "The Director-General and Council of New Netherland." The Schout-Fiscaal was entitled to sit with the Council but had no vote. The Secretary was the officer next in importance to the Director, and was also "Opper-koopman," or book-keeper and treasurer.

This Council had supreme executive and legislative authority in the colony. It was also the sole tribunal for the trial of all civil and criminal cases, and all prosecutions before it were instituted and conducted by the Schout-Fiscaal. In taking informations, he was bound to note as well those points which made for the prisoner as well as those against him, as the Roman law provides, and after trial to see that the sentence was lawfully executed. He was also chief custom-house officer and had power to inspect vessels and their cargoes, sign their papers, and confiscate all goods introduced in violation of the Company's regulations. This most responsible of all the offices in the new government was held during Director Minuit's entire administration by the above-named Jan Lampo who was a native of Cantelberg. It should be stated also, that when the Schout-Fiscaal acted as prosecuting officer he retired from the bench. It will be seen that this Council acted in a twofold capacity, as an Executive Council, and as a Court of Justice. When, later, inferior tribunals were established, its members were not amenable to them. On extraordinary occasions it was usual to adjoin some of the principal inhabitants, or Public Servants, pro hac vice, to the Council by its own vote, who then had an equal voice in the decision of the matter in question.[2]

Such was the nature of the body by which executive, legislative, and judicial authority was exercised, not only on Manhattan Island, and in the County of Westchester, but in all parts of New Netherland.

The new government began vigorously. The Governor and Council first laid out and commenced the erection of a regular fortification on the extreme southern point of Manhattan Island. The engineer was Krijn Frederickje, and it was begun in 1626, was not finished in July 1627, as de Rasières tells us, but was probably completed at the end of 1627. Its predecessor, though called a fort, was simply a stockaded trading house. This, however, was a regular work of four bastions, entirely faced with stone.[3]

Isaac de Rasières, the writer of the letter mentioned, arrived in the ship "Arms of Amsterdam" on July 27th, 1626. He was a Huguenot Walloon, an agent of Blommaert an Amsterdam merchant, and a member of the West India Company, to whom his letter is addressed. He was made by Minuit Provincial Secretary, and as such, opened a correspondence with Gov. Bradford of Plymouth, for a friendly trade, visited that celebrated place, as a New Netherland envoy in 1627, and has left us an account of it in this letter, discovered at the Hague in 1846, and first printed in II. N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2 Series, 339.

On the 23d of September, 1626, this ship, the "Arms of Amsterdam," sailed again on her return voyage to Holland, with a very valuable cargo of furs.

[1] III. Doc. Hist. N. Y., 41–43.

[2] I. O'Call., 101; N. Netherland Register, 2.

[3] Wassenaer, III. Doc. Hist. N. Y., 47; Brodhead's Early Colonization of N. Netherland, II. N. Y. Hist. Coll., 2d Series, pp. 363–365.

She also carried out the official account of the most important event that had yet happened in New Netherland, the result of a treaty held by Director Minuit and his Council with the natives of Manhattan, the first ever held by the Dutch with the Indians in America. This event was the purchase of the Island of Manhattan by the West India Company, which is the foundation of title to all the real estate on the Island of New York, and by which the city holds all the land that it still possesses at this day, south of the Harlem River. She had a comparatively rapid passage, reaching Amsterdam on the fourth of November following, a little over six weeks. The very next day, the delegate of the States-General in the "Assembly of the XIX.," then in session, advised that august body of the arrival, and the news, by letter. Unfortunately Minuit's official despatch has not been preserved, but the letter of Pieter Schagen, the States-General's representative, is still in the Royal Archives at the Hague, and proves the fact. It is, in full, as follows;—

"High and Mighty Lords:—Yesterday arrived here the ship 'the Arms of Amsterdam,' which sailed from New Netherland out of the River Mauritius,[1] on the 23d of September. They report that our people are in good heart and live in peace there; the Women have also borne some children there. They have purchased the Island Manhattes from the Indians for the value of 60 guilders; 'tis 11,000 morgens in size.[2] They had all their grain sown by the middle of May, and reaped by the middle of August. They send thence samples of summer grain; such as wheat, rye, barley, oats, buckwheat, canary seed, beans, and flax.

The cargo of said ship is;—

7,246 Beaver skins.
178½ Otter skins.
675 Otter skins.
48 Minck skins.
36 Wild cat skins.
33 Minckes.
34 Rat skins.
Considerable oak timber and hickory.

Herewith, High and Mighty Lords, be recommended to the mercy of the Almighty.

In Amsterdam, the 5th of November A. D. 1626.

Your High Mightinesses obedient,

P. SCHAGEN."

It is endorsed, "Received 7th November, 1626."

This action of Director-General Minuit and the Council of New Netherland marks the beginning of the policy of the Dutch nation in its treatment of the Indians of America in the matter of their lands, and also its Christian character. This policy and all the dealings with the natives pursuant to it was based on the principle, that the Indians were the lawful proprietors of their native land by original right of occupancy, and that it could only be alienated by their own act, and not taken from them by right of conquest, or by rapine. Of no other of the nations of Europe which colonized America, except the Dutch, can it be truly said that this wise and Christian principle always governed them in their dealings with the Indians. Much has been written about William Penn as being the first to purchase their lands by treating with them. But Director Minuit on the banks of the Hudson preceded him in this honorable and Christian treatment of the Indians by more than half a century. And the same policy and treatment was ever continued during the whole period of the Dutch possession of the Province of New Netherland.

At the date of the purchase the Indian population of Manhattan Island is said by some writers to have been 200, men, women, and children, and by none has it been put at more than 300. The numbers of the Dutch, we know, were only 270.[3] So that the population on each side could not have been far from equal. A fact that speaks well for those early Dutch people, for from the discovery up to 1626 their possession of the island was only by the sufferance of the Indians, and during that whole time there was never a contest or a quarrel between them and the savages.

The price paid for the Island was a fair one, for the time, age, and place, for it was nothing but a little wild island on a coast almost unknown, of a continent entirely unknown. It was but one of hundreds and hundreds of small islands lying all along the Western shores of the Atlantic Ocean, with nothing to show it had any value at all except the prior occupation of one end of it as a trading post by the Dutch. And many of those same little islands in as out-of-the-way places, may be purchased to-day for a price almost as low.

De Laet in his history of the West India Company gives a table of the annual exports and imports from, and into, New Netherland, from 1624 to 1635, from which it appears, that in 1626, the year of the purchase, but two ships came to, and went from, New Amsterdam, and that the value of the imports (supplies and goods) was 20,384 guilders, about 8,500 dollars, and that of the exports (furs and timber) were 45,050 guilders, about 14,000 dollars.[4]

It was simply as a station to collect furs from the Indians that Manhattan Island then had any value whatever. Such was the beginning of that "Province of New Netherland" in the year 1623, which 262 years later, in 1885, is the State and City of New York, the former with 5,000,000 of inhabitants, the latter with 1,250,000 people. And the island that was

[1] The Dutch so named the Hudson after Maurice, the then Prince of Orange.

[2] A morgen, or Dutch acre, was two English acres; "60 guilders" was 24 dollars of our money.

[3] Wassenaer, III. Doc. Hist. N. Y., 47.

[4] De Laet, I. N. Y. Hist. Coll., 2d series, 385. I. O'Call., 104.

then bought for 24 dollars, now has a value so high up in the millions of dollars, that the mind with difficulty can take it in; while the city built upon it, is the third in importance, size, and wealth in the civilized world, and the chiefest in the western hemisphere.

The Walloons had moved in the matter of leaving Holland for America in the year 1621, two years before the thirty families came out under Director May as mentioned above. They applied to Sir Dudley Carleton, British Ambassador at the Hague, to know, whether the King of England, James the First, would permit them "to settle in Virginia," in accordance with a petition setting forth the terms and conditions under which they desired to undertake the enterprise. This Petition of fifty-six heads of families, Walloon, and French, all of the Reformed Religion was presented to, and left, with Carleton, who sent it to England, enclosed in a letter of his own favoring its object, dated the 19th of July, 1621. Accompanying the petition was a written covenant in these words;— "We promise his Lordship the ambassador of the most serene king of Great Britain, that we will go to settle in Virginia, a part of his Majesty's dominions, at the earliest time practicable, and this under the conditions set forth in the articles we have communicated to his said lordship the ambassador, and not otherwise."

This paper bore the signatures of all the petitioners, attached in the form of a round-robin the centre of which was the above covenant; and it showed, besides the names of the signers, their occupations, and the number of the children of each. Among the names are those well known in New Amsterdam from that day to this, as De Forest, De La Montagne, Lambert, Le Roy, Du Puy, and others, as good, honest, upright people. The Lords in Council referred the application to the Virginia Company, who received it very coldly, suggested a few modifications and declined any assistance, in money or in transportation. This ended the matter with the English, and these "Walloons as well as French," afterwards made arrangements with the West India Company to go to New Netherland, which were carried out under May in 1623 as mentioned before.

This petition to the British King contained seven articles specifying in detail, the conditions and terms under which, these first colonists desired to enter upon the work of colonization, and is therefore of the greatest value as acquainting us, beyond cavil, with the views and ideas of those who actually did begin that work in what is now the City and State of New York.[1]

In this document appears the very earliest mention of the land tenure which the first colonists of New York desired and asked for. It was that with which they were familiar, and which they fully understood, and under which they had always lived, and was based on fealty, homage, and manorial rights, as fixed by the Roman law, with which alone they were acquainted, and which under the West India Company was established as the law of New Netherland, and governed it till its conquest by the English in 1664. The articles of this "petition" numbers five and six, are in these words (The whole is in French, and this is the translation):

"VI. Whether he (His Britannic Majesty) would "grant them a township or territory, in a radius of "eight English miles, or say, sixteen miles in diameter, "which they might improve as fields, meadows, vine-"yards, and for other uses; which territory whether "conjointly or severally, they would hold from his "Majesty upon fealty and homage; no others being "allowed to dwell within the bounds of the said "lands, unless they shall have taken letters of citi-"zenship; in which territory they would reserve to "themselves inferior manorial rights; and whether it "might be permitted to those of their number who "are entitled to maintain the rank of noblemen, to "declare themselves such.

"VII. Whether they would be permitted in the "said lands to hunt all game whether furred or "feathered, to fish in the sea and the rivers, to cut "heavy timber, as well for ship building as for com-"merce, at their own will; in a word, whether they "could make use of all things either above or beneath "the ground, at their own pleasure and will, the royal "rights reserved; and whether they could dispose of "all things in trade with such persons as may be per-"mitted them.

"Which provisions would extend only to said "families and those belonging to them, without ad-"mitting those who might come afterwards to the said "territory to avail themselves of the same, except so "far as they might of their own power, grant this to "them, and not beyond, unless his said Majesty should "make a new grant to them."

Such were the clear, undeniable wishes and desires, expressed in their own words, by those men who began the actual settlement of the region now known as New York, and which they did carry out, a little modified, by the Dutch system and rule.

The West India Company by its charter was bound to take measures for the increase of the population of its new Province, and the development of its agricultural resources. It found this a difficult duty to perform, mainly in consequence of two causes. The first was, the extreme profit of the fur trade which absorbed the general attention. The second was, that the farmers and laborers of Holland knew that they could do well enough at home. This fact is thus stated in a report of the Assembly of XIX. to the States General in 1629, referring to the effect of a proposed truce with Spain, upon the interests of New Netherland.

[1] This petition is given at length, with an engraving of the "round robin" and its signatures, in the valuable "History of the Huguenot Emigration," by the Rev. Dr. C. W. Baird, vol. I. p. 158, just published.

"Moreover the colonizing such wild and uncultivated countries, demands more inhabitants than we can well supply; not so much through lack of population, in which our provinces abound, as from the fact, that all who are inclined to do any sort of work here, procure enough to eat without any trouble; and are, therefore, unwilling to go far from home on an uncertainty."[1]

This subject had engaged the attention of the Company, and of the Chamber of Amsterdam especially, in 1627 and 1628. After much discussion, and long deliberations, it was finally determined in the Assembly of the XIX. that a plan should be prepared giving special privileges, powers, and exemptions, to such members of the Company who would, at their own expense and risk, send out expeditions, and establish separate and distinct plantations in any part of New Netherland, Manhattan Island excepted. The details were slowly and carefully determined, and not till the seventh of June, 1629, was the plan finally approved and adopted by the Assembly of XIX., and ratified and confirmed by their High Mightinesses the States-General.

This plan, or charter, as it sometimes styled, was entitled:—

"FREEDOMS AND EXEMPTIONS.

GRANTED BY THE ASSEMBLY OF THE XIX. OF THE PRIVILEGED WEST INDIA COMPANY, TO ALL SUCH AS SHALL PLANT ANY COLONIES IN NEW NETHERLAND."

It consisted of thirty-one articles, and was printed in a small quarto pamphlet of four or six pages and distributed throughout the United Provinces in 1630. Only three or four copies of this pamphlet are now known to exist, and it is so rare that within ten years a distinguished New York antiquarian reprinted it in fac-simile.

As it is the first instrument under which lands in the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Delaware, and Connecticut, were acquired, and on which titles rest, it is here given in full from the translation made by the late eminent historian of New Netherland, Dr. Edmund B. O'Callaghan, for his own great work, the "History of New Netherland; or, New York under the Dutch," first published in 1846.

"FREEDOMS AND EXEMPTIONS.

GRANTED BY THE ASSEMBLY OF THE XIX. OF THE PRIVILEGED WEST INDIA COMPANY, TO ALL SUCH AS SHALL PLANT ANY COLONIES IN NEW NETHERLAND:

"I. Such members of the said Company as may be inclined to settle any colonie[2] in New Netherland, shall be permitted to send in the ships of this Company going thither, three of four persons to inspect the situation of the country, provided that they, with the officers and ships company, swear to the articles, so far as they relate to them, and pay for provisions and for passage, going and coming, six stuyvers per diem; and such as desire to eat in the cabin twelve stuyvers, and to be subordinate, and give assistance like the others, in cases offensive and defensive; and if any ships be taken from the enemy, they shall receive pro rata, their proportions with the ships company, each according to his quality; that is to say, the colonists eating out of the cabin shall be rated with the sailors, and those who eat in the cabin with those of the company's men who eat at table and receive the lowest wages.

"II. Though, in this respect, shall be preferred such persons as have first appeared and desired the same from the Company.

"III. All such shall be acknowledged Patroons of New Netherland, who shall, within the space of four years next after they have given notice to any of the chambers of the company here, or to the Commander or the Council there, undertake to plant a colonie there of fifty souls, upwards of fifteen years old; one-fourth part within one year, and within three years after the sending of the first, making together four years, the remainder, to the full number of fifty persons, to be shipped from hence, on pain, in case of wilful neglect of being deprived of the privileges obtained; but it is to be observed that the company reserve the island of the Manhattes to themselves.

"IV. They shall, from the time they make known the situation of the places where they proposed to settle colonies, have the preference to all others of the absolute property of such lands as they have chosen; but in case the situation should not afterwards please them, or they should have been mistaken as to the quality of the land, they may, after remonstrating concerning the same to the Commander and Council there, be at liberty to choose another place.

"V. The Patroons, by virtue of their power, shall and may be permitted, at such places as they shall settle their colonies, to extend their limits four miles along the shore, that is, on one side of a navigable river, or two miles[3] on each side of a river, and so far into the country as the situation of the occupiers will permit; provided and conditioned that the company keep to themselves the lands lying and remaining between the limits of the colonies, to dispose thereof, when, and at such time, as they shall think proper, in such manner that no person shall be allowed to come within seven or eight miles[4] of them without their consent, unless the situation of the land thereabout

[1] I. Col. Hist. N. Y., 39; Ibid., 65.

[2] This word "colonie," pronounced in Dutch with the accent on the last two letters, does not mean "colony" in the English sense, but means a plantation, or settlement, and includes people, cattle, tools, stock of all kinds, as well as the lands on which all were to be placed.

[3] These are Dutch miles, one of which is equal to four English ones.

[4] Twenty-eight or thirty-two English miles.

were such, that the Commander and Council for good reasons, should order otherwise; always observing that the first occupiers are not to be prejudiced in the right they have obtained, other than, unless the service of the Company should require it, for the building of fortifications, or something of that sort; remaining, moreover the command of each bay, river, or island, of the first settled colonie, under the supreme jurisdiction of their High Mightinesses the States-General, and the company; but that on the next colonies being settled on the same river or island, they may, in conjunction with the first, appoint one or more council, in order to consider what may be ne cessary for the prosperity of the colonies on the said river and island.

"VI. They shall forever possess and enjoy all the lands lying within the aforesaid limits, together with the fruits, rights, minerals, rivers and fountains thereof; as also the chief command and lower jurisdictions,[1] fishing, fowling, and grinding, to the exclusion of all others, to be holden from the company as a perpetual inheritance, without it ever devolving again to the Company, and in case it should devolve, to be redeemed and repossessed with twenty guilders per colonie, to be paid to this Company, at the chamber here, or to their Commander there, within a year and six weeks after the same occur, each at the chamber where he originally sailed from; and further, no person, or persons, whatsoever, shall be privileged to fish and hunt but the Patroons and such as they shall permit; and in case any one should in time prosper so much as to found one or more cities, he shall have power and authority to establish officers and magistrates there, and to make use of the title of his colonie according to his pleasure and the quality of the persons.

"VII. There shall likewise be granted to all Patroons who shall desire the same, venia testandi, or liberty to dispose of their aforesaid heritage by testament.

"VIII. The Patroons may, if they think proper, make use of all lands, rivers, and woods, lying contiguous to them, for and during so long a time as this company shall not grant them to other Patroons or particular individuals.

"IX. Those who shall send persons over to settle colonies shall furnish them with proper instructions, in order that they may be ruled and governed conformably to the rule of government made or to be made by the Assembly of the Nineteen as well in the political as the judicial government; which they shall be obliged first to lay before the directors of the respective colleges [or chambers].

"X. The Patroons and colonists shall be privileged to send their people and effects thither, in ships belonging to the company, provided they take the oath[2] and pay to the Company for bringing over the people as mentioned in the first article; and for freight of the goods five per cent. ready money, to be reckoned on the prime cost of the goods here; in which is, however, not to be included such creatures and other implements, as are necessary for the cultivation and improvement of the lands, which the Company are to carry over without any reward if there is room in their ships. But the Patroons shall at their own expense, provide and make places[3] for them, together with every thing necessary for the support of the creatures.

"XI. In case it should not suit the Company to send any ships, or in those going there should be no room; then the said Patroons, after having communicated their intentions, and after having obtained consent from the Company in writing, may send their own ships or vessels thither; provided that in going or coming they go not out of their ordinary course; giving security to the Company for the same, and taking on board an assistant, to be victualled by the Patroons, and paid his monthly wages by the Company; on pain, for doing the contrary, of forfeiting all the right and property they have obtained to the colonie.

"XII. Inasmuch as it is intended to people the island of the Manhattes first, all fruits and wares that are produced on the lands situate on the North River, and lying thereabout, shall, for the present, be brought there before they may be sent elsewhere; excepting such as are from their nature unnecessary there, or such as cannot, without great loss to the owner thereof, be brought there; in which case the owners shall be obliged to give timely notice in writing of the difficulty attending the same, to the Company here, or the Commander and Council there, that the same may be remedied as the necessities thereof shall be found to require.

"XIII. All the Patroons of colonies in New Netherland, and of colonies on the Island of Manhattes, shall be at liberty to sail and traffic all along the coast from Florida to Terra Neuf,[4] provided that they do again return, with all such goods as they shall get in trade, to the Island of Manhattes, and pay five per cent. for recognition to the Company, in order, if possible, that after the necessary inventory of the goods shipped be taken, the same may be sent hither. And if should so happen, that they could not return, by contrary streams or otherwise, they shall, in such case, not be permitted to bring such goods to any other place but to these dominions, in order that under the inspection of the directors of the place where they may arrive, they may be unladen, an inventory thereof made, and the aforesaid recognition

[1] Under the Roman Dutch law.

[2] Of allegiance to the Company, and to the States General.

[3] Stalls, or other accommodations.

[4] Newfoundland.

of five per cent. paid to the company here, on pain, if they do the contrary, of the forfeiture of the goods so trafficked for, or the real value thereof.

"XIV. In case the ships of the Patroons, in going to, or coming from, or sailing on, the coast from Florida to Terra Neuf, and no further without our grant, should overpower any of the prizes of the enemy, they shall be obliged to bring, or cause to be brought such prize to the college (chamber) of the place, from whence they sailed out, in order to be rewarded by them; the company shall keep the one-third part thereof, and the remaining two-thirds shall belong to them in consideration of the cost and risk they have been at, all according to the orders of the company.

"XV. It shall also be free for the aforesaid Patroons to traffic and trade all along the coast of New Netherland and places circumjacent, with such goods as are consumed there, and receive in return for them, all sorts of merchandise that may be had there, except beavers, otters, minks, and all sorts of peltry, which trade the company reserve to themselves. But the same shall be permitted at such places where the company have no factories,[1] conditioned that such traders shall be obliged to bring all the peltry they can procure to the island of Manhattes, in case it may be, at any rate, practicable, and there deliver to the director, to be by him shipped hither with the ships and goods; or, if they should come hither, without going there, then to give notice thereof to the Company, that a proper account thereof may be taken, in order that they may pay to the Company one guilder for each merchantable beaver and otter skin; the property, risk and all other charges, remaining on account of the Patroons or owners.

"XVI. All coarse wares that the colonists of the Patroons there shall consume, such as pitch, tar, wood-ashes, wood, grain, fish, salt, hearthstone, and such like things, shall be brought over in the company's ships, at the rate of eighteen guilders ($7.20) per last; four thousand weight to be accounted a last, and the company's ship's crew shall be obliged to wheel and bring the salt on board, whereof ten lasts make a hundred. And in case of the want of ships, or room in the ships, they may order it over at their own cost, in ships of their own, and enjoy in these dominions such liberties and benefits as the company have granted; but in either case they shall be obliged to pay over and above the recognition five per cent., eighteen guilders per each hundred of salt that is carried over in the company's ships.

"XVII. For all wares which are not mentioned in the foregoing article, and which are not carried by the last, there shall be paid one dollar per each hundred pounds weight; and for wines, brandies, verjuice, and vinegar, there shall be paid eighteen guilders per cask.

"XVIII. The Company promises the colonists of the Patroons, that they shall be free from customs, taxes, excise, imposts or any other contributions, for the space of ten years; and after the expiration of the said ten years at the highest, such customs as the goods are taxable with here for the present.

"XIX. They will not take from the service of the Patroons any of their colonists, either man or woman, son or daughter, man-servant or maid-servant; and though any of them should desire the same, they will not receive them, nor permit them to leave their Patroons, and enter into the service of another, unless on consent obtained from their Patroons in writing; and this for and during so many years as they are bound to their Patroons; after the expiration whereof, it shall be in the power of the Patroons to send hither all such colonists as will not continue in their service, and until then shall not enjoy their liberty. And all such colonists as shall leave the service of their Patroons, and enter into the service of another, or shall, contrary to his contract, leave his service; we promise to do everything in our power to apprehend and deliver the same into the hands of his Patroon, or attorney, that he may be proceeded against, according to the customs of the country as occasion may require.

"XX. From all judgments given by the courts of the Patroons for upwards of fifty guilders ($20), there may be an appeal to the Company's Commander and Council in New Netherland.

"XXI. In regard to such private persons as on their own account, or others in the service of their masters here (not enjoying the same privileges as the Patroons), shall be inclined to go thither and settle; they shall with the approbation of the Director and Council there, be at liberty to take up as much land, and take possession thereof, as they shall be able properly to improve, and shall enjoy the same in full property either for themselves or masters.

"XXII. They shall have free liberty, of hunting and fowling, as well by water as by land, generally, and in public and private woods and rivers, about their colonies,[2] according to the orders of the Director and Council.

"XXIII. Whosoever whether colonists of Patroons, or free persons for themselves, or other particulars for their masters, shall discover any shores, bays, or other fit places for erecting fisheries, or the making of salt ponds, they may take possession thereof and begin to work on them in their own absolute property, to the exclusion of all others.

[1] Trading stations.

[2] Plantations.

And it is consented to that the Patroons of Colonists may send ships along the coast of New Netherland, on the cod fishery, and with the fish they catch to trade to Italy, or other neutral countries, paying in such cases to the Company for recognition six guilders ($2.40) per last; and if they should come with their lading hither, they shall be at liberty to proceed to Italy, though they shall not, under pretext of this consent, or from the company, carry any goods there, on pain of arbitrary punishment; and it remaining in the breast of the company to put a supercargo on board each ship, as in the eleventh article.

"XXIV. In case any of the colonists should, by his industry and diligence, discover any minerals, precious stones, crystals, marbles, or such like, or any pearl fishery, the same shall be the property of the Patroon or Patroons of such colonie; giving and ordering the discoverer such premium as the Patroon shall beforehand have stipulated with such colonist by contract. And the Patroons shall be exempt fr m all recognition to the company for the term of eight years, and pay only for freight, to bring them over, two per cent., and after the aforesaid eight years, for recognition and freight, the one-eighth part of what the same may be worth.

"XXV. The company will take all the colonists, as well free as those in service under their protection, and the same against all outlandish and inlandish wars and powers, with the forces they have there, as much as lies in their power, defend.

"XXVI. Whoever shall settle any colonie out of the limit of Manhattes Island, shall be obliged to satisfy the Indians for the land they shall settle upon, and may extend or enlarge the limits of their colonies, if they settle a proportionate number of Colonists thereon.

"XXVII. The Patroons and colonists shall in particular and in the speediest manner, endeavor to find out ways and means whereby they may support a minister and school-master, that thus the service of God, and zeal for religion may not grow cool, and be neglected among them; and that they do, for the first, procure a comforter of the sick there.

"XXVIII. The colonies that shall happen to lie on the respective rivers, or islands (that is to say, each river or island for itself), shall be at liberty to appoint a deputy, who shall give information to the Commander and Council of that Western quarter, of all things relating to his colonie, and who are to further matters relating thereto, of which deputies there shall be one altered or changed every two years; and all colonies shall be obliged, at least once in every twelve months, to make exact report of their colonie, and lands thereabout, to the commander and council there, in order to be transmitted hither.

"XXIX. The colonists shall not be permitted to make any woollen, linen, or cotton cloth, nor weave any other stuffs there, on pain of being banished, and as perjurers to be arbitrarily punished.

"XXX. The company will use their endeavours to supply the colonists with as many blacks as they conveniently can, on the conditions hereafter to be made; in such manner, however that they shall not be bound to do it for a longer time than they shall think proper.

"XXXI. The company promises to finish the fort on the island of the Manhattes, and to put it in a posture of defence without delay."

It will be noted that under the first article of this Plan, or charter, of Freedoms and Exemptions, the privilege of becoming Patroons, with all their rights, powers, and exemptions, hereditary and otherwise was confined solely to the members, that is the stockholders, of the West India Company. Other persons however, could, with the permission of the Director and Council of New Netherland, take up as much land as they could improve, "and enjoy the same in full property either for themselves or others," but without any of the advantages and privileges conferred upon the Patroons. These were styled Free Colonists. Under these clauses the colonizing of the territory of New Netherland began.

While the charter was in process of discussion and formation in the Assembly of the XIX., which it will be recollected was composed of directors chosen from the several chambers of the West India Company, certain directors of the Amsterdam Chamber, which had been specially charged with the care and supervision of New Netherland, as soon as it became certain that the charter would be approved by the Company and ratified by the States-General, sent out to agents to purchase for them, the Indian title to certain lands in different parts of New Netherland, so that they might be ready to constitute themselves Patroons under the charter, as soon as it should finally pass and go into effect. The first of these were Samuel Godyn and Samuel Blommaert, whose agents, sent out some time previously, on June 1st, 1729, a few days before the passing of the charter, bought for them of the Delaware Indians, the lands on the southwest side of Delaware Bay from Cape Henlopen thirty-two miles northwardly in length, and two miles inland in width. As these were Dutch miles, the tract was 128 English miles long and eight miles broad.

After the passage of the charter and on the 19th of June, 1729, Godyn notified the Chamber of Amsterdam that he had sent out agents to purchase lands, and declared "that he now in quality of 'Patroon' has undertaken to occupy the Bay of the South River, on the conditions (the charter) concluded in the last Assembly of the XIX., as he hath likewise advised the Director Pieter Minuit, and charged him to register the same there."[1]

[1] I. O'Call., Appendix S, p. 479.

Minuit in due time with his Council executed and passed the grant, or "transport" as the Dutch termed the instrument, and sent it to Godyn in Holland. In 1841 Mr. J. Romeyn Brodhead found the original document in the West India House at the Hague, brought it back to New York, and it is now deposited in the State Library at Albany. It bears date the 15th of July 1630, and bears the signatures of Pieter Minuit and his Council,—the only signatures of those officials known to be in existence, and is the first title given by civilized men to lands in the present State of Delaware, and the first in New Netherland under the charter of Freedoms and Exemptions of 1629. Its date is two years before Lord Baltimore's charter of Maryland from Charles the First, and fifty-two years prior to William Penn's charter of Pennsylvania from Charles II. The name Godyn and Blommaert gave to their "Colonie" was "Zwanandael;" in English, "Swansdale." The following is a translation of this first conveyance for any part of New Netherland.

TRANSPORT.

The Director and Council of New Netherland to Samu·l Godyn and Samuel Blommaert.

"We, the Director and Council in New Netherland, residing on the Island Manahatas and in Fort Amsterdam, under the authority of their High Mightinesses the Lords States-General of the United Netherlands, and of the Incorporated West India Company, Chamber at Amsterdam, hereby acknowledge and declare, that on this day, the date underwritten, came and appeared before us, in their proper persons, Queskakous, and Eesauques, Siconesius, and the inhabitants of their village, situate at the South cape of the Bay of the South River, and freely and voluntarily declared, by special authority of the rulers and consent of the Commonalty there, that they already, on the first day of the month of June of the past year, 1629, for and on account of certain parcels of cargoes, which they, previous to the passing hereof, acknowledged to have received and gotten into their hands and power, to their full satisfaction, have transported, ceded, given over, and conveyed in just true and free property, as they hereby transport cede, give over, and convey to, and for the behoof of, Messrs. Samuel Godin and Samuel Blommaert, absent; and for whom We, by virtue of our office, under proper stipulation, do accept the same namely: the Land to them belonging, situate on the South side of the aforesaid Bay, by us called the Bay of the South River, extending in length from C. Hinlopen off unto the mouth of the aforesaid South River, about eight leagues (groote mylen), and half a league in breadth; into the interior, extending to a certain marsh (leegte) or valley through which these limits can clearly enough be distinguished. And that with all the action right and jurisdiction to them in the aforesaid quality, therein appertaining, constituting, and surrogating the said Messrs. Godin and Blommaert in their stead state, real and actual possession thereof; and giving them at the same time, full and irrevocable authority, power, and special command, to hold in quiet possession, occupancy and use, tanquam Actores et Procuratores in rem propriam, the aforesaid land acquired by the above mentioned Messrs. Godin and Blommaert or those who may hereafter obtain their interest; also to do barter and dispose thereof, as they may do with their own well and lawfully acquired lands. Without they, the Grantors having, reserving, or retaining for the future, any, the smallest part, right, action, or authority, whether of property, command, or jurisdiction therein; but now, hereby, forever and a day desisting, retiring from, abandoning and renouncing the same for the behoof aforesaid; promising further, not only to observe, fulfil, and to hold fast, unbroken and irrevocable, this their conveyance, and whatever may be done in virtue thereof, but, also, the said parcel of land to maintain against every one, and to deliver free of controversies, gainsays and contradictions, by whomsoever instituted against the same. All in good faith without guile or deceit. In witness is this confirmed with our usual signature and our seal dependant therefrom. Done on the aforesaid Island Manahatas, this fifteenth of July, XVI^c and thirty.

(Signed) PIETER MINUIT, Director,
PIETER BYLVELT,
JACOB ELBERTSEN WISSINCK,
JAN JANSEN BROUWER,
SYMON DIRCKSEN POS,
REYNER HARMENSEN,
JAN LAMPO,
Sheriff.[1]

Another of the directors who took time by the forelock in the matter of the Patroonships was Kiliaen van Rensselaer of Amsterdam, who de Vries tells us "was accustomed to polish pearls and diamonds."[2] At his request Sebastian Jansen Kraol, who had resided as commissary at Fort Orange for three or four years, bought for him early in 1630, of the Mohican Indians, a tract on the west side of the Hudson, and shortly after another agent, Gillis Hosset, bought for him another tract on the east side of that river, of the same Indians. These purchases were on the 13th of August duly "transported" or granted to van Rensselaer by Director Minuit and his Council, and were the first lands in the State of New York granted under the charter of Freedoms and Exemptions, and consequently the following "transport" of these lands, is the first deed of conveyance for any lands in this State to a private person under the charter of 1629. The original in Dutch is in Holland, the translation was made by the late Dr. Edmund B. O'Callaghan, from the copy in Dutch in the Brodhead Papers, and is as follows:

[1] I. Col. Hist. N. Y., 43.
[2] De Vries, p. 102.

TRANSPORT.

The Director and Council of New Netherland to Kiliaen van Rensselaer. Anno 1630, adi[1] 13th August. We the Director and Council of New Netherland, residing on the Island of Manahatas and in Fort Amsterdam, under the authority of their High Mightinesses the Lords States-General of the United Netherlands and the Incorporated West India Company, Chamber at Amsterdam, do hereby acknowledge and declare, that on this day, the date underwritten, before us appeared and presented themselves in their proper persons: Kottomack, Nawanemit, Albantzeene, Sagiskwa, and Kanaomack, owners and proprietors of their respective parcels of land, extending up the River, South and North, from said Fort[2] unto a little south of Moeneminnes Castle, to the aforesaid proprietors, belonging jointly and in common, and the aforesaid Nawanemit's particular land called Semesseerse lying on the East Bank opposite Castle Island off unto the above mentioned Fort; Item from Petanock, the Millstream, away North to Negagonse, in extent about three miles, and declared freely and advisedly for and on account of certain parcels of cargoes, which they acknowledge to have received in their hands and power before the execution hereof, and, by virtue and bill of sale, to hereby transport, convey, and make over to the Mr. Kiliaen van Rensselaer, absent, and for whom We, ex-officio and with due stipulation, accept the same; namely: the respective parcels of land hereinbefore specified, with the timber, appendencies, and dependencies, thereof, together with all the action right and jurisdiction to them the grantors conjointly or severally belonging, constituting and surrogating the said Mr. Rensselaer in their stead, state, and right, real and actual possession thereof, and at the same time giving him full, absolute, and irrevocable power, authority, and special command, to hold in quiet possession, cultivation, occupancy, and use, tanquam actor et procurator in rem suam ac propriam, the land aforesaid, acquired by said Mr. Van Rensselaer, or those who may hereafter acquire his interest; also to dispose of, do with, and alienate it, as he or others should or might do with his other and own Lands and domains acquired by good and lawful title, without the grantors therein retaining, reserving, or holding, any the smallest part, right, action, or authority, whether of property command, or jurisdiction, but rather hereby desisting, retiring, and renouncing therefrom forever, for the behoof aforesaid; further promising this their conveyance and whatever may by virtue thereof be done, not only forever to hold fast and irrevocable, to observe and to fulfil, but also to give security for the surrender of the aforesaid land, obligans et renuncians a bona fide. In testimony is thus confirmed by our usual signature, with the ordinary seal thereunto depending.

Done at the aforesaid Island Manahatas and Fort Amsterdam on the day and year aforesaid.

(Signed) PIETER MINUIT, Director,
PIETER BYVELT,
JACOB ELBERTSS. WISSINCK,
JAN JANSEN BROUWER,
SYMON DIRCKS. POS,
REYNER HARMENSEN,
JAN LAMPO,
Sheriff.

There was besides: This conveyance written with mine own hand is, in consequence of the Secretary's absence, executed in my presence on the thirteenth day of August, XVI,° and thirty as above.

(Signed) LENART COLE,
Deputy Secretary.[3]

The lands covered by the above "transport" together with some adjacent land subsequently acquired by Kiliaen van Rensselaer formed the great Patroonship of "Rensselaerswyck." In 1705, seventy-five years later, it was erected into a Manor of the same name under the English law, and continued in unbroken existence till 1837, when the last Patroon Stephen van Rensselaer died.

He devised in fee to his eldest son Stephen the part of the manor west of the Hudson, and to his son William the part east of that river. Under titles derived from these two sons the lands of the old manor, which had not been sold by their father, the last Patroon, in his lifetime, are now held in fee, subject in some cases to former leases the terms of which are not yet expired.

A third keen, long-headed, director of the Amsterdam Chamber was Michael Pauw of Achtienhoven, near Utrecht. Like Godyn, Blommaert, and Van Rensselaer, early in 1630 he bought through agents the Indian title to the lands on the west side of the Hudson River, opposite Manhattan Island from the heights of Wehawken, and Hoboken, to Bergen Point, and also the island of Staten Island. He duly obtained like transports of these regions from the Director and Council, and gave to his Patroonship the name of "Pavonia," a Latinized derivation from his own surname.

These three Patroons in a document laid before the States-General in June 1634,[4] thus, describe their own action in relation to their Patroonships, their rights as Patroons, and the expenses they had incurred in the colonization of their lands. After stating the enact-

[1] Abbreviation of "Anno Domini."
[2] Fort Orange is here meant.
[3] I. Col. Hist. N. Y., 44.
[4] I. Col. Hist., 84.

ment of the Freedoms and Exemptions on the 7th of June 1629) they continue thus;—

"Whereupon some directors of the before-named Company in addition to the great interest they possessed with their next friends in the said Company (who imported [to the value of] more than two tons of gold); animated with new zeal to carry out their High Mightinesses' intentions, and hoping in consequence for God's blessing, preceded all the other stockholders by way of a good example, saving the Company from expenses, troubles, and heavy charges, and further involved themselves by undertaking divers Patroonships, the expenses whereof incurred and laid out to this day, amount to not far from one ton of gold, cash down, and are yearly taxed, in addition, with at least 45,000 guilders for the support of three of their Patroonships."

"The Patroons proceeding on daily, notwithstanding, bought and paid for not only the grounds belonging to the chiefs and natives of the lands in New Netherland, but also their rights of sovereignty (jura Majestatis) and such others as they exercised within the limits of the Patroons purchased territories.

"So that on the 28th November, 1630, were read at the Assembly of the Directors, the deeds of conveyance of the lands and jurisdictions purchased from the Saccimaes, the Lords of the Country, executed for the behoof of the Patroons, their successors; and the new proprietors were accordingly thereupon congratulated.

"On the 2d December, in the year aforesaid, the patents sent to the Patroons from New Netherland were in like manner also again read, recorded in the Company's Register, ordered by the Assembly to be ensealed with the seal of New Netherland; the Patroons were again congratulated and handed their patents.

"16th ditto. The Patroons on resolution of the Assembly, delivered to the Company's Counsel a perfect list of their undertaken patroonships.

"8th January, 1631. The Patroons Colonies were ex supra abundanti confirmed, on submitting the question to the Assembly of the XIX., holden in Zealand."

Such was the manner and the method in which began the colonization, settlement, and population, of New Netherland in general, and the territories of the States of Delaware, New Jersey, and New York in particular. Space will not permit mention of other and later Patroonships in different parts of the Dutch territory in America, except that of Colen-Donck, the only one which was created in the County of Westchester which will be treated of hereafter.

Very soon difficulties arose between the West India Company and the Patroons in relation chiefly to the trade in furs and the claims of the Patroons to embark in the same under the articles of the charter of Freedoms and Exemptions. The latter were more inclined to push the trade in peltries than the agricultural settlement of their lands, for the reason that the former was highly profitable, whereas the latter required a constant outgo of money with a prospect of only distant and much smaller returns. Clashings as to civil powers and duties also occurred between them. But notwithstanding, population and agriculture slowly increased. Other Patroonships were taken up, and some lands were settled by individuals. The West India Company, although several other Directors in the Assembly of the XIX. had been taken in as partners by the three Patroons above named in their ventures, but without participation in their personal privileges and dignities, thought that the Patroons were prospering too much at the expense of the interests of the Company itself, and sought to restrict them in their trading operations. The Patroons on their side claimed that the Company not only had no right to restrict them, but had not fulfilled its own obligations as laid down in the articles of the Freedoms and Exemptions.

These controversies led finally after much discussion, to a determination by both parties, concurred in by the States-General, to which both had appealed, that the charter of 1729 should be revised, changed in some important respects, and re-enacted in the form of an entirely new Charter of Freedoms and Exemptions.

One of the memorials of the Company to the States-General presented in October 1734, growing out of these difficulties and those arising from the claim set up by the English to authorize trade to New Netherland, is of extreme interest for its clear and succinct account of the Dutch discovery and settlement from 1609 to 1634.

It states, "That said river" ("the North River in New Netherland," so styled in the memorial which is believed to be the first time it is so named in any official document) "and adjacent countries had been discovered in the year 1609, at the cost of the East India Company, before any Christians had ever been up said river, as Hudson testified, who was then in the service of said Company, for the purpose of discovering the north-west passage to China.

"And that your High Mightinesses' grant hath conferred from that time down, on divers merchants, the exclusive trade in peltries there.

"Likewise, that one or more little forts were built, also under your High Mightinesses' chief jurisdiction, even before the year 1614, and supplied with people for the security of the said trade;

"Further, that after these countries had passed into the hands of the incorporated West India Company, not only were the above-named forts renewed and enlarged, but said Company purchased from the Indians who were the indubitable owners thereof, the Island of the Manhattes, situate at the entrance of the said river, and there laid the foundation of a city.

"As also, not only on that river, but likewise on the South River, and others lying to the east of the aforesaid North River, divers natives and inhabitants of these countries, by the assistance of said Company, planted sundry Colonies, for which purpose, were also purchased from the chiefs of the Indians, the lands and soil, with their respective attributes and jurisdictions.

"As is to be seen by divers deeds of Conveyance and cession, executed in favor of the Patroons of the Colonies by the Sachems and Chief Lords of the Indians, and those who had anything to say therein." [1]

In 1638, A "Report on the Condition of New Netherland was made to the States-General by a special Committee of eight members, of which Rutger Huygens was Chairman, in the form of eight brief questions and answers thereto, (The questions were propounded by the States-General, and the answers were made by the special committee of that body, after it had held a joint meeting with the Company's Assembly of the XIX. at the Hague.) of which the last three very clearly show the state of affairs at that time;—

"6. Has the Company realized profit or loss since the planting of New Netherland?

A. Loss. But it could afford profit, principally from grain.

"7. And in case of loss, and their High Mightinesses consider it advantageous to preserve the limits of New Netherland, and to establish the population on a better and surer footing?

A. The Company cannot people it; because the Company cannot agree among themselves; but a plan of throwing it open must be considered.

"8. Whether it would not, therefore, be expedient to place the district of New Netherland at the disposal of the States-General?

A. They have no intention so to do; unless they derived profit by it. But they hope, now that they have taken some order about Brazil, that it will prove a source of profit in time.

They propose to surrender the trade with the Indians, or something else. Nothing now comes from New Netherland but beaver skins, minck's, and other furs; considerable grain could be raised there in course of time." [2]

The effect was, that the States-General appreciating the necessity of action, considered a "plan of throwing open" New Netherland, adopted it on the 2d of September 1638, and at once put it into operation.

This plan opened the trade of New Netherland to all the world on certain simple conditions, and permitted any one to take up land according to his means for immediate cultivation. It is in these words;—

"Whereas the Directors of the Incorporated West India Company, Chamber at Amsterdam, are authorized by resolution of the XIX., to promote and improve the trade and population of New Netherland; they, therefore, with the approbation of their High Mightinesses, hereby make known to all and every the inhabitants of this State, or its allies and friends, who may be disposed to take up and cultivate lands there, and to make use for that purpose of the harbors of these countries, that they may henceforth convey thither in the company's ships, such cattle merchandise and property as they shall deem advisable; and receive the returns, they, or their agents may obtain therefor in those parts; on condition that all the goods shall first be brought to the Company's store, so as to be put on shipboard all at once, in the best manner, on payment of the following duties and freights; and the Directors will take care that they shall be sent thither by the safest conveyance;—

On all merchandises going thither, there shall be paid to the company here (an export duty) a duty of ten per cent. in money, proportionably to their value; and on those coming thence hither (an import duty) fifteen per cent. there, in kind or money, at the choice of the Company or its Agent; eighty-five remaining for the owner. And if any one happen to commit an error, in the valuation of his goods, the Company shall be at liberty to take such goods, paying one-sixth more than they are entered at; but all concealed and smuggled goods, either in this country or that, which may be discovered to have been brought on board the Company's ships, by secret plans or other cunning contrivances, shall be immediately forfeited and confiscated to the profit of the said Company, without any right of action accruing thereby." And after specifying rules for freight charges, it continues thus;—

"And whereas it is the Company's intention to cause those countries to be peopled and brought into cultivation more and more, the Director and Council there, shall be instructed to accommodate every one according to his condition and means, with as much land as he can properly cultivate, either by himself or with his family. Which land thus conceded to any person in the name of the Company, shall remain the property of him, his heirs, or assigns, provided he shall pay to the Company after it has been pastured or cultivated four years, the lawful tenths of all fruit, grain, seed tobacco, cotton, and such like, as well as of the increase of all sorts of cattle; of which property a proper deed shall be given, on condition that he truly undertakes the cultivation or pasture thereof. Failing therein, he shall incur, in addition to the loss of such land, such penalties and fines as shall be mutually agreed on at the time of the grant. To which penalties and fines his successors and assigns shall be also bound. And in order to obviate all confusion and losses, which have formerly arisen therefrom, and are hereafter to be expected in a still graver degree, no one shall henceforward be allowed to possess or hold any lands or houses in those parts, that have not previously come through the hands of the Company.

[1] I. Col. Hist. N. Y., 94.
[2] I. Col. Hist., 107.

The Company, subject to the High and Mighty Lords States-General, shall take care that the places and countries there shall be maintained in peace and quietness, in proper police and justice, under its ministers or their deputies, conformably to the regulations and instructions thereupon already established and issued, or to be hereafter enacted and given, upon a knowledge and experience of affairs.

All those who will be inclined to go thither, to inhabit the country or to trade, shall severally declare under their signatures, that they will voluntarily submit to these regulations, and to the orders of the Company, and shall allow all questions and differences there arising, to be decided by the ordinary courts of justice, which shall be established in that country, and freely suffer there the execution of the sentences and verdicts, without any further opposition. And shall pay for passage and board in the state-room, one guilder, in the cabin twelve stuivers, and between decks, eight stuivers, per diem."[1]

The effect of thus throwing open to the world the trade of New Netherland, was to increase at once its population, and the development of the agricultural capacity of the country. Capital was attracted, colonists came over from Holland, and Patroonships and individual grants of lands were freely taken up. Englishmen and their families driven from New England by Puritan persecution,—a persecution unparalleled in North America save by that inflicted by the Spaniards in Mexico, fled to the Dutch province, became subjects of the New Netherland government, and as grantees of its lands took the oaths of allegiance to the West India Company and to the States-General of Holland.

The old disputes between the Company and the Patroons as to their respective rights, though modified, still continued. At last in January, 1640, the matter was taken up by the States-General, the Assembly of the Nineteen, and the Patroons, with a determination to come to a final settlement of the whole subject. Debates, discussions, and negotiations, were actively continued till July of the same year, with the result, that an entirely new charter of "Freedoms and Exemptions" was framed which met the assent of all parties. This was reported to the States-General on the 19th of July, 1640, duly enacted, and went into immediate operation.

The first charter of "Freedoms and Exemptions of 1629," and this new charter of 1640, together, are the foundation of civilized government as originally established, in New York, and successfully maintained there during the entire period of its possession by the Dutch nation.

Before describing the system of government, civil and ecclesiastical law, and land tenures, thus founded and set in operation, it is necessary to a right understanding of the subject to set forth at length, in its own words, the new charter of 1640, so that there can be no misunderstanding of these most important instruments as to what they do, or do not, contain.

It is entitled;—

"FREEDOMS AND EXEMPTIONS granted and accorded by the Directors of the General Incorporated West India Company at the Assembly of the XIX., with the approbation of the High and Mighty Lords States General of the free United Netherlands, to all Patroons, Masters, or Private persons who will plant any Colonies or introduce cattle in New Netherland. Exhibited 19th July, 1640.

"All good inhabitants of the Netherlands and all others inclined to plant any Colonies in New Netherland shall be at liberty to send three or four persons in the Company's ships going thither, to examine the circumstances there, on condition that they swear to the articles, as well as the officers and seamen, as far as they relate to them, and pay for board and passage out and home, to wit, those who eat in the master's cabin, fifteen stivers per day, and those who go and eat in the orlop, shall have their board and passage gratis, and in case of an attack, offensive or defensive, they shall be obliged to lend a hand with the others, on condition of receiving, should any of the enemy's ships be overcome, their share of the booty pro rata, each according to his quality, to wit—the Colonists eating out of the Cabin shall be rated with the seamen, and those eating in the cabin with the Company's servants who board there and have the lowest rate of pay.

"In the selection of lands, those who shall have first notified and presented themselves to the Company, whether Patroons or private Colonists, shall be preferred to others who may follow.

"In case any one be deceived in selecting ground, or should the place by him chosen afterwards not please him, he will, upon previous representation to the Governor and Council then be at liberty to select another situation.

"For Patroons and Feudatories of New Netherland, shall be acknowledged all such as shall ship hence, and plant there a Colonie of fifty souls, above fifteen years of age, within the space of three years after having made a declaration and given notice thereof to some Chamber of the Company here or to the Governor there; namely, one-third part within the year, and so forth, from year to year, until the number be completed; on pain of losing, through notorious neglect, the obtained Freedoms and cattle. But they shall be warned that the Company reserves the Island Manhattes to itself.

"All Patroons and Feudatories shall, on requesting it, be granted Venia Testandi, or the power to dispose of, or bequeath, his fief by Will.

"For Masters or Colonists, shall be acknowledged, those who will remove to New Netherland with five souls above fifteen years; to all such, our Governor there shall grant in property one hundred morgens, Rhineland measure, of land, contiguous one to the other, wherever they please to select.

[1] I. Col. Hist., 113.

"And the Patroons, of themselves or by their agents, at the places where they will plant their Colonies, shall have the privilege to extend the latter one mile (consisting of, or estimated at, 1600 Rhineland perches) along the coast, bay, or a navigable river, and two contiguous miles landward in; it being well understood, that no two Patroonships shall be selected on both sides of a river or bay, right opposite to each other; and that the Company retains to itself the property of the lands lying between the limits of the Colonies, to dispose thereof hereafter according to its pleasure; and that the Patroons and Colonists shall be obliged to give each other an outlet and issue, (uytteweeghen ende uyttewateren) at the nearest place and at the smallest expense; and in case of disagreement, it shall be settled in the presence and by the decision of the Governor for the time being.

"The Patroons shall forever possess all the lands situate within their limits, together with the produce, superficies, minerals, rivers and fountains thereof, with high, low and middle jurisdiction, hunting, fishing, fowling and milling, the lands remaining allodial, but the jurisdiction as of a perpetual hereditary fief, devolvable by death as well to females as to males, and fealty and homage for which is to be rendered to the Company, on each of such occasions, with a pair of iron gauntlets, redeemable by twenty guilders within a year and six weeks, at the Assembly of the XIX., here, or before the Governor there; with this understanding, that in case of division of said fief or jurisdiction, be it high, middle or low, the parts shall be and remain of the same nature as was originally conferred on the whole, and fealty and homage must be rendered for each part thereof by a pair of iron gauntlets, redeemable by twenty guilders, as aforesaid.

"And should any Patroon, in course of time, happen to prosper in his Colonie to such a degree as to be able to found one or more towns, he shall have authority to appoint officers and magistrates there, and make use of the title of his Colonie, according to the pleasure and the quality of the persons, all saving the Company's regalia.

"And should it happen that the dwelling places of private Colonists become so numerous as to be accounted towns, villages or cities, the Company shall give orders respecting the subaltern government, magistrates and ministers of justice, who shall be nominated by the said towns and villages in a triple number of the best qualified, from which a choice and selection is to be made by the Governor and Council; and those shall determine all questions and suits within their district.

"The Patroons who will send Colonies thither, shall furnish them with due instruction agreeably to the mode of government both in police and justice established, or to be established, by the Assembly of the XIX., which they shall first exhibit to the Directors of the respective Chambers, and have approved by the Assembly of the XIX.

"The Patroons and Colonists shall have the privilege of sending their people and property there in the Company's ships, on condition of swearing allegiance, and paying to the Company for the conveyance of the people, as in the first article, and for freight of the goods requisite for their bouwery, five per cent. on the cost of the goods here, without, however, including herein the cattle, on the freight of which the Company shall be liberal.

"But in case it should come to pass that the Company have no ships to dispatch, or that there be no room in the sailing vessels, in such a case the Patroons and Colonists can, upon previously communicating their determination to, and obtaining the consent of the Company in writing, send their own ships thither, provided, in going and returning, they shall not leave the ordinary track laid down, and take a supercargo, whose board shall be at the expense of the Patroons or Colonists, and whose wages shall be paid by the Company; on pain, in case of contravention, of forfeiting their ship and goods to, and for the behalf of, the Company, it remaining optional with the Patroons, during the term of the current grant, and no longer, to convey over their cattle, wares and people in the Company's ships, in their own or in chartered vessels.

"And, whereas, it is the Company's intention first to settle the Island of the Manhattes, it shall provisionally be the staple of all produce and wares accruing on the North river and the country thereabout, before they can be sent further, except those which by nature itself are useless there, or cannot be brought there except with great loss to the owners, in which case the latter shall be bound to give timely notice of such inconvenience to the Company here, or to the Governor and Council there, that it be provided for, according as the circumstances shall be found to require.

"All Patroons, Colonists and inhabitants there, as well as the stockholders in the Company here, shall be privileged to sail and trade to the entire coast, from Florida to Newfoundland, on the following conditions:—

"First, that all goods which will be sent hence for sale there, whether freighted by the Company, or by Colonists, or the stockholders themselves, must be brought into the Company's stores for inspection and payment of the proper duties, to wit: ten per cent. on the cash cost of the article here, besides convoy-freight and average, an agreement being made for the freights of what may be sent in the Company's ships; and bulk will not be allowed to be broken any where except at the Manhattes, or such place as the Company here may order, so as to be at liberty, after proper inspection of their loading and the entry thereof, to depart to whatever place they think proper.

"And on the other wares which will be sent thence hither, shall be paid here, over and above the convoy duty granted by the State to the Company, five per cent., according to the valuation to be made here, on such penalty as aforesaid; but an agreement must be made with the Governor and Council there, for the freight of any of the goods that are being sent from there in the Company's ships, as aforesaid; and on all beavers, otters and other peltries, which will be sent from there here, shall be paid to the Governor and Council there, ten per cent., all in kind, and due receipt for the payment thereof, shall be brought along, on pain of confiscation of all the furs which will be found not to have paid any thing for the behoof of the Company, and with that to be exempt from further duty.

"And in case said private ships, in going or coming, or in ranging along the coast from Florida to Newfoundland, happen to capture any prizes, they shall, in like manner be obliged to bring the same, or to cause the same to be brought, to the Governor and Council in New Netherland, or to the Chamber whence they respectively sailed, to be rewarded by them, and the third part thereof shall be retained for the Company, before deducting his Highness' and the State's portion, the two other third parts for themselves, in return for their incurred expenses and risk, all in pursuance of the Company's order.

"In like manner they shall not be at liberty to depart thence with their goods obtained in barter, without first returning to the said place, to enter their goods there and to obtain proper clearance, signed by the Governor and Council, and they shall be bound to return to this country, with their ships and yachts, to the place they sailed from, in order to discharge all their freight into the Company's stores, according to the register and clearance to be brought from thence, on pain of forfeiting their ship and goods for the Company's behoof, should they go and break bulk elsewhere, or have any unregistered goods on board.

"The Company promises, during the continuance of the present charter and no longer, not to burden the Patroons and Colonists in that country, either with customs, toll, excise, imposts or any other contributions, and after the expiration hereof, at farthest, with no greater duty than is imposed on goods in this country.

"The Company shall not take from the service of Patroons or Colonists, their man servants or maid servants, even though some person should solicit it; nor receive them, much less suffer them to go from their master's service to that of another, during the term of such years as they are bound for; and if any man servant or maid servant run away, or take his freedom contrary to contract, the Company shall, according to its means, cause such to be delivered into the hands of their masters, to be proceeded against according to the circumstances of the case.

"From all definitive judgments pronounced by the Courts of the Patroons or Colonists, for an amount exceeding one hundred guilders, or from such as entail infamy, also from all sentences pronounced in matters criminal, on ordinary prosecution, conformable to the custom of this country, an appeal shall lie to the Governor and Council of the Company in New Netherland.

"All Patroons, Colonists and inhabitants are allowed free hunting and fishing, both by land and by water, generally in public woods and rivers in the extent of their lands, according to the order to be made thereupon by the Governor and Council; and the Patroons exclusively within the limits of their Colonies, with the clear understanding that the Governor and Council shall not be excluded therefrom.

"All Patroons, inhabitants or Colonists, are also allowed to send ships along the coast of New Netherland and the countries circumjacent thereunto, to fish for Cod, &c., and to proceed with the catch straight to Italy or other neutral countries, on condition of paying to the Company for duty, in such case, six guilders per last, and on coming here with their freight, it shall be allowable and sufficient to pay the Company the custom dues alone, without conveying, under pretence of this consent, any other goods elsewhere, on pain of arbitrary punishment, it remaining at the pleasure of the Company to put a supercargo on board each ship, on such conditions and terms as hereinbefore set forth.

"If any Patroons, inhabitants or Colonists happen by their industry, diligence or otherwise to discover any minerals, precious stones, crystals, marbles, pearlfisheries or such like within the limits of their lands, all such Patroons and Colonists shall give one-fifth part of the nett proceeds to the Company, which for this purpose shall have the power to appoint one or more inspectors, at the charge of said mines and pearlfisheries; but any one finding such without their limits, the same shall belong to the Company on paying the discoverer such premium as the merits of the case shall demand.

"The Company shall take all Colonists, whether free or bound to service, under their protection, defend them as far as lies in their power with the force which it has there, against all domestic and foreign wars and violence, on condition that the Patroons and Colonists shall, in such case, put themselves in a suitable state of defence for which purpose each male emigrant shall be obliged to provide himself, at his own expense, with a gun or musket of the Company's regular calibre, or a cutlass and side arms.

"And no other Religion shall be publicly admitted in New Netherland except the Reformed, as it is at present preached and practiced by public authority in the United Netherlands; and for this purpose the Company shall provide and maintain good and suitable preachers, schoolmasters and comforters of the sick.

"The particular Colonies which happen to lie on the respective rivers, bays or islands shall have the privilege (to wit, each river or island for itself) of designating a deputy who shall give the Governor and Council of that country information respecting his Colonie, and promote its interests with the Council: one of which deputies shall be changed every two years, and all the Colonies shall be obliged to communicate to the Governor and Council there a pertinent report, at least every twelve months, of their condition and of the lands in their vicinity.

"The Company shall exert itself to provide the Patroons and Colonists, on their order, with as many Blacks as possible, without however being further or longer obligated thereto than shall be agreeable.

"The Company reserves unto itself all large and small tythes, all waifs, the right of mintage, laying out highways, erecting forts, making war and peace, together with all wildernesses, founding of cities, towns and churches, retaining the supreme authority, sovereignty and supremacy, the interpretation of all obscurity which may arise out of this Grant, with such understanding, however, that nothing herein contained shall alter or diminish what has been granted heretofore to the Patroons in regard to high, middle and low jurisdiction.

"The Company shall, accordingly, appoint and keep there a Governor, competent Councillors, Officers and other Ministers of Justice for the protection of the good and the punishment of the wicked; which Governor and Councillors, who are now, or may be hereafter, appointed by the Company, shall take cognizance, in the first instance, of matters appertaining to the freedom, supremacy, domain, finances and rights of the General West India Company; of complaints which any one (whether stranger, neighbor or inhabitant of the aforesaid country) may make in case of privilege, innovation, dissuetude, customs, usages, laws or pedigrees; declare the same corrupt or abolish them as bad, if circumstances so demand; of the cases of minor children, widows, orphans and other unfortunate persons, regarding whom complaint shall first be made to the Council holding prerogative jurisdiction in order to obtain justice there; of all contracts or obligations; of matters pertaining to possession of benefices, fiefs, cases of lesæ majestatis, of religion and all criminal matters and excesses prescribed and unchallenged, and all persons by prevention may receive acquittance from matters there complained of; and generally take cognizance of, and administer law and justice in, all cases appertaining to the supremacy of the Company."

Owing to the difficulties which arose at the close of Kieft's administration, and continued during the earlier years of that of Stuyvesant, between the Commonalty of New Netherland and the West India Company as represented by those Directors, growing out of the restrictions upon trade and traders established by the Company and strictly enforced by their officers, the States-General, after the delegates, Van der Donck, Couwenhoven and Bout, who were sent by the Commonalty to Holland, had explained the matters in question, enacted on the 24th of May 1650, a third Charter of "Freedoms and Exemptions," which modified somewhat the clauses of that of 1640 relating to trade, and the administration of justice in some minor points.[1] It did not however vary in the least the principles of the former Charters, or the system of settlement and Colonization by them fixed and established in relation to land and its tenure. It is therefore unnecessary to refer to it more particularly in this connexion. These three were the only charters of "Freedoms and Exemptions," in force in New Netherland during the entire Dutch domination.

5

The Nature of the Dutch Systems of Government and Law established in New Netherland, and of the Patroonships there.

To comprehend the system of government, laws, and religion, established in New Netherland, through the West India Company, by the Dutch republic under these Charters of Freedoms and Exemptions, a brief account of that of the "Fatherland," or "Patria," as that republic was called in its province in America, must be given.

The form of government of the Seven United Provinces was republican, the law was the Roman law, and the church was the established Reformed Church of Holland in accordance with the Synod of Dort. All were transplanted to New Netherland, and there existed and flourished until its capture by the English in 1664. Nine years later when the Dutch re-conquered it, all were re-introduced, a Dutch Governor re-appointed, and New Netherland replaced in its original position, except as to the names of its three largest towns which were changed. New York, as the English had called it, was re-named "New Orange," Albany was re-named "Willemstadt," and Kingston "Swanenburgh," instead of New Amsterdam, Beverswyck, and Wiltwyck, their original appellations.

The Province of Holland the largest of the seven United Provinces formed at an early period a portion of the Kingdom of the West Franks, and about the year 922 was conferred by Charles the Simple upon Count Dirk, who thus became the first "Count of Holland." In 925 Charles ceded it to Henry the Fowler, King of the East Franks, with the rest of the Kingdom of Lotharingia, the Count of Holland still being its own local sovereign. The successive Counts of Holland ruled over their little province, to which in the course of time they added the adjoining province of Zeeland, for four hundred years of unbroken male descent when their race died out, and the Countship passed into the hands of the Counts of Hainault. From them it devolved upon the Dukes of Bavaria, the last representative of which house was dispossessed by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, who held the rest of the Netherlands under his rule. By the marriage of his daughter, Mary of Burgundy, with the Archduke Maximilian of Austria, the entire Netherlands passed from the House of Burgundy to the Imperial House of Austria. In 1496, Philip the Fair married Joanna, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile and Arragon, and the Netherlands, through this marriage came under the dominion of the Kings of Spain. Philip the Fair was succeeded by his only son, the Emperor Charles the Fifth, who was born in the Netherlands, and ruled the country as a part of his empire till 1555, when he abdicated in favor of his son Philip II. By Philip II. as King of Spain, through savage persecutions and ferocious wars, were the people of the Netherlands driven into a rebellion and war of Independence, which after an heroic struggle of forty years continuance, was successfully terminated by the famous twelve years truce of 1609.[1]

[1] I. Col. Hist., 401.

One of the strange results of this truce, was the voyage of Hudson in search of a western passage to Cathay, and his momentous discovery of the Bay of New York and the magnificent river which has immortalized his name. Another remarkable result, was the establishment in the same year of the Bank of Amsterdam, which so long ruled the exchanges of Europe, and through which, the financial transactions of the first merchants and Patroons of New Netherland were subsequently carried on.

During the whole period in which these different Princes, Kings, and Emperors, possessed the Netherlands, they ruled the provinces of Holland and Zeeland, which together comprised about five-eighths of the area of the "United Provinces," not in their royal capacities, but as "Counts of Holland." These two Provinces with, Friesland, Groningen, Utrecht, Guelderland, and Overyssel, comprising the other three-eighths of the Netherlands, formed the "Seven United Provinces" of the Republic, which founded Christian government and Christian civilization in New York.

What was the nature and constitution of this Republic? A Republic which not only established its own independent existence as one of the nations of Europe, but humbled forever the pride and power of Spain then one of the greatest of those nations. A Republic which founded in the New World a system of government, the principles of which to-day form the basis, upon which rests the constitution of that greater Republic which under the name of the United States of America dominates the Western Hemisphere.

The Republic of the Netherlands was a small country, in area but a trifle larger than Wales, but its population of about two millions in 1609, of Teutonic origin, was dense, reliant, and self-supporting. Each of the seven provinces into which it was divided contained a number of cities and large towns, each governed by a Board of Managers styled a 'Vroedschap.' These Boards of Managers were self-electing close corporations, the members of which were appointed for life from the general body of the citizens. Whenever vacancies occurred these Boards either filled them by a direct election of new members, or by making a double or triple nomination of names, and submitting them to the Stadtholder, or Governor, of the province, who selected one to fill the vacancy. This Stadtholder was, originally, the representative of the Count, or the Sovereign, but at the period of which we are treating, he was elected by a body called the "States-Provincial" of each Province, which consisted of deputies elected by the Boards of Managers and Nobles of the Province. These "States Provincial" managed all the affairs of each Province for itself, the Provinces in their domestic concerns being entirely independent of each other. They were the representative assemblies of the numerous Municipalities and Nobles of which each Province was composed. The "States Provincial" had also conferred upon them, another, and most important, power, one which then existed in no other part of the civilized world. For neither in the Swiss republic, nor in the Italian republics of the middle ages, did a precisely similar power exist. This was the election of envoys to the Supreme Legislature of the republic,—the States General. The members of this body so elected were not representatives in the usual sense of that term but envoys from their respective Provinces to the Supreme Parliament of the nation, in which each Province, though it could have as many envoys as it pleased, had but one vote. These envoys were bound by instructions in writing from their constituents the "States Provincial," whom they were obliged to consult in all doubtful or new matters before acting upon them. Neither war nor peace could be made, nor troops nor money raised, without a unanimous vote of the whole seven Provinces by their envoys in the States-General. The title of this Supreme Council of Parliament of the Republic, was "The High and Mighty Lords the States-General." It received ambassadors, appointed its own to other nations, and conducted, wholly, the foreign relations of the republic. Each Province, by one of its deputies or envoys presided in turn for a week. Its Greffier, or Clerk read all papers, put all questions to vote, and announced the result. Its sessions were held at the Hague, in a very handsome oblong apartment in the

[1] Maasdorp's Introduction to his translation of Grotius' treatise on Dutch Jurisprudence, p. iv.

Binnenhof, the old palace which formed a part of the ancient chateau of the Counts of Holland, which remains to this day.[1]

In these Independent "States Provincial," their representative envoys, and the States-General in which they sat, we see the origin of the Independent Sovereign states of the Federal Constitution of 1787, the Senators who represent those Sovereign States, and that great body, the Senate of the United States of America, in which they sit. So ancient and honorable is that system and doctrine of State rights, upon the continued preservation of which in their integrity depends the existence of the American Union.

The source of power in the "States Provincial" of Holland was in the constituencies of the deputies to them who were the Municipal Councils of the towns and cities, and the College of Nobles, by which the deputies were elected. To them was each deputy responsible, and under their instructions alone he acted.

Holland was an aggregate of independent towns and cities each administering its own taxation, finances, and domestic affairs, and making its own ordinances. Its inhabitants were not on an equality. To entitle a man to every municipal franchise, he must have acquired the greater or lesser burger-right—"burger recht"—either by inheriting it, by marriage, or by purchase. In the latter case a larger sum was required for the great burger right and a smaller sum for the lesser. In either case, however, the amount was not very large. Only a year's previous residence was necessary for any foreigner to obtain it. The privileges it conferred were, freedom of trade, exemption from tolls, special privileges and preferences in the conduct of lawsuits, and an exclusive eligibility of election to municipal office. The privileges of the two classes of burghers varied only in degree. The city and town governments consisted of a Board of Burgomasters and Schepens, and a Schout, that is a Board of magistrates and aldermen, and a sheriff who was also a prosecuting officer.

These Burgomasters and Schepens, provided for the public safety, attended to police matters, called out the military when needed, assessed all taxes, and administered all financial, and civic matters. They were elected either by the general body of the citizens possessing a small property qualification, or by the "Vroedschapen," or Boards of Managers mentioned before, who were themselves elected by the general body of qualified citizens, the custom varying in different towns and Provinces.

Such was the form of political liberty which constituted the great strength of the Dutch Republic, by which it conquered its own independence of Spain, and which it carried to, and established in, New York.[2] It is well summed up by Brodhead in these words, "The self-relying burghers governed the towns; the representatives, of the towns, and of the rural nobility, governed the several Provinces, and the several States of the respective Provinces claimed supreme jurisdiction within their own precincts." The system of the Dutch Republic was a thorough system of town government, expanded to meet the needs of a national governmental organization. It was also a strikingly conservative as well as effective form of government, and after the termination of the twelve years truce with Spain in 1621, it enabled the Netherlands to carry on that brilliant series of hostilities against Spain which, in 1648, resulted in her final acknowledgment of the United Provinces as an Independent Nation.[3] Subsequently to that event the Republic enlarged and increased the machinery of her government—developing it further upon the same principles to meet the enlarged sphere of action upon which she had entered, but this it is unnecessary to describe here.

There was in this system of government one principle which must be particularly noticed, one which has had but scant mention from American historians, and yet upon it rests the system of colonization begun by the Dutch in New Netherland, and that is the rights, powers, privileges, and position of the nobles of the Netherlands in the government of their native land.

The Dutch people of the United Provinces at the date of Hudson's discovery of New Netherland, and during the period of its settlement and possession by that Republic consisted, by their own law, of two classes, "Nobles" and "Commoners." The Commoners were subdivided into "Gentlemen by birth," and "Common people." Thus practically making three classes of Dutch citizens.

They are thus described, and the definition of each given, by the most famous of the great lawyers of Holland;—[4]

"From descent comes the distinction whereby some are born Noble and some Commoners.

Noble by birth are those sprung from a father whose ancestors have, from times of old, been acknowledged as noble, or who was himself ennobled by the sovereign.

For some families have held their rank for a period so far distant, and so fully acknowledged, that no proof is necessary. Other families have been ennobled from services, or favors subsequently bestowed.

Commoners were formerly of two classes, such as Gentlemen by birth and the common people.

[1] Maasdorp's introduction to his translation of Grotius, vi. I. Brod. Hist. N. Y., 454.

[2] First learned in Holland by the English self exiled Brownists it was carried by them to Plymouth their new home across the Atlantic and was thus the origin of the town and township system established in New England.

[3] I. Sir Wm. Temple's Works, 68, 70, 126, 127, 131, 139–142.

[4] Grotius, ch. XIV.; also note IX. to Benson's Memoir, II. N. Y. Hist. Coll., 2d series, p. 138.

It seems formerly that Gentlemen by birth were those who from generation to generation were descended from free and honorable persons. These, being favoured by different Counts [of Holland], and especially by Count Floris, who was disliked by the nobles (which gave rise to a conspiracy against him and ultimately to his death), had a right to wear arms publicly, as a token of descent, to ride with a spur, and be exempt from taxes. At present [1620, in which year Grotius wrote] all these matters, together with others, having become general by practice, the only distinction is, that those who are gentlemen born are selected as judges of the Bailiff's Court, in the place of vassals [or tenants], and were consequently exempt from serving in the office of schepens, or civic magistrates."

The Seven United Provinces were composed of the patroonships of nobles, cities, and towns, the two latter possessing municipal privileges, or rather, privileges as municipalities, similar to those possessed as individuals by the nobles. Both originated in the ancient Teutonic system of military tenures modified by the Roman law and the spirit of commercial enterprise. There were then in the United Provinces, no small independent farms; isolated houses scattered through the country did not exist. The people dwelt in the towns and cities, and only the nobles on large estates in the country with great buildings, strongholds, and sometimes churches, to accommodate themselves and their numerous retainers whom they were bound to protect. In the single province of Holland alone, the largest of the seven provinces of the republic, there existed, and had existed for more than a century prior to the Discovery of New Netherland, three hundred of these Patroonships, or fiefs as they were called,[1] to the mutual advantage of their owners and their tenants or vassals, as the then flourishing and powerful condition of the Dutch republic fully proves.

There was no clashing of interests between the nobles, the commoners, and the municipalities. Each held their rights and privileges from the same sovereign authority. The latter were in fact incorporated nobles, so to speak. The people of the towns, as the military features of the feudal system gradually weakened, demanded and obtained of the Sovereign authority, Count, King, or Emperor, the same rights and privileges as a body, which the nobles possessed individually. The Sovereign, as Lord Paramount, granted these as they were desired, for he was perfectly willing that the people of the towns should commute for specific annual sums the military and other feudal services to which he was entitled, just as the nobles did. The people, however, in the Dutch provinces, always claimed and demanded the right to fix the amount of these annual sums themselves. This was always granted, and they ever held tenaciously to this right of taxing themselves. In this manner town corporations and city corporations originated, in the Netherlands, and as such were in full vigor, with a happy, flourishing, and united population, not only when New Netherland was discovered, but for a very long period preceding that event. The magistrates of these municipalities, chosen by the people themselves, were the means by which they were united with the Sovereign power, and through which the latter communicated with the people of the municipalities themselves, just as the nobles were the point of union and communication between the same Sovereign power and their own vassals or tenants.

The nobles formed a distinct House or College in each province, and sent deputies to the States of the Province, and the States-General, and also to the three Councils, of State, Accounts, and Admiralty. In the Council of State their deputy was the President, and in the States-General his was the first vote[2] cast. "The Dutch Nobility" says the English author of the "Description of Holland" in 1743, seem to observe a medium between the loftiness of those of the same rank in some countries, and the meanness of others. The Italian Nobility do not scruple to trade: The French are nicer: yet they make no difficulty to marry a tradesman's daughter, if she be rich, and thereby capable of repairing a shattered Estate. The British Nobility do not differ from the French in this respect. The Germans abhor trade; and perhaps in effect of the general barbarous constitution of their country, Tyrant and Slave, disdain to mingle their blood with that of base plebeians, though their brethren of nature."[3]

It was this combined and harmonious system of mingled municipalism and aristocracy, which gave the United Netherlands their great power and made them such a strong, conservative, and successful nation. It was a system they had tried, and under which they had lived, for more than two centuries, which all classes approved, and with which they were fully satisfied and thoroughly familiar. Hence it was, that when the West India Company undertook to colonize New Netherland, they naturally adopted for that new possession the same system which they knew had always worked well in the old, which they had always been accustomed to, and which was in entire consonance with the views, habits, manners, and customs, of the people of the Batavian republic.

It was not this system in New Netherland, but the ways and means of putting it into operation and carrying it out, which produced the delays, disputes, and changes, that began soon after the enactment of the charter of Freedoms and Exemptions of 1629, and only

[1] I. O'Call. 1302.

[2] "Description of Holland," p. 76. This work, by an Englishman, resident from infancy in Holland, was published in 1743, and is a full, fair and good account of that country.

[3] Ibid., 79.

ended with the adoption of the revised and amended charter of Freedoms and Exemptions of 1640.

It is needful to consider only the most salient features of these instruments, for a simple reading of documents themselves, as above given in full, will afford the best possible idea of the nature of the system of colonization, of which they were the foundation, and upon which rests that civilization, which, increasing and improving in the course of years, and modified, not abrogated, by a subsequent change of dominion and rulers, now constitutes the pride and glory of the great Empire State of New York.

They were drawn in accordance with the views and spirit of the age in which they had their birth, and should, and must, be judged in the light of that age if we would wish to form a fair and true opinion of them and the system they established. No more unjust, yet more common error, exists, than to make the views and spirit of this, our own age, the standard by which to judge the views, spirit, and actions of every age that has gone before it, and to praise or condemn, accordingly.

Judged by the lights of the seventeenth century these charters of Dutch Colonization were extremely free and liberal, far more so than those of any other nation at that time. It must be remembered, too, that, they were the work of an armed commercial organization, of the nature of those then existing, intent upon its own interests, as well as those of the nation to which it belonged; an organization equally well adapted to triumph in the pursuits of peace, or conquer in those of war.

Essentially monopolies, as were all the colonizing and commercial companies of that era in England, and in all the other European nations, the charter of Freedoms and Exemptions of 1629 confined its benefits and privileges to the members of the Dutch West Indian Company by which it was granted. This was changed by that of 1640 which threw them open to, "All good inhabitants of the Netherlands and all others inclined to plant any colonies in New Netherland." The former acknowledged, and granted the rights, powers, and privileges, of Patroons, as they then existed in the United Provinces of the Netherlands, to those who would plant a "colonie," (that is establish a plantation) of fifty souls above fifteen years of age, within four years in New Netherland, after notifying the proper authorities of their intention so to do. The latter reduced the time to three years, and by it all New Netherland was thrown open to the establishment of Patroonships, except the Island of Manhattan, which the Company reserved to itself.

All Patroons under the first charter (Art V.) were permitted, after settling upon a location, to extend the limits of their "colonies," or plantations, four miles Dutch, (equal to sixteen English) along the shore on one side of a navigable river, or two miles (eight English) on each side of the same, at their option. This was restricted by the second charter, to one Dutch mile along a navagable river, or two miles landward.

The latter also provided for a class of colonists, not Patroons, in these words "For Masters or Colonists, shall be acknowledged, those who will remove to New Netherland with five souls above fifteen years; to all such, our Governor there shall grant in property one hundred morgens, (two hundred English acres) Rhineland measure, of land, contiguous one to the other, wherever they please to select."

Thus were provided for New Netherland colonists of the two upper classes then dwelling in the Republic of the United Provinces, nobles and commoners of the first class, as before described. Both of these classes, brought out the third, the common people, the boers, who were the men and women, whom they settled upon their "colonies" and farms.

All the colonists, whether the Patroons, or of the Masters of farms, "Free Colonists," as they were styled in the charter of 1640, were freed from customs, taxes, excise, imposts, or any other contributions for the space of ten years."[1]

The special powers, rights and privileges of Patroons are set forth in articles VI, VII, VIII, and IX, of the charter of 1629, and as revised, and slightly altered, are thus stated in the charter of 1640;—

"The Patroons shall forever possess all the lands situate within their limits, together with the produce, superficies, minerals, rivers, and fountains thereof, with high, low, and middle jurisdiction, hunting, fishing, fowling, and milling, the lands remaining allodial, but the jurisdiction as of a perpetual hereditary fief, devolvable by death as well as to females as to males, and, fealty and homage for which is to be rendered to the Company, on each of such occasions, with a pair of iron gauntlets, redeemable by twenty guilders within a year and six weeks at the Assembly of the XIX here, or before the Governor there; with this understanding, that in case of division of said fief or jurisdiction, be it high, middle, or low, the parts shall be, and remain, of the same nature as was originally conferred upon the whole, and fealty and homage must be rendered for each part thereof by a pair of iron gauntlets, redeemable by twenty guilders as aforesaid.

And should any Patroon, in course of time, happen to prosper in his colonie to such a degree as to be able to found one or more towns, he shall have authority to appoint officers and magistrates there, and make use of his Colonie, according to the pleasure and the quality of the persons, all saving the Company's regalia.[2] counted towns, villages, or cities, the Company shall give orders respecting the subaltern government, magistrates, and ministers of justice, who shall be nominated by the said towns and villages in a triple number of the best qualified, from which a choice and selection is to be made by the Governor and Council; and those shall determine all questions and suits within their district.

And should it happen that the dwelling places of private Colonists become so numerous as to be ac-

[1] Charter of 1629, art. XVIII.
[2] Rights of Sovereignty.

The Patroons who will send colonies thither, shall furnish them with due instruction agreeably to the mode of government, both in police and justice,[1] established, or to be established by the Assembly of the XIX, which they shall first exhibit to the Directors of the respective chambers, and have approved by the Assembly of the XIX."

The possession of the land, with everything, in, upon, or produced by it, as well as all matters of every kind, within the bounds of the patroonship, was first granted. Then follow the powers, rights, and privileges, the first of which was the high, middle, and low jurisdiction within the patroonship; a power necessarily appertaining to the ownership of the land, as requisite to the orderly government of the patroonship, the due protection of the tenants in their rights, and the determination of all controversies between themselves, or between themselves and the Patroon, or his agents, as well as the trial and punishment of criminal offenses. "High jurisdiction" means the power of capital punishment. Under the charter of 1629 (Art. XX), a right of appeal from all judgments of these courts, of fifty guilders ($20), and upwards, lay to the Governor and Council in New Netherland. By that of 1640, the limit was increased to 100 guilders ($40), and the right extended to all cases of criminal sentences, and judgments entailing infamy upon any person. Thus the rights of all people were thoroughly protected.

Next are enumerated the sole rights of hunting, fishing, fowling, and milling. These explain themselves, except the last,—milling. This means, not the actual grinding, or manufacturing, but the right to erect, or control the erection of, all mills within the Patroonship. For every Patroon was to build a mill, or mills, for the use and benefit of the tenants or vassals, these terms being simply synonymous, of the Patroonship. These mills could, either be run by the Patroon or his agent, or rented by him to any one who wished to run them, at a fixed rent or toll. But the Patroon was in all cases bound to provide the mills and appurtenances themselves.

The Tenure by which the lands, rights, powers, privileges, and jurisdictions of the Patroons of New Netherland were held, is thus stated in the sixth article of the charter of 1629, "to be holden from the Company as a perpetual inheritance, without it ever devolving again to the Company, and in case it should devolve, to be redeemed and repossessed with twenty guilders per colonie to be paid to this Company, at the Chamber here (Holland), or to their commander there (New Netherland) within a year and six weeks after the same occurs, each at the Chamber where he originally sailed from." This continued without change till 1640, when the revised charter of that year, stated the same tenure more fully, in these words, "the lands remaining allodial, but the jurisdiction as of a perpetual hereditary fief, devolvable by death as well to females as to males, and fealty and homage for which is to be rendered to the Company, on each of such occasions with a pair of iron gauntlets, redeemable by twenty guilders within a year and six weeks, at the Assembly of the XIX here (in Amsterdam), or before the Governor there (in New Amsterdam); with this understanding, that in case of division of said fief or jurisdiction, be it high, middle, or low, the parts shall be and remain of the same nature as was originally conferred on the whole, and fealty and homage must be rendered for each part thereof by a pair of iron gauntlets, redeemable by twenty guilders as aforesaid."

The Dutch words translated in the above quotation "a perpetual hereditary fief," and in the sixth article of the charter of 1629 "a perpetual inheritance," mean more than these English renderings, and express a technicality of the Dutch law which the latter does not convey. It is this. A feud, or fief, (these terms are synonymous) is thus defined in the Dutch law, "an hereditary indivisible use over the immoveable property of another, with a mutual obligation of protection on the one side, and a duty of homage and service on the other."[2] Such a fief, under the law, "was not divisible, except by charter and passed only per capita, or by stipulation in cases of intestacy, to the eldest male amongst the lawful children, or further descendants, of the last possessor; to males sprung from males, the nearest degree taking precedence of one more remote."[3] These, the old fiefs of the Fatherland, were termed "recta feuda," right fiefs, and were the fiefs referred to in both the New Netherland charters of "Freedoms and Exemptions" and the above translations of them. As they were indivisible and passed of right to the eldest male representative of the last possessor, and did not depend upon the intestacy of a son, they were termed "undying" fiefs, as opposed to fiefs where the succession might be changed by stipulation at the time of the investiture, or afterwards, which last were also hereditary. These "old fiefs" were not transplanted to New Netherland by the charters of Freedoms and Exemptions, but the new fiefs created by virtue of those charters had merely the same rights of jurisdiction, hunting, fishing, fowling, and milling, as the old undying ones. In all other respects they were entirely different. The jurisdiction of the Patroons and their seignorial rights were held "as" of these undying fiefs, that is in the same manner as jurisdiction and seignorial rights were held under them. But the land itself, together with the produce, superficies, minerals, rivers and fountains thereof, was held by a very different tenure. That tenure was allodial, which means, not feudal, independent of a lord paramount. "The lands remaining allodial but the jurisdiction as of a perpetual (undying) hereditary fief" is the language of the charter of 1640. Then follows this radical change from the old fiefs, "devolvable by death as well to females as males," to women as well as to men, is the literal translation of the original words. Thus in New Netherland the right of succession was extended to at least double the number of persons, that it was under the old fiefs of the Fatherland. Annexed to this right, was the provision that upon each person succeeding to the inheritance of the Patroonship, fealty and homage were "to be rendered on each of such occasions to the Company with a pair of iron gauntlets, redeemable by twenty guilders within a year and six months, at the Assembly of the XIX. here (Amsterdam), or before the Governor there (New Amsterdam)." This was simply a method adopted for the acknowledgment by the Patroons of the political supremacy of the West India Company, as the ultimate and paramount government and source of title in New Netherland; a method borrowed from the old feudal manner in which the tenant, or vassal, acknowledged the holding of his lands from a lord paramount, who was in his turn thereby obliged to protect him, and which was called tenure by knight-service. Nothing of the latter ever existed in New Netherland. Except this political acknowledgment of the West India Company to be what we now call "the State," the Patroonships were held as hereditary allodial lands, which the Patroons could divide in parts and sell in fee at their pleasure; but what they did not sell in fee, descended to the next heir, whether man or woman, unless devised by will otherwise.

[1] This means "political and judicial," the original being badly translated. See Art. X, in the charter of 1629, where the language, "is as well in the political as the judicial government."

[2] Herbert's Grotius, 230, § I.

[3] Ibid. § II.

This power of devising by will was earnestly desired and contended for by the Patroons. The seventh article of the charter of 1629 says, "There shall likewise be granted to all Patroons who shall desire the same, venia testandi, or liberty to dispose of their aforesaid heritage by testament." "All Patroons and feudatories (fundatories were the holders of any part of the fief) shall, on requesting it, be granted "Venia Testandi, or the power to dispose of, or bequeath his fief by Will," is the language of that of 1640. This power alone, as it insured at some time or other the dividing up of all large fiefs, was sufficient to prevent the New Netherland fiefs from ever becoming dangerous, or the source of a great, continued, and oppressive aristocracy.

The "feudal system" of Europe, as such, never existed in New Netherland. That system however is the basis of the land titles of every civilized country of Europe at this hour, as it was at the discovery of the New World; and, as derived from the various countries of Europe which colonized America, is now the basis of those of the various States of the American Republic. The system of tenure introduced into New York by the Dutch, was divested of all burdensome attributes—the nova feuda, the new fiefs, by which all the land was there held were purely allodial, with full right in the Patroons to sell in fee in whole or in part, and to devise it in whole or in part by will, free of all charges and incumbrances, except the mere political acknowledgment of the West India Company as the ultimate paramount source of all title, the State. It was the most liberal land system, introduced upon the American Continent; far more so than the English system as introduced into the English Colonies, and the full feudal system, introduced into the American Colonies of France, Spain, and Portugal. It certainly did not "scatter" in New Netherland "the seeds of servitude, slavery, and aristocracy."[1] There were no "serfs" in the feudal sense, either in the Dutch republic or its colony of New Netherland. Slavery was, and had been, the universal, acknowledged, source of labor, the result of conquest originally, for centuries before, and at that time—the 17th century—all over the world. And equally in all countries of civilization was the division of society into classes of diverse grades, and the existence of an aristocracy, the only one known, established, and existing; and every State and government then in being was based upon it. How futile then is the idea, that to these New Netherland charters of Freedoms and Exemptions is owing the introducing of all these institutions into what is now the State of New York. Had neither of these charters ever existed the "seeds" of all three of these institutions would have found their way thither because they were simply the universal institutions of the highest human civilization at that era.

The reason why it was possible for the liberal fiefs of New Netherland to be created, was the nature of the investiture required to establish the Patroons in their rights, the seizin or delivery of possession to them established by the charters. This in the old fiefs, and under the feudal system, in Europe generally, was by an act of the lord upon receiving the oath of fealty and the homage of the tenant or vassal, at which time the latter also presented the lord with a fine, that is, a gift of some small article or thing as a token of his fidelity. In the New Netherland fiefs by virtue of the charters this whole matter was changed. The delivery of the grant of the fief by the Governor and Council itself was the livery of seizin, or investiture, of the possession in the Patroon.

[1] Moulton in his Hist. of N. Y., 387–8.

And at that time the latter took the oath of allegiance which was the "fealty," to the Company, and did his "homage," which was simply by holding up his hands in the presence of some other tenant, of the Company or Patroon, verbally acknowledging the Company as the ultimate possessor of the land, or as we should say, the State, requesting the Governor to invest him with the possession, and at the same time, presenting to him the pair of iron gauntlets (the hand armor of a coat of mail), or twenty guilders in money. They were thus under the Dutch law nova feuda, new fiefs, as distinguished from the old fiefs described before; and the Company as the ultimate possessor of the land by its Governor's grant could, and did, make the new investiture that has been described. If a Patroon divided his patroonship, the same jurisdiction attached to each part, and the same kind of investiture, had to be made for each part, as was provided for the whole patroonship in the original grant.

The numerous provisions of these charters relating to the trade, and other commercial privileges, granted to the Patroons do not require to be here considered. Neither do a few other provisions of a general nature.

The twenty-sixth article of the charter of 1629 as has been mentioned, provided that every one who "shall settle any colonie out of the limits of Manhatten Island, shall be obliged to satisfy the Indians for the land they shall settle upon," thus absolutely protecting the natives in the possession of their territories.

The twenty-ninth article, in accordance with the political economy of Europe at that day, which taught that colonies should be kept as markets for the productions of the mother countries, prohibited all manufactures in New Netherland on pain of banishment.

The thirtieth article of that of 1629, provided "that the company will use their endeavours to supply the colonists with as many blacks as they conveniently can, on the conditions hereafter to be made; in such manner, however, that they shall not be bound to do it for a longer time than they shall think proper." The charter of 1640, says, "The company shall exert itself to provide the patroons and colonists, on their order, with as many blacks as possible, without however being further or longer obligated thereto than shall be agreeable." These provisions were simply to furnish the cheapest labor then known, and were in accordance with the manner and methods of colonizing at that day, and the views of that era, as to labor. It was a similar provision to those put in contracts in our day and generation, for building railroads, canals, mines, and other enterprises, by syndicates and construction companies, and corporations, by which, so many hundreds, or thousands, of laborers, black, yellow, or white, are to be furnished at such a price for such wages. Were slavery not now abolished everywhere except in the Spanish Colonies, these contracts now would call for slaves as the cheapest kind of labor.

But one other subject of these charters remains to be considered, and that is the religion they established in New Netherland. All the charters were approved and enacted as laws by the West India Company, and the States-General; the sovereign power of the Seven Provinces of the United Netherlands. The twenty-seventh article of the charter of 1629 is in these words,—"The Patroons and Colonists shall in particular and in the speediest manner, endeavour to find out ways and means whereby they may support a minister and school-master, that thus the service of God and Zeal for religion may not grow cool, and be neglected among them; and that they do for the first, procure a comforter of the sick there." The charter of 1640 speaks much more strongly and directly:—"And no other Religion shall be publicly admitted in New Netherland except the Reformed, as it is at present preached and practiced in the United Netherlands; and for this purpose the company shall provide and maintain good and suitable preachers, school-masters and comforters of the sick." By these provisions of the two charters was the Reformed Church of the Netherlands, the national established church of the Dutch Republic, made the established church of New Netherland. And as such it remained until the seizure of the province by the English in 1664. It was re-established at the recapture by the Dutch, nine years later, and only ceased as "the Establishment" on the surrender of the province to Sir Edmund Andros, for the King of England, pursuant to the treaty of Westminister, on the tenth of November 1674. On this occasion the Dutch Governor, Colve, sent certain "articles" to Andros to which he required answers before surrendering, "for the satisfaction of the Dutch Government and for the greater tranquillity, of the good People of this Province." These related mainly to the settlement of debts, the validity of judgments during the Dutch administration, the maintenance of the titles of the owners of landed property to its possession, and the position of the established church. Andros directed Mathias Nicolls, the former secretary under the English, to confer in person with Colve on these subjects. Nicolls satisfied Colve that Andros would give satisfactory answers as soon as he assumed the government, and this assurance was fully carried out. The article relating to the Church is in these words:—"that the inhabitants of the Dutch nation may be allowed to retain their customary Church privileges in Divine Service and Church discipline."[1] This was granted, and with the Province of New Netherland fell forever the "Establishment" of the Dutch Church. But from that day to this, that great and venerable Church has continued in the enjoyment of its creed, privileges, and property, as fully and as freely as it did, while having the power of the Province Government at its back to enforce its support and prohibit all doctrines it did not approve. And how strong this power was, its dealings with the Lutherans, and with the Quakers in Governor Stuyvesant's time, fully attest.

[1] II Brod., 270.

At the beginning the maintenance of the Church though undertaken by the West India Company, was, under the charter of 1629, devolved by it upon the Patroons and Free Colonists; but under that of 1640, and during the entire Dutch dominion afterward, it was placed upon the Province Government, as the representative, or rather agent, of the West India Company, without however relieving the Patroons and Colonists from their obligations in regard to it. If they were in default, the Company itself was to maintain "the Established Church" through its Provincial Government from its own revenues. Before the charter of 1629 the Company undertook the support of the church. This appears from a letter of the Rev. Jonas Michaelius, the first clergyman of the Dutch Church in New Netherland to a brother clergyman at Amsterdam, the Rev. Adrianus Smoutius, dated August 11, 1628, which was discovered and first printed, only in 1858, in a periodical of Amsterdam by Mr. J. J. Bodel Nijenhuis of that city, and subsequently translated and sent to the late Dr. Edmund B. O'Callaghan then of Albany, the author of the "History of New Netherland," by the late Henry C. Murphy, then United States Minister at the Hague. The second volume of the "Holland Documents" translated and edited for the State by Dr. O'Callaghan, was, when the letter arrived, just printed, but not bound nor published, and in it, as an appendix, that learned editor inserted Mr. Murphy's translation of this letter. Michaelius sailed from Holland, January 24th, 1628, and arrived at the "Island of Manhatas," as he calls it, on the 7th of the succeeding April, and wrote the letter the following August. In it he says, "In my opinion, it is very expedient that the Lords Managers of this place (the Amsterdam Chamber of the West Indian Company) should furnish plain and precise instructions to their Governors that they may distinctly know how to regulate themselves in all difficult occurrences and events in public matter; and at the same time that I should have all such Acta Synodalia, as are adopted in the Synods of Holland, both the special ones relating to this region and those which are provincial and national, in relation to ecclesiastical points of difficulty, or at least such of them as in the judgment of the Reverend brothers at Amsterdam would be most likely to present themselves to us here." . . . The promise which the Lords Masters of the Company had made me of some acres or surveyed lands for me to make myself a home, instead of a free table which otherwise belonged to me is wholly of no avail. For their honors well know that their are no horses, cows, or laborers to be obtained here for money. Every one is short in these particulars and wants more."

This letter also proves incidentally, that slavery existed in "the Manhatas" at its date, the year before the enactment of the charter of 1629 which provided for their being furnished by the Company to the Patroons, as stated above, and to which has been so often, and so wrongly ascribed their first introduction in New York. Speaking of his family matters, for his wife had died since his arrival leaving him with "two little daughters," Michaelius writes, "maid-servants are not to be had, at least none whom they advise me to take; and the Angola slaves are thievish, lazy and useless trash." Evidently slaves had been by no means lately introduced in "the Manhatas" in 1628.

The Canon law and the Roman law came into Holland together, and that country was governed by both until the Reformation. Then the former was overthrown, and the law of the Reformed Church of Holland promulgated in 1521, and confirmed in 1612, went into operation, but the Roman civil law remained as before the law of the land. Under the law of the Reformed Church of Holland, matters ecclesiastical come first before the Consistory, then before the Assembly, and finally before the Synod. There being no Synod in New Netherland, the care of the church there was entrusted to the Assembly or classis of Amsterdam, by whom the Dutch clergymen were approved and ordained, at the request, or with the assent, of the West India Company at Amsterdam.[1] Except when as a matter of mere charity on their being driven from New England, the English settlers of the Congregational belief were granted freedom of conscience and to worship in their own way, and to choose their own civil officers,[2] people of other denominations were not allowed to hold office.[3] This was because the Reformed Religion in accordance with the doctrine of the Synod of Dort was the Established Religion of New Netherland, and the magistrates were bound to maintain it against all sectaries, and therefore they must have belonged, or been friendly, to that faith.[4]

Such were the provisions of the charters of Freedoms of Exemptions as to tenure of lands and the rights, powers and privileges of the Patroons, and the Masters or Free Colonists, of New Netherland, and the farm people, or boers, they brought over to cultivate the soil; and as to the Church.

The total number of land grants of all kinds, from a Patroonship, to a single lot in Manhattan Island, issued by the Dutch Provincial Government from [1] Laws of N. N., v.

[2] See charter of Hempstead granted by Governor Kieft, in 1644. Laws N. N., 42.

[3] Ibid, 479.

[4] On March 17, 1664, Stuyvesant and his council passed an ordinance, that all school-masters should appear with their school-children every Wednesday afternoon in the church, that they might be catechised by the Ministers and Elders. Laws of N. N., 461.

1630 to 1634, as far complete as the Books of Patents and Town records now admit was 638, as shown by the statement of O'Callaghan appended to the second volume of his history. It is not absolutely correct, but is sufficiently so as a very fair approximation. The territories and rights of the original Patroonships on both sides of the Hudson River, with but two exceptions, were subsequently on account of the difficulties of their owners, with the West India Company, and the obstacles they met with in settling their lands, subsequently bought back by the Company. Thus they became again part and parcel of the public domain, and as such were retransported and regranted to various individuals, by the Director and Council. That of New Amstel on the Delaware, was finally conceded to the city of Amsterdam in Holland, as late as 1656, and that city took upon itself the settlement and colonization of that Patroonship.

The two exceptions to the re-purchase of the New York Patroonships, were those of Rensselaers-wyck and Colen-Donck, both of which continued in the possession of their Patroons. Space will not permit of even a brief account of the former, which, changed in 1705 to an English Manor, has continued to our own days, striking and interesting as it is. The latter, the only Patroonship established in Westchester County, will now be described.

6

The Patroonship of Colen-Donck.

(Yonkers.)

In that portion of New Netherland which now constitutes the county of Westchester there existed under the Dutch dominion but one Patroonship. It was called Colen-Donck, in English "Donck's Colony," from the name of its Patroon, Adriaen van der Donck, to whom it was granted by Director Kieft and his Council in the year 1646.[1]

It was granted as the sole property of one of the most noted and intelligent of the leading men of New Netherland. Public affairs in which its Patroon was engaged almost immediately after it was granted, and his necessary absence in Holland, retarded its successful development. His death following shortly after his return, and its sale under the power he obtained to dispose of it by will, practically terminated it after an existence of only twenty years.

Adriaen van der Donck, styled by the Director and Council of New Netherland in a summons to the Rev. Everardus Bogardus, dated the second of January, 1646, "the Yoncker"[2] was an educated Dutch gentleman, a native of Breda,[3] a graduate of the University of Leyden, and a doctor of both the civil, and the canon, law, "utriusque juris," as that degree was then expressed in Latin. He came to America in the autumn of 1641, in the service of Kiliaen van Rensselaer, the first Patroon of Rensselaerswyck, having been appointed in the early part of that year by that gentleman Schout-Fiscaal of the Patroonship of that name. This office, which, as shown before, combined the duties of a Sheriff and an Attorney-General, was a most important one, and brought him into close connection with the other officers, and the tenants, of Rensselaerswyck; the rights and interests of all parties being in many particulars subject to his official action. His first instructions from the Patroon were dated July 18, 1641, and his first account, still existing in the books of that colonie, begins on the 9th of September following.[4] The above mention of van der Donck as "the Yoncker" is the earliest mention of that title as applied to him that I have found. As it is used in referring to a matter which occurred in 1645, it is clear that he was so called and known four years only after his arrival in America. The term is simply a corruption of "Jonkheer," son of a gentleman.[5] It is of interest, for, from this title so given to him who became in the succeeding year, 1646, the Patroon of Colen-Donck, is derived the name which that Patroonship, in common parlance, ever afterwards bore, and which is to-day perpetuated in the corporate name of the beautiful city which is embraced within its limits—Yonkers.

Van der Donck was the first lawyer in New Netherland, and of course in that part of it now New York. Lubbertus van Dincklagen, who was appointed Schout-Fiscaal and Vice Director of New Netherland, 5th May, 1645, also a doctor of civil and canon law, was the second, and Dirk (Richard) van Schelluyne, who was also the first notary, commissioned 8th May, 1650, was the third.

These first lawyers are mentioned here because their names are found appended to so very many of the early deeds, and public and private documents, of the earliest part of the Dutch dominion in New York. Prior to leaving Amsterdam, van der Donck, probably as part of the terms between them, received from Kiliaen von Rensselaer, a lease of the westerly half of the first island on the west side of the Hudson below Albany then called Welysburgh, from van Wely, a relative of the Patroon. Later it was styled, "Castle Island," because upon its southern end was built the first fortified trading house erected by Corstiaensen under the charter of "The United New Netherland Company," of 14th October, 1614, and called Fort Nassau, which three years later, in 1617, was destroyed by a freshet. Subsequently, and till this day, from its proprietors, it was, and still is, known as Rensselaers Island. Here van der Donck erected a house and dwelt. In 1643 difficulties between him and Arendt von Curler, or Corlaer, the Patroon's commissary, occurred, and van der Donck, determining to leave his position, undertook to arrange for the

[1] II. O'Cal., 584; I. Brod., 420.
[2] XIV. Col. Hist., 70.
[3] I. Col. Hist., 477.
[4] I. O'Cal., 327.
[5] I. Brod. 421.

planting of a "Colonie" at "Katskill," of which he himself was to be the Patroon. This was a violation of the sixth and twenty-sixth articles of the charter of Freedoms and Exemptions of 1629, and the Patroon of Rensselaerswyck, on the 10th September, 1643, sent written orders to van Curler, to see that van der Donck desisted at once, being his "sworn officer," and if he did not, that he should "be degraded from his office and left on his bowerie to complete his contracted lease without allowing him to depart." This effectually put an end to the project of the Katskill Colonie, van der Donck continued to perform his duties, and matters grew much easier with van Curler. On the 18th of January, 1646, van der Donck's house burned down, at which very time he was negotiating for a sale of his lease to one Michael Jansen, to which, as the Patroon's Commissary, van Curler had to assent. A new quarrel at once arose, as to whether the loss should fall on the Patroon as van der Donck claimed, or on the latter as van Curler insisted. The matter was finally referred to the Patroon in Holland, van der Donck left the island, and lived in a hut near Fort Orange, till spring, and then came down to New Amsterdam.[1] In the previous year, 1645, he had been of great assistance to Director Kieft in advancing the requisite funds, and settling the terms of peace with the Indians, which closed the wicked war that Kieft had wantonly begun two or three years before, and which proved so disastrous to New Netherland.[2] The Patroon of Rensselaerswyck, died at Amsterdam later in 1646, and with his death the connection of van der Donck with that Patroonship ceased, Nicolas Coorn succeeding him in his office by the appointment of the executors of the late Patroon, Johannes van Wely and Wouter van Twiller.

Van der Donck still desiring to become a Patroon, immediately occupied himself, on returning to New Amsterdam, in looking for a proper location. He finally selected the lower portion of what is now the county of Westchester and northern part of the city of New York, between the rivers Hudson and Harlem, on the west and south, and the Bronx on the east. A choice which eminently proved his good taste and sound judgment. The Indian name for this region was Keskeskick, and the Indian title to it was extinguished by its sale to the West India Company by its Indian owners on the third of August, 1639, in these words, "This day, date as below, appeared before me Cornelis van Tienhoven, Secretary in New Netherland, Tequeemet, Rechgawac, Pachamiens, owners of Keskeskick, who in presence of the undersigned witnesses voluntarily and deliberately declare, that in consideration of a certain lot of merchandise, which they acknowledge to have received and accepted before the passing of this act, they have transferred, ceded, conveyed, and made over, as a true and lawful freehold, as they herewith transfer, cede, convey, and make over, to, and for the benefit of, the General Incorporated West India Company, a piece of land, situate opposite to the flat on the Island of Manhattan, called Keskeskick, stretching lengthwise along the Kil, which runs behind the Island of Manhattan mostly east and west, and beginning at the head of the said Kil and running to opposite of the high hill by the flat, namely by the Great Kil, with all right, titles, &c., &c. Done at Fort Amsterdam, the 3d of August, 1639.

CORNELIS VAN DER HOYLEN,
DAVID PIETERSEN DE VRIES,
as witnesses,

in my presence,

CORNELIS VAN TIENHOVEN,
Secretary.

This instrument is recorded in Book G, G, of Patents page 30, in the Secretary of State's Office in Albany.[3] By it was vested in the West India Company the right of soil and possession of the Indians in the tract described. It will be noticed that it bears no marks of the Indians as signatories, but is only signed by the witnesses and the Secretary of the Province, differing in this respect from the Indian Deeds of much later dates, and especially from those executed under the English rule. This was strictly in accordance with the Dutch Provincial "Ordinance," or law, enacted by the Director and Council of New Netherland the year before the date of this deed, which, as it is not generally known, is in full as follows ;—

"The Free people" (those not Patroons, nor boers or farm laborers) "having by petition requested Patents of the Lands which they are at present cultivating, the prayer of the Petitioners is granted, on condition that at the expiration of Ten years after entering upon their Plantation, they shall pay yearly to the Company the Tenth of all crops which God the Lord shall grant to the field; also from this time forth, one couple of capons for a house and lot." This ordinance of the Director and Council was passed on the 24th June, 1638.[4]

On the 19th of the following August another ordinance was passed by the same high authority, in which occurs this clause providing that all legal documents, shall be drawn up by the Secretary of the Province ;—"Likewise, that, from now henceforward, no instruments, whether contracts, obligations, leases, or Bills of Sale, or such like writings of what nature soever they be, and concerning which any dispute

[1] I. O'Call, N. N., 333, 338, 345, 346 ; I. Brod., 419, 420.

[2] Von der Donck's New Netherland in I. N.Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d Series, 127 and 161.

[3] It is also printed in XIII. Col. Hist., 5.

[4] Laws N. N., 16. This law was the origin of the "four fat fowls" clause of the manorial leases in New York.

The "tenths" or tithes were simply a form of rental, the recompense to the Company and the Patroons for their outlay and expense in settling their lands.

may arise, shall be held valid by the Director and Council, unless they shall be written by the Secretary of this place. Let every one take warning and save himself from damage. This done and published in Fort Amsterdam this 19th of August, 1638."[1]

The witnesses to the above instrument were well known men of mark at that day. The name of the first correctly entered should have been Cornelis van der Hoyken, or van der Huyghens, as the name was truly spelled. He was, on July 13th, 1639, just previous to the date of this deed, appointed the Schout-Fiscaal, or Sheriff and Attorney-General, of the Province, served for several years, and was drowned on the voyage to Holland in 1647 with Governor Kieft. David Pietersen de Vries was the famous navigator, the author of the "Journal notes of several voyages in Europe, Africa, Asia and America," one of the earliest and most authentic writers on New Netherland. He was also a Patroon of Swanandael on the Delaware, of another Patroonship upon Staten Island, and in the words of Brodhead, was "frank, honest, religious, and a sincere advocate of the true interests of New Netherland."[2]

Cornelis Tienhoven the Secretary, so long in office under Kieft and Stuyvesant, and often their envoy to the different English Colonies, and active in other public positions in New Amsterdam is so well known as to need no further mention.

Van der Donck began his settlement on the banks of the Neperhaem, or, as more lately termed, the Neperan near its confluence with the Hudson, erecting a saw mill, and other improvements incident to such an enterprise, at that place. From this mill the stream derived its Dutch name of Saeg-Kill, or Saw-Kill, and the English one, by which it continues to be known, the "Saw-Mill River." For his own residence and home plantation, he selected the southern end of the beautiful peninsula, or tide island as it really was, and the meadows immediately about it, which the Indians called Papirinemen, directly opposite the northernmost extremity of Manhattan Island, almost surrounded by the waters of the same name, connecting the Spyt-den-Duyvel Creek, on the west, with the Great Kill, or Harlem River on the east; and upon which afterward was erected the first bridge connecting Manhattan Island with the mainland of Westchester County, then, and to this day called Kingsbridge.[3] He also cultivated the ancient corn grounds of the former Indian owners, now the beautiful flat surrounding the old "Cortlandt House" soon to be the parade-ground of the new "Van Cortlandt Park;" that estate which has continued in the family for nearly two centuries, having now been wisely acquired by the City of New York for a grand suburban park.

Becoming engaged, as a leader, in the disputes between the people of New Amsterdam and Governor Stuyvesant as the representative of the West India Company, he could not give his Patroonship the attention it needed. Three years after the grant to him of Colen-Donck by Governor Kieft, the troubles with Stuyvestant came to a head. The Commonalty of the "Province of New Netherland," drew up by a committee, a Petition to the States-General for a redress of their grievances, dated July 26th, 1649; the draughtsman, and first signer, of which was Adriaen van der Donck. This Petition, with a full explanation in the form of notes, also by van der Donck, and signed by him and the others of the committee was transmitted to Holland.[4] Two days later on the 28th of July, was also signed the famous "Remonstrance," or "Vertoogh" of van der Donck, giving a long, detailed, history of the discovery, productions, settlement, and alleged misgovernment of the New Netherland by the officers of the West India Company.

Van der Donck, Jacob van Couwenhoven, and Jan Everts Bout, were appointed by the Commonalty a delegation to proceed to Holland and lay these documents before the States-General and the West India Company and ask for a redress of what they deemed oppression. On the 12th of the succeeding August, von Dincklagen the Vice-Director under Stuyvesant, but not favored by him, sent a letter to the States-General, in which he says, "whereas the Condition of that most fertile New Netherland is seriously impaired by the war,[5] and the Commonalty hath resolved on a delegation of three of the Nine Selectmen in order that your High Mightinesses may obtain full and thorough information on every point, [and] I have not been able to dissuade them therefrom. I cannot but say they intend what is right. These persons are thoroughly conversant with the situation of the country. I hope your High Mightinesses will be pleased thereby and extend to them a favorable audience, and give them despatch as soon as your High Mightinesses' more weighty affairs will permit, as the people are very anxious."[6]

These papers were received on the 13th of October, 1649, by the States-General from the delegates, and referred to a special committee to examine and report upon them. On the 31st of January, 1650, the committee reported adversely to the Petitioners, answering their documents article by article, and using strong language.[7] The delegates replied by a further short petition on the 7th of February following, which was also referred to a special committee.[8] Other communications were subsequently received and referred. Finally their committee reported to the States-General a long, detailed, and very full "Provisional Order respecting the Government, Preservation and Peo-

[1] Laws N. N., 17.
[2] Vol. I. 381, note.
[3] Van der Donck's Letter. Riker's Harlem, 163.
[4] I. Col. Hist., 259, 270.
[5] Kieft's late war with the Indians is here referred to.
[6] I. Col. Hist., 319.
[7] I Col. Hist., 338, etc.
[8] Ibid., 346.

pling of New Netherland on April 11, 1650." It contained twenty-one sections materially modifying the action of the West India Company,—and one of which instructed Stuyvesant to return to Holland.[1] The Company opposed its adoption, and it was temporarily laid over.[2] A new modification of the Freedoms and Exemptions was also adopted on the 24th May, 1650, which however did not change the principles of those of 1629, and 1640, but referred chiefly to minor details. This was the last legislative action of the States-General relative to the colonization of New Netherland.[3] Van der Donck endeavoured to aid his "Colonie," and New Netherland generally, in the matter of population. On the 11th of March, 1650, he and the other delegates, concluded a contract "to charter a suitable fly boat of two hundred lasts, and therein to go to sea on the 1st of June next, and convey to New Netherland the number of two hundred passengers, of which one hundred are to be farmers and farm servants, and the remaining one hundred such as the Amsterdam Chamber is accustomed to send over, conversant with agriculture, and to furnish them with supplies for the voyage," on condition that the contractors should be allowed four thousand guilders from the export duties on New Netherland freights, "to pay present expenses," and the further sum of seven thousand guilders from the peltry duties at New Amsterdam; and in case of failure by the contractors they were to restore the four thousand guilders, and forfeit, besides, two thousand guilders more of their own funds.[4]

Van Couwenhoven and Bout returned to New Netherland with a copy of the "Provisional Order," arriving there on the 28th of June,[5] leaving van der Donck in Holland to complete the business of the delegation, and return when the redress was actually voted. Failing to obtain action, van der Donck, on the 14th January, 1651, presented the States-General, with a further petition "again praying that a speedy and necessary redress may be concluded on, in regard to the affairs of New Netherland."

Stuyvesant declined to obey the "Provisional order," except in some minor matters, and opposed it by strong despatches to the company, while his Secretary van Tienhoven was already in Holland fighting van der Donck strenuously before the authorities there. On the 10th of February, 1652, nothing having been finally determined, still another representation of the contumacy of Stuyvesant, and the continued bad state of New Netherland, and the necessity for an act of redress of their grievances was made by van der Donck. It thus concludes,—"the said delegate of the Commonalty of New Netherland again humbly prays and requests your High Mightinesses to be pleased to dispose favorably of the aforesaid, in order that he, the delegate, may leave by the first ship this spring on his return for New Netherland."[6]

With this paper van der Donck laid before the States-General a voluminous mass of extracts of letters and other documents received chiefly in the year 1651, by him from New Netherland, detailing the difficulties there.[7] After a reference of these papers to the different chambers of the West India Company and considering their various reports thereon, which occupied many months, the States-General adopted and sent the following recall to Stuyvesant, "Honorable &c. We have, in view of the public service considered it necessary to require you, on sight hereof, to repair hither in order to furnish us circumstantial and pertinent information, as to the true and actual condition of the country and affairs; and also of the boundary line between the English and the Dutch there. Done 27th April 1652."[8]

The very day before, on the 26th of April, at his own request pursuant to the charter of Freedoms and Exemptions, the States-General granted to van der Donck, by patent under seal, the "venia testandi," or right to dispose by will as Patroon, "of the Colonie Nepperhaem by him called Colem Donck, situate in New Netherland."[9]

He now thought everything was completed and that he should soon be again on the banks of the Hudson. He embarked his goods and everything in the way of supplies for his "Colonie," in a vessel then anchored in the Texel, and on the 13th of May 1652 applied to the States-General for their formal permit to return home, which was requisite by a resolution of that body of the 14th of the preceding March. But he was doomed to disappointment. The Amsterdam chamber supported their officers, and were displeased at van der Donck, and the delegation for laying all their matters before the States-General instead of before themselves, thereby forcing the chamber to bring its own action in New Netherland before the "Lords of Holland," as the States-General were termed. And it had influence enough among them to annoy van der Donck in every way. His request was merely referred to a committee "to examine." But on the 24th of May he sent in a long and sharp, but respectful, memorial, protesting against their inaction. In this, he says, "that proposing to depart by your High Mightinesses consent, with his wife, mother, sister, brother, servants, maids, and in that design had packed and shipped all his implements and goods," but he understood "that the Hon.ble Directors at Amsterdam had forbidden all skippers to receive him, or his, even though exhibiting your High Mightinesses express orders and consent," * * * "by which he must, without any form of procedure, or anything resembling thereto, remain separated from his wife, mother, sis-

[1] I. Col. Hist., 387. [2] Ibid., 393.
[3] Ibid., 401. [4] I. Col. Hist., 379.
[5] I. Colonial Hist., 447.
[6] I. Col. Hist., 438. [7] I. Col. Hist., 444–461.
[8] I. Col. Hist., 472. [9] I. Col. Hist., 470.

ter, brother, servants, maids, family connexions, from two good friends, from his merchandise, his own necessary goods, furniture, and also from his real estate in New Netherland."[1] But this also was merely referred to the various chambers " for their information."[2] Nothing was done, and on the 5th of August, 1652, he again solicited permission to depart.[3] He was again denied, and this, too, in spite of his showing that his affairs were going to ruin, and the cruelty of separating him from his wife and family. The family therefore were obliged to sail without him, and he returned to the Hague.[4]

To this persecution and vindictiveness of his opponents, however, we are indebted for the most valuable account of New Netherland written by any one who had then been a resident there. He seems to have begun this work immediately upon his return to the Hague and it was probably finished in the course of the ensuing winter. In May he applied for a copyright, which after an examination of the book both by the Chamber of Amsterdam, and a Committee of the States-General, was granted by the latter body on the 24th of May, 1753. The correspondence on this subject between these bodies, shows that a copy of this little book was sent by the former to the latter on the 2d of May, and referred to a committee " to inspect, examine, and report thereon."[5] It must therefore have been printed at that time, though no copy of that date is now known to exist. This is the more probable from the fact, that van der Donck was at length permitted to depart, and returned to New Netherland in the summer of 1753.[6] As we know that he intended to write an addition to this work in order to make it complete as a history, and obtained an order from the West India Company, in the shape of a letter from it to Stuyvesant, to permit him to examine the papers and records in the Secretary's office of the Province, for that purpose, it may be, that though printed, it was not published in 1653. Stuyvesant on his return refused him access to the records, and thus defeated his plan, and he then, in all probability, consented to the publication of what had already been printed in Holland. He died in 1655, about two years after his return to America,[7] and in the same year the first edition of his work that we now have, was issued in Amsterdam, with a view of New Amsterdam inserted.[8] A second edition was issued in 1656, also in Amsterdam, without the view, but containing a map of New Netherland. This book was entitled, " Beschryvin I. van Niew Nederlandt," or, "A Description of New Netherland" (such as it now is) Comprehending the nature, character, situation and Fruitfulness of that Country," &c., &c., with an account of the manners and customs of the Indians, and of the natural history of the Beaver." This and the "Vertoogh" or "Remonstrance" referred to before, published in 1650, which was a contemporaneous relation of events in New Netherland, historical, civil, and military, are the two most valuable and authentic accounts of New Netherland and its early history and condition, that exist, and are the sources to which all writers ever since, have gone for information on the early history of what is now New York. The first named work was first published in English, only in 1841, in the first volume of the second series of the Collections of the New York Historical Society, the translation having been made by the late General Jeremiah Johnson of Brooklyn. And in the second volume of the same series, is an admirable translation of the "Vertoogh," from the pen of the Hon. Henry C. Murphy of the same city.

This full sketch of the Patroon of Colen Donck and his career is given, because it shows, that it was owing to what may be called his public life, that he was unable to effect the better settlement of his Westchester Patroonship. His enforced absence for so long a period, was followed by his death two years only after his return to America, too short a time to enable him to carry out any plans he may have formed in regard to it. And also because that career, one of the most striking and remarkable in New Netherland history, was the career of the Patroon of the only Patroonship in Westchester County.

Prior to leaving Rensselaerswyck, and in the year 1645, von der Donck married Mary Doughty, a daughter of the Rev. Francis Doughty, a New England clergyman, who in 1642, three years before, had been driven, with many of his friends, by the persecuting Puritans of Massachusetts from his home in that colony. Having stated publicly, at Cohasset, "that Abraham's children should have been baptized," he was forthwith dragged out of the assembly and otherwise harshly used; and with one Richard Smith and some others who held like views of baptism, was forced to " escape from the insupportable government of New England " to New Netherland.[9] He and his friends were granted in compassion for their sufferings and poverty, a tract, with the privileges of a patroonship for those interested collectively, but without the privilege of milling, or the title of Patroon to any one of them, for 6000 Dutch acres, at Maspeth, on Long Island, dated, March 28th, 1642. But quarrels between the parties themselves, the Indian war, and Doughty's demands for money for himself personally, made the enterprise a failure, and the lands were afterwards, under the law, confiscated to the company by Governor Kieft, and subsequently regranted in parcels, to different individuals.[10]

[1] I. Col. Hist., 476.
[2] I. Col. Hist., 476, 478.
[3] Ibid., 485.
[4] Ibid., 532.
[5] I. Col. Hist., 531, 532.
[6] N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d Series, vol. ii. 258.
[7] I. Col. Hist., 533; II. O'Call., 551.
It is a small 4to vol. of 104 pages, with an introduction of 8 pages.
[9] N. Y. Col. Hist., 131.
[10] XI. Col. Hist., 413.

This is the only instance on record of a collective transport of a Patroonship, and seems to have been made ex-gratia as a matter of charity, to the poor persecuted exiles from Puritan Massachusetts, who brought practically nothing but their own persons to New Netherland. Nothing was paid by them for the land, and all that the grantees had to do, was "to acknowledge the said Lords Directors as their Masters and Patroons, to pay, after the lapse of ten years, the tenth part of the produce of the fields, whether cultivated with the plough, or hoe, or otherwise (orchards and gardens not exceeding one acre, Holland measure excepted)."[1] Doughty afterwards removed to Patuxent, in Maryland, where his daughter resided and where he was living in October, 1659.[2]

When Van der Donck died in 1655, his widow was left, after a married life of ten years, with some small children, but how many, is not now known. As we have seen that he had sought and obtained the venia testandi, or the right of disposing of his Patroonship by will, he probably devised Colen-Donck to his widow. She subsequently married Hugh O'Neale of Patuxent, Maryland, and resided with her husband in that province. Eleven years after van der Donck's death, and two after the English seized New Netherland, a new patent dated October 8th, 1666, in the nature of a confirmation was issued by Governor Richard Nicolls to O'Neale and his wife in their joint names, thus vesting the title to the whole Patroonship in them jointly. This Patent styles it "Nepperhaem," and is in these words ;—

"Richard Nicolls, Esq., Governor under his Royal Highness, ye Duke of York, of all his territoryes in America, to all to whom this present writing shall come, sendeth greeting: Whereas there is a certain tract of land within this Government, upon the Main, Bounded to the northwards by a rivulet called by the Indians, Macakassin, so running southward to Nepperhaem, from thence to the Kill Shorakkappock,[3] and then to Paperinemin,[4] which is the southern most bounds, then to go across the country to the eastward by that which is commonly known by the name of Bronck's, his river and land, which said tract hath heretofore been purchased of the Indian proprietors by Adriaen van der Donck, deceased, whose relict, Mary, the wife of Hugh O'Neale, one of the patentees is, and due satisfaction was also given for the same, as hath by some of the said Indians been acknowledged before me; Now for a further confirmation unto them, the said Hugh O'Neale and Mary his wife, relict of the aforesaid Adriaen van der Donck, in their possession and enjoyment of the premises Know ye, that by virtue of this our commission and authority, given unto me by his Royal Highness the Duke of York, I have thought fit to give, ratify, confirm, and grant, and by these presents do give, ratify, confirm, and grant, unto the said Hugh O'Neale and Mary his wife, their heirs and assigns, all the afore mentioned tract or parcel of lands called Nepperhaem, together with all woods, marshes, meadows, pastures, waters, lakes, creeks, rivulets fishing, hunting and fowling, and all other profits, commodities and emoluments to the said tract of land belonging, with their, and every of their appurtenances, and of every part and parcel thereof, to have and to hold the said tract of land and premises, with all and singular their appurtenances, to the said Hugh O'Neale and Mary his wife, their heirs and assignes to the proper use and behoofe of the said Hugh O'Neale and Mary his wife, their heires and assignes forever, he, she, or they, or any of them, rendering and paying such acknowledgment, and duties, as are, or shall be, constituted and ordayned by his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and his heirs, or such governor, or governors, as shall from time to time be appointed and set over them within this province. That, if at any time hereafter, his Royal Highness, his heirs, successors, or assigns, shall think fit to make use of any timber for shipping, or for erecting or repairing of forts within this government, liberty is reserved for such uses and purposes to cut any sort of timber upon any unplanted grounds, on the said tract of land, to make docks, harbours, wharfes, houses, or any other conveniences relating thereunto, and also to make use of any rivers or rivuletts, and inlets of water, for the purposes aforesaid, as fully and free as if no such patent had been granted.

Given under my hand and seal at Fort James, New York, on the Island of Manhattan, the eighth day of October, in the eighteenth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord, Charles the Second, by the grace of God, of England, France, and Ireland, King, defender of the Faith, &c., &c., in the year of our Lord God, 1666."[5]

The acknowledgment by the Indians referred to in the foregoing deed, thus appears under date of September 21st, 1668, in Book of Deeds III., at Albany, page 42:

"This day came Hugh O'Neale and Mary his wife (who in right of her former husband laid claime to a cert^{n} parcele of land upon the Maine not farre from Westchester, commonly called the Younckers land), who bro't severall Indyans before the gov^{r} to acknowledge the purchase of said lands by van der Donck commonly called ye Youncker. The said Indyans declared y^{e} bounds of the sd. lands to be from a place called by them Macackassin at y^{e} north so to run to Neperan and to y^{e} Kill Soro-quappock, then to Muskota and Papperinemain to the south,

[1] The original transport is in Latin, and an English translation is in XIV. Col. Hist., 38 ; I. O'Call, 237 ; and Appendix, 427 and 428.

[2] II. Col. Hist., 93.

[3] The Indian name of Spyt-den-Duyvel Creek.

[4] Now Kingsbridge.

[5] Recorded in Sec. of State's office, Albany and crosse the country to y^e^ eastward by Bronckx his Ryver and Land. The Indyan Propyetors name who was cheife of them is Tackareeck living at the Nevisans[1] who acknowledged the purchase as before described, and that he had received satisfac^n^ for it.—Claes y^e^ Indyan hav^g^ interest in a part acknowledged to have sould it, and received satisfact^n^ of van der Donck. All the rest of the Indyans present being seven or eight acknowledged to have rec^d^ full satisfaction."

The date of this instrument, 1668, is evidently a clerical error for 1666, as the acknowledgment is recited in Nicoll's patent of confirmation which bears day October 8th, 1666.

From this patent it is clear that no part of the patroonship had been parted with since van der Donck's death in 1655. And from the fact that on the 30th of the same October in the same year in which this patent was granted, only twenty-two days afterward, the first conveyance under it was made by O'Neale and his wife, it seems evident that it was obtained simply as a confirmation of the original title, and an acknowledgment of its validity, by the New English government, in order to make the sale alluded to. This sale of the tract, on October 30th, 1666, was made to Elias Doughty, of Flushing, Long Island, who was the son of the Rev. Francis Doughty, and a brother of van der Donck's widow, the then wife of Hugh O'Neale, and vested the entire Patroonship in him.

Elias Doughty at once began the sale of it in different parcels to different individuals in fee. On the first of March, 1667, four months after he had become its owner Elias Doughty sold to John Arcer, or Archer, as this Dutch name was Anglicised,[2] "four score acres of upland and thirty of meadow betwixt Broncx river & y^e^ watering place at the end of the Island of Manhattans,"[3] which four years later, with some adjoining purchases of lands, was erected in his favor into the Manor of Fordham by Governor Lovelace on the 13th of November, 1771.

On June 7th, 1668, Doughty sold to John Heddy[4] of Westchester a tract of three hundred and twenty acres, now part of the old van Cortlandt estate, recently taken for van Cortlandt Park. The next month, on the 6th of July, 1668, Elias Doughty sold to George Tippitt and William Betts another piece of Colen-Donck, thus described: "A parcell of land & meadow to ye Patent to William Betts and George Tippett who are in possession of a part of the same land formerly owned by old Youncker van der Donck which runs west to Hudson's river & east to Broncks River, with all the upland from Broncks River south to Westchester Path, & so runs due east and north beginning at the boggy swamp with^n^ the liberty of the said Patent, & the southrnmost bound to run by the path that runneth or lyeth by the north end of the aforesaid swamp, & so to run due east to Broncks River, & due west to the meadow which cometh to the wading place."[5]

From this George Tippett, or Tippits, as the name is spelled in his inventory made the 29th of September, 1675,[6] the stream is called Tippetts brook, which forms the van Cortlandt Lake, and, thence flowing southerly in a sinuous course, falls into Spyt-den Duyvel Creek just east of Kingsbridge. Its Indian name is Mosholu.

On the 1st of December, 1670, another part of the Patroonship, on its western side was sold by Doughty to Francis French and Ebenezer Jones of Ann Hooks Neck (now Pelham Neck), and John Westcott, of Jamaica, Long Island. This was the tract on the Bronx then, and now, so well known as Milesquare.[7]

These were all the sales of Doughty in the southern part of the Patroonship. At the mouth of the "Nepperhaem River," he sold on the 18th of August, 1670, to Dame Margaret Philipse, on behalf of her husband, Frederick Philipse, and Thomas Lewis, for £150, the south half of that River with its mill privileges, and also about three hundred acres of land adjoining it. The north half of the river and its mill privileges he sold to one Dirk Smith, reserving the right to repurchase if Smith wished to sell. This right Doughty conveyed to Philipse and Lewis, who subsequently effected the re-purchase.[8]

Two years after, and on September 29th in the year 1672, Frederick Philipse, Thomas Delavall and Thomas Lewis, bought of Elias Doughty all the remainder of Colen-Donck, each taking a third interest, the whole amounting to seven thousand seven hundred and eight acres. Delavall devised his share ten years later, in 1682, to his son John, and he, together with Frederick Philipse and Mrs. Geesie Lewis, the widow of Thomas Lewis, obtained a patent for the whole on the 19th of February, 1684. Frederick Philipse bought out Delavall's share on the 27th of August, 1685, and on the 12th of June, 1686, also acquired by purchase that of Mrs. Lewis and her children. These lands, with all the territory above them on the north, as far as Croton River, and extending from the Hudson eastwardly to the Bronx, subsequently acquired by Philipse and his son from the Indians, were seven years later, on the 12th of June, 1693, erected into that mag-

[1] The Neversink Highlands in New Jersey.

[2] Riker's Harlem, 278.

[3] Deed Book III., 138. Albany.

[4] This name, spelled also "Headly," was really, it is believed, "Hadden."

[5] Book III. of Deeds, p. 134, Albany.

[6] Lib. I., N. Y. Surv. Off., p. 234. He was a mere farmer and the inventory is but a list of farm stock and common house utensils. It, however, thus describes his farm,—"Item, a tract of land and meadow purchased of Elias Doughty, with the dwelling-house, orchard and barne now standing on the said land,—£100, 0, 0." It also mentions his neighbor, "John Heddy, of Yonkers, carpenter."

[7] Book III. of Deeds, 139.

[8] Book of Deeds, IV. 9.

nificent Manor under the English system, which from his own name, its first lord called "Philipseborough," or, as it was later, and is to this day termed "Philipseburgh."

Thus was divided up, and ended forever, the only Patroonship under the Dutch system of Colonization, which existed within the limits of the County of Westchester. And its termination strictly in accordance with the provisions of the charters of Freedoms and Exemptions, by will under the power of the venia testandi, as therein set forth, strikingly illustrates the fact, that the tenure of the Patroonships could never have become dangerous to the rights, and liberties, and laws, of the people of New Netherland.

What became of van der Donck's children is not now known, nor their names, nor in fact how many of them, if any, reached maturity. We know that in 1653 his mother, a brother, and the son of the latter, came out to New Netherland; that the name of the former was Agatha, that of his brother Daniel, and that of the son of the latter, Guisbert. But here all certainty ends. We may hope that the blood of so able and prominent a Hollander still exists, but that is all.

Although but this one Patroonship was established in Westchester County, there were a number of grants of smaller tracts to individuals, made by the Dutch Directors-General, after they had purchased the Indian title for the West India Company, or it had by their permission been bought of the Indians, by the persons, or for the persons, to whom the grants were made. But these require no special mention here.

7.

The Capture of New Netherland from the Dutch, and the Creation of the English 'Province of New York.'

The continued encroachment and pressure of the English of Connecticut, and of the east end of Long Island—then practically a part of Connecticut—upon the Dutch in New Netherland, led the Burgomasters and Schepens of New Amsterdam and the delegates from the adjoining towns, in public meeting, on the 2d of November, 1663, to send a Remonstrance to the Directors of the West India Company asking for assistance and protection. In this document they make this striking statement of their position, and the condition of the Province, at that time, and the consequences that would follow unless relief was afforded, consequences which really happened in less than a year afterward.

"When it is considered that the Remonstrants, on the one side, stand here between barbarous nations, and are bounded on the other by a powerful neighbour who keeps quarreling with this State about the limits. Thus the good people are thereby brought and reduced to a condition like unto that of a flock without a shepherd, a prey to whomsoever will seize his advantage to attack it. And lastly (and what is of the most considerable force), is evident by the aggressions attempted on the part of the English Nation, our neighbours, on divers places into the jurisdiction of this Province; whereof your Honors will, no doubt, have been advised by the Director-General and Council. Which English Nation hath, as your Remonstrants learn, found out a way neglected by your Honors, to provide and arm itself with a coat of mail in the shape of an unlimited patent and commission, which it lately obtained from his Majesty of England.[1] "So that this commission and patent being executed by them according to their interpretation; for experience in State affairs teaches and abundantly exemplifies, that the strongest are commonly in the right, and that the feeble, ordinarily, must succumb; the total loss of this Province is infallibly to be expected and anticipated, such apprehension being indubitably very strong; or, at least, it will be so cramped and clipped, that it will resemble only a useless trunk, shorn of limbs and form, divested of all its internal parts, the head separated from the feet; and therefore the Remonstrants would be, if not at once, wholly oppressed, and reduced to such a state of anxiety, as to be desperately necessitated, to their irreparable ruin, to abandon and quit this Province, and thus become outcasts with their families.

"It being objected and pleaded by the above named English, as a pretext for their designs, that the real right and propriety of this Province and its territories were not duly proved and justified on your Honors parts by proper commission and patent from their High Mightinesses. Whence it appears in consequence of the want of such commission and patent, the obtaining whereof from their High Mightinesses has been so long postponed, as if your Honors have been pleased to place the good inhabitants of this Province, as it were, upon glare ice, and have given them grounds and lands to which you have no real right.[2] And in this way, too, the well intentioned English who have settled under your Honors Government are held in a labyrinth and a maze, without any right assurance how they shall have to demean themselves in observing the oath taken by them. [of allegiance to the Company and the States-General].

Wherefore the Remonstrants in these their troubles, afflictions, intricacies, and extreme necessity, are come, in all humility, to throw themselves on your Honors consideration, fervently and heartily praying you to be pleased to enable them exactly to apply the essential means, whereby, they, your Honor's most faithful servants, may be effectually supported and maintained in the real possession of the lands, properties, and what depends thereon, which were given and granted them by the above mentioned exemptions, and by them possessed at the expense of vast labor, bloody fatigue, and the outpouring of countless drops of sweat." [1]

[1] The Connecticut Patent, granted to the New Haven and Hartford settlements on the 23d of April, 1662.

[2] Special patents and charters, like those under English law, were not favored by the Roman Dutch law of Holland.

The formal enactment of the W. I. Company's Charter of Privileges by the States-General, and of the different charters of "Freedoms and Exemptions" were amply sufficient for all purposes under the Law of the United Provinces, to vest perfect titles to all lands granted under them in New Netherland. The English of Hartford and New Haven, only obtained their Charter of Connecticut from Charles II., on the 23d of April, 1662. Not till after they got this document, did they seriously claim that the Dutch had no title by patent from the States-General. The claim was baseless, and only made as a cover for encroachment.

Ten days after the above Remonstrance was drawn up and, later, on the 10th of November, 1663, Director Stuyvesant, in a despatch referring to it, also fully and vigorously warns the Company in Holland, in these words;—

"In regard to the unrighteous, stubborn, impudent, and pertinacious proceedings of the English at Hartford, I can only repeat what has for many years past, and especially these two last, been so frequently stated, set forth, and requested; all which neither time, nor opportunity, permits us to relate and include herein. Your Honors will be able to see from the inclosures, what efforts have been made agreeably to your Honors letters, to conclude, in this country, a settlement of the Boundary with our neighbors. It was first attempted by the Director-General in person at the general meeting of the four English Colonies at Boston; and since on the advice of three of the Colonies,[2] by our Commissioners, viz: Mr. Cornelis van Ruyven, Secretary Oloff Stevens Cortlandt, Burgomaster of this city, and John Laurens (Lawrence), burgher and merchant, made to the General Court, or Legislature, at Hartford.

"On reading over both journals, your Honors will not only perceive the impossibility of effecting anything here, unless all be given up to them, hardly excepting alone what the Dutch Nation justly possessed and settled on Manhatans Island and on the North River.

"By virtue of a patent signed in the year 1626, Boston [Massachusetts] claims whatever is north of 42½ degrees, East and West, from one sea to the other. This line includes the whole of the Colonie of Rensselaers-Wyck, the village of Bever-wyck, and all the Mohawk and Seneca country. Again, the General Court at Hartford lay claim to, and demand, in virtue of the newly obtained patent [that for Connecticut of 1662], all the country lying South of the aforesaid line of 42½ degrees, and westerly until it touches another Royal Patent, and therein include all of New Netherland, south to the seacoast, and west to a Royal patent; and furthermore declare positively;—

"First. Contrary to the advice of the other three colonies, that the treaty concluded at Hartford, An°. 1650, is null and void.

"Secondly. That they will dissolve the Union with the other three colonies, [rather] than acquiesce, to the prejudice of their patent, in the advice of the Commissioners at Boston.

"Thirdly. They know no New Netherland, nor government of New Netherland, except only the Dutch plantation on the Island of Manhatan.

"Fourthly. They will and must take Westchester, and all the English towns on Long Island, under their protection, by virtue of their patent, without being obliged to wait for any further order of the King, since such was their understanding.

"Fifthly and lastly. 'Tis evident and clear from their repeated declaration, that were Westchester and the five English towns on Long Island,[3] surrendered by us to the Colony of Hartford, and what we have justly possessed and settled on Long Island left to us, it would not satisfy them, because it would not be possible to bring them sufficiently to any further arrangement with us by commissioners to be chosen on both sides by the mediation of a third party; and as in case of disagreement, they assert in addition, that they may possess and occupy, in virtue of their unlimited patent,[4] the lands lying vacant and unsettled on both sides of the North River and elsewhere, which would certainly always cause and create new pretensions and disputes, even though the Boundary were provisionally settled here." He further says, that if a settlement of all disputes cannot be obtained and effected through their High Mightinesses with "Ambassador Douwning,"[5] and by them both, and their High Mightinesses Resident in England, with his Majesty, "by next spring, one of two things is certainly and assuredly to be apprehended;—bloodshed, and with bloodshed, which they seem only to wish, loss of all we possess, if proper, active, opposition be not offered to the English or their daily encroachments and intrusions; reducing under their obedience now this, and then that, place, and occupying suitable spots, here and there, up the North river, and elsewhere, abundance of which are yet unpeopled and unsettled." [6]

But the clear-headed and patriotic Director-General was greatly mistaken in "Ambassador Douwning," or rather in his expectation that that envoy would aid in bringing matters to a settlement. Sir George Downing was as inimical to the Dutch nation as Governor Winthrop or any other Connecticut Englishman. He had been long in Holland under Cromwell and dis-

[1] II. Col. Hist., 478.

[2] Massachusetts declined to take part in the second conference.

[3] Gravesend, Hempstead, Flushing, Newtown and Jamaica.

[4] Its claim was westward to the sea.

[5] Sir Richard Downing, the English envoy to Holland at that time.

[6] II. Col. Hist.

liked and feared the Dutch. When it was evident that Charles the 2d would be restored, he hastened to make his peace with him, and the Duke of York, before they left the Netherlands. Sharp, unprincipled, and determined to break down Dutch power, and Dutch commercial supremacy, if he could, he was the last man to give any assistance to effect such a solution of the Dutch and English difficulties as Stuyvesant desired. The Duke of York, though he should not have possessed such feelings towards the people who had befriended his brother and himself in their exile, also was personally unfriendly to the Dutch Nation. Certain libels against him though punished by the Dutch courts, had not been punished as thoroughly, or as soon, as he wished. The Dutch West India Company in trading under their charter to the Guinea coast, interfered with the business of the Royal African Company of which he was the Governor. He complained of the Dutch on this account before the English Parliament, and, of his own authority as Lord High Admiral, sent a fleet to harass them on the coast of Africa. Therefore it was as a matter of revenge, as well as hoped for profit, that he obtained from Charles the 2d on the 12th of March, 1664, O. S.,[1] only a year and eleven months after the date of the Connecticut Colony's Patent, a gift by patent of the whole of New Netherland, based on the sailing along its coast by the Cabots, in the reign of Henry VII., without proof of their having seen it, and though no actual possession of it was ever taken by them or anybody else, prior to the discovery, and actual settlement, by the Dutch, a hundred years and a little more afterwards. There was actual peace between the Dutch and English nations at the date of the patent, and at the time of the seizure by the latter, though war broke out soon afterward; a fact which deepened the flagrancy of one of the most striking instances of the rapacity and wickedness of a strong people dealing with a weaker one, in all history.

Borrowing four vessels of the English navy, of which he was Lord High Admiral, the Duke of York sent an expedition under the command of Colonel Richard Nicolls, with Sir Robert Carr, George Cartwright and Samuel Mavericke as co-commissioners with Mathias Nicolls, subsequently Secretary for New York, and a few other English officers, in command of about 450 men, to visit the Plantations in New England, and to "reduce" the Dutch Province of New Netherland "to an entire obedience to our government" as their instructions from the King expressed it.[2] These instructions, and the special communications from Charles 2d to Massachusetts and Connecticut in relation to the commission and its powers were dated the 23d of April, 1664, as well as his "Private Instructions" which were only to be considered by the commissioners between themselves.[3] The Royal Commission to Nicolls and the others, was dated two days later, on the 25th of April, 1664. The latter, strange to say, does not mention, or even refer to, New Netherland.[4] Why this remarkable omission was made is not now known, but such is the fact. On the second of April, 1664, three weeks previously, the Duke of York had given Colonel Richard Nicolls a commission from himself as his Deputy Governor. This document after reciting the King's Patent to himself, and a brief description of the boundaries therein set forth, continues:—"And whereas I have conceived a good opinion of the integrity, prudence, ability, and fitness of Richard Nicolls, Esquire, to be employed as my Deputy there, I have thought fit to constitute and appoint, and I do hereby constitute and appoint him the said Richard Nicolls, Esquire, to be my Deputy Governor within the lands, Islands, and places aforesaid, To perform and execute all and every the powers which are by the said Letters Patent granted unto me to be executed by my Deputy Agent or Assign. To Have and to Hold the said place of Deputy-Governor unto the said Richard Nicolls Esquire, during my will and pleasure only; Hereby willing, and requiring, all and every the Inhabitants of the said Lands, Islands, and places, to give obedience to him the said Richard Nicolls, in all things according to the tenor of his Majesty's said Letters Pattent."[5]

Under the King's Patent of the 12th March, 1664, and these Instructions and commissions from Charles 2d, and the Duke of York, the forcible seizure and annexation of the Province of New Netherland to the English Kingdom was effected.

The expedition, consisting of the Guinea of 36 guns, Capt. Hugh Hyde, the Elias of 30 guns, Capt. William Hill, the Martin of 16 guns, Capt. Edward Grove, and the William and Nicholas, Capt. Morley, of 10 guns, carrying the commissioners and a body of troops, about 450 in number, sailed from Portsmouth on the 15th of May, 1664. Nicolls the commander-in-chief and Cartwright embarked in the Guinea, and Carr and Mavericke in the Martin. Their orders were to rendezvous in Gardiner's Bay, at the east end of Long Island. The voyage was long, the vessels got separated, and the Martin, and Nicholas and William, were obliged to run into Piscataway (Portsmouth) New Hampshire on the 20th of July, 1664, whence Mavericke the same day wrote the following brief account of the voyage to Capt. Breedon of Boston;—"It hath pleased God (after a tedious voyage of neare ten weeks time) That two of our ships arrived here this afternoon at Pascataway where wee hourly expect our other two; the Guiney comanded by Capt. Hyde wee lost sight of this day se' night, and Capt.

[1] The original, a beautiful MS. is in the State Library at Albany. It is printed in II. Col. Hist. 295; Brod. II. 651.

[2] III. Col. Hist., 52.

[3] Ibid., 51–63.

[4] Ibid., 64.

[5] Book of Patents, Albany, II. 116–118; II. Brod., 153; Leaming and Spicer's Jersey Laws, 665.

Hill with the Elyas on Sunday last. * * * * our stay here being only for a little water and our other shipps, which if they come not in time, we must go to our appointed port in Long Island." Three days later, on the 23d of July, the Guinea and Elias arrived at Boston. Nicolls wrote at once to Thomas Willet at Plymouth, and Gov. Winthrop at Hartford, and applied for assistance. On the 29th of July the vessels from "Pascataway" arrived at Boston. Further letters from Nicolls were sent to Winthrop asking for aid, and to Thomas Willets at Plymouth, and directing them to meet the expedition at the west, instead of the east, end of Long Island. A few days later the ships sailed, and piloted by New Englanders, came direct to New Utrecht, or Nayack, Bay, now called Gravesend Bay, between the west end of Coney Island and the main, the Guinea arriving on the 25th of August, and the other three vessels three days later, on the 28th.

Winthrop with other Connecticut officials, and armed men, from that colony and the east end of Long Island, met them there, as well as Thomas Clarke and John Pynchon, of Boston, with offers of military aid from Massachusetts. On the 8th of the preceding July Thomas Willett had heard, from a young man of the name of Lord, a rumor from Boston, that an expedition had sailed from England to attack New Netherland, and immediately informed Governor Stuyvesant, but subsequently, for some reason, alleged that the troops had disembarked, that Commissioners to settle the boundaries were appointed, and that there was no danger. This put an end to Stuyvesant's anxiety, and he went to Albany to settle a quarrel among the Indians in that neighborhood. He was also lulled into security by the receipt of a despatch from the Directors at Amsterdam that no danger from England need be entertained as the King only wanted to reduce his own colonies to uniformity in church and State.[1] The truth was, that the Directors of the Company, intently engaged in the public affairs of Holland (it was the period of John de Witt's ascendancy and the efforts of the Prince of Orange's party to destroy it) really neglected New Netherland, and their own interests there, giving both such slight attention, as not only disappointed its people, and their own officials, but facilitated, the treacherous action of the English King, and inclined its inhabitants to yield with less resistance and feeling to his military power, than they otherwise would.

Of course no real resistance,[2] greatly as he desired to make it, could be offered, by Director-General Stuyvesant, and his people; and after several days negotiations, Articles of Capitulation were definitely settled by a commission, composed of John De Decker, Nicholas Varleth, Samuel Megapolensis, Cornelis Steenwyck, Jacques Cousseau, and Oloff Stevens van Cortlandt, on the part of Director Stuyvesant, and Robert Carr, George Carteret, John Winthrop, Samuel Willys, John Pynchon, (the latter three of Connecticut), and Thomas Clarke (of Massachusetts) on the part of Governor Nicolls, and consented to by both. The negotiations took place, and the terms were finally agreed upon, on Saturday, September 6th, 1664, at Gov. Stuyvesant's house in the Bowery. This house, as I have been told by the Hon. Hamilton Fish, now the oldest living descendant of Stuyvesant, stood on what is now the block between 12th and 13th Streets facing the Third Avenue, as that part of the Bowery road is now called, and on the east side of that avenue. The old Stuyvesant pear tree which stood till within a few years at the north east corner of 13th St. and Third Avenue was one the Governor planted in his garden. Nicolls ratified the articles the same day. The next day was Sunday, during which the Director-General and his Council considered them, and early on the morning of the succeeding day, Monday, September 8th, 1664, ratified them. About eleven o'clock of the same morning Stuyvesant marched out of the fort with the honors of war, at the head of the Dutch regulars, about 150 in number, and through Beaver street to the ship "Gideon," in which they were at once embarked for Holland, though she did not sail till some days later. A corporal's guard of the English took possession of the fort as the Dutch marched out. "Col. Nicolls's and Sir Robert Carr's companies one hundred and sixty-eight strong, formed into six columns of about thirty men each, next entered New Amsterdam; whilst Sir George Cartwright occupied with his men the city gates and Town Hall." The volunteers from Connecticut and Long Island, were detained at the ferry at "Brenkelen," "as the citizens dreaded most being plundered by them." Finally the Burgomasters having proclaimed Nicolls Governor, he called Fort Amsterdam "Fort James," and the name of the city and Province he changed to "New York."[3] Thus ended the Dutch dominion in America, and thus forever passed away the great Batavian Province of New Netherland from the Republic of the United Netherlands.

The Articles of Capitulation were twenty-three in number, and never were more favorable terms granted by a superior power. Great prudence on one side was met by great liberality on the other, and Nicolls proved that he was all that his commission as Deputy-Governor described him, honest, prudent, able, and fit. It would be foreign to our purpose to discuss these Articles of Capitulation, or as usually termed "Surrender," at length.[4] Those only which bear upon our subject will be mentioned, viz—the third, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, sixteenth, and twenty-first. They are as follows:—

[1] II. O'Call., 517.

[2] The details of Stuyvesant's action at this crisis are too numerous to be given in an essay of this kind, and are so generally known, at least in their outlines, as not to need further mention.

[3] II. O'Call., 536.

[4] They are to be found in II. Col., Hist., 250; I. Brod., 762, and in many other historical works.

"III. All people shall still continue free denizens, and shall enjoy their lands, houses, goods, wheresoever they are within this country, and dispose of them as they please.

"VIII. The Dutch here shall enjoy the liberty of their consciences in divine worship and church discipline.

"XI. The Dutch here shall enjoy their own customs concerning their inheritances.

"XII. All publique writings and records, which concern the inheritances of any people, or the reglement [regulation] of the church, or poor, or orphans shall be carefully kept by those in whose hands now they are, and such writings as particularly concern the States-General may at any time be sent to them.

"XVI. All inferior civil officers and magistrates shall continue as now they are (if they please) till the customary time of new elections, and then new ones to be chosen by themselves, provided that such new chosen magistrates shall take the oath of allegiance to his majesty of England before they enter upon their office.

"XXI. That the town of Manhattans shall choose Deputyes, and those Deputyes shall have free voyces in all publique affaires as much as any other Deputyes."

By the third, eighth, eleventh, and twelfth, all Dutch grants of land under the former laws and ordinances, of the Province, and under the Roman-Dutch law, were acknowledged as valid, and the possession of them confirmed to their owners, as well as their former power of disposing of them by will, and all legal incidents thereto appertaining. This settled the question of the holding of the lands by their owners, at once, and proved that there would be no confiscation, or other interference with them, and no imposing of any English law of inheritance.

The sixteenth article confirmed and continued in their offices all the civil magistrates and officers of every grade in the country, from the highest to the lowest, and provided for the election of their successors, under the existing Dutch laws, conditioned only that the new officers, should take the oath of allegiance to their new English King. No such oath was wisely demanded of the old ones, and the administration of justice, not only in regard to lands, but in all its forms, went on precisely as if no change of government had taken place.

The twenty-first article confirmed to the City of New York, all the civil rights and powers it had under its former organization, and under the Assemblies which had been called, and in which it had been represented, during Stuyvesant's administration. Its lands were preserved to it, and all rights in relation thereto, by the same articles, which preserved the other lands of the province to their respective owners, as well as all the municipal rights, powers, and privileges the city possessed under the Dutch rule.

The Eighth article, in connexion with the twelfth, preserved, maintained, and continued, to the Established Dutch Church all its rights, privileges, and immunities of creed and worship, and guaranteed to it freedom of conscience and church discipline, as well as the continuance of its regulations, as to its own concerns, and to the poor and to orphans, in the same hands, and under the same control, that they had ever been. But these articles did not continue it as the Established Church of the Province, or provide for its maintenance and control as such, by the government, or rather, through the government, as had been the case under the West India Company, and all the Charters of Freedoms and exemptions from the first to the last. They did however continue and guarantee to it everything else. Its lands and all its rights of property were guaranteed and continued to it by the same third, eighth, eleventh and twelfth articles, which guaranteed and maintained all the other landholders of the Province in their rights of possession and property in their realty. In short the Dutch Church was acknowledged in its existence, confirmed in its creed, discipline, and worship, maintained in the possession of its property, and guaranteed in its rights in every respect and in every way. Nothing was altered, nothing abrogated, except its position as the Established Church of New Netherland. That was determined by the fall of the Dutch Province. Both were ended by the surrender to England. The new Province of New York had during its whole existence no connexion officially, with the Dutch Church, or any other church, except "the Church of England as by law established."

When the Province was recaptured by the Dutch on the 8th of August 1673 the Dutch Church was reestablished in all her rights, privileges, and powers, as she originally possessed them. And when the second surrender to the English was made pursuant to the treaty of Westminster in September 1674, all were guaranteed to her again precisely as in 1664, except, of course, her position as an establishment; and she was also permitted to keep up her ecclesiastical connexion with, and subjection to, the ecclesiastical bodies of the Established Church of Holland, a connexion and dependence which continued unimpaired until the close of the American Revolution more than a century later. The position of the Dutch Church as an Established Church, was the reason why it was so particularly guarded, and provided for, in the Articles of Capitulation of 1664, and again in the special articles of surrender formulated by Governor Colve, and carried into effect by the English Governor Andross, in 1674, no other church being mentioned or referred to in either. And to this circumstance is owing the fact, that it was in consequence of these provisions in both sets of articles, that during the entire existence of New York as an English Province, the Dutch Church was ever treated with greater favor than any other church dissenting from the Church of England; and that between these two churches a cordial relation ever existed, and one which has been maintained down to this day, when both churches are flourishing, each with a name slightly changed, under a new political dominion, to a degree which was impossible under either of the dominions of old.

The change from the Dutch system of government and laws to that of the English, was very gradual indeed. It was no part of the policy of the Duke of York to make changes other than what might be absolutely necessary. All that he insisted upon, at first, was, that he should be acknowledged as Lord Proprietor of the Province under the Patent from his brother King Charles the 2d, of 1652. The prudence, skill and wisdom of Richard Nicolls, his Deputy Governor, after much objection and opposition, which he completely and gently overcame, effected this; and between the 20th and 25th of October, 1664, hardly five weeks after the surrender, all the former Dutch officials, and nearly three hundred of the male inhabitants of New York, including Stuyvesant, van Cortlandt, van Ruyven, van Rensselaer and Beekman, took the oath of allegiance to Charles the 2d and the Duke of York, as the lawful Sovereign, and the lawful Lord Proprietor of New York.

8.

The English System in the Province of New York under the Duke of York as Lord Proprietor.

From the eighth day of September, 1664, when the Surrender of New Netherland to the English took place, the right of soil, the right of domain, the right of jurisdiction, and the source of power, in the Province of New York, was vested, and acknowledged to be vested, in the Duke of York under the Patent to him from King Charles the Second of the 12th of March, 1664. In this Patent, perhaps the strongest, most sweeping, and most comprehensive in its terms, of any granted in America by an English Monarch, the King gave to the Duke the entire territory of New Netherland therein described, (though of course that name was not used) upon this tenure, namely;—"To be holden of us our Heirs and Successors, as of our Manor of East Greenwich and our County of Kent, in free and common soccage and not in Capite, nor by Knight Service, yielding and rendering * * * * of and for the same, yearly and every year, forty beaver skins when they shall be demanded, or within Ninety days after."

The Patent was drawn by Lord Chancellor Clarendon, the Duke's father-in-law, and practically vested in him all the powers of an absolute Sovereign, subject only in the execution of them to the laws of England. But in all matters not covered by those laws, his own rule in person, or by his Deputy-Governor, was supreme. The only power that was reserved to the King was the hearing and determining of Appeals from Judgments and Sentences.

The theory of the Patent was, that the King had resumed control of a territory originally belonging to the Crown by the right of its discovery by the Cabots. That all people therein, Indians excepted, were trespassers without legal right, that the territory was without lawful government, that the Sovereign of Great Britain, of his own right, therefore established therein such government as he saw fit. That he chose to give, and did give, in the exercise of such right, the entire territory, and his own powers and rights therein, and thereover, to his brother the Duke of York, with full authority to establish, and carry them into effect, as he should see fit. The only proviso, as to all "Laws, Orders, Ordinances, Directions and Instruments" that the Duke or his Deputy might make or execute, was, that they should "be not contrary to, but, as near as conveniently may be, agreeable to the Laws, Statutes and Government of this our Realm of England."[1]

The principle the English acted on, was, that as regards the territory of New Netherland, the right of conquest governed, and the King could institute therein such form of government, system of laws and other institutions, as he pleased. This view was not at all satisfactory to the owners and holders of land under Connecticut titles in Suffolk County, Long Island, who were the very earliest to obtain new grants and patents from the Duke of York. The towns there took out patents from the Duke, with extreme reluctance, but they did it, nevertheless. Among these patents were that of Smithtown to Richard Smith of the 3d of March, 1665, that for Gardiner's Island in the same year, and that for Shelter Island to the Sylvesters of June 1st, 1666.

The principle just mentioned was essentially modified in its application by two things. It was limited by the terms of the Articles of Surrender, which bound the conqueror as well as the conquered. And it was also limited by that rule of the law of nations, which provides that the ancient laws of a conquered people remain in force till changed by the conqueror.

Under these instruments and principles the rule of England, and the Lord Proprietorship of the Duke of York had its beginning in the "Province of New York in America." That Proprietorship lasted twenty-one years, (excepting only the fifteen months of the Dutch reconquest), ending on the 6th of February, 1685, on which day, by the death of his brother, King Charles, the Duke became James the Second, King of England. His Proprietary rights merging in those of the Crown on his accession to the throne, New York became thenceforward a Royal Province under a Royal Government, uncontrolled by any charter. From that time till the close of the American Revolution by the Peace of 1783, she so remained, the freest and most flourishing of all the British American Provinces, ruled by her own people, enacting her own laws, supporting her own government and local institutions by taxation imposed by her own elected Legislature, and by her own parish, town, and county authorities.

[1] See Patent.

The slight interruption, by the Dutch reconquest from the 9th of August, 1673, to the 10th of November, 1674, did not, except for the time being, change the character of the Proprietorship of the Duke of York in point of fact. But as the Province was restored by the Dutch to England as a conquest under a treaty and a formal surrender of it pursuant to such treaty, the crown lawyers in England held that the Dutch reconquest in 1673 terminated the Duke's Proprietorship; and that the renamed Province of New Netherland was vested anew in Charles the Second as King solely by the treaty of Westminster in 1674. Therefore a new Patent was granted by the King to the Duke on the 29th of June, 1674. It was almost in the same words as the first, vesting him again with the same sweeping and absolute rights and powers, but not mentioning the first Patent nor referring to it in any way. The object of this second Patent was to cure the defect in the first, that it was signed, sealed, and delivered, while the Dutch were in actual possession of the territory it described, and therefore it was, by the law of England, void; and was not subsequently confirmed by Charles the Second after the title was really vested in him in 1677, by the treaty of Breda. Had Charles made such a confirmation, no second Patent would have been required.

The new Patent of 1674, on its face was an original grant, but in fact it simply revested the Duke with all the rights, powers, jurisdiction and territory he possessed under the Patent of 1664.

These facts are distinctly stated, because the validity of the confirmations of all Dutch groundbriefs, transports, and other grants, and all subsequent English grants during the Proprietorship of the Duke of York, and the later Royal Government, as well as those originally made by Connecticut authorities on Long Island, and subsequently confirmed by the Duke, rests upon them.

The tenure by which the Duke of York held his Province in New York was allodial in its nature.

In this respect it was the same as that under which, as has previously been shown, the Dutch West India Company held New Netherland under their charter, and the Patroons held their Patroonships under the different "Freedoms and Exemptions." But it was not to follow a good Dutch example, that this tenure was granted by the King and accepted by the Duke, but because the law of England had then been recently changed, and neither King nor Duke could do otherwise, even if they wished, of which there is no evidence. Four years before New York was given by the King to the Duke, and its surrender by the Dutch, the Parliament of England had passed that Great Act, second only to Magna Charta itself,—if it was second,—in its effect on English liberty, and the rights of English subjects, the act abolishing feudal tenures, and all their oppressive incidents forever throughout the realm.

This was the famous "12 Charles II, cap. 24," and its title is, "An Act taking away the Court of Wards and Liveries, and Tenures in Capite, and by Knight Service, and Purveyance, and for settling a Revenue upon his Majesty in lieu thereof." It swept away, at one blow, all the grievous feudal military tenures, their great exactions, and the means possessed by the monarch for enforcing them, as well as all charges payable to the King, or any lord paramount under him, arising therefrom; and prohibited their creation afterward, forever. After the clauses of abolition, the act continues,—"And all tenures of any honours, manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, of any estate of inheritance at the common law, held either of the King, or of any other person, or persons, bodies politic or corporate, are hereby enacted to be turned into free and common socage, . . . any law, custom, or usage to the contrary hereof in any way notwithstanding."[1] The fourth section provided. "That all tenures hereafter to be created by the King's Majesty, his heirs or successors, upon any gifts or grants of any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, of any estate of inheritance at the common law, shall be in free and common socage only, . . . and not by Knight Service or in Capite."

As this abolition deprived the King of large revenues, and the means of supporting his military, and other governmental expenses, the act granted to him as a recompense duties upon beer, ale, and other articles in common use.[2]

It is thus seen not only that there were no feudal rights nor privileges granted in New York to the Duke of York by his Patents, but that the King had no power whatever to grant any to him, or to anybody else. And none ever were granted by any British Sovereign, or British Governor, in that Province. The rights and privileges contained in the subsequent Manor grants in New York, were simply those appertaining to, and consistent with, the free socage tenure on which they were granted, and under which they were held.

This allodial tenure of land, though it has been formerly referred to under the Roman Dutch legal system of New Netherland, may now be more fully described, as it was also the tenure by which all lands in New York under the English system were held.

---

[1] Section 1 of the act.

[2] "Up to the passage of this act, every free land-owner was burdened with military service, which was not considered an incident of tenure, but a duty to the State." Digby's Law of Real Property, 20. Hence, the substitution of taxation in lieu of military service by this act, is the foundation of governmental support by taxation, both in England and America, and of the existing systems of taxation in both countries. The military tenures "were sold, or released to the country in consideration of the hereditary revenue of excise by the Statute, 12 ch. 2, c. 24." Fourth Report of the English Law Commissioners, 110.

The law of land both in Holland and England was of Teutonic origin. In the former country it was modified earlier than in the latter by the conquest by the Romans, and the introduction of the Roman Law, and at a later period in each, by the introduction of the Canon Law. The Teutonic idea of property in land was based on its conquest by a body of men under a leader or chief,—a successful barbaric invasion. The land so won was considered the common property of its captors, not of the leader alone. He, as chief, had the regulation of the distribution of the conquest among the conquerors, and of the cultivation of the land by the distributees who received it. As he was the leader of this community in war so he was its head in time of peace.

The land thus belonging to the community was in both Holland and England considered as what we should now call "public land." Among the Saxons it was called "folcland," that is, land of the folk, or people. As civilization progressed and Christianity was introduced, the band of barbaric invaders, or tribe, adopted, of necessity, a political organization. The leader became a chief of a district or principality, or king of a petty kingdom; his followers became his supporters or subjects; and the land was made the source of revenue, by its being given in separate parcels to individuals in severalty as their private property. Lands so given were granted by a written "book" as it was termed, which was a deed or charter, delivered to the grantee, and it was then said to be "booked" to him, from which it was called "bocland," that is, booked land. This "book," or grant, stated that the grantee was to hold the land free from all burdens and from any services or money payment, except three,—military aid in case of invasion, manual, or money aid in the repairing of fortresses, and in the repairing of bridges, which duties were borne by all landholders indiscriminately, and was termed the trinoda necessitas, or threefold obligation. This military aid, was simply the liability to be called on to defend the country in case of attack, and not the tenure by knight service under the feudal system, which tenure was unknown in England till after the Norman conquest. Thus before that event all land in England was either 'folcland" or "bocland."[1]

All land not made 'bocland' remained 'folcland' and was held in common by the community. Later it became vested in the chief, as its head man, and subject to his control. "Nearly, if not quite coextensive with the conception of "bocland," says Digby, "was that of allodial land. The term 'alod,' allodial, did not, however, have any necessary reference to the mode in which the ownership of land had been conferred; it simply meant, land held in absolute ownership, not in dependence upon any other body or person in whom the proprietary rights were supposed to reside, or to whom the possessor of the land was bound to render service."[2] It was another name for 'bocland' and signified that it was devisable by will, and in case of intestacy was divisible among children equally.' It could be freely sold at pleasure by its possessor; or its beneficial enjoyment could be granted by him for a longer or shorter term, at the end of which it reverted to him or his heirs; when this last disposition of it was made it was called "laenland," literally loan land, or in modern parlance leased land.

The success of the Norman Conquest of England changed almost entirely these early allodial tenures. William the Conqueror introduced the military tenure of "Knight-service" or "in chivalry," with all its feudal attributes and exactions, which had come into vogue in the western and southern portions of the European continent. That system with its correlative rights of protection by the King or the lord, and of service as soldiers by the tenants or vassals, carried down through all classes of society from the highest to the lowest, termed the feudal system, thus introduced, became the basis of the English land system and land law. From William of Normandy to Charles the Second, gradually developed in the earliest reigns of the Norman Kings to its fullest extent, its principles governed English land, English law, and English thought, until the enactment of the statute of 1660 in the twelfth year of Charles the Second abolished feudalism forever, practically restored the old Saxon allodial tenures, and turned to freedom the mind of England. "Perhaps," said that most learned chief justice of Massachusetts, James Sullivan, in 1801, then that State's Attorney-General, "the English Nation are more indebted to this one act for the share of liberty they have enjoyed for a century and a half past, and for the democratic principles by that law retained in their government, than to Magna Charta, and all the other instruments of which they boast."[3]

To show how entirely different the "feudal system" was from the systems introduced into New York by the Dutch and English; and how erroneous have been, and are, the views that have been expressed by American, and New England, as well as New York, writers, respecting the latter, it will be well to recur to what "feudalism" really was.

Scarcely any subject of an historical nature has been more fully and thoroughly investigated, studied, and written upon, in late years, by modern historical scholars than this. Germany, France, and England, have each produced writers who have given to the world the results of searches and investigations of the most exhaustive character; von Maurer, Waitz, Eichorn, Roth, and Richter, in the former, Guizot,

[1] Digby's Hist. Law of Real Property, Ch. I. Sect. 1.

[2] The word "alod" (Latinized into allodium, whence the English "allodial") does not occur in Anglo Saxon documents before the eleventh century, when it appears in the Latin of Canute's laws in the Colbertine MS. as the equivalent of "bocland" or "hereditas." Stubbs Cons. Hist. 76, n.

[3] Hist. Land Titles in Mass. 52.

Thierry, Sismondi, Lavelèye in France, and Palgrave, Austin, Freeman, Digby, Maine, and Stubbs in England. The latter, the latest writer on this subject, has treated it so fully, that a short statement almost in his own words will make the matter clear.

Feudalism was of distinctly Frank growth. The principle which underlies it may be universal, but its historic development may be traced step by step under Frank influence, from its first appearance on the conquered soil of Roman Gaul to its full development in the jurisprudence of the Middle Ages. As it existed in England, it was brought full grown from France at the Norman Conquest;[1] and "it may be described as a complete organization of society through the medium of land tenure, in which from the King down to the lowest land owner all are bound together by obligation of service and defence: the lord to protect his vassal, the vassal to do service to his lord; the defence and service being based on, and regulated by, the nature and extent of the land held by the one or the other. As it developed territorially, the rights of defence and service were supplemented by the right of jurisdiction. The lord judges, as well as defends, his vassal; the vassal does suit as well as service to his lord. In States in which feudal government has reached its utmost growth, the political, financial, judicial, every branch of public administration, is regulated by the same conditions. The central authority is a mere shadow of a name.[2]

It grew up from two sources, the beneficiary system and the practice of commendation. "The system testifies to the country and causes of its birth. The beneficium is partly of Roman and partly of German origin.[3] In the Roman system the usufruct, the occupation of land belonging to another person, involved no diminution of the status (the condition) of the occupier; in the Germanic system he who tilled land that was not his own was imperfectly free. Commendation on the other hand may have had a Gallic or Celtic origin, and an analogy only with the Roman clientship."[4]

"The beneficiary system originated partly in gifts of land made by the kings out of their own estates to their kinsmen and servants with a special undertaking to be faithful, partly in the surrender by the landowners of their estates to churches or powerful men to be received back again and held by them as tenants for rent or service. By the latter arrangement the weaker man obtained the protection of the stronger, and he who felt himself insecure placed his title under the defence of the church. By the practice of commendation, on the other hand, the inferior put himself under the personal care of a lord [that is, commended himself to him, hence the term] but without altering his title, or divesting himself of his right to his estate; he became a vassal and did homage. The placing of his hands between those of his lord was the typical act by which the connexion was formed. And the oath of fealty [faithfulness] was taken at the same time. The union of the beneficiary tie with that of commendation completed the idea of feudal obligation; the twofold tie on the land, that of the lord and that of the vassal, was supplemented by the twofold engagement, that of the lord to defend, and that of the vassal to be faithful."[5] This oath of 'fealty' and wherein it differed from 'homage' may be explained best in the words ot Littleton, "Fealty is the same that fidelitas is in Latine. And when a freeholder doth fealty to his lord he shall hold his right hand upon a booke (a Bible) and shall say thus: Know ye this my lord, that I shall be faithfull and true unto you, and faith to you shall beare forthe lands which I claime to hold of you, and that I shall lawfully doe to you the customs and services which I ought to doe, at the termes assigned, so help me God and his Saints; and he shall kisse the booke. But he shall not kneel when he maketh his fealty, nor shall make such humble reverence as is aforesaid in homage.[6]

The practice of commendation became so very general, that in the words of Sir Henry Maine, it "went on all over Europe with singular universality of operation, and singular uniformity of result, and it helped to transform the ancient structure of Teutonic society no less than the institutions of the Roman Provincials."[7] It was one of the leading causes of the universality of feudalism in Europe.

Well writes one of the most distinguished living jurists of New York, on this subject,—

"Feudalism is compounded of barbaric usage and Roman law. While it resembled in some respects a Hindoo village community, it is in other respects quite different. The Hindoo communities gathered together by instinct, and new comers were introduced by fiction. The feudal obligation was created by contract. The feudal communities were, for this reason, more durable and varied in character than the ancient societies. Some would hold that the variety of Modern Civilization is due to the exuberant and erratic genius of Germanic races. In opposition to this error, it may be asserted that the Roman Empire bequeathed to society the legal conception to which all this variety is attributable. The one striking and

[1] Freeman in his fifth volume denies this in his usual self-sufficient manner, and attacks "lawyers" for saying so, very fiercely. But before he ends that chapter he confines his words to governmental matters, and really admits that "the lawyers" were right after all as to the tenures.

[2] I. Stubbs' Cons. Hist., 252.

[3] The beneficia, or benefices, were "grants of Roman provincial land by the chieftains of the tribes which overran the Roman Empire; such grants being conferred on their associates upon certain conditions, of which the commonest was military service." Maine's Village Communities, 132. The same writer also says, "that in the ineradicable tendencies of the Teutonic race, to the hereditary principle, the benefices became descendible from father to son."

[4] I. Stubbs' Cons. Hist. 254.

[5] I. Stubbs, 252.

[6] Co. Litt., chap. II. sect. 91.

[7] Hist. of Institutions, 155

characteristic fact in the customs and institutions of barbaric races is their extreme uniformity."[1]

The effect of feudalism on the society of the era in which it existed, was two fold. It repressed and harshly kept down the personal rights and freedom of what in our day we now term "the masses," but it also gave rise to, maintained, and established in those who then ruled the masses of that day, those feelings, rules of conduct, and principles of action, to which are really due the vastly higher general civilization of both classes of people at this era. If we investigate feudalism in its social aspects, in the words of the late chief justice of Ceylon, "we shall find ample cause for the inextinguishable hatred with which, as Guizot truly states in History of Civilization in Europe, it has ever been regarded by the common people. But this ought not to make us blind to its brighter features. There was much in feudalism, especially as developed in the institutions of chivalry, that was pure and graceful and generous. It ever acknowledged the high social position of woman, it zealously protected her honour. It favoured the growth of domestic attachments, and the influence of family associations. It fostered literature and science. It kept up a feeling of independence, and a spirit of adventurous energy. Above all, it paid homage to the virtues of Courage and Truth in man, and of Affection and Constancy in woman."[2]

Such was the feudal system in reality, its origin and principles. As a system of land tenure, or of government, it not only never existed in the Province of New York, but it was absolutely the opposite of the systems of both which were there established. No lord paramount, either as Duke of York, or as a Lord of a Manor, was ever known within this State while an English Province. The former was a Proprietor only, as William Penn and Lord Baltimore were, in Pennsylvania and in Maryland. The latter was an owner in fee with no powers, rights or privileges, but those appurtenant to, and consistent with, the freest allodial tenure. Moreover, it not only never existed, but it could not possibly have existed in New York. For it was prohibited by the statute law within the realm of England four years before New York became an integral part of the dominions of that realm.

What then was the tenure described, "as of our mannor of East Greenwich and our County of Kent in free and common soccage and not in capite or by Knight service, upon which the Province of New York was holden under his grant from the King of England by the Duke of York as Lord Proprietor?"

Socage[3] tenure was a holding of lands by a certain service or rent. Certainty as opposed to the uncertainty of tenure by Knight service, or as sometimes styled, "in chivalry," was for its essence. It made no matter what the service, or rent, was, so long as it was absolutely certain. It might be by ploughing lands for a fixed number of days at a time fixed, or it might be for a fixed annual rent, payable either in cattle, produce or in money, or it might be by homage, fealty, and a fixed money rent, in lieu of all manner of services, or by fealty only in lieu of every other service.[4] This inherent element of certainty was what gave this tenure its power, and has made it the only tenure by which, in different forms and under different modifications, and under systems based upon its principles, lands are now held in the English-speaking nations of the world.

Property in land has a double origin. "It has arisen," in the words of Maine, "partly from the disentanglement of the individual rights of the kindred or tribesmen, from the collective rights of the Family or Tribe, and partly from the growth and transmutation of the Sovereignty of the Tribal Chief. . . . Both the sovereignty of the Chief and the ownership of land by the Family or Tribe were in most of Western Europe passed through the crucible of feudalism; but the first re-appeared in some well-marked characteristics of military or Knightly tenures, and the last in the principle rules of non-noble holdings, and among them of Socage, the distinctive tenure of the free farmer."[5] Its essential character was "its liability to rents and services due, not to the State, but to the grantor, who in most cases was the lord of the manor, holding under a charter (meaning a grant or patent) given or confirmed by the crown."[6] The word socage is generally believed to have been derived from "soca" a plough. It was "originally applied only to husbandmen who owed fixed services for husbandry. Where these rustic services had not been commuted for a money rent the tenure was called 'villein socage,'[7] as distinguished from 'free and common socage.'[8] In Knight-service tenure, and in the spiritual tenure of Francalmoigne or Free Alms, that is freedom from all earthly services [on which churches, abbeys, and cathedrals, in England held and still hold so many of their lands], and in all the military tenures the services were uncertain: from all other free tenants of lands a fixed amount of service, or rent, was due, and their tenures were included in the general name of socage[9]

It was a free tenure, the land a freehold, and the

[1] Dwight's Introduction to the American edition of Maine's Ancient Law, LXIV.

[2] Sir E. Creary's Rise of the British Constitution, 83.

[3] The word is now spelled with one "c" only.

[4] Litt. ch. 5, Sect. 117, 85a; Reeve's Hist. 3d vol. ch. xxi. 495; I. Francis Sullivan's Lectures on the Laws of England, 157; Christian's Blackstone, ii. 81, n 1; Sullivan's Mass. Land Titles, 34; Maine's Hist. Inst., 120; Stubbs' Cons. Hist., 549.

[5] Maine's Hist. Inst'ns., 120.

[6] Elton's Tenures of Kent, 29.

[7] A villein was an inhabitant of a villa, the ancient name of a farm, and in the earliest times was attached to it permanently. And as many villas were included in a manor, it had often many villeins. These villeins gradually came to be allowed to hold parcels of land, on condition of manuring, or ploughing the lord's demesne lands, or on base or rustic services. Hence arose the tenure termed villein-socage.

[8] Elton's Law of Copyholds, 3, note b.

[9] Ib. 3.

holder a freeman, because he, as well as the land, was entirely free from all exactions, and from all rents and services except those specified in his grant. So long as these last were paid or performed, no lord or other power could deprive him of his land, and he could devise it by will, and in case of his death, intestate, it could be divided among his sons equally.[1]

At a later period, after the Norman conquest, this latter quality of the tenure became changed by the introduction of the principle of primogeniture in all parts of England; a principle of Teutonic origin, and one necessary to the maintenance of the feudal system as a military system. One of the parts of England which, at the time of its conquest, first submitted peaceably to William of Normandy, was the Saxon Kingdom of Kent, afterward, and now, the County of Kent, the southeastern extremity of England. In consequence of this action the Norman king confirmed its inhabitants in all their ancient laws and liberties. "Kent was firmly attached to the Conqueror by the treaty, which he never broke, that the law of Kent should not be changed.[2]

One of the provisions of the law of Kent was the custom or tenure of 'Gafolcund' or 'Gavelkind,' one of the most ancient of the free socage tenures, by which the greater portion of that county was then, and is now held.

According to this ancient relic of the early Saxon law, the land descended to all the sons equally, was usually devisable by will, did not escheat in case of attainder and execution for felony, and could be aliened by the tenant at the age of fifteen.[3] It was a freeman's tenure, and so general, though not universal, in the county, that it was considered by the common law of England, and judicially taken notice of by the King's Courts as the "common law of Kent." The only instance in all England of a county having a different common law from the rest of the Kingdom. And it so continues to this day. Much of its area originally gavelkind has been changed by special acts of parliament, or, as it was termed, 'disgaveled,' and thus made knight service land and subject to the law of primogeniture.[4] The name is derived from the Saxon word 'gafol,' or 'gavel,' [the pronunciation of the words being similar in sound] which was the Saxon word for rent, "including in that term money, labor, and provisions."[5] Gavelkind land therefore means primarily rented land with the privileges above stated.

One of the Manors of the Crown of England was that of East Greenwich in this favored County of Kent which had never been reduced to the new military tenures brought in by the Norman Conqueror, and owed no claim for suit or services or other obligation than that of fealty and allegiance.[6] Hence it was that when the tenure of the British grants in America came to be settled, it was described as of our Manor of East Greenwich in the County of Kent, that manor being held only "in free and common soccage." The object being to give to the new possessions in America the most favorable tenure then known to English law.

The fixed "service" or "rent" on which New York was held in socage by the Duke of York was the yearly payment of "forty beaver skins when they shall be demanded or in ninety days after." When the Duke became King in 1685, this nominal rent ceased and he held the Province from that date as Sovereign of England. And under him and his successors, from that year until the peace of 1783, by virtue of this fact New York continued to be a Royal Province, under Royal Governors commissioned by its English monarchs under their signs manual.

As such representatives of their Sovereigns were all grants, of Manors, and other great, and small, tracts of land, made by the Governors of New York as long as New York continued to be a British Province. The tenure of all was the same as that in the Patents from Charles II. to the Duke of York, "in free and common socage as of our manor of East Greenwich in County of Kent." The fixed services or rents varied, but were merely nominal in all cases. In some of the minor incidents of the grants of manors, and of lands not manors, they also varied, but the important thing, the tenure itself, was the same in all. When William and Mary directed their Governor to call General Assemblies, with the advice and consent of the Council, and the first Assembly held in New York, under those sovereigns, met in April, 1691, that Assembly, in the second act it passed, declaring the rights and privileges of their Majesties' subjects to their Province of New York, enacted "That all the Lands within the Province, shall be esteemed and accounted Land of Freehold and Inheritance, in free and common Soccage, according to the tenor of East Greenwich in their Majesties' Realm of England."[7] And it is owing to these facts that this subject has been so fully dwelt upon, dry as it must necessarily be to the general reader.

The confirmations by the English Governors of the Dutch groundbriefs, transports, and other grants, were rendered necessary, by the change of the Sovereign Power. The Dutch instruments, under the Dutch law, it will be remembered, required their grantees to take the oaths of allegiance to the West India Company and to the States-General of the United Provinces. Of course when the country became a British possession, and the Duke of York became its Lord Proprietor, the terms on which the Dutch grantees held their lands required to be changed in this respect, so as to

[1] Digby, 72. [2] Elton's Tenures of Kent, 72.
[3] Digby's Hist. Real Property, 38, n. 2.
[4] Elton's Tenures of Kent passim. [5] Ibid 29.
[6] Sullivan's Mass. Land Titles, 69.
[7] II. Bradford's Laws, N. Y., ed. 1710, p. 4.

conform to the actual change of the owners of the ulterior sovereign right of eminent domain.

This was provided for in that very ably drawn, liberal, and just "Code of Laws," enacted and promulgated at the first meeting of delegates of the people of the Towns of the Province of New York under the English rule, held at Hempstead, in Queens County, on June 24th, 1665, nine months only after the Dutch surrender, known as "The Duke's Laws." This code, the earliest of the codes of New York, full, clear, and complete, is well arranged in an alphabetical division of its subjects. Under the heading "Lands," is this provision, "To the end all former Purchases may be ascertained to the present possessor or right owner, They shall bring in their former Grants, and take out new Pattents for the same from the present Governoure in the behalf of his Royall Highness the Duke of Yorke;" then after directing the making and filing of a survey and map within a year from the date of a purchase, the law continues, "Every Purchaser in acknowledgment of the propriety of such Lands belonging to his Royal Highness James Duke of York, shall upon the sealing of the Pattent Pay unto the Governoure so much as they shall agree upon; not exceeding hundred acres." Some amendments and alterations were made to this code pursuant to its own provisions at a meeting of the Court of General Assizes[1] held in the City of New York at the close of September, 1665, three months later, one of which re-enacts the last cited clause in these more definite words,—"To the end all former Purchases &c, all persons whatsoever who have any Grants or Patents of Towneshipps, Lands, or Houses, within this Government, shall bring in the said Grants or Patents to the Governoure and shall have them Revewed by Authority from his Royall Highness the Duke of Yorke, before the beginninge of the next Court of Assizes.[2] That every purchaser &c. shall pay for every hundred acres as an acknowledgment two Shillings and six pence.[3]

This law and this sum marked the beginning of the Quit-rents and their amount or rate paid ever after to the King, and subsequently to the American Revolution to the State, and which only terminated under the State Quit-rent statute of 1815, which commuted them all for gross sums of money, as will be fully explained hereafter.

Governor Lovelace sent a report to the Duke of York on the state of the Province, undated, but which is believed to have been made early in 1669, the year after his arrival in New York. In this he says: "The Tenure of Lands is derived from his Royall Highness who gives and grants Lands to Planters as their freehold forever, they paying the customary rents and duties with others toward the Defraying of the Publique Charges. The highest Rent, or acknowledgment of his R. H., will be one penny per acre for Lands purchased by his R. H., the least two shillings six pence for each hundred acres, whereof the Planters themselves are purchasers from the Indyans."[4]

In the year 1666 the "General Court of Assizes" made an order, that all persons who had old patents should bring them in to be renewed, and they that had none should be supplied therewith by a certain time therein limited. A proclamation of the Governor dated at Fort James the 1st of July, 1669, to "the Inhabitants about Delaware" shows us very clearly what this order meant. After quoting the order, it continues in these words: "Which said order did extend itself to Albany, Esopus, and all other places of the Governm^{t}, as well as this City and more particularly to all those who had beene under the Dutch, and are now reduced to his Majesties obedience.' These presents doe declare and make Knowne that the Inhabitants in and about Delaware being under this Governm^{t} are likewise concerned as well as the rest; So that all persons there who hould their lands by Patent or ground briefs of y^{e} Dutch Tenure are to have their Patents renewed. And those who have none are with all conveniente speed to bee supplyede therewith, otherwise they are liable to incurre the penaltye in the Law set forth."[5]

The terms on which the new Patents of Confirmation were granted were very liberal. So much so as to explode the idea indulged in by many writers that the sole object was to extort fees. The evidence is conclusive. The mayor and aldermen of New York presented a petition of inquiry to the Court of Assizes on this subject. In this Court it will be remembered the Governor presided. In the proceedings of the Court in the Assize Book, under date of March 25, 1667, two years prior to the proclamation just cited, is Governor Nicolls' reply to this petition in the form of six specific entries. They are as follows, (the contractions in the original being plainly written out).

"1. The reason for renewing all former groundbriefs was, and is, to abolish the express conditions contained in every one of them, to hold their lands and houses from and under the States of Holland and the West India Company in Amsterdam as their Lords and Masters.

"2. Whoever shall bring a certificate from the mayor, or deputy mayor, or two aldermen of his incapacity shall pay nothing for renewing an old or granting a new patent.

"3. No man shall pay more than a beaver for a new patent and all the transports depending thereupon. If any person shall desire his own transport to be converted into a patent, it shall be done for 3 guilders in beaver.

[1] This court combined judicial and legislative powers, and was created by the code itself.

[2] This court sat annually in September.

[3] The Duke's Laws, I. N. Y. H. Coll., 359 and 410.

[4] III. Col. Hist. N. Y. 188.

[5] XII. Col. Hist. 463.

"4. Where the original groundbrief of several transports cannot be found each transport shall be confirmed for 3 guilders.[1]

"5. If any man have 2, 3, or more ground briefs of small parcels of land they shall be comprised in one confirmation at the half price allowed by the Court.

"6. The Mayor and Alderman to draw up a list of houses and lots belonging to persons now in Holland or else where not in amity; nor under allegiance to his Majesty of Great Britain who are deprived of the benefit hereof.

As the time allowed for bringing in the said ground briefs is almost expired the Governor suspends the penalty for not bringing them in at or before the 1st April next until the 1st May this present year, 1667."

Surely more favorable or easier terms could not have been promulgated.

Such, in brief, was the nature of the tenure of land established in New York when the Province came under English rule. It was fortunate that that event was almost simultaneous with the greatest change in the law of England since the days of King John. That change really gave to New York the freehold, partible, and perfectly alienable, land system, which, with slight modifications, has existed from that day to this, and under which her population has increased from the 10,000 souls in the last year of Director Stuyvesant to the 5,000,000 people over whom Governor Hill now rules in this year of grace 1886.

9.

The Manors in New York, what they were not, and what they were.

What were the Manors which existed in New York? What were those in the County of Westchester? To answer these questions, the origin and nature of Manors, especially those of England, all of which were created prior to the 18th year of the reign of Edward I. (Anno 1290), must be considered. The statute of Edward, called "of Westminster," or "Quia emptores" from its first two words, "in the year 1290 put an end forever to New Manors in England."[2] Those Manors were feudal Manors, of the kind already alluded to, those erected in New York, four hundred years later were freehold Manors. Their difference, and why Manors could be erected in New York, and not in England will be shown.

"It has often been noticed," says Sir Henry Maine, "that a Feudal Monarchy was an exact counterpart of a Feudal Manor,[3] but the reason of the correspondence is only now beginning to dawn upon us, which is, that both of them were in their origin bodies of assumed kinsmen settled on land and undergoing the same transmutation of ideas through the fact of settlement. The history of the larger groups ends in the Modern Notions of Country and Sovereignty; the history of the smaller in the Modern Notions of Landed Property. The two courses of historical development were for a long while strictly parallel, though they have ceased to be so now."[4] It is not possible in the limits of this essay to describe, except in outline, the various steps and changes by which the barbarian Teutonic leader and his followers, developed into the family or tribal ruler and his kindred by blood or by tribe settled upon the land which they had seized, and which they retained as their own. How strong, how natural, and how general, was this principle of a specific land-settlement on the basis of kinship by blood or by tribe, is proven by the examples which now exist in three continents at this day. The more prominent of which are, the clans of Scotland, the Septs of Ireland, the Slav tribes of the Balkan regions, in Europe, the Hindoo Joint-Families of British Asia, and the native Indian tribes of North America.

Out of the tribal settlement on a fixed district of land came the Teutonic village or town. This was "an organized, self acting group of Teutonic families exercising a common proprietorship over a definite tract of land,—its Mark,—cultivating its domain on a common system, and sustaining itself by the produce."[5] It had its separate households, each governed by the father of a family, and each entirely free from any interference by anybody else. Its master was supreme, and from this feature, continually preserved and maintained to this day, comes the familiar principle of English and American law, that "every man's house is his castle." These groups of families, or societies, with their Leader, or Headman, were often involved in disputes, with neighboring societies and their families and Headmen. And to this fact of native Teutonic quarrelsomeness the German investigators and writers ascribe the change (which took place gradually) that evolved the manor from the Mark. "One community conquers another and the spoil of war is either the common Mark (the part of the district cultivated in common), or the waste (the uncultivated part), of the worsted community. Either the conquerors appropriate and colonize the part of the waste so taken, or they take the whole domain and restore it to be held in dependence on the victor society."[6] This was the origin of the idea of suzerainty or lordship. Another cause of the change from this Mark system to the manorial system, the German writers say, was the fact, that these Teutonic village societies, "though their organization can only be described as democratic, appear, nevertheless, to have

[1] It will be remembered that under the Dutch system, the "groundbrief" was the license to buy of the Indians, and the "transport" the deed of the Director and Council for the land after the purchase of the natives had been made.

[2] Gneist's Const. History of England, 148.

[3] A similar statement is found in West's Manner of Creating Peers, p. 10. Cruise on Dignities, p. 13.

[4] Hist. Inst. 77.

[5] Von Maurer cited by Maine, Vill. Com. 10, with approval.

[6] Maine's Vill. Com. 143.

generally had an abiding tradition that in some one family, or in some families, the blood which ran in the veins of all the freemen was purest; probably because the direct descent of such family, or families, from a common ancestor was remembered or believed in.

From the members of these families the leader for a military expedition would, as a rule, be chosen, and the power he would thus acquire "would be a combination of political, military, and judicial, power." This leader, "thus taken from the privileged family would have the largest share of the lands appropriated from the conquered village societies; and there is ground for supposing that he was sometimes rewarded by an exceptionally large share of the common land belonging to the society which he headed." Another privilege which the leading family and its chief obtained, was the power "to sever his own plot of land from the rest, and, if he thought fit, to enclose it; and thus break up or enfeeble that system of common cultivation under rules of obligatory custom which depended mainly on the concurrence of all the villagers."[1] Add to this the inherent tendency of the Teutonic mind to the principle of primogeniture, and we have the basis of what is known as the manorial system. Transplanted into England by its early German invaders this inchoate manorial system took root and existed under the Saxon domination till the days of Harold. At the Norman conquest, which, as we have seen, brought full-grown to England the Feudal System, William of Normandy had little difficulty in engrafting it upon the existing Saxon system, or rather in transforming that system into Norman Feudalism, which was that of France and Continental Europe.

Such is the view, of the latest historians, and most learned writers, on this subject. A view most tersely summed up by Sir Henry Maine, "our modern English conception of absolute property in land is really descended from the special proprietorship enjoyed by the Lord, and more anciently by the tribal chief, in his own Domain."[2] "Manors," Sir William Blackstone, tells us "are in substance as ancient as the Saxon Constitution, though perhaps differing a little in some immaterial circumstances from those which exist at this day; just as we observed of feuds, that they were partly known to our ancestors, even before the Norman Conquest."[3]

Originating before the feudal system itself, that system when it became fully developed and consolidated in England under its Norman Kings, gave its own coloring and imparted its own features to the manor land-system of the England of the Saxons.

The impression is very common, especially in America, that the Manor system is purely of feudal origin. Writers who have referred to the New York manors, as a rule, describe them as the same as the feudal manors of England. Not aware that manors have not been created in England since 1290, not aware that the law of England at the time of the wresting of New Netherland from the Dutch, prohibited the existence in the New Province of New York of feudal Manors, they have indulged, and do indulge, in a great deal of fine, and sometimes indignant, writing on this subject, which had, and has, no real basis whatever.

The word 'Manor' is an English corruption of the French word, 'Manoir,' a habitation, or mansion, in which the owner of land dwelt permanently; and that is derived from the Latin verb 'Maneo,' to remain, to abide in a place, to dwell there. In Latin a Manor was termed 'Manerium' which signifies the same as the French 'Manoir.' It has, however, been stated to be a synonym of 'Manurium,' because it was labored by handy work,[4] 'Manus' being the Latin for 'hand;' but this signification is very doubtful. Ellis in his introduction to Domesday Book, the Great Survey of the Lands of England made by order of William the Conqueror,[5] says, that the earliest appearance of the word Manor in England was in the reign of Edward the Confessor who was fond of introducing Norman language and customs.

In that famous survey the words 'mansio,' 'villa,' and 'manerium,' are synonymous. "The conquest," Mr. Digby states, probably wrought but little change in the relation of Saxon supreme land owners, or lords of districts, and the tenants holding small parcels of land under them. "A Norman lord might be substituted for a Saxon, but the dues and services would substantially continue the same. . . . After the Conquest, England is [found] parcelled out into manors varying greatly in size, having, as a rule, fixed boundaries, often coinciding, as is still the case at the present day, with the boundaries of the parish. In some cases manors were diminished or added to, and new ones created. Probably however there was no great addition after the Conquest to the number of Manors."[6] In the reigns of the later Saxon Kings, those subsequent to Alfred, the English Commissioners on the Law of Real Property tell us, "that portions of the royal domains, with jurisdiction were granted, and afterwards jurisdiction was granted although the land might never have belonged to the King. The objects of these grants were lay favorites or monastic houses, and the operation of them was to invest the grantees with the power of judging the people dwelling in their territory. The courts for this purpose were framed after the ordinary model. The lord or a deputy presided, and the tenants and suitors formed the jury. They were commonly held in the hall of the lord's house, and were thence called Hallmotes." The words which granted this jurisdiction "were saca, soca, and theime, of which one of the

[1] Maine Vill. Com. 1215, and 146. [2] Hist. Ins. 126.
[3] II. Christian's Blackstone, 90.
[4] Tomlins, 518. Tower's Law Dict. "Manors."
[5] P. 2.5. [6] Digby 34,35.

laws supplies us with the interpretation. Saca, meant the privilege of administering justice locally; soca, the territory or franchise in which the privilege was to be exercised; theime,[1] the seignorial jurisdiction." "It will be obvious to every one's mind that this species of local and private jurisdiction is what we now call a Manor. The substance of a manor is therefore justly said by Mr. Ellis to be as ancient as the Saxon constitution; and the lord having soc and sac over his own men, and the baron holding his own court for his own men, were the same characters as were afterwards termed lords of Manors. The word manor was not however applied in pure Saxon times; nor perhaps were all the laws and usages such as we now have them."[2]

The ancient manor as it became consolidated in the eleventh and twelfth centuries is thus defined and described by that "reverend Judge eminently knowing in the common and statute law, William Rastall"[3] in his famous book on the Terms of the Law:—"Mannor is compounded of divers things; as of a House, Arable Land, Pasture, Meadow, Wood, Rent, Advowson, Court's Baron, and such like which make a Mannor. And this ought to be by long continuance of time, the contrary whereof man's memory cannot discern; for at this day a Mannor cannot be made because a Court-Baron cannot be made, and a Mannor cannot be without a Court-Baron and Suitors and Freeholders, two at the least; for if all the Freeholds except one escheat to the Lord, or if he purchase all except one, there his Mannor is gone, for that it cannot be a Mannor without a Court Baron (as is aforesaid) and a Court-Baron cannot be holden but before Suitors, and not before one Suitor; and therefore where but one Freehold or Freeholder is, there cannot be a Mannor properly, although in common speech it may be so called.

Mansion (Mansio) is most commonly taken for the Chief Messuage or habitation of the Lord of a Mannor, the Mannor-House where he doth most reside, his Capital Messuage as it is called; of which the wife by the Statute of Magna Charta, chapter 7. shall have her Quarantine."[4]

It will be noticed that in this description the Court-Leet is not mentioned. This is because, though it existed in every Manor, it was not of its essence as the Court-Baron was. The Court-Leet was a Sheriff's court and had cognizance only of offences against the King, or the King's peace, below the degree of high treason.

The Manors of New York, in consequence of their having been erected after the statute of Charles II. (12 Charles II., ch. 24, Anno 1660) abolishing the military tenures and turning them into free and common soccage, never possessed, nor were their lords ever invested with, the powers, privileges, rights, duties, and burdens of the old feudal manors of England as thus described. It is owing to ignorance of this fact, or the concealment of it, as the case may be, that so much misconception has been generated in the popular mind, by some writers, and also by some lawyers and men in public life, who in the recent past sought political preferment, or private gain, in relation to the manors of New York, their tenants, and their owners. As to the latter, a curious error has obtained credence. We often, at this day, see them written of, and hear them spoken of, as Nobles. "Lord Philipse" and "Lord Pell" are familiar examples of this ridiculous blunder in Westchester County. No grant of a feudal manor in England at any time from their first introduction ever carried with it a title,[5] and much less did any grant of a New York freehold manor ever do so. Both related to land only. The term Lord of a Manor is a technical one, and means simply the owner,—the possessor,—of a manor, nothing more. Its use as a title is simply a work of intense, or ignorant, republican provincialism. "Lord" as a prefix to a manor owner's name was never used in England, nor in the Province of New York.[6]

The origin, nature, existence and continuance of the Manors of New York, and the reason why they could be erected by the English Sovereigns here, when those Sovereigns could not do so in England since 1690, was so fully, thoroughly and learnedly set forth, more than thirty years ago, in an opinion by one of the greatest chief justices who ever graced the State of New York, that no apology is necessary for giving it in his own language: "The grantees are authorized in terms to hold a court-leet and a court-baron, to award fines, have the customary writs, etc., to have the waifs and estrays, deodands, etc., and the patronage of any churches to be erected on the tract; and the freeholders of the manor are empowered to elect a representative to sit in the General Assembly in the Province of New York. [This "privilege" was granted only to the three manors of Cortlandt, Livingston and Rensselaerswyck, and the Borough towns of West Chester and Schenectady]. There is nothing in the patent which in terms empowers the patentees to grant lands to be holden of themselves, [and all the manors were alike in this respect], but it is argued that the erection of a manor and the authority to hold the courts mentioned, which, according to English law, are manor courts, necessarily implies the power to create suitors, who must of necessity be tenants, holding of the proprietor of the manor, owing him suit

[1] This word is so spelled in the Report, but it is spelled 'Theam' or 'Team,' by Sir Henry Ellis in the "Introduction to Domesday," vol. i. p. 275.

[2] Fourth Report of Commissioners, Appendix, p. 106.

[3] Coke's preface to his 10th report.

[4] Terms of the Law 490, ed. of 1685.

[5] In France this was different. Many seignories there did carry with them the right to a title, but it was not the case with all.

[6] The Sovereign alone is the "source of honor" in England, and the sole power that can, or ever could, grant a title, or confer nobility, under English law.

and service. This, it is said, is a violation of the statute called quia emptores terrarum, passed in the eighteenth year of Edward the First, (Anno 1290). This statute, after reciting that the feudal tenants have sold their lands to be holden in fee of themselves, instead of the chief lord of the fee, whereby those lords have lost their escheats and other feudal perquisites to their "manifest disinheritance," enacts that "forever hereafter it shall be lawful to every freeman to sell at his own pleasure his lands or tenements, or part thereof, so neverthless that the feoffee [the grantee], shall hold the same lands or tenements of the same chief lord of the fee and by the same services or customs as his feoffor [grantor], held them before. A second chapter provides for an apportionment of the services in case of a sale of a part of the land out of which they issued. (Coke, 2 Inst. 500.)

"The freedom of alienation thus conferred upon the military tenants, was undoubtedly a very material amelioration of the feudal system, but at the same time the main object of the statute would seem to have been to secure to the great barons their profits arising out of these tenures. It is stated in the statute itself that it was ordained "at the instance of the great men of the realm," and it was clearly for their protection, though incidentally, and probably by its unforeseen operation, proved a relief to the inferior tenants. The evil was that the chief lords were defrauded of the fruits of their tenures, and the remedy provided was, that every tenant, however remote, should remain the debtor of the chief lord instead of his immediate feoffor [grantor] for the services incident to the tenure. But as one may generally waive an advantage secured to himself, so it was held that the chief lord might forego the benefit of the statute by authorizing his tenant to make a subinfeudation, that is, grant lands to be holden of himself; but this could not be done by a mesne (middle) lord on account of the interest of his superiors.

. . . As the King is lord paramount in all feudal tenures, no subject, since the statute, can, by his own authority, create a manor; and as in England, all the land was granted at, or soon after the Conquest, it follows that English Manors must have their origin prior to (this statute) the eighteenth of Edward first (Anno 1290). But as the King does not hold of any superior, he may grant land to be holden of himself, "for," says Coke, "hereby no man is restrained, but he which holds over of some lord, and the King holds of none" (2 Inst. 67). Therefore, if there are crown lands in England at this day which have never been granted to a subject, they may, without doubt, be erected into royal manors. And cannot the King grant to his immediate tenant the right to make grants to be held of himself, the tenant, since thus there would be the assent of all the lords, mediate and immediate. The King's tenants in capite could not make such grants before the statute quia emptores without his consent. This was by force of the King's prerogative, and was an exception to the general rule, which permitted subinfeudations by all lords except the tenants in capite. But I think that as well since, as before, the statute, the King could license his immediate tenant to alien to hold of himself the tenant."

After citing and quoting several authorities to this effect he continues, "Assuming the law to be as in these authorities stated, and assuming further that the grant of a manor and the right to hold manor courts ex vi termini implied an authority in the patentees to create manor tenants by means of grants reserving services to themselves, it still seems clear that the patents (the manor grants) were no violation of the statute referred to. The patent so construed was itself a license to the patentee to make grants to hold of himself. On the making of such grants the patentees became the mesne lords, holding of the King, and the grantees of the patentees were the tenants paravail (so called because they have the avails or profits of the land), holding by license from the King as lord paramount, of their immediate lords the patentees. The statute would prevent any further subinfeudations, by the freeholders holding under the patentees, unless, indeed, the King and patentees should both consent.

"That this was the understanding of the crown lawyers who prepared the patents for lands in the Colonies, is evident from the terms of several Colonial grants. The charter of Pennsylvania empowered Penn, the patentee, to erect manors and to alien and grant parts of the lands to such purchasers as might wish to purchase, "their heirs and assigns, to be held of the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, by such services, customs and rents as should seem fit to the said William Penn, etc.. and not immediately of the said King Charles, his heirs or successors," notwithstanding the statute of quia emptores (I. Wheaton 348; 9 Wheaton 256). . . .

"The records of some ten or twelve patents exist in the office of the Secretary of State, issued respectively in the reigns of James II., William and Mary, Anne, and George I., and the earlier government of the Duke of York [among which are those of Scarsdale, Philipsburgh, Fordham, Pelham, Cortlandt, and Morrisania, in Westchester County], with powers respecting a manor and Manor Courts similar to those under consideration [the English manor grants of Rensselaerswyck]; and the proprietary charters of several of the Colonies authorize grants to be made to hold of the proprietaries. If the statute against subinfeudations was in force in the colonies, these proprietary grants were as much violations of its provisions as the grants in question or any other grants from the King. The practice of making such grants for a long course of years is pretty strong evidence that the statute was never understood to apply to the King. . . . The general expressions of writers and judges to the effect that manors cannot have a commencement since the statute of Edward [in the year

1290] is quite correct, if we add the reason, which is always understood, viz., that all the lands in England are already in tenure, and subinfeudations are forbidden by the statute. The remark was never applicable to the ungranted crown lands in the Colonies, upon which the statute, I think, never had any, or only a qualified, bearing.[1] I have considered this question as though the statute was in force, and controlled the tenures in this Colony (New York) in any case to which in England it might be applicable; and I do not think it material to deny the proposition, though it has been questioned by respectable authority. Whether it was generally in force or not, it did not, in my opinion, apply to the ungranted crown lands; and in respect to these, the King, I think, was competent to authorize his immediate grantees to create tenants of a freehold manor by granting lands to be held of themselves.

"It will not be supposed that all the vexatious incidents of the feudal tenures were engrafted upon these Manor lands (in New York). If the feudal system ever prevailed in the American Colonies, it had been shorn of its most severe features before either of the grants in question [or any other of the Manor grants in New York] was made, by the Statute 12 Charles II., ch. 24 (Anno 1660), which abolished the peculiar incidents of the military tenures, and changed them whether holden of the King or others, into free and common socage; and which was re-enacted in this State soon after the Revolution with a retrospect to the time of the passage of the English statute I. Greenleaf, 359, p. 2."

The case in which the foregoing opinion was delivered was the famous one of the People against Van Rensselaer instituted by the Attorney-General of this State expressly to test the validity of manorial grants and privileges in the former province of New York, reported in 5 Selden 291. It was decided by the Court of Appeals unanimously in favor of the defendant Mr. Van Rensselaer, in 1853, the decision being, that "Royal letters patent granting lands in the province of New York are not void by reason of their conferring manorial privileges and franchises upon the patentees."

These "privileges and franchises" are set forth at length in every Manor Grant, being such incidents of the Grant as the Crown chose to express in the instrument itself, and saw fit to bestow upon the grantee therein named.

These privileges and franchises of "the Freehold Manors of New York" as Chief Justice Denio styles them, were, in his words," "free from the vexatious incidents of the feudal tenures. And he further says "the feudal system, which if it ever prevailed in the American colonies, had been shorn of its most severe feature before either of the grants in question, [or any other of the Manor grants in New York] was made, by the statute of Charles II. ch. 24, which [in 1660] abolished the Military tenures and changed them into free and common socage." This tenure as we have seen is purely allodial, save only in the fealty due the King as the ultimate lord of all the land of the realm. It was formally, as has previously been stated, declared by the Provincial Act of 1691 to be the tenure of lands in the Province of New York. No change was made or effected by the American Revolution, except that the Independent Sovereign State of New York succeeded to the position of the King as ultimately entitled to all the land within its borders. On the 20th of February 1787, before the United States had an existence, before the Convention of Independent States out of which this Union proceeded, had been chosen, and two years and twelve days before the Constitution of the United States formed by that convention went into effect, the Legislature of the State of New York, passed an "Act concerning Tenures" of a remarkable character. It would take too long to give its genesis here, interesting as it would be. It was passed ten years after the formation of the Constitution of the State. Its first section (there are six altogether) establishes and admits Manor grants, but calls the Lord of a Manor "the Chief Lord." It is as follows: "Be it Enacted by the People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, and it is hereby Enacted by Authority of the same, That it shall forever hereafter be lawful for every Freeholder to give, sell, or alien the Lands and Tenements whereof he or she is, or at any time hereafter shall be seized in Fee Simple, or any Part thereof, at his or her Pleasure, so always that the Purchaser shall hold the Lands or Tenements, so given, sold or aliened, of the Chief Lord, if there be any, of the same Fee, by the Same Services and Customs by which the Person or Persons, making such Gift, Sale or Alienation, before held the same Lands or Tenements.

And if such Freeholder give, sell or alien only a Part of such Lands or Tenements to any, the Feoffee or Alienee shall immediately hold such Part of the Chief Lord, and shall be forthwith charged with the Services for so much as pertaineth, or ought to pertain, to the said Chief Lord, for the same Parcel, according to the Quantity of Land or Tenement given, sold or aliened, for the Parcel of the Service so due." The second, third, fourth and fifth sections practically re-enact the statute of Charles II. abolishing military tenures, the fifth being in these words, "Provided always, and be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That this Act, or any Thing herein contained, shall not take away, nor be construed to take away or discharge, any Rents certain, or other Services incident or belonging to Tenure in common Soccage, due or to grow due to the People of this State, or any mesne [middle] Lord, or other Private Person, or the Fealty or Distresses incident thereto." The Sixth and final section enacts "That the Tenure upon all Gifts, Grants, and Conveyances heretofore made, or hereafter to be made, of any Manors, Lands, Tenements, or Hereditaments, of any Estate of Inheritance, by any Letters Patent under the Great Seal of this State, or in any other Manner, by the People of this State, or by the Commissioners of Forfeitures, shall be and remain Allodial, and not Feudal, and shall forever hereafter be taken and adjudged to be, and to continue in free and pure Allodium only."

[1] Chief Justice Ambrose Spencer, said from the bench that the statute in question never applied to the American Colonies. 18 Johnson p. 180.

The Statute of Charles seems to have been re-enacted, out of pure caution only, for its provisions had been the law of the Province and the State from the Dutch surrender to the time this statute was passed. It was pure surplusage. But why the first section was enacted is by no means clear. The act certainly confirms the free socage tenure of all lands in New York, does away with every other tenure and its incidents, except the fealty to the State and to "the Chief Lord" in the first section stated. While the last section declares the Socage tenure purely allodial in so many words. It thus actually re-enacted the entire English Provincial system of land tenure, including the manor system as the State land system of New York.

Under this act the State law as to tenures remained without change from its enactment in 1787 to the year 1830, when the Revised Statutes went into effect which declare that all lands since that date are allodial and abolish all incidents of the socage tenure, and, the tenure itself, using the word 'feudal' to express it, preserving, however, all rights under the same as they had previously existed. The "Tenure of Real Property" is thus stated.

§ 1. The People of this State, in their right of sovereignty, are deemed to possess the original and absolute property in and to all lands within the jurisdiction of this State; and all lands, the title to which shall fail from a defect of heirs, shall revert or escheat to the people.

§ 3. All lands within this State are declared to be allodial, so that subject only to the liability to escheat, the entire and absolute property is vested in the owners, according to the nature of their respective estates; and all feudal tenures of every description, with all their incidents, are abolished.

§ 4. The abolition of tenures shall not take away or discharge any rents or services certain, which at any time heretofore have been, or may hereafter be, created or reserved; nor shall it be construed to affect to change the powers or jurisdiction of any Court of Justice in this State.[1]

From and after 1830, therefore, the land tenure of New York has been and continues to be purely allodial. The vested rights and incidents of the former socage tenures were preserved, but the erection of any other tenure than a pure allodial one is forbidden.

[1] II. R. S,, Part II. Title I, p. 718, first ed.

The state has thus after the lapse of centuries returned to the free and just 'alod' of the earliest Saxon days of England.

The nature of the old Feudal Manors, and the difference from them of the Freehold Manors of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in New York having been shown, the incidents, franchises and privileges of the latter next demand attention.

10.

The Franchises, Privileges, and Incidents, of Manors in the Province of New York, and in the County of Westchester, and the Parishes in the latter.

The erection of 'Manors' by the English in New York, like the previous creation of 'Patroonships,' by the Dutch in the same Province, was simply the establishment and carrying out, of what they deemed the best method of promoting the growth and development of their new possession under their own laws and customs. To the same idea is due the granting therein of similar large tracts of land which were not manors. The latter, the 'Great Patents,' as they were called, were usually granted to several grantees. The Manors were necessarily granted to one only. The franchises, privileges, and other valuable incidents, which the Manors possessed, and which the Great Patents did not possess, were much fewer than is generally supposed. The term 'feudal,' popularly applied to the former, has caused much misconception. The tenure of both classes of these crown grants was precisely the same, being "in free and common socage as of the Manor of East Greenwich in the county of Kent," which has been already explained. The greatest difference between them lay in the peculiar public incidents, as they may be called, which constituted a Manor, incidents essential to its existence, and which related more to the government and good order of the territory of the Manor and the protection of the inhabitants, and their rights as Englishmen, than to the power and profit of the Lord. Tenants could, and did, take up lands under the grantees of the Great Patents, as well as under the Lords of the Manors. The former could, and did, settle people upon their Patents under leases, as well as deeds in fee, just as the latter did upon their Manors. Both classes of Proprietors sold in fee, or granted on leases of different kinds, just as their interests or wishes dictated. The Great Patents, their grantees, and the inhabitants upon them, were subject, in general and local matters, to whatever public territorial divisions of the Province embraced them, and the laws in force therein. The Manors, their Lords, and their inhabitants, whether tenants, or holders in fee simple of manor lands by purchase from the Lords, were subject only to the jurisdiction and courts of the Manors in local matters. Both, in all matters not local, were governed by the laws, courts, and the civil and military authorities, of the county and of the Province.

There were in the county of Westchester Six Manors, which together comprised by far the largest part of its area. The Great Patents were much more numerous, but together not so extensive in area. These latter and the Borough-Town of Westchester, with a few small original grants, formed the rest of the county as it was originally. The lower part of the "Equivalent lands" or "The Oblong," received in settlement of a boundary dispute from the colony of Connecticut was not added to the county till the year 1731, and this too, was then embraced in a single Great Patent.

The Manors were those of "Cortlandt," "Scarsdale," "Pelham," "Morrisania," "Fordham," and "Philipseborough," or as it was, and is, usually written and pronounced "Philipsburgh." Of these, Cortlandt, and Philipsburgh, were much the largest. It will give a correct idea of the great extent and thoroughness of the manorial settlement of Westchester county, as well as the satisfactory nature of that method of settlement to its inhabitants, although a surprise, probably, to many readers, when it is stated that in the year 1769, one-third of the population of the county lived on the two Manors of Cortlandt and Philipsburgh alone. The Manors of Fordham, Morrisania, Pelham and Scarsdale, lying nearer to the city of New York, than these two, and more accessible than either, save only the lower end of Philipsburgh, were, if any thing, much more settled. It is safe to say that upwards of five-eighths of the people of Westchester County in 1769 were inhabitants of the six manors that have been named. As the people upon the manors were free of general jury duty the fact threw upon the rest of the county an increased burden. The 'Burgess' (or Representative) of the "Borough of Westchester" in the Assembly in 1769, was John de Lancey of Rosehill, Westfarms, of the second, or Westfarms, branch of that family, being the second son of Peter de Lancey of Rosehill, Westfarms, and his wife Elizabeth, the daughter of Governor Cadwallader Colden. He attempted the relief of the non-manorial inhabitants of the county and brought this matter before the Assembly in this speech, from which we learn the fact above-mentioned,—

"Mr. Speaker,—As the qualification required by the act for returning able and sufficient jurors in the several counties of this colony, entirely disqualifies all the tenants settled upon the Manor of Philipsburgh, and great part of those settled upon the Manor of Cortlandt, in the county of Westchester, from serving upon juries; which makes that service extremely hard upon the other parts of the county (the Manors of Philipsburgh and Cortlandt, containing at least one-third of all the inhabitants of the said county); I therefore move for leave to bring in a bill, to enable and qualify the tenants holding lands improved of the value of sixty pounds (£150), either for years, or at will, within the Manors aforesaid to serve upon juries within the said county of Westchester." Leave was given, and the next day Mr. de Lancey introduced the bill. [1]The jury act referred to required all jurors to be possessed either in their own rights and names, or that of Trustees, or in that of their wives, of "a freehold in lands, messuages, or tenements, or rents, in fee, feetail, or for life, of the value of sixty pounds New York currency (£150) free of all incumbrances." In the City of New York alone personalty of sixty pounds value was permitted as a qualification. The object of Mr. de Lancey's bill was to make the tenants in the Manors, who were not freeholders, subject to jury duty. This legislative action proves that none of the leases in the manor of Philipsburgh were "fee-farm" leases, that is leases in perpetuity, for such leases were "freeholds," and the "tenants freeholders," by law; and that the same thing was true of a "great part" of the leases in the Manor of Cortlandt. Mr. de Lancey's attempt to aid his constituents was not successful. His bill failed to pass, but why, the journals of the House do not show. Probably the tenants of the Manors were in a majority sufficient to control their members in the House. The two members for the County had the tenants of Philipsburgh, and of the four smaller manors of Scarsdale, Pelham, Morrisania and Fordham among their constituents, and "The Manor of Cortlandt" had its own representative. One of the county members was Frederick Philipse, the third, and the then, Lord of Philipseburgh (the other being John Thomas of Harrison), and the member for the Manor of Cortlandt, was Pierre van Cortlandt, of Croton, of the second branch of that family, and subsequently the first Lieutenant-Governor of the State of New York. Both the county members had a majority of Manor tenants in their constituency.

The next year, 1770, Mr. Thomas, one of the County members, tried a little different measure, apparently punitive. He introduced a bill relating to the Manor of Philipsburgh alone, entitled "a bill to enable and qualify tenants holding lands improved to the value of sixty pounds, either for years, or at will, within the Manor of Philipsburgh, in the County of Westchester, to serve as jurors in the justices courts held in said Manor, where the parties concerned in the cause to be tried, are tenants as aforesaid."[2] This was practically to invest Justices' courts in the Manor, with the jurisdiction of the Courts-baron of the manor, only with a justice instead of the Lord or his Steward as its presiding head, and thus imposed double jury duty on the tenants. This measure also failed to pass. These facts, and the proposed legislative action, first mentioned, occurring as it did, only five years before the beginning of the American Revolution, show how widely-extended was the manorial system of New York, in Westchester County, how numerous and politically powerful were the tenants of the manors there, and how well they were satisfied with their position. The objection coming from those only who were not manorial tenants.

[1] Assembly Journals. Session from 1st November, 1769, to 27th January, 1770, pp. 6 and 7.

[2] Assembly Journals. Session from 21st Nov. 1769 to 27th Jan. 1770, p. 80.

The peculiar incidents of an old English Manor have not been described, although they have been referred to. The definition of a Manor already given, shows that it had two Courts, a Court-Baron, and a Court-Leet. The scope and duties of the former of these, that in which the Lord exercised jurisdiction, we learn from Coke. "If," says he, "we labour to search out the antiquity of these courts-baron, we shall find them as ancient as manors themselves. For when the ancient kings of this realm, who had all England in demesne, did confer great quantities of lands upon some great personages with liberty to parcel the lands out to other inferior tenants, reserving such duties and services as they thought convenient; and to keep courts where they might redress misdemeanors within their precincts, punish offences committed by their tenants, and decide and debate controversies arising within their jurisdiction; these courts were termed courts baron."[1]

This jurisdiction was the very essence, so to speak, of a Manor, for the same great authority also says, that, "A Manor in these days [the age of Elizabeth, in which Coke wrote] signifieth the jurisdiction and royalty incorporate rather than the land or scite."[2]

An old English Manor may be said to have consisted of:—

1. Demesne lands, which were the Lords personal demesne. These were of two kinds, first, the Manor-House and the land immediately about, or adjacent to, it, which the Lord himself cultivated for his own maintenance, or demised to others to be cultivated for that purpose, on terms of years, or for the life of the tenants; and secondly, the uncultivated lands of the manor including those allowed as common lands for pasturage, &c., to the freehold tenants generally, which were termed the "wasted lands," or more usually the "Lords waste," not because they were worth nothing, but because they were untilled.

2. The services, rents, and duties, reserved to the Lord upon the original freehold leases to the freehold tenants of the manor.

3. The reversion of those parts of the demesne lands granted for lives or terms of years, and of those escheated to the Lord in the case of freehold tenants dying intestate and without heirs.

4. Jurisdiction in a Court-Baron, and the rents and services of the freehold tenants liable to escheat and owing attendance as suitors at the Court. This Court was a necessary incident of a manor, and without it, and at least two suitors, no manor could exist. The Lord, or his Steward always presided, no one else could hold it. The freehold tenants were the judges of fact, just as jurors are in ordinary Courts; thus no man could be tried except by his peers. It was an absolute necessity that it should be held within the Manor limits, for if held outside, its proceedings were null and void. Hence it was usually held in or near the Manor House.

5. The right to hold a Court-Leet. This Court was not necessary to the existence of a manor as a Court-Baron was. It was simply one of the general franchises given in and by a Manor Grant. It was not given to all manors, but in those in New York it was usually one of the franchises granted. All the manors in Westchester County possessed this franchise. The Court-Leet was a Court of Record having a similar jurisdiction to the old Sheriff's "Tourns" or migratory courts held by the Sheriff in the different districts, or 'hundreds' of his County, for the punishment of minor offences and the preservation of the peace, but had more extended powers. It was a criminal Court only and took cognizance of all crimes from the smallest misdemeanors, up to, but excluding, treason. It was granted to lords of manors "in order that they might administer justice to their tenants at home."[3] All the people in the district of the Court-Leet were bound to attend under penalty of a small fine. The Steward of the Manor was the judge, and the people of the manor alone could be the jurors. "Anciently," said Lord Mansfield, "the Tourn and the Leet (derived out of it) were the principal Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction; coeval with the establishment of the Saxons here. There were no traces of them either among the Romans or Britons; but the activity of these Courts is marked very visibly both among the Saxons and the Danes."[4]

6. The Franchises annexed or appendant to a Manor. These were privileges specifically given by the Crown in the Grants of manors, or of lands not manors. "A franchise," says Cruise, "is a royal privilege or branch of the King's prerogative subsisting in a subject by a grant from the Crown."[5] When so granted they were said to be appendant to the manor, or other grant in which they are set forth. There was nothing whatever which was "feudal" in their nature. They were simply favors extended by the crown to the grantees of lands whether manorial, or non-manorial, to increase the value and enjoyment of their properties. They varied much, some manors having more, some less. Most of these franchises were common to both manorial, and non-manorial, lands. Some, however, were only granted to Manors, and were held by their Lords in addition to those common to both these classes of Crown-granted lands. Among those of the non-manorial lands were Hunting, Hawking, Fowling, Fishing, &c., among the latter, those of Courts-Baron, Courts-Leet, Waifs, Estrays, Advowsons, Deodands, &c. In the case of Manors

[1] Cited in Cruise on Dignities, 24. [2] Ibid.

[3] Coke 2 Inst. 70.

[4] 3 Burrow's Rep. 1860. See as to the jurisdiction of these Courts Hallam's "Middle Ages," 347.

[5] Digest, Title, xxvii. § 1.

there were often special franchises granted, growing out of the geographical situation of the land itself, or other special circumstances of a local nature, such as franchises to establish ferries, bridges, fairs and markets; and for the tenants to meet and choose assessors and other local officers, and elect representatives of the Manor in the General Assembly. The latter, a very high franchise, was conferred upon three only out of the great number of Manors in New York. These were the Manors of Cortlandt, Livingston, and Rensselaerswyck, of which the former, the first in which the franchise was granted, was the only one in Westchester County. All three of them bordered upon the Hudson River, and eventually embraced within their territorial limits large numbers of inhabitants.

All these franchises were what the law terms "incorporeal hereditaments," which are rights and profits arising from, or annexed to, land. Among them was that of advowson and church patronage. An advowson is a right of presentation to a church, or any ecclesiastical benefice. It existed in New York, during the Colonial period. The word is derived from the Latin advocatio, which means receiving in clientship, because in England originally the one possessing this right was termed advocatus ecclesiæ, as he was bound to defend and protect, both the rights of the church, and the clergyman in charge, from oppression and violence. Hence the right of presentation to a church acquired the name of advowson, and he who possessed the right was called the patron of the church. The origin of the right was this:—In the early days of Christianity the nomination of all ecclesiastical benefices belonged to the Church. When the piety of some rich and prominent men, or great lords, induced them to build churches, near, or upon, their own estates, and endow them with land called a glebe, or to appropriate the rent or tithes from neighbouring lands of their own, to their support, the bishops, (non-episcopal church organizations did not then exist) desiring to encourage such pious undertakings, permitted these rich men to appoint what person they pleased to officiate in such churches, and receive the emoluments annexed to them; reserving to themselves only the power to examine, judge of, and pass upon, the qualifications of the persons so nominated. Originally a mere indulgence, this practice in process of time became a right. And those who had either founded or endowed a church naturally claimed and exercised the right of presenting a clergyman to the bishop for institution whenever the Church became vacant. This right of presentation originally allowed to the person who built or endowed a church, became by degrees annexed to the estate or Manor in which it was erected; for the endowment, whether land, or tithes of its produce, was taken as part of the Manor and held of it; hence the right of presentation passed with the Estate or Manor to which it was appendant by grant, and thus became a species of property.

'Presentation' is the offering of a clergyman by the patron, or owner, of an advowson to the Bishop or ordinary, by a kind of letter in writing, requesting him to admit the clergyman named in it to the Church. When the Bishop, or Ordinary, after due examination, certified in writing that the clergyman was a fit person to serve the church, the latter was said to be "admitted." The Bishop, or Ordinary then "instituted" the clergyman, by the formal commitment to him of the cure of souls. This was done by the clergyman kneeling before the bishop and reading his promise of faithful duty from a written instrument prepared beforehand with the episcopal seal attached, which he held in his hands, and afterwards retained. This gave him the right to the temporalities of the Church. After the completion of the "Institution" the Bishop, or Ordinary, issued a "Mandate of Induction" in writing, directed to him who had the power to induct of common right, or, in case of there being no person possessing this power, to any other proper person whom he saw fit to name, to perform the office. The Actual Induction was made by the authorized person taking the clergyman and putting his hand on the door, wall, or other part of the church edifice, and saying to this effect—"By virtue of this mandate to me directed I do induct you into the real, actual, and corporeal possession of the Church of ——— (naming it) with all the rights, profits, and appurtenances thereunto belonging," or similar words to that effect. He then opened the door, and led the new clergyman into the church, who usually tolled the bell, if there was any, for a few moments, to make known his induction to his parishioners and the public. This course was followed in New York, and the other British-American colonies in which the church of England existed. But as there was no Bishop at that time in this country, the Ordinary was either the Governor, by virtue of his Commission, or the Bishop of London's Commissary, who was a clergyman appointed by the Bishop to perform certain administrative duties here, and one or the other acted in the Bishop's place. The Governor of the Province usually issued the mandate of, and appointed a proper person to perform the ceremony of, Induction.

This right of advowson and church patronage was specifically granted in express terms to four out of the six manors in Westchester County, and is set forth specifically in the Manor Grants of 'Cortlandt,' 'Philipseburgh,' 'Pelham,' and 'Morrisania.' In that of Scarsdale it is not granted, nor in that of Fordham, a proof of the statement made above that Manor franchises varied in different Manor Grants.

At the beginning, the instruments of Presentation and Induction in New York were in Latin, and many of them are recorded in the public offices of the older Counties, in that tongue. Later they were in English. The following is a complete sequence of these curious and instructive documents showing the Collation and Induction into the "Parish of Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford," of the Rev. Ebenezer Punderson, as its incumbent in the year 1763, the whole being in English. The originals are in the possession of John C. Jay, M.D., of Rye. They are printed in Bolton's History of the Church in the County of Westchester, page 300, etc. The headings do not appear in the originals. In this case the right of Patronage was vested in the Wardens and Vestry of the Parish itself, as was often the case.

THE PRESENTATION TO THE PARISH OF RYE OF MR. EBENEZER PUNDERSON.

"To the Honorable Cadwallader Colden, Esq., his Majesty's Lieutenant Governour, and Commander in Chief of the Province of New York, and the Territories depending thereon, in America :

The Churchwardens and Vestrymen of the Parish of Rye, including the districts or precincts of Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford, in the County of Westchester, in the Province of New-York, the true and undoubted patrons of the said Parish, within your Honour's government, in all reverence and obedience to your Honour, due and suitable, send greeting, in our Lord God everlasting, and certifye that to the said Parish of Rye, including the districts or precincts of Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford, now being vacant by the natural death of James Wetmore, the last incumbent of the same, and to our presentation of full right belonging, we have called our beloved in Christ, Ebenezer Punderson, Clerk, to officiate in the said Parish church of Rye, called Grace Church ; and him, the said Ebenezer Punderson, sends by these presents to your Honour, present, humbly praying that you would vouchsafe him to the said church and Parish of Rye, including the districts or precincts aforesaid, to admit, institute, and cause to be inducted, with all its rights, members, and appurtenances, and that you will, with favour and effect, do and fulfill all and singular, other things which in this behalf are proper and fitting for your honour to do.

In testimony whereof, we, the Churchwardens and vestrymen aforesaid, have to these presents put our hands and seals, this day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three.

EBENEZER KNIFFEN, } Churchwardens,
ANDREW MERRIT. }

and seven Vestrymen."

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOUR COLDEN'S ADMISSION OF MR. PUNDERSON TO THE PARISH OF RYE.

"I, CADWALLADER COLDEN, Esquire, his Majesty's Lieutenant Governour, and Commander in Chief of the province of New-York, and the Territories depending thereon in America, do admit you, Ebenezer Punderson, Clerk, to be Rector of the Parish Church of Rye, commonly called Grace Church, and of the Parish of Rye, including the several districts or precincts of Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford, in the County of Westchester, within the said Province.

Given under my hand and the prerogative seal of the Province of New-York, at Fort George, in the City of New-York, the seventeenth day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three.

CADWALLADER COLDEN."

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOUR COLDEN'S INSTITUTION OF MR. PUNDERSON AS RECTOR OF THE PARISH OF RYE.

"I, CADWALLADER COLDEN, Esquire, his Majesty's Lieutenant Governour and Commander in Chief of the Province of New-York, and the Territories depending thereon, in America, do institute you, Ebenezer Punderson, Clerk, Rector of the Parish Church, of Rye commonly called Grace Church, and of the Parish of Rye, including the several districts or precincts of Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford, in the County of Westchester, in the said Province to have the cure of the souls of the parishioners of the said Parish ; and take your cure and mine.

Given under my hand and the prerogative seal of the Province of New-York, at Fort George, in the City of New-York, the seventeenth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three.

CADWALLADER COLDEN."

LIEUTENANT GOVERNOUR COLDEN'S MANDATE TO INDUCT MR. PUNDERSON INTO THE PARISH OF RYE.

"The Honorable Cadwallader Colden, Esquire, his Majesty's Lieutenant Governour and Commander in Chief of the Province of New-York, and the Territories depending thereon in America. To all and singular Rectors and Parish Ministers whatsoever, in the Province of New-York, or to Andrew Merrit and Ebenezer Kniffen, the present Churchwardens of the Parish of Rye, in the County of Westchester, and to the Vestrymen of the said Parish, and to each and every of you, greeting :—Whereas, I have admitted our beloved in Christ, Ebenezer Punderson, Clerk, to the Rectory of the Parish Church at Rye, commonly called Grace Church, and of the Parish of Rye, including the several districts or precincts of Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford, in the County of Westchester, within this government, to which the said Ebenezer Punderson was presented unto me by the Churchwardens and Vestrymen of the said Parish, the true and undoubted patrons of the said Parish, vacant, as is say'd by the natural death of James Wetmore, the last incumbent there, on or about the nineteenth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and sixty ; and him, the said Ebenezer Punderson, I have instituted into the Rectory of the said Parish Church and Parish, with all their rights, members, and appurtenances, observing the laws and canons of right, in that behalf required and to be observed. To you therefore, jointly and severally, I do commit, and firmly injoining. do command each and every of you, that in due manner, him, the said Ebenezer Punderson, or his lawfull Proctor, in his name, and for him into the real actual, and corporal possession of the Rectory of the said Parish Church and Parish, including the districts and precincts aforesaid, and all of their rights and appurtenances, whatsoever, you induct, or cause to be inducted, and him so inducted you do defend : and of what you shall have done in the premises thereof, you do duely certify unto me or other competent judge, in that behalf, when there unto you shall be duely required.

Given under my hand and the prerogative seal of the Province of New-York, at Fort George, in the City of New-York, the seventeenth day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three."

CADWALLADER COLDEN."

CERTIFICATE OF MR. PUNDERSON'S INDUCTION INTO THE RECTORSHIP OF THE PARISH OF RYE.

"I, John Milner, Rector of the Parish of Westchester, in the County of Westchester and Province of New-York, do hereby certifye, that by virtue of a warrant hereunto annexed, from the Honourable Cadwallader Colden, Esquire, his Majesty's Lieutenant Governour and Commander in Chief of the Province of New-York, aforesaid, and the Territories depending thereon, in America ; I have this day inducted the Rev. Ebenezer Punderson, into the real, actual and corporal possession of the Rectory of the Parish Church of Rye, commonly called Grace Church and of the Parish of Rye, including the several districts or precincts of Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford, in the County of Westchester aforesaid, with all their rights, members, and appurtenances, the 21st day of November, Anno Domini, 1763. The induction of the Rev. Ebenezer Punderson being executed, the above certificate was signed, in consequence thereof, by the Rev. John Milner, in the presence of us, who subscribe our names as witness thereunto.

JOHN MILNER, Rector of St. Peter's Church Westchester, and twenty-one others."

MR. PUNDERSON'S DECLARATION OF CONFORMITY.

"I, Ebenezer Punderson, do here declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in and by ye Book entitled the Book of Common Prayer, and administrations of ye sacraments ; and ye Rites and Ceremonies of ye Church, according to the use of the Church of England ; together with ye Psalter or Psalms of David, pointed as they are to be sung or said in Churches, and the form or manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating Bishops, Priests and Deacons."

"Upon the 4th day of December, 1763, the above mentioned Ebenezer Punderson, after divine service was began, and before it was ended, read distinctly the thirty-nine articles of Religion, and declared his unfeined assent and consent to them ; and also made the above declaration.

Witness, HACHALIAH BROWN, TIMOTHY WETMORE."

The Rents incident to a manor were of two kinds, those arising from the demense lands of the lord, and those from the freehold lands held by the tenants of the manor. It is a proof of the fact that the renting of land from a superior, was a most natural as well as most ancient custom, that from the payment of rent is derived our English word farm. In early Saxon days, and at, and just after, the Norman Conquest, the estates of the chiefs and leaders were cultivated by the people attached to their different lands, the villeins, heretofore mentioned, who were practically slaves, and, in the very earliest times, passed with the estates on which they dwelt. In course of time the land owners allowed them to occupy specific parts of their lands at will, yielding a return of corn, hay, of other portions of their crops; and later they granted them the lands for a certain number of years, by which they were enfranchised, the owners reserving an annual return of portions of the corn or other provisions. From this the lands thus granted were called farms, from the Saxon word feorm, which signifies provisions.[1] This return for the use of the land, was expressed by the Latin word redditus, which means 'return,' and from it comes our English word 'rent.'

Rents were of three kinds, 1. Rent service; that is payment of money or produce, and fealty, which was the only rent known to the common law and to which a right of distress was incident. 2. Rent charge; when the rent was created by deed, no fealty was annexed and consequently there could be no distress in case of non-payment; hence an express power of distress was inserted in the deed to cure the difficulty. A rent so reserved was said to be charged with a distress, and hence called a rent charge. 3. Rent seck, or dry or barren rent; this was simply a rent for the recovery of which no power of distress was given by the common law, or by the agreement of the parties.[2]

All three kinds were used, but the first or rent service was that generally reserved in manor leases in New York. The leases themselves were granted for terms of years of longer or shorter periods, with covenants of renewal, or without, as the parties could agree. Usually they were for long terms, and sometimes they were made in perpetuity, in which latter case they were called fee-farm leases, and the rents fee-farm rents. In the Westchester County Manors there was great latitude in the character of the lease holds. The Lords and their Tenants were bound by no hard and fast rules, and made just such agreements with each other as they saw fit. Sometimes the right to purchase the fee by the tenant upon terms was inserted in the leases. But it was the custom generally to sell the reversion of the fee to the tenant, whenever it was desired and the parties could agree upon the terms of the purchase. These leaseholds were devisable by will, and divisible, with the lord's assent, into parts in the lessee's lifetime. This made it easy for tenants to retain their farms in their families from father to son if they wished, or to divide up a large farm into smaller ones, among several sons, or married daughters. But in all cases the consent in writing of the lord was necessary. And, as a rule, this was never withheld, when the subdivisions proposed were not made too small. In these divisions of a leasehold, the rent was arranged to be paid in one of two ways. Either the lord consented to take it in fixed parts from the holders of the subdivisions, or, which was most usual, it was agreed among the subtenants that some one of them should pay the entire rent under the whole lease to the lord, and be re-imbursed by each of them for his own part. The amounts for the different parts were apportioned among themselves in this case as they chose. When the lord accepted the rent in parts the apportionment was made by him, or his steward, with the tenants at the time such division into parts was agreed upon. In the Manor of Scarsdale, there were, within the personal knowledge of the writer, instances of tenants holding their farms for four and five generations, and then purchasing the reversion of the fee from the lineal representatives of the Lord to whom the fee had descended. And it may be said that much the greater number of the original tenants of that manor, or their descendants became the owners in fee of their farms by direct purchase from the first Lord, Caleb Heathcote, or his lineal descendants. Several of these farms have been so sold and so acquired in the memory of the writer. Another rule which obtained with the owners of that manor, and with some of the owners of the manor of Cortlandt, also, to the writer's knowledge, was, that no stranger to the tenants of any farm was ever permitted to purchase the fee of a farm, without the owners first giving the tenant in possession the first opportunity to purchase it. In the latter manor many farms were originally leased to tenants on ninety-nine years leases, and in some instances they have remained in the families of the same lords and the same tenants during that entire term, and upon its expiration then sold in fee. One of these farms which descended to the writer, had been divided into four parcels by the original tenant in the manner above mentioned. And ten years ago, when the ninety-nine years' lease had expired, two portions of it were still in the hands of the great-grandchildren of the first tenant. The right to purchase, though there was no obligation to do so, the term having expired, was offered to them. But not wishing to profit by it, the fee was sold at public auction, and bought by an adjoining neighbor, who some years before had acquired the fee, or "soil right" of his own farm in the same way.

The quit-rents, payable to the sovereign authority, whether the Crown, or, after the Revolution, the State of New York, from all Manors, as well as the Great Patents and Small Patents, granted by the Crown, were incidents of all the Manors, as well as of the other Crown grants of every kind. The term itself is derived from the Latin 'quietus redditus,' and signifies a rent reserved in grants of land, by the payment of which the tenant is quieted, or quit, from all other service. They were at once the acknowledgment of the tenure, the holding, of the lands, from the Sovereign Authority, and the source of a part of its revenue. And this is the reason why the success of the American Revolution had no effect whatever upon quit-rents, and that they continued payable after it, just as they were before, the State succeeding to the revenue from them formerly enjoyed by the Crown.

[1] Cruise Tit. VIII., ch. I. § 1., and Tit. XXVIII., ch. I. § 1.
[2] Cruise Tit. XXVIII., ch. 1.

The Manor-Grants in the County of Westchester varied a little in the form and terms of the clauses providing for the reservation and the payment of these quit-rents, and the times of their payment. The clauses were framed in the model of the quaint old clauses of the ancient Manors of England, of five centuries before. But except this mere resemblance there was nothing "feudal" in them more than in the reservations of rent in a modern lease of a store on Broadway, a farm in the Country, or an opposition Rail Road, or Oil, Company. The quit-rent clauses of the different Manor-Grants in Westchester County are these;—

Manor of Cortlandt:—"Yielding rendering and paying therefor yearly and every year unto us, our heirs and successors, at our City of New York, on the feast day of the Annunciation of our Blessed Virgin Mary, the yearly rent of forty shillings current money of our said Province, in lieu and stead of all other rents, services, dues, and demands whatsoever for the afore recited tracts and parcels of land and meadow, Lordship and Manor of Cortlandt and premises."

Manor of Scarsdale:—"Yielding, rendering, and paying therefor yearly and every year forever at our City of New York, unto us our heirs and successors, or to such officer or officers, as shall from time to time be empowered to receive the same, five pounds current money of New York, upon the Nativity of our Lord, in lieu and stead of all services, dues, duties, or demands whatsoever."

Manor of Pelham:—Like Scarsdale as far as the word "same" inclusive, and then, "twenty shillings, good and lawful money of this province, at the City of New Yorke, on the five and twentyeth day of the month of March, in lieu of all rents, services, and demands whatsoever."

Manor of Morrisania:—"Yielding rendering and paying therefor yearly and every year, on the feast day of the Annunciation of our Blessed Virgin, unto us, our heirs and successors, at our city of New York the annual rent of six shillings, in lieu" etc. "for the said lordship and manor of Morrisania, and premises."

Manor of Fordham: "Yealding, rendering, and paying yearly and every year unto his Royal Highness, the Duke of Yorke and his successors, or to such governor, or governors, as from time to time, shall by him be constituted and appointed, as full acknowledgment and quit-rent, twenty bushels of good peas upon the first day of March, when it shall be demanded."[1]

Manor of Philipsborough:[2] "Yealding, rendering, and paying therefor, yearly, and every year, on the feast day of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, at our fort at New York, unto us our heirs and successors, the annual rent of four pounds, twelve shillings current money of our said province, in lieu of all former rents, services, dues, duties, and demands for the said Lordship or Manor of Philipsborough and premises."

In the parts of this essay treating of these Manors severally, will be found copies of the official receipts for these quit-rents given by the authorized Crown officers to whom they were payable. Being so small, they were practically allowed to run for a number of years, and then paid in a gross sum. Upon Crown Grants all over the province, not Manor-Grants—Patents as they were termed—the quit-rents were usually fixed upon the number of acres included, or estimated to be included in them, at the rate of two shillings and six pence sterling per hundred acres. But though this rate varied in some instances it may be taken as the general rate. Some of them were payable in kind usually in winter wheat. As the Province grew the amount of quit-rents increased and came to be an important part of the public revenue. Several acts of the Legislature from time to time regulated the times and manner of their payment, when they had fallen into arrears, which was a common occurrence, the last of which was in 1762, which also carefully provided for the partition of large estates where they had come into the possession of numerous heirs. But space will not permit of more than this allusion to this legislation.

After the Revolution when the State succeeded to the rights of the Crown, and in 1786, an act was passed providing for the payment of the quit-rents to the State, and permitting the owners of lands subject to them, to commute by paying a sum in gross, upon the receipt of which, the lands were declared free and discharged from then forever. The sum fixed was fourteen shillings in cash for every one shilling of annual quit-rent payable any time before the 1st of May, 1787, in the same State securities receivable in payment for forfeited estates. In the case of those payable in kind they were to be settled for in the method in the book of the Receiver-General of the former Colony, if this could be found, and if not found, then upon principles of equity and good conscience by the State Treasurer. This law was extended from time to time by various special acts. In 1791 one of these acts also changed the payments from the securities mentioned above to gold and silver, at the lower rate of twelve shillings for every shilling of quit-rent. The extensions continued to be made nearly every year up to 1813, when all payments and commutations were suspended for two years.[1] In 1815, the Comptroller was authorized to sell and commute, on the same terms as before, but in a method specified in the Act.[2] In 1816 and 1817 two more Acts were passed regulating and fixing the whole subject and placing it in the hands of the State Comptroller, and under these the quit-rents were gradually commuted until about the year 1823, when Commutation had been made for nearly all the lands subject to them, and the quit-rents became finally extinguished.

[1] This was the only Manor-Grant in the County of Westchester issued under the Duke of York as Lord Proprietor.

[2] So styled in the Manor-Grant, but usually pronounced "Philipseburgh."

Another subject requires brief mention in this place. In the account of the old English Manors which has been given before, little or no mention has been made of the Copyhold lands. This was because, copyhold lands as such did not exist in the New York Manors. The Copyhold Tenure in England grew out of and was simply an enlargement by custom of the greater firity of the villein holdings of the manors, which, as has been shown, were originally terminable at the will of the Lord. As the custom of permitting the villeins to hold their lands from father to son increased, it finally became regulated by the Steward of the Manor forming a Court roll of such holdings in the Court-Baron, and for the tenants when a death or other termination of such a tenancy by gift or purchase occurred, to apply at the Court-Baron, over which the Steward, in the absence of the Lord, presided, for an entry of such change in this Court roll, a copy of which was given to the new tenant. From this custom such tenants were called "Tenants by copy of Court Roll," and in shorter terms "Copyholders." As the tenure grew solely out of a custom of the Manors, it could only exist in Manors old enough to have a custom. But as the freehold Manors of New York, were, as above shown, all New Manors, no custom of a manor could possibly exist in the Manors in that Province, and consequently there could not be any "Copyholds" or "Copyholders" therein.

In England at this day, it may be said, that with few exceptions, all the lands of the old manors except the private demesne lands of the Lords, have long since become Copyhold lands, and their Tenants Copyholders. Manors there are frequently bought and sold as a whole, and the purchaser succeeds to all the rights, franchises, privileges, and powers of the original Lord of the Manor. In the growth of England many Manors have become enormously valuable, by the spreading over them of large towns and cities. Hence many rich men have bought out these old Manors when in the neighborhood of flourishing cities and towns as an investment, or on speculation. The Lords, whether old or new ones are always ready in such cases to sell the fee of these Manor lands on satisfactory terms, which is termed Enfranchising the lands. It will be seen when a town or city has overgrown a Manor and the latter has been divided into lots how very valuable manors in such a condition become. The writer personally knew of such an instance in Gloucestershire, where the City of Cheltenham has spread over the Manor of that name.

A little upwards of twenty years ago, that manor was purchased in the manner just mentioned, and the new Lord issued through his Steward, who was also the Steward of the former Lord, his proposals for Enfranchising the lots in the Manor within that City. A copy of them is here given as an illustration of the nature and working of copyhold lands in an old English Manor, and their advantages and disadvantages, and the method by which they can become lands in fee simple. Although no copyhold lands did exist or could have existed, in New York the matter is of interest in connection with the general subject of this essay.

"MANOR OF CHELTENHAM.

Enfranchisement of Copyhold Property.

The Purchase by Robert Sole Lingwood Esquire of the Manor of Cheltenham having been completed, we are requested by him, as Lord of the Manor, to signify to the Copyholders that every facility will be afforded to those who desire to enfranchise their Copyhold Property, and that the terms on which such enfranchisement may be effected can be ascertained either through us or by application to Mr. Lingwood.

Whilst very reasonable terms will now be accepted to induce the Copyholders to avail themselves of the present opportunity to effect enfranchisements, the Lord of the Manor directs us to inform the Copyholders that he requires all Leases and dealings by the Owners with their Copyhold Tenements to be made in strict conformity with the Act of Parliament regulating the Customs of the Manor; and this notification is rendered the more necessary because Leases have heretofore frequently been made and executed by Tenants of the Manor in violation of the Custom regulating the mode of leasing, and because a Lease of Copyhold property by the Owner made contrary to the Custom occasions an absolute forfeiture to the Lord of the property so leased.

Among the objections to Copyhold property which will be got rid of by Enfranchisement may be enumerated the following:

1. The risk of forfeiture of the property by reason of ignorance in granting Leases contrary to the Custom.—

2. The expence of the perpetually recurring Stewards' fees payable on every occasion of dealing by Sale or Mortgage with the Copyhold property.—

3. The like expence of Stewards' fees payable on the death of every Owner of Copyhold property, for the admittance of his heir or devisee.—

4. The expence and inconvenience, frequently oc-

[1] Ch. 232 of Laws of 1813. [2] Ch. 209 of Laws of 1815.

casioned, to the Wife of a Copyholder, of having to travel from a distance to make in person a surrender of property sold or mortgaged by her Husband.—

5. The liability to publicity consequent on the surrender of Copyholds being made in open Court, and the proceedings being recorded on the Court Rolls which are accessible to all the Tenants of the Manor. This is particularly objectionable with reference to Mortgages.—

6. The liability to absolute forfeiture of the property, if the Owner dig clay or brickearth therefrom, or cut timber, or otherwise commit waste without the previous sanction of the Lord.

Many other grounds might be stated in favor of the Enfranchisement of Copyholds—but the foregoing are some of the more important; and in Cheltenham, where one-half of the property is Copyhold, nothing need be added to shew the importance of the Copyholders availing themselves of the opportunity now offered to them of immediately enfranchising their property on reasonable terms.—

Cheltenham W. H GWINNETT,
19 January, 1863. Steward of the Manor."

One incident of a manor was the right to tithes which sometimes could be acquired by the lords by prescriptions. This incident, as the manors of New York were new, was of little value for no prescription could attach to a new manor. It is singular, however, that in the very first manor erected in Westchester County, that of Fordham, in 1671, provision was made for the payment of a parson when it should have inhabitants. Its Lord, John Archer, and his heirs, were granted the privilege of obliging the inhabitants, when there should be enough of them, to contribute to the maintenance of a minister.[1] Had this been done which it never was, the method of contribution would naturally have been by tithes. As tithes were not known in America, it is perhaps well to explain briefly what they really were. During the first ages of Christianity the clergy were supported by the voluntary offerings of their flocks. But this being a precarious subsistence then, as it is now, the ecclesiastics in every country in Europe, in imitation of the Jewish law, claimed, and in course of time established, a right to the tenth of all the produce of lands. This right appears to have been fully admitted in England before the Norman Conquest, and acquired the name of tithe from a Saxon word signifying tenth. "Dismes or Tithes are an Ecclesiastical inheritance, collateral to the estate of the land, and of their proper nature due only to Ecclesiastical persons by the ecclesiastical law.[2] They were merely a right to the tenth part of the produce of the soil, produce of live stock, and the personal industry of the inhabitants, in return for the benefit the latter derived from the ministry of their spiritual pastors. They were an application of the Mosaic law to modern exigencies, very similar to certain applications of other parts of that dispensation to their own exigencies by the Puritan settlers of New England, and were like the latter, strictly enforced. Both were simply methods of paying the clergy. They were of various kinds and descriptions varying with the products of the soil, but these require no further mention here.

Glebe lands, however, were very common in America, in New York, and in Westchester County. They were lands given as an endowment by the Lords of Manors, and other large landholders, for the support, or in aid of the support, of Rectors, or other clergymen, of parishes. The original parishes of Westchester County all had glebes; and so, towards the close of the Colonial era, had the different churches and parishes erected and formed at different places, out of those parishes. Of course, all the original parishes as well as the later ones, were parishes and churches of the Church of England, as is shown by their very nomenclature. A nomenclature which the dissenting organizations of all kinds always repudiated, and never have used, since they severally came into existence during the last three centuries. Like all English parishes these in Westchester County were territorial divisions, each having Church Wardens, Vestrymen, and minor Parish officers.

In addition to their duties and powers relative to the Parish church, its Rector, and the maintenance, of church services in their fullness and propriety, the Wardens and Vestrymen possessed, exercised, and were by law bound to perform, many civil duties, now laid upon, and performed, by Town and County officers, such as the repairs of highways and bridges, maintenance of the poor, the assessing and collection of rates and taxes, and similar local duties, including the preservation of the public peace. They were not, as Church wardens and Vestrymen now are, officers of a purely ecclesiastical organization, but the civil officers of the parishes or territorial organizations of the church of England, as established by law in the County of Westchester. They were elected by all the freeholders resident in their respective parishes, whatever their religious views might be. And before entering upon the duties of their offices, pursuant to a law of the Province passed the 27th day of July 1721, took the following oath annually, which of itself demonstrates their powers in one of the important respects just mentioned:—

"You do Swear on the Holy Evangelist, That you and every of you shall well and truly execute the Duty of an Assessor, and Equally and Impartially assess the several Freeholders and inhabitants, according to the value of their respective Estates, in an equal proportion, in every of your respective City, Counties, and Precincts, for which you are chose Vestry-men and according to your best Skill and Knowledge therein. You shall spare no persons for Favour or Affection, or grieve any person for Hatred or Ill Will. So Help you God." [1]

[1] Manor Grant of Fordham. II, Bolton, 506, 2d ed., and post.
[2] II. D'Avner's Abridgment of Com. Law, 582.

Their powers and duties of every nature were perfectly well understood and acknowledged, and their authority obeyed, without hesitation, by the people of Westchester County throughout the Colonial era. Occasionally some bitter opponent of the church of England would try to prevent the performance of their legal duties or the legal exercise of their powers, by word, and deed, sometimes with great heat and violence, just, as the dissenting clergy did in matters of the exercise of clerical functions. But their legal rights and duties as parish officers under the laws of the Province were never contested or denied in the Courts of the Province. The People knew them perfectly and acted accordingly. A remarkable proof of this was furnished in the case of the Parish of Rye, in 1794, eleven years after the peace of 1783, and six years after the first organization of the County into townships, in 1688, which terminated the political existence of the Parishes and the Manors. Certain creditors of the "late Parish of Rye," in that year obtained payment of the debts due them from the various newly organized towns formerly parts of that Parish, through an Act of the Legislature of the State passed for that express purpose. The executors of one of the Creditors sued "Joshua Purdy one of the Church Wardens of the late Parish of Rye" and recovered judgment. Thereupon he and the other creditors laid the case before the Legislature which granted the relief sought by passing the following Act, thus showing the continued and acknowledged lawful action of the Parochial officers of the Parish of Rye, under the Ministry Act of 1693, which created the Parish, up to its extinction by the Act of 1784, repealing that Act, and its subsequent transformation into townships by the Act of 1788. The Act with its interesting preamble, and severe provisions for its due enforcement is in these words;—

An Act for raising Monies in arrear from the late Parish of Rye, in the County of Westchester. Passed the 28th of January 1794.

Whereas it hath been represented to the Legislature that a judgment of fourteen pounds damages hath been obtained by the executors of John Lawrence, deceased, against Joshua Purdy, as one of the late Church Wardens of the late Parish of Rye, in the County of Westchester, for monies in arrear to their late testator for keeping and supporting a pauper committed to his care by the said Joshua Purdy, together with the Costs of suit, and that other monies are in arrears from the late parish of Rye to other persons; Therefore;

Be it Enacted by the People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, That it shall and may be lawful for the Supervisors of the said County of Westchester, or the major part of them, and they are hereby required at their next annual meeting to examine into, and ascertain the amount of the monies so recovered as aforesaid, as also the costs of defending the said suit, and to ascertain also the amount of other monies so due from the late Parish of Rye as aforesaid, and to cause the said monies, and also such other sum or sums of money as they shall find to be so due, together with one shilling in the pound for collections, and three pence in the pound for the fees of the County Treasurer for receiving and paying the same, to be levied on and raised from the Towns which constitute the said late Parish of Rye, in the same manner as the contingent charges of the said County are usually raised; which monies when so raised, shall be paid by the Collectors respectively, to the Treasurer of the said County on or before the first Tuesday of February in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, who shall pay the same after deducting his fees, to the persons to whom the monies are due: and if any Collector shall refuse or neglect to perform the duty required of him by this act, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty pounds to the Treasurer of the said County to be recovered with costs in any Court having cognizance thereof by an Action of debt in the name of the Treasurer of the said County for the time being, and to be disposed of for the use of the same County in such manner, and for such purposes as the Supervisors of the said County, or the Major part of them shall think proper and direct.[2]

11.

The Church of England Parochial organization in West Chester County in its relation to the Manors therein.

In England the Boundaries of a Parish and a Manor were often coincident, and in the very earliest times this was generally the case. Later a Manor, often embraced more than one Parish. Sometimes a Parish contained within its limits two or more Manors or parts of Manors, and lands non Manorial. In New York the latter was the case. In the County of Westchester the Parishes erected, in 1693 by an act of the Legislature were, the "Parish of Westchester," and the "Parish of Rye." The former included Westchester, Eastchester, Yonkers and the Manor of Pelham, the latter Rye, Mamaroneck, and Bedford.[3] These divisions were termed the "Precincts" of these Parishes. The Parish of Westchester included the three Manors of Pelham, Morrisania, and Fordham, with the lower part of Philipseburgh. The "Ten Farms," as Eastchester was originally termed, were separated from the mother Parish and erected on the petition of its people into a Parish by itself in the year 1700, under a special act of the Legislature, "by the name and stile of The Parish of Eastchester in the County of Westchester."[1] The "Parish of Rye" included the Manor of Scarsdale, and the non-manorial lands of Rye and Bedford.

[1] II. Bradford's Laws, 211; I. Liv. & Smith, 146.

[2] Laws of the 17th Session A.D. 1794, p. 5.

[3] II. Bradford, 19-20.

Later Yonkers was taken from Westchester, and made a Parish by itself. It was the only Parish entirely embraced within the limits of a Manor, being wholly included within the boundaries of Philipseburgh as they are described in the Manor-Grant of that Manor. New Rochelle was taken out of the Manor of Pelham and eventually made a Parish by itself, though it long continued a Precinct of the Parish of Westchester.

These were the Parishes in Westchester County, one of the four Counties of New York, in which, the Church of England became, under the legal action of the Crown of England in its conquered Province, the Established Church; the others being the Counties of New York, Richmond, and Queens.

A misconception has existed in relation to the origin and establishment of the Church of England in the part of the territory of New York, comprising the four Counties that have been named. It has been owing mainly to the little attention bestowed on the subject, both by those who are now the successors in belief of the Church of England since the American Revolution, and those of the dissenting ecclesiastical organizations. The few writers who have referred to the subject at all, have taken for granted, and honestly believed, that no such establishment ever existed, and, of course, have written in that belief and with that idea. But some attention to the Authorities, and the then law, bearing upon the subject, will show that the current popular opinion is not as well founded as has been supposed.

The question is a purely historical one. And only in an historical point of view can, and will, it be considered here.

From and after the English conquest of New York in 1664, excepting only the fifteen months that the Dutch reconquest of 1673 lasted, under all the English Governors, their Chaplains maintained the services of the Church of England and performed all clerical duties in the chapel in the Fort in New York.

By the several "Commissions" and "Instructions" to the Governors under the signs-manual of their Sovereigns, and their several oaths of office, the different Governors were commanded and compelled to maintain and support the Church of England in the Province of New York. This was the exercise in New York of a power which was legally vested in the Sovereign of England by the law of England, and which by his coronation oath he was bound to exercise. Although so strictly commanded, the Governors were unable to carry out their Instructions in any other way than in the King's chapel in the Fort, as above stated, for twenty-nine years. This was owing to the fact that the English speaking people in the Province were so few in comparison with the Dutch, and the French, (the latter alone being one-fourth of the City population prior to 1790), that the church in the Fort was sufficient for their needs in the City; while those in other parts of the Province where there were any English at all were so very few, that it was impossible to act at all in the matter. All this time it must be borne in mind that the Commissions and Instructions of the Governors were continually in force. At length the increase of the English population became sufficient to justify a movement putting them in operation. On the 28th of August, 1692, Colonel Benjamin Fletcher arrived in New York as Governor in the ship "Wolf," having been appointed by William and Mary on the 18th of the preceding March.[2] He was warmly attached to the Church of England. Chief Justice Lewis Morris in a judicial opinion in 1701, speaks of him as "Colonel Fletcher (justly styled the great patron of the Church of England here)."[3] At his instance, pursuant to his Commission and Instructions, the Legislature, composed of the Governor, Council, and Assembly, answering to the present Governor, Senate and Assembly, passed on the 24th of March, 1693, seven months only after his arrival as Governor, "An Act for Settling a Ministry and Raising a Revenue for them in the City of New York, County of Richmond, Westchester and Queens Counties."[4] This act gave an impetus to the Church of England in New York, which it never afterwards lost. Under it and the efforts and support of a few English Churchmen in the City of New York who had organized themselves into a body styled "The Managers of the Church of England in New York," at the head of which was Colonel Caleb Heathcote, that Church began a growth, which has continued to this day. Increasing ever after, sometimes faster, sometimes slower, that Church became during the Colonial era, as it has continued to be since the American Revolution, under its present title of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, the leading church in influence and standing, but not in numbers, in the City, Province, and now State of New York.

Under, or rather by, this Act of 1693, the Parishes of Westchester County were constituted.

The reasons why this "Ministry Act," as it was commonly styled, was confined to the regions it names in establishing the Church of England have not been adverted to by any writer who has mentioned it. The Counties it designates were the only portions of the Province in which English-speaking people dwelt, with the single exception of the County of Suffolk, in the eastern portion of Long Island. In all the other counties of the Province, the Dutch, with many French in two or three of them, were the sole inhabitants. In those counties the Dutch church, for fifty

[1] II. Bradford, 39.

[2] III. Col. Hist., 846, 833.

[3] Chalmers Opinions, 257.

[4] II. Bradford's Laws, 19.

years prior to 1664, the Established Church in the Province, with which the French Protestants, outside of New York City, generally affiliated, was maintained in its worship, privileges, property and dependence on the Church of Holland, by the Crown of England, pursuant to the Articles of Surrender of 1664, the Treaty of Breda in 1667, and the Articles of Surrender of 1674. All that it really lost by the change of dominion from Holland to England was the pecuniary support it derived from the Dutch West India Company under the different charters of Freedoms and Exemptions, and the title of the 'Established Church.' Hence it was impossible to establish the English Church in those parts of the Province, where not only were there no English-speaking people, but where the pre-existing Dutch Church was guaranteed by the English Crown in its faith, worship, and rights of property, neither of which, by the law of the land, could be interfered with in any way whatsoever. In Suffolk County, the only other English-speaking region of the Province, there existed an Established church, the Congregational Church of New England. That County claimed to be a part of, and was claimed by, the Colony of Connecticut, was represented for years by delegates in the "General Court" at Hartford, and was an integral part of that Colony. As such, the "General Court," under the "Body of Laws of Connecticut, concluded and established in May, 1650," ruled supreme in church and state on the east end of Long Island. What that rule so "established" was, is best stated in the very words of "The Laws of Connecticut Colony." "It is ordered by the Authority of this Court; That no persons within this Colony shall in any wise imbody themselves into Church Estate without consent of the General Court, and the approbation of Neighbour Churches.

"It is also ordered by this Court; That there shall be no Ministry or Church Administration entertained or attended by the Inhabitants of any Plantation in this Colony distinct and separate from and in opposition to that which is openly and publicly observed and dispensed by the approved Minister of the place, except it be by approbation of this Court and Neighbour Churches, upon penalty of the forfeiture of Five pounds for every breach of this order. . . . .

"This Court having seriously considered the great Divisions that arise amongst us about matters of Church Government, for the Honour of God, welfare of the Churches, and preservation of the publick peace so greatly hazarded.

"Do Declare; That whereas the Congregational Churches in these parts for the general[1] of their Profession and practice have hitherto been approved; We can do no less than approve and countenance the same to be without disturbance until better light in an orderly way doth appear.

"But yet forasmuch as sundry persons of worth for prudence and piety amongst us are otherwise perswaded (whose welfare and peaceable satisfaction we desire to accommodate; this Court doth Declare; That all such persons, being so approved according to Law, as Orthodox and Sound in the Fundamentals of Christian Religion, may have allowance in their perswasion and Profession in Church ways or Assemblies without disturbance. . . .

"It is further ordered; That wheresoever the Ministry of the Word is established according to the order of the Gospel throughout this Colony, every person shall duely resort and attend thereunto respectively upon the Lord's day, and upon such publick Fast dayes and dayes of thanksgiving, as are to be generally kept by the appointment of Authority. And if any person within this Jurisdiction, shall without just and necessary cause, withdraw himself from hearing the publick Ministry of the Word, after due means of conviction used, he shall forfeit for his absence from every such meeting five shillings. . . .

"It is ordered by this Court; That the Civil Authority here established hath power and liberty to see the Peace, Ordinances and Rules of Christ be observed in every church according to his Word; as also to deal with any Church member in a way of civil justice notwithstanding any Church relation, office, or interest, so it be done in a civil and not in an ecclesiastical way, nor shall any church censure degrade or depose any man from any Civil Dignity, Office or Authority he shall have in the Colony.[2]

Such was the Established Congregational Church of Connecticut, on the East end of Long Island. To both it and the Colony, the final determination of the Joint-Commission appointed to settle the boundary question after the Dutch surrender, that the eastern part of Long Island was included in the Duke of York's Patent and was a part of New York, was a blow as severe as it was unwelcome, and the people of that region protested against it, but in vain. Although this decision severed the civil connexion between Suffolk County and the Colony of Connecticut, it did not affect the ecclesiastical connexion between them except that it ended the latter's power to enforce its church laws there by the civil arm. And its effect is perceptible to this day, notwithstanding the fact, that Presbyterianism came there about 1717, and that, since the American Revolution, several other forms of Christian belief have obtained a foothold in that County. So strong was, and is, this old feeling, that the editor of the Southampton Records, published in 1877, says in his preface to the second volume, "Had the wishes of the people been consulted, this union would have still continued, and to-day our delegates to the Legislature, would ascend the Connecticut River rather than the Hudson."[3]

These were the causes, the efficiency of which can-

[1] So in the original.

[2] Book of the General Laws, collected out of the Records of the General Court, pp. 21, 22. Brinley's Reprint of 1865, of the ed. of 1673.

[3] Mr. W. S. Pelletreau.

not truthfully be denied, why the English Governors of the Province of New York, in obedience to the "Instructions" of the English King, could take no steps to establish the Church of England, except in those parts of that Province, where it could possibly be done.

The Church of England in New York originated not in this "Ministry Act" as has been so generally believed and stated, but in the earlier action of the English Sovereigns, in virtue of the law of England. That act was merely the second step taken in obedience to the Royal Instructions. It was also an illustration of a principle, which obtained throughout British America from the earliest settlement of Virginia down to the close of the American Revolution. That principle was this, "that some form of religion, dissent from which involved serious civil disabilities was established in nearly all the Colonies by virtue, of either the local or the imperial law." These are the words of Ex-Provost Stillé of the University of Pennsylvania, in his "Religious Tests in Provincial Pennsylvania."[1] Mr. Stillé has treated this subject so ably, and so well, and his conclusions being so nearly identical with those to which its investigation had already led the writer, that his statement (which has only appeared since this portion of this essay was begun) is here given in preference to the writer's own, which was not quite so full, and because it corroborates his views.

"The truth is," says Mr. Stillé, "that during the Colonial period we were essentially a nation of Protestants, with fewer elements outside Protestantism than were to be found in any country of Europe, and that we, forced to do so, either by our own earnest conviction that such was the true method of supporting religion, or by the laws of the Mother-country, took similar methods of maintaining and perpetuating our Protestantism, excluding those who dissented from it from any share in the government, and frankly adopting the policy which had prevailed in England from the time of Queen Elizabeth. . . . . There were, it is true, in some of the Colonies, especially New York, at times 'ineffectual murmurings' against laws which forced people to pay taxes for the support of a ministry whose teachings were not in harmony with the religious sentiment of the great mass of the inhabitants,[2] and in Pennsylvania there was a long, and at last a successful struggle to induce the Imperial Government to regard the affirmation of a Quaker as equivalent to the oath of another man; but if there were any men in our Colonial history who, after the example of William Penn, and Lord Baltimore, lifted up their voices to protest, as these men had done, against the violation of the principle of religious liberty here, I have not been able to discover their names. The only subject of a quasi-ecclesiastical nature which appears to have excited general interest and to have met determined opposition was a scheme, at one time said to have been in contemplation of sending Bishops to this country. It was opposed not so much because it was thought to be the first step towards forming a Church Establishment in this [whole] country, as because the Colonists had a peculiar abhorrence of the methods of enforcing the jurisdiction of the English Church as they were familiar with them in the old country. They may have forgotten many of the sufferings they had endured in England in consequence of their non-conformity and even committed themselves to a theory of Church establishment, but there was one thing they never could forget, and that was the prelatical government of Land and the High Commission, and upon this were founded the popular notions of the authority wielded by Bishops. . . . I I am well aware that these statements of the general prevalence of a principle here during the Colonial period, which in contrast to that now universally recognized I must call the principle of religious intolerance, will appear to many too wide and sweeping. But a very slight examination of the provisions in this subject in the laws of the Colonies will, if I mistake not, produce a different impression. In Virginia where the English Church was early established by law and endowed, men who refused or neglected to bring their children to be baptized were punished with civil penalties; Quakers were expelled from the Colony, and should they return thither a third time, they were liable to capital punishment. Any one who denied the Trinity or the truth of the Christian religion was deprived by the Act of 1704 of his civil rights, and was rendered incapable of suing for any gift or legacy. In New England, except in Rhode Island, religious intolerance was very bitter. It is true that in Massachusetts, under the charter of 1691, the power of committing those barbarous acts of persecution of which the theocracy of the old standing order had been guilty was taken away, and all Christians, save Roman Catholics, were permitted to celebrate their worship, yet none but members of the Congregational Church could be freemen, and all were taxed for the support of the Ministry of that Church. In Maine which was a District of Massachusetts, in New Hampshire, and in Connecticut, the same general system of religious intolerance prevailed. Conformity was the inflexible rule throughout New England. In New York, the Dutch were protected by the provisions of the Treaty of Breda, which guaranteed them the possession of their property then held there for religious purposes and their ecclesiastical organization.[3] But the royal Governors of that Province expelled any Catholic priests who might be found within their territory on the plea that they were exciting the Indians to revolt against the government, and they established the English Church, so far as it could be done in a Province where the Episcopalians were very few in number by requiring each of the towns to raise money for the support of the clergy of that church, by dividing the country into parishes, and by exercising the power of collating and inducting into these parishes such Episcopal Rectors as they thought fit.[1] In New Jersey, after the surrender of the Charter, when the Colony came directly under the royal authority in 1702, liberty of conscience was proclaimed in favor of all except Papists and Quakers; but as the latter were required to take oaths as qualifications for holding office, or for acting as jurors or witnesses in judicial proceedings, they, of course the great mass of the population, were practically disfranchised. But the story of the arbitrary measures taken by the Governor of this Colony [New Jersey], Lord Cornbury, to exclude from office or the control of public affairs all except those who conformed to the Church of England is too well known to need to be retold here. In Maryland the English Church was established in 1696, and one of the first acts of the newly organized Province was to disfranchise those very Catholics and their children by whom the doctrine of religious liberty had been established in the law of 1649. In Carolina after the fanciful and impracticable Constitution devised for it by the celebrated philosopher, John Locke, had been given up, by which the English Church had been established, and endowed in the Colony, the Church feeling was so strong, and the determination to secure its supremacy so unyielding, that an Act was passed in 1704 requiring all members of the Assembly to take the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England. Georgia, following the example of her elder sisters, gave free exercise of religion to all except Papists, and such rights in this respect as any native born Englishman at that time possessed; a grant, as we have seen, of very doubtful value to English nonconformists, then ruled by the tender mercies of the Toleration Act.[2] The result of this review is to show that in all the Colonies named except, perhaps, Rhode Island, liberty of worship was the rule, excepting, of course, in the case of Roman Catholics. Throughout the Colonies, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, the man who did not conform to the established religion of the Colony, whether it was Congregationalism in New England, or the Episcopal form elsewhere, was not in the same position in regard to the enjoyment of either civil or religious rights as he who did conform. If he were a Roman Catholic he was everywhere wholly disfranchised. For him there was not even the legal right of public worship. If he were a Protestant differing in his creed from the type of Protestantism adopted by the rulers, although he could freely celebrate in nearly all the Colonies his peculiar form of worship, he was nevertheless excluded from any share in public affairs. He could neither vote nor hold office,[3] and he was forced to contribute to the support of a religious ministry whose teachings he in his heart abhorred. And this condition of things, extraordinary as it seems to us now, had not been brought about by any conscious arbitrary despotism on the part of the rulers, but was the work of good but narrow-minded men who were simply following out the uniform practice of the Christian world, and who no doubt honestly thought that in so acting they were doing the highest service by obeying the will of God."[4]

[1] IX. Penn. Mag. of History, 372.

[2] The laws in the New England Colonies, though not mentioned by Mr. Stillé, were still more severe than the Ministry Act of New York in compelling dissenters from the Puritanism of those colonies, to pay taxes to support their "Established Church."

[3] The articles of the two "surrenders of 1664 and 1674," should have been mentioned also in this connexion.

The Ministry Act of New York was simply the carrying out as far as it was possible of the Commission and the "Instructions" which Governor Fletcher had received from the King. These "Instructions" to the Governors of the British Crown Colonies, which were delivered by the English Sovereigns in writing to each Governor when first appointed, were the Constitutions of the Colonies under which they were ruled by their Governors, just as the Charters from the same Sovereigns were the Constitutions of the Chartered Colonies under which they were governed. Both were given in the exercise of the Royal Prerogative, and were in fact grants of it. The charters could not be revoked except for cause as long as they were lived up to and obeyed. The "Instructions" were the Royal directions from the King for the governing of his Province, and could be altered, varied, or revoked at his pleasure. In point of fact they were never changed in the time of each Governor, except to meet some exigency not contempleted when they were issued. Upon the appointment of a new Governor, either new "Instructions" were given to him, or, if those of the preceding Governor were satisfactory to the Province and the King, he was simply directed to carry them out as his own.

The Instructions of Charles II. to Sir Richard Nicolls the first English Governor of New York, dated the 23d of April, 1664, five months prior to the capture of New York from the Dutch, directed him to avoid giving umbrage to the people of Massachusetts, where he was to stop on his way to New York, by being present at their devotions in their churches, but the document thus continues, "though wee doe suppose and thinke it very fit that you carry with you some learned and discreete Chaplaine, orthodox in his judgment and practice, who in your owne

[1] All this was done under the "Ministry Act" above mentioned, and its amendments, An Act which was not repealed till 1784, one year after the establishment of Independence. It was the binding law of New York from 1693 to 1784, full ninety years.

[2] I. W. and M., Ch. 18. Exempting dissenters from the penalties of certain laws against non-conformity, but requiring an oath against transubstantiation, and of allegiance to William and Mary.

[3] New York was an exception to this, as to all religions, except the Roman Catholic.

[4] IX. Penna. Mag. Hist., 372-376.

familyes will reade the book of Common Prayer and performe your devotion according to ye forme established in the Church of England, excepting only in wearing the surplesse which haveing never bin seen in those countryes may conveniently be forborne att this tyme." [1]

The Instructions of Lovelace the second Governor seem not to have been preserved, but he says in a letter of the 28th of August, 1668, to Secretary Lord Arlington: "I have since happily accomphisht my voyadge and am now invested in the charge of His Royal Highnesses teritorys being the middle position of the two distinct factions, the Papist and Puritane." [2]

In the time of Thomas Dongan, afterward the Earl of Limerick, the third Governor of New York, Charles the Second died, the Duke of York succeeded as James the Second, and his Lord Proprietorship merging in the Crown, New York thenceforward became a Royal Province, governed directly by the King through his appointed Governor. Though a Roman Catholic himself, and his Governor, Dongan, was of the same religion, James, as King, acted promptly, and without hesitation, and gave Dongan the most pointed, and strongest possible, "Instructions" to establish the Church of England in New York. A King of England by the law of England could not do otherwise. But the thoroughness of James's action under the circumstances is very surprising. His "Instructions" to Dongan bear date May the 29th, 1686. They not only established the Church of England, but also placed it under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and are in these words:

"31. You shale take especial care that God Almighty bee devoutly and duely served throughout yo^{r} Government: the Book of Common Prayer as it is now established, read each Sunday and Holyday, and the Blessed Sacrament administred according to the Rites of the Church of England. You shall bee careful that the Churches already builtt here shall bee well and orderly kept and more built as y^{e} Colony shall, by Gods blessing bee improved. And that besides a competent maintenance to be assigned to y^{e} Minister of each Church, a convenient House bee built at the Comon charge for each Minister, and a competent Proportion of Land assigned him for a Glebe and exercise of his Industry.

"32. And you are to take care that the Parishes bee so limited & settled as you shall find most convenient for ye accomplishing this good work.

"33. Our will and pleasure is that noe minister be preferred by you to any Ecclesiastical Benefice in that our Province without a Certificat from ye most Reverend the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury of his being conformable to ye Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England, and of a good life and conversation.

34. And if any person preferred already to a Benefice shall appear to you to give scandal either by his Doctrine or Manners, you are to use the best means for y^{e} removal of him; and to supply the vacancy in such manner as we have directed. And alsoe our pleasure is, that, in the direction of all Church Affairs, the Minister bee admitted into the respective vestrys.

And to th^{e} end the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction of the said Archbishop of Canterbury may take place in that our Province as farr as conveniently may bee. Wee doe think fitt that you give all countenance and encouragement in y^{e} exercise of the same; excepting only the Collating to Benefices, granting licenses for Marriage, and Probate of Wills, which wee have reserved to you our Gov^{r} & to y^{e} Commander-in-chief for the time being.

"36. And you are to take especial care, that a Table of Marriages established by ye Canons of the Church of England, bee hung up in all Orthodox churches and duly observed.

"37. And you are to take especial care that Books of Homilys & Books of the 39 Articles of y^{e} Church of England bee disposed of to every of y^{e} said churches, and that they bee only kept and used therein.

"38. And wee doe further direct that noe Schoolmaster bee henceforth permitted to come from England & to keep school within our Province of New York, without the license of the said Archbishop of Canterbury; And that noe other person now there, or that shall come from other parts, bee admitted to keep school without your license first had."

In the face of these direct, positive "Instructions" of James II. to Governor Dongan there can be no question that the King in the legal exercise of his power as King, as soon as it was possible after he came to the throne of England established the Church of England in his former Proprietary, and now Royal, Province of New York, subject only to the articles of surrender of 1664, of 1674, and the treaty of Breda in 1667, which guaranteed the continued existence therein of its former established Church of Holland with all its rights of faith, discipline, and property; and subject also as far as Suffolk County was concerned, to the pre-existing Congregational Church of Connecticut as there practically established under the authority of the General Court of that Colony. If the latter was a legal establishment under the laws or charter of Connecticut prior to the Dutch surrender in 1664 and the treaty of Breda in 1667, then the King of England was legally bound to maintain it as such. He did immediately after the first Dutch surrender, by his commissioners make a change in the civil condition of Suffolk County by deciding that Long Island, of which it was then, as it is now, the eastern end, was not a part of Connecticut, but was a part of New York. He appointed civil officers in Suffolk County, and instituted there the complete civil and military jurisdiction of New York, but made no change whatever in its ecclesiastical condition, which continued precisely the same as when it claimed to be a part of Connecticut.

[1] III. N. Y. Col. Hist. 49. [2] Ibid. 174.

The above-cited provisions of the Instructions of King James to Governor Dongan relative to the Church of England in New York were continued by William III., Anne, George I., George II., and George III. in their different "Instructions" to the different Governors of New York they successively appointed, with little or no variation in language and none in effect.[1] Occasionally a new one was added, as in the Instructions to Lord Cornbury when he was appointed Governor by Queen Anne, dated the 29th of January, 1702, in which, clause No. 63, is in these words;—"You are to inquire whether there be any minister within your Government who preaches and administers the Sacrament in any orthodox church or chapel without being in due orders and to give an account thereof to the Bishop of London." The use of the word "Minister" in these various Instructions is shown by the context of them, and markedly in this additional one to Cornbury, to mean and to designate clergymen only of the Church of England. And the same thing may be said of the term "Orthodox Church," for by law neither the King nor the Bishop could acknowledge, or have any ecclesiastical jurisdiction over, any Minister or any Church which did not belong to the Church of England. No other church and no other other clergyman could be, in the eye of the law, either of England or New York, orthodox. King William, as King, formally approved the Ministry Act of 1693 passed by the Legislature of New York, and as by the law of England he could not acknowledge any other church as orthodox or any other Ministers, as Ministers, except those of the Church of England, it follows that the words and terms of that act referred to the Church of England and only to that church. That this is the sense, and the only legal sense, in which these words were then used, is shown by an opinion of Sir Edward Northey, the Attorney-General, in 1705, asked by the Board of Trade and Plantations, upon the grant of ecclesiastical power in the Patent of Maryland, which closes with these words, "and the consecrations of chapels ought to be, as in England, by Orthodox Ministers only."[2]

No English Governor has been more denounced for his action in regard to the church of England than Lord Cornbury, and his official acts concerning it have been abused in almost every possible way. His action has been taken as the result of pure bigotry, and he termed a bigot, while he was merely carrying out the Instructions he had sworn to support and maintain. His "Instructions" are therefore here given at length, taken from the original Instrument which with his Commission under the hand and seal of Queen Anne, are now in the hands of a gentleman in New York.

From the Instructions to Lord Cornbury, dated January 29, 1702–3.

60. You shall take especial care that God Almighty be devoutedly and duly served throughout your Government, the Book of Common prayer, as by Law established, read each Sunday and Holy day, and the blessed Sacrament administered according to the rites of the Church of England; You shall be carefull that the Churches already built there be well and orderly kept, and that more be built as the Colony shall by God's blessing be improved, and that besides a Competent maintenance to be assigned to the Minister of each Orthodox Church, a convenient house be built at the Common charge for each Minister, and a competent proportion of Land assigned him for a Glebe and exercise of his Industry. And you are to take care that the parishes be so limited and setled, as you shall find most convenient for the accomplishing this good work.

61. You are not to present any Minister to any Ecclesiasticall Benefice in that Our Province without a certificate from the right reverend Father in God the Bishop of London, of his being conformable to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England, and of a good life and conversation, and if any person preferred already to a Benefice shall appear to you to give Scandall, either by his doctrine or Manners, You are to use the best means for the removal of him, and to Supply the Vacancy in Such manner as Wee have directed.

62. You are to give order forthwith (if the same be not already done) that every Orthodox Minister within your Government, be one of the Vestry in his respective parish, and that no Vestry be held without him, except in case of Sickness, or that after notice of a Vestry Summon'd he omitt to come.

63. You are to enquire whether there be any Minister within your Government, who preaches and administers the Sacrament in any Orthodox Church or Chappell without being in due Orders, and to give an account thereof to the said Bishop of London.

64. And to the end the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction of the Said Bishop of London may take place in that province So farr as conveniently may be, Wee do think fitt, that you give all Countenance and encouragement to the exercise of the Same. Excepting only the Collating to Benefices, granting Lycenses for Marriages and probate of Wills, which Wee have reserved to you Our Governour and to the Commander-in-chief of Our Said Province for the time being.

65. Wee do further direct that no Schoolmaster be henceforth permitted to come from England, and to keep Schoole within Our Province of New York, without the Lycense of the said Bishop of London, and that no other person now there, or that shall come from other parts, be admitted to keep School without your Lycense first obtained.

66. And you are to take especial care that a Table of Marriages, established by the Canons of the Church of England be hung up in every orthodox Church and duly observed, and you are to endeavour to get a Law past in the Assembly of that province (if not already done) for the strict observation of the Said Table.

[1] In the 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th volumes of the "Col. Hist. of N. Y." nearly all of them may be found.

[2] Chalmers' opinions, 42. The italics are the writer's, and not in the original.

79. And you are also with the assistence of the Council and Assembly to find out the best means to facilitate and encourage the conversion of Negroes and Indians to the Christian Religion; more especially you are to use your endeavours with the Assembly that they make provision for the maintenance of some Ministers to inhabit amongst the five Nations of Indians in order to instruct them, and also to prevent their being Seduced from their Allegiance to us, by French priests and Jesuits.

In the instance not only of Cornbury but of each Governor, it must be remembered that these "Instructions" were, not merely directions to him personally, but were the binding constitutions of the Province in all things civil, military, and ecclesiastical, during each Governor's period of office. They were the law of the land both for the Governor and the people, which was to be obeyed by both. They were laid down, and set forth, by each Sovereign, in his Kingly capacity, under the law of England for the government of his or her Province of New York. This fact has not been considered by American historians, or by English ones either, in treating of the civil and religious,—especially the religious—aspects and conditions of the Royal Provinces in America in general, and of New York in particular.

What then was the Kingly authority in these respects? Whence came the monarch's legal right to govern his Royal Provinces by "Instructions" to his representatives the Governors? What were the powers then vested in the Crown by the laws of England?

The attributes of the Monarch of England, sovereignty, perfection,[1] and perpetuity,[2] which are inherent in, and constitute, his political capacity, prevail in every part of the territories subject to the English Crown. "In such political capacity as King he is possessed of a share of legislation, is the head of the Church, generalissimo throughout his dominions, and is alone entitled to make war and peace.[3] But in countries which, though dependent on the British Crown, have different local laws, as for instance the Colonies the minor prerogatives and interests of the Crown must be regulated and governed by the peculiar law of the place. But if such law be silent on the subject," or if the place has become by conquest or cession a Colony or Province of the Crown, having never before been possessed by the English nation, "it would appear that the prerogative of the King in his political capacity as chief of the State, as established by English law, prevails in every respect."[4] "When a country is obtained by conquest or treaty the King possesses an exclusive prerogative power over it, and may entirely change or new-model, the whole, or part, of its laws, and form of government, and may govern it in all respects by regulations framed by himself, subject only to the Articles or Treaty on which the country is surrendered or ceded, which are always sacred and inviolable according to their true intent and meaning.[5] Lord Mansfield thus most fully and succinctly lays down the law on this subject, citing New York as an example. "A country conquered by the British arms becomes a dominion of the King in right of his crown. . . . After the conquest of New York, in which most of the old Dutch inhabitants remained, King Charles 2d changed the form of their Constitution and political government, by granting it to the duke of York, to hold of his crown under all the regulations contained in the letters patent." "It is not to be wondered at," continues the Great Chief Justice of England, "that an adjudged case in point has not been produced. No question was ever started before but that the King has a right to a legislative authority over a conquered country; it was never denied in Westminster Hall; it was never questioned in parliament."[6] This decision was made in the Court of King's Bench in 1774—a century after the practical application of, and action under, its principle, by Charles the Second, and James the Second, and William & Mary in their Province of New York, to say nothing of Queen Anne and her successors. There can therefore be no question as to the law itself, or the legality of the power by which the Sovereigns of England, by their "Commissions" and "Instructions" to their Governors, established the Church of England in their American Province of New York.

Now what was a "Province" in law? This term, in Latin Provincia, was first used by the Romans to designate a portion of territory outside of Italy, which they had subjected by conquest. Its general use, however, says Chief Justice Stokes of the Colony of Georgia, is "to denote the divisions of a Kingdom or State, as they are usually distinguished by the extent of their civil or ecclesiastical jurisdiction. With us, [the English people] a Province signifies—1st. An out-country governed by a Deputy or Lieutenant; and 2dly, The circuit of an Archbishop's jurisdiction. When the British settlements in America are spoken of in general, they are called the Colonies or Plantations. If it is a Government on the Continent [in contradistinction to the West India Islands] where the King appoints the Governor it is usually called a Province, as the Province of Quebec; but a Plantation in which the Governor was elected by the inhab-

[1] This is expressed by the well-known legal axiom "The King can do no wrong."

[2] This is expressed by that other well-known axiom "The King is dead, long live the King."

[3] Chalmers' Opinions, 150.

[4] Chitty's Prerogatives of the Crown, 25 and 26.

[5] Ibid. 29; Cowper's Rep. 208.

[6] Hall v. Campbell, Cowper's Reports, 208, 211. Calvin's Case 4 Coke's Rep. 1.

itants, (under a charter of incorporation from the King) was usually called a Colony, as the Colony of Connecticut."[1] Thus the very name was expressive of the character of the King's power by virtue of which he erected and established in New York Manors, Parishes, Churches and a General Assembly. Sir William Blackstone in speaking of the American Provinces, says, "In the Provincial Establishments (commonly called King's Governments) their constitution depended on the respective commissions issued by the Crown to the Governors, and the Instructions which usually accompanied these commissions; under the authority of which Provincial Assemblies were constituted with the power of making local ordinances, not repugnant to the laws of England."[2] It is clear, and beyond question, that the very authority by which New York was granted the right to possess and elect a representative Assembly of its own people, a privilege granted to it by William and Mary in 1691, which continued from that time without interruption as long as it remained a British Province, sprang from precisely the same source, as the establishment of the Church of England within its limits—the Commission and King's Instructions to his Governors; To say nothing of the first granting of the right to elect and hold Assemblies by James II. himself as Duke of York to Governor Dongan in 1683, eleven years before; which assemblies sat for three years, and the laws which they passed in those years, still in existence, are the earliest English statutes of New York; and which assemblies were called and held solely by virtue of James's "Commission" and "Instructions" to Governor Dongan.

There is another point of importance in this connexion. Every Commission to every Governor from every Sovereign of New York, contained in it a clause, delegating to him the power of collation to church benefices, a power under the law of England which could be exercised only in the Church of England. It was in these words, "And we do by these presents authorize and impower you to collate any person or persons to any churches, chapels, or other ecclesiastical benefices within our said province and territories as aforesaid, as often as any of them shall happen to be void."[3] This was the delegation by the King of his own power as Ordinary. This word derived from the Civil Law primarily signifies one who, of his own right, has authority to take cognizance of causes. In the common law it is usually applied to the Bishop of a Diocese, who only could certify to ecclesiastical and spiritual acts in his own diocese. The King as the Head of the Church possessed this temporal right throughout his whole Kingdom, and could delegate it. The Bishop could only delegate his power in temporal ecclesiastical matters in his own diocese. As there were no dioceses as such in the British American Colonies, the King delegated the power of collating to benefices here to his different Governors as his personal representatives. From the same source came their power to grant probate of wills, and marriage licenses.

The spiritual supervision of the Church of England in America, was, as we have seen, first committed by King James to the Archbishop of Canterbury. Later it was deemed most convenient to attach this supervision to the Bishop of London, who appointed "Commissaries" in different parts of America, to oversee the clergy in their different districts, in such matters not purely episcopal, as a Bishop did in his Diocese in England.

As there were then no Dioceses in America, the King in the different Instructions to the Governors, directed them to retain these powers, of collation, to benefices, of granting probate of wills, and of licensing marriages to themselves. This was in virtue both of the King's Legislative power, and his power as Head of the church. Perhaps nothing has been, or is, more misunderstood, and that very honestly, in America than the Royal Supremacy of the Church of England. Of course, it cannot be treated at length here. We can only state the popular idea of it, and then show what it really is. The popular idea of it in this country is, that the Sovereign of England was, and is, the head of the Church of England in spiritual as well as temporal matters, and is the superior of the Archbishops and Bishops in all that relates to their offices as such, and is governed by his or her own ideas of what is true and right in matters of doctrine and discipline. Of course this is only the common idea, but it is held by many people of education and general intelligence nevertheless, who are, and are usually considered, well informed.

A recent writer after citing and examining the legal authorities, and writers of England since the Reformation, on this subject, says, "These numerous authorities repeat again and again the same opinions touching the supremacy of the Crown. According to them the Royal Supremacy is simply and strictly a temporal or civil power over all causes and persons in things temporal, and over spiritual persons and causes as far as their temporal or civil accidents are concerned. But it has no inherent spiritual power as such, nor ecclesiastical authority, whatsoever, the spirituality alone possessing the power of the Keys."[4] Lord Selborne the learned and eminent Lord High Chancellor in Mr. Gladstone's late Government says, "The Sovereign has not (as some suppose) a temporal supremacy in temporal things and a spiritual supremacy in spiritual things; it is one undivided temporal supremacy, extending to all persons, causes, and things, whether ecclesiastical or civil, of which the law of the land takes cognizance, and upon which that law has

[1] Constitutions of the British Colonies in America, 2.

[2] 1 Blackstone's, Comm. 108.

[3] Stokes's Cons. of the Am. Colonies, 158. And see the different Commissions themselves in the volumes of the Colonial History.

[4] Fuller's Appellate Jurisdiction of the Crown, 186.

operation. It does not and it can not extend to the province of religious belief, or to moral and spiritual obligations recognized by the conscience as springing from a source higher than the laws of the land."[1] That most eloquent and able prelate, Wilberforce Bishop of Winchester, when Bishop of Oxford, in a debate in the House of Lords, in which this subject was brought up, thus spoke out:—"he did not believe that it was a correct or constitutional interpretation of that supremacy, to say that the occupant of the throne should settle in his or her individual capacity, articles of faith or any other questions whatever. He was sure that the exalted personage who at present occupied the throne would be herself the first to repudiate so unconstitutional a doctrine. The Supremacy of the Crown meant nothing more than this, that the Crown had the ultimate Appeal in all questions ecclesiastical and civil, deciding such questions not of herself, but through her proper constitutional agents." And Mr. Gladstone himself writes, in his Letter on the Royal Supremacy;—"I contend that the Crown did not claim by statute, either to be by right, or to become by convention, the source of that Kind of action which was committed by the Saviour to the Apostolic church, whether for the enactment of laws or for the administration of its discipline; but the claim was that all the canons of the church, and all its judicial proceedings, inasmuch as they were to form parts respectively of the laws and the administration of justice in the Kingdom, should run only with the assent and Sanction of the Crown."

This full statement has been written to show, that in their Province on the Hudson, the Sovereigns of England in virtue of their political, ecclesiastical, and legislative, capacities, as Sovereigns under the laws of England, through their direct "Commissions" and "Instructions" under their own signs-manual, legally established and maintained in that Province, by precisely the same legal instruments and methods, the same form of civil government and the same form of religious belief, that was established in England, as far forth as both could possibly be there done, consistently with the Surrenders and Treaty by which the Province became a possession of their Crown. And it also shows, that historically, the existence in New York, of a General Assembly of elected representatives of the people, of Manors, of the Church of England with its Parishes, and taxation of all inhabitants for the support of its Ministers and churches, had one and all exactly the same origin, and were equally the legitimate results, of the legitimate action, of its legitimate Sovereign authority, the monarchs of England.

12.

The Manors and the County in their Mutual relations, with the Origin and Organization of the latter.

The six Manors of the County of Westchester, in the order of their erection, were 'Fordham' in November 1671, 'Pelham' in October 1687, 'Philipsborough' in June 1693, 'Morrisania' in May 1697, 'Cortlandt' in June 1697, and 'Scarsdale' in March 1701. As the 'Manor of Cortlandt' comprised the whole northern part of the County from the Hudson to the Connecticut line, and was ten miles in width, it will be described first, then following the order of location of the others down the eastern side of the county to its southern extremity, 'Scarsdale,' 'Pelham,' 'Morrisania,' and 'Fordham,' will be suceessively treated, then 'Philipsborough,' which comprised the entire western portion of the County bordering upon the Hudson as far north as the south line of the Manor of Cortlandt, and extended eastwardly to the Bronx River which runs through the centre of the County from north to south and was the boundary between it and the manors of the east side.

The general nature and history of Manors in a legal point of view, the origin of the ancient manorial system of England, its tenures, and the modern manorial system of New York with its incidents, and tenure introduced by the English upon its capture from the Dutch, have been described. But before treating of each of the Manors separately, the general Province and County Jurisdiction as it affected the Manors as a whole, and the origin and formation of the County itself will be shown.

The authority of the Governor, as Governor, of the Governor and Council in the Executive capacity of the latter, and of the Governor, Council in its legislative capacity, and the General Assembly, the three together forming the Legislature of the Province, extended throughout the manors of New York in all respects save one. Neither of these authorities could in any way whatever alter, change, abridge, or in any way interfere with the franchises, rights, powers, privileges, and incidents, vested in any Lord of a Manor by his Manor-Grant. The Lords might not choose, or desire, to exercise any one or more of the franchises, rights, powers, privileges, and incidents of their Manors. This was a matter in their own discretion. but none of them could become void by non-user, nor could the Province authorities of any grade modify them in any way. If the Lords preferred, or had no objection, to have any local duties, legal acts, or offices, exercised by justices of the peace, assessors, constables, and other minor officers, either chosen by their tenants alone, or by their tenants in connection with the inhabitants, freeholders of any adjoining non-Manorial lands, this could be done by an act of the Provincial Legislature. But no act of such a nature could be passed against their wishes. Hence there are to be found many acts of the kind alluded to in the Colony laws.

The jurisdiction of the "Supreme Court," of the "Inferior Court of Common Pleas" and of the Court of Sessions, extended to all lands whether Manorial or non Manorial.

[1] Letter of Lord Selborne, then Sir Roundell Palmer, Atty. Gen., of 30 Dec. 1850, in Plymouth Herald of 11th Jan. 1851. Fuller, app. B. 251.

So too, in the matter of elections, the inhabitants of all the Manors, (except that of Cortlandt which had a representative of its own as a franchise of its Manor-Grant) united with the people of the non-Manorial lands in the choice of Members of Assembly for the County.

The power of the High Sheriff of the County, who was always a gentleman, was appointed by the Governor, and served without pay, as in England, was as complete and thorough in the Manors as out of them. The fees of the office, which were vastly lighter in proportion, than those of elected Sheriffs now, went after being reported to, and scrutinized by the High Sheriff, to the Undersheriff and the one or two deputies, who were all that the business of the County required in the Colonial era. If any overcharge or oppression, was attempted, a complaint properly proven, to the High Sheriff himself, was all that was necessary to right the wrong.

Again, in military matters, the military organization of the County was effected in the County as a whole without regard to the Manors. Sometimes, however, their names were given to the companies enrolled within their limits.

A Colonel for the County commissioned by the Governor, commanded the one regiment, which was formed of the enrolled companies within its limits, all of which were infantry. Toward the close of the Colonial period, when the population had increased, a Light Horse organization of one or two troops for the County in general was formed, the Commander of which was a Lieutenant-Colonel, or Colonel. The inhabitants of the Manors were enrolled in both precisely as were those of the rest of the County.

The third act passed by the first Assembly under William and Mary in 1691, provided for the annual election in each town of "a certain Freeholder" "to supervize and examine the Publick and Necessary Charge of each respective County, which persons so duely chosen shall elect and constitute a certain Treasurer for each respective County." It also provided for the election of two Freeholders in each town as Assessors. This was the origin in New York of County Assessors, Supervisors, and Treasurers.[1] Only Freeholders could be electors, and the second Act of 1691, defines a Freeholder to be, "every one who shall have Forty shillings per annum (N. Y. Currency) in Freehold."[2] And the same act apportioned to Westchester County two Members of Assembly. In the second year of Queen Anne, eleven years later, this third act of 1691 was re-enacted in an enlarged and amended form. Its provisions are worth quoting in full as showing the early internal economy civil and political of the County and how all interests manorial and non-manorial moved in harmony and unison. Its words are "That there be elected and chosen once every year, in each respective Town within this Province, by the Freeholders and Inhabitants thereof, one of their Freeholders and Inhabitants, to compute, ascertain, examine, oversee, and allow the Contingent public and necessary charge of each County, and that each and every Freeholder in any Manor, Liberty, Jurisdiction, Precinct, and out-Plantation, shall have liberty to joyn his or their Vote with the next adjacent town in the County where such Inhabitant shall dwell, for a choice of Supervisor (except the Manor of Rensselaerswyck who shall have liberty to chuse a Supervisor for the same Mannor). And also, that there shall be in each Town, Mannor, and Precinct, by the Freeholders and Inhabitants hereof, in every respective County annually two Assessors, and one Collector, which Supervizors, Assessors, and Collectors, shall be annually chose in every Town on the first Tuesday in April, or such days as is appointed by their Charters or Patents, which Supervizors so chosen shall annually meet at the County Town in each respective County, on the first Tuesday in October, and at such other time and times as the said Supervizors shall judge and find necessary and Convenient," to perform the duties of their office.[3]

In 1722 the number of Supervizors was increased in the County of Westchester by a special Act, passed on the 6th of November in that year, as the former Act which applied to the whole Province, worked unequally in some respects in Westchester. It provided "for such Mannor or Mannors as (in their Rates and Taxes) have usually been or hereafter may be divided into two or more Divisions. That a Supervizor may in like manner be chosen for each of such Divisions by the Freeholders and Inhabitants thereof. And where the said Inhabitants shall omit to make such annual choice in any of the said Divisions, or in such Mannor or Mannors, where not above twenty Inhabitants do dwell or reside, the Owner or Owners of such Mannor or Mannors, or of such Division thereof as aforesaid, or their Stewards or Deputies, shall be deemed and esteemed the Supervizors thereof respectively, and have the same Powers, to all intents, constructions, and purposes, whatsoever as those chosen by virtue of the Act above mentioned.[4]

The act of 1703 called for the annual meeting of the Supervisors at the "County-town," which then was the Town of Westchester. In 1745 the population had so much increased as to make a change to another part of the County desirable, therefore an act was passed on the 27th of November in that year changing the place of meeting as "much for the ease of the people," which provided that "the annual meeting shall be at the School House in the Town of Rye," and that the majority shall have power to adjourn to such time and place as they see proper.[5]

The next change did not occur till 1773, twenty-

[1] III. Bradford 6. [2] Ibid. 3.

[3] III. Bradford, 53. [4] III. Bradford 212.

[5] I Van Schaak's Laws, ch. 804.

eight years later. Then another act was passed changing the annual meeting of the Supervizors "to the Court-House at Whiteplains on account of the increase of inhabitants of the northerly part of said County," with a like liberty to adjourn to such time and place as they should please.[1] This building was the first Court-House in Whiteplains which was burned by the Americans a day or two after the battle of Whiteplains in 1776. It stood on the same site as its successor, the old wooden Court-House on Main St., which was pulled down after the erection of the present handsome stone edifice on Rail-Road Avenue.

Another fact of interest which shows the upward march of population of the people, both of the manors and the towns is the change in the place holding the County elections which it produced. The Colonial elections, it must be remembered, were not by ballot as ours are now, but like those in England, viva voce. The term "hustings" was, and is used in England to describe the place of election, but though the thing was the same in New York, the word does not seem to have been in use here. At least no instance of its employment has been met with by the writer,

The first law on the subject passed in 1699 directed that the Sheriff "shall hold his Court for the same Election at the most publick and usual Place of Election within City or County where the same has most usually been made."[2] This was usually at Westchester before it was chartered as a "Boroughtown" and after that at Eastchester.

But in 1751, on the 25th of November the place was changed by a special act of the Legislature,[3] which is of such curious interest for its reasons and choice of a new place, and its stern enforcement of that choice that it is here given in full.

"Whereas the County of Westchester is very extensive, and the extreme parts thereof to the Northward, have of late years become very populous; and whereas the Elections for Representatives to serve in the General Assembly for the said County, have, from the first settlement of the said County, been held at the Southern Part of said County; it now becomes extremely inconvenient for the Freeholders of the Upper or Northern Parts thereof, which are now become, by far, the most numerous, to attend those Elections at so great a distance from their respective Habitations: For Remedy whereof for the Future;

I. Be it Enacted by his Excellency the Governor, the Council, and the General Assembly and by Authority of the Same, That in All Elections hereafter to be Made in the said County of Westchester, for electing Representatives to serve in this, or any future Assembly of this Colony, the Sheriff of the Said County for the time being, or his Deputy, shall hold his Court of Election at or near the Presbyterian Meeting-House in the White-Plains, in the said County, and at no other Place Whatsoever; any Law, Usage, or Custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

II. And be it Further Enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That if any Sheriff of the said Counsy of Westchester, or Deputy of the said Sheriff, Shall after the Publication of this Act, in the Execution of any Writ or Writs for the electing "Representatives for the Said County, to serve in this or any future Assembly, act contrary to the Directions, and true Intent and Meaning of this Act; they shall respectively forfeit the Sum of One Hundred Pounds ($250). to be recovered in any Court of Record within this Colony, by any person aggrieved; and the said Election so made contrary to the Directions and true Intent and Meaning of this Act, shall be null and void to all Intents, Constructions, and Purposes Whatsoever."

Not only does it prove the great change of population, south of the Manor of Cortlandt, to which it not apply as that Manor elected its own representative, but the severity of the last clause would seem to show that there was some opposition, probably political, to the change. It applied to the whole County except the Manor of Cortlandt and the "Borough" of Westchester, which elected their own representatives.

No other change was made during the Colonial era, and from 1751 to 1776, all the County "Courts of Election" were held at the Presbyterian Church in White plains.

The Colonial elections were not held at fixed times as at present, but at whatever dates the "writs" of election were issued to the Sheriff by the Secretary of the Province, at the command of the Governor and Council. Consequently they were held at various seasons of the year, but usually early in the spring or in the fall.

The qualification for electors "in the Cities, Counties, and Mannors" of the Province, was the having by "every one of them," "of Land or Tenements improved to the value of Forty Pounds in Freehold, free from all Incumbrances, and have possessed the same three Months before the Test of the said Writ." As soon as the writ was received by the Sheriff, he was obliged in six days to give at least six days previous public notice of the time and place of election, to each constable in his bailiwick to be affixed to the most Public Place in each Town, or Mannor. At the time and place fixed the Sheriff attended with his Deputies and presided at the "Court of Election." The electors met, the candidates being present, the Sheriff announced the names of one side, when all of their supporters held up their hands; then he announced the names on the other, and their supporters held up their hands. He then announced who had the most. In case the election was not determined by this

[1] I Van Schaak's Laws, ch. 690.

[2] II. Bradford 33. The reference here is to the elections held for the Assemblies for 1683 to 1685 inclusive under the Duke of York, the last of which was under James as King.

[3] Ch. 1411 of I. Liv. & Smith, 453.

"view," as the law calls it, or "show of hands," as it was popularly termed, with the consent of the electors, then "a Poll" was required. The Sheriff then appointed a sufficient number of clerks who were sworn, "Truly and Indiferently to take the same Poll, and to set down the names of each Elector, and the place of his Freehold, and for whom he shall poll, and to poll no Elector who is not sworn, if so required by the Candidates or any of them, then and there present." The Sheriff also appointed to each candidate such one person as the latter designated "to be Inspectors of Every Clerk." Every elector if a candidate desired it was obliged to swear in his vote, which was given audibly by word of mouth. At the end the Sheriff made a return of the votes cast in writing and announced the result. The return, which was a certified copy of "the poll" as taken by the Clerk "in his presence, the Sheriff returned to the Secretary of the Province, who produced it at the first meeting of the Assembly which was the judge of the validity of all elections of its members. Neither the Sheriff nor his deputies were permitted to charge any fees whatever. And he was bound to furnish "a copy of the poll" to any one who demanded it, on "payment of a reasonable charge for writing the same."

Such was a Westchester County election in Colony Times, and such the Presbyterian Church in White-Plains witnessed from 1751 to 1765 inclusive. This edifice of wood stood on the site of the present stone church on Main street, but was burned down in 1776 by the Americans, Massachusetts troops, in the same fire which destroyed the Court-House as has been mentioned above.

Another matter of interest in Colonial days to the people of Westchester, were the two Fairs held by law in the county. In England Fairs were often a franchise of a manor, as well as of a town or county, but neither of the Westchester manors possessed it. The reason probably was, that very early, in 1694, before the time several of them were erected, a general "Act for the settling of Fairs and Markets in each respective City and County throughout the Province" was passed.[1] It directed that two Fairs be "kept" in the County of Westchester, the first at Westchester on the second Tuesday in May, the second to be "kept" at Rye on the second Tuesday of October, each yearly, and to be "held for four days inclusive and no longer," so as to end on the "Fryday" of each week; "All which Fairs shall be holden together with a Court of Pypowder, and with all Liberties and Free Customs to such Fairs appertaining, or which ought or may appertain, according to the Usage and Customs of Fairs holden in their Majesties Realm of England." The Governor of the Province commissioned for each Fair "a Governour or Ruler" authorized to hold a Court of Pypowder on each of the days of the Fairs, who was charged with the preservation of order, and who could try all causes of Complaint of every Kind, and all disputes, arising at the Fairs, and could punish "by Attachments, Summons, Arrests, Issues, Fines, Redemptions, and Commodities, and other Rights whatsoever, to the same Courts of Pypowder any way appertaining," To these Fairs, could be carried, for sale, (for they were not Exhibitions for prizes like modern Fairs, but places for trade) "all sorts of Cattle Horses, Mares, Colts, Grains, Victuals, Provisions, and other Necessaries, together with all sorts of Merchandize of what nature soever, and them to expose to sale or Barter in Gross or by Retail, at the Times, Hours, and Seasons, that Governours or Rulers of the said respective Fairs, for the Time being, shall proclaim and appoint." The Governor was also obliged to set apart a certain space or "Open Place" for all the horse kind, where they could be sold, and put a person in charge as "Toll-Gatherer" who was to take "Nine pence" a day for every animal brought there and sold; and who was to put down in writing in a book, the names, sir-names, and dwelling places of all the said Parties, and the Colour, with one special mark at least, of every such Horse, Mare, Gelding, or Colt," sold, bartered, or exchanged under a penalty of a fine of Forty Shillings. The "Toll-gatherer, was obliged the next day after the Fair" to deliver the said book to the "Governour," who was to make a note therein of all the number of all the animals, so sold &c. at the Fair, and subscribe his name to it, for which entry of such sale &c. he was "to take for Toll of the same the sum of Nine pence, the one half to be paid by the Buyer, the other half by the Seller." It is evident from this that the old Westchester men meant that their dealings in horses at their Fairs should be as honest as the nature of the business would permit, whatever may been the practical result.

Such were the County Fairs of the Colonial Days, and to them went regularly great numbers of people with their stock and produce, from the Manors, Great Patents, and villages of all Westchester. And there too went as in more modern days the county politicians of all kinds who of course attended, as their successors do now, solely for the good of their country.

In this connection it is proper to state the origin and organization of the County itself as such.

Under the Dutch there was no county organization, each of the settlements then in existence, and the Patroonship of Colendonck, were simply mere parts of the Province of New Netherland entirely independent of each other.

When the Dutch surrendered New Netherland in 1664, one of the first acts of the first English Governor Richard Nicolls was to re-name it and its parts in the English language in the English manner. This he did by using mainly the name and titles of the Duke of York, who was Lord Proprietor of the Province, and by whom he was appointed the Chief of the Commission to capture it, and then to command it as its first Governor. It was a very natural thing for him to do, but its result has been to fasten forever on what is now the chiefest city of the Western hemisphere, that most inadequate name—New York. As the entire region surrounding Old York in England, from which the Duke took his title, forms the County there called "Yorkshire;" and as it is one of the largest in England, it was early for convenience sake divided into three Districts, termed in the peculiar Dialect of that region, Ridings, which from their position were termed the East, West, and North, Ridings of Yorkshire. This example Governor Nicolls faithfully followed. He called Long Island, Staten Island and Westchester, as the region nearest to "New," York, "Yorkshire," and divided it into three "Ridings, the "East," "West," and "North," "Ridings. The region now Suffolk County formed the "East Riding;" Staten Island, Kings County, and the town of Newtown in Queens County, formed the "West Riding;" the remainder of what is now Queens County, together with what is now Westchester County, being all the territory on the main, North of the Harlem River and South of the Highlands, between the Sound and the Hudson, he called the "North Riding." As the portion of "the North Riding" on the main, Westchester County was legally and popularly known till the year 1683. In that year it received its present name in an act of the first legislature of New York, which sat in the "Hall" of Fort James. This Assembly which there sat, was called by the express "Instructions" of the Duke of York by his Governor Thomas Dongan subsequently Earl of Limerick, and was the very first ever held in New York. This Act, passed on the 1st of November, 1663, runs thus: "Haveing taken into Consideraçon the necessity of divideing the province into respective Countyes for the better governing and setleing Courts in the same, Bee It Enacted by the Governour, Councell and Representatives, and by authority of the same That the said Province bee divided into twelve Countyes as followeth: . . . The Countye of Westchester to contain West and East Chester, Bronx[1] Land, ffordham, Anne Hooks Neck, Richbills, Minford's Island and all the Land on the Maine to the Eastward of Manhattan's Island As farr as the Government Extends and the Yonckers Land and Northwards along Hudsons River as farr as the High Lands." After describing all the "countyes" seriatim, the Act terminates with this clause, which first created English High Sheriffs in New York: "And for as much there is a necessity for a High Sheriffe in every County in this Province, Bee it therefore Enacted by the Governour, Councell, and Representatives in Generall Assembly mett and by the Authority of the same, THAT there shall be yearly and Every yeare an High Sheriffe constituted and Commissioned for Each County And that Each Sheriffe may have his under Sheriffe Deputy or Deputyes." From 1683 to 1783, precisely one hundred years, the High Sheriffs existed, and so were they always designated. After the Revolution the prefix was dropped, the duties remained the same, however, except the holding of "Courts of election" was taken from them, and these officers themselves were appointed by the State Governor. By the Constitution of 1821 they were made elective. A great mistake, for an officer clothed with a Sheriff's powers, of all others, should never be made elective. As its result we see the corruptions, extortions, and cruelties, which are known to every observant man, especially in the cities of the State.

[1] III. Brad. 17.

The Acts of the Legislatures from 1683 to 1685 inclusive under the Duke of York as Lord Proprietor, and of 1686 under him as James II. though existing in manuscript in the State, have, strange to say, never been printed by the Province, nor the State of New York, a fact disgraceful to both. This one dividing the Province into Counties, however, has by itself been printed in two or three historical works, the last of which is the xiiith volume of the Colonial History of New York, in which it is on the very last page. But to this hour it has never appeared in any of the volumes of the Laws of New York. It was passed and signed by Governor Dongan on the 1st of November 1683, and is entitled "An Act to divide this Province into Shires and Countyes." It was the third act of the first session of the first Legislature which ever sat within the limits of this State.[2] Eight years later the first Assembly under William and Mary was called by Governor Sloughter.

The first Act of the second session of this first Legislature under the "Instructions" of those Sovereigns, held at the "Fort Hall" in September 1691, was a confirmation of the foregoing law, in the form of "An Act to divide this Province and Dependencies into Shires and Counties,"[3] with a preamble that it was enacted to prevent mistakes in the boundaries. The first clause provides "That the said Province be divided into twelve Counties, as followeth;" and the third clause is, "The County of Westchester, to contain East and Westchester, Bronkes Land, Fordham, Mannor of Pelham, Miniford Island[4] (now City Island) and Richbill's Neck, (now De Lancey's Neck) and all the land on the Main to the Eastward of Manhattans Island, as far as the Government at present extends, and the Yonckers Land. And Northwards along Hudsons River as far as the High Lands." The member chosen from Westchester County to this As-

[1] This is the earliest instance the writer has found of the use of the word "Bronx." "Bronkes his land" and "Bronkes' Land" and Bronkes River, were the first terms used.

[2] It is here cited from a MS. copy of the original Manuscript of the Dongan Laws, at Albany, in which it is found on page 12.

[3] II. Bradford's Laws, ed. 1710, p. 11. III. Bradford's Laws, ed. 1726, p. 11. I. Livingston & Smith's Laws, 6., II. Van Schaack, 6.

[4] Westchester is named first in the original act, while it is second here. This is the only change that was made.

sembly was John Pell, who was thus the first of a line of Assemblymen for the County which has existed from that day to this. In the Governor's Council at the time of this first Assembly as Members by Royal appointment, and as such, members of the Upper House which passed this Act, were Stephanus Van Cortlandt and Frederick Philipse, who were also of the Council under James as Duke and as King. Thus among the framers of the original act which created the County, who, so to speak, were present at its birth, and also at its confirmation were two members of families, subsequently manorial, both of whom were the first Lords of the Manors of Philipsburgh and Cortlandt, neither of which had then been erected.[1]

Who represented "The North Riding," in the Assembly under the Duke of York is not known as the Journals of all the Assemblies from 1683 to 1686 have been lost, and the names of the members of all of them have consequently gone into oblivion.

No change whatever took place in the limits of Westchester after the act of 1691, until the "Equivalent Lands," or "Oblong," was acquired by New York in the settlement of a boundary dispute with the Colony of Connecticut, on the 11th of May, 1731. This was a strip nearly two miles in width taken off the western side of Connecticut as far north as Massachusetts, and ceded to New York in exchange for lands upon the Sound yielded to Connecticut. The extension of the counties of New York over this strip was not made by a Legislative act. Being an addition to a Crown Colony, it was a new acquisition by the Crown, and as such its status was legally determinable by the King. Hence an "Ordinance" by the Governor of New York in the name of the King was issued on the 29th of August 1733 extending Westchester and the other counties affected up to the new line between New York and Connecticut established by the agreement of the 14th of May 1731. As this Ordinance does not appear in any collection of New York Laws and Ordinances that the writer has seen nor in the two volumes of Historical Documents relating to the Boundaries of New York, lately compiled and printed by order of the Regents of the University and is rare, it is here given in full from an original printed copy in the writer's possession.

"An

Ordinance for The Running and better Ascertaining the Partition Lines between the Counties of Westchester, Dutchess, Albany and Ulster, and extending those Counties on the East side of Hudsons River to the present Colony Line of Connecticut.

GEORGE the Second, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, KING, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all Our loving subjects inhabiting or being in our Province of New York, and to all others whom it doth or may concern, Greeting, Whereas since the passing of the Acts of Assembly in the year 1683, and 1691, for dividing this Province and its Dependencies into Shires and Counties, there are several acquisitions of Lands by New Settlements, and otherwise, particularly the Equivalent Lands Surrendered by the Colony Connecticut, whereby this Colony has became larger than it was before. And Whereas notwithstanding that the Counties lying on the West side of Hudson's River, were by the said Acts intended to be parted and divided by a West Line to be drawn from Hudson's River, at the respective Stations and Places on the said River, mentioned in the said Acts, to the utmost extent of Our said Province on the West side of the said River; and that the Counties lying on the East side of the said Hudson's River were likewise, by the said Acts, intended to be parted and divided by an East Line to be drawn from Hudson's River at the respective Places and Stations on the said River, mentioned in the said Acts, to the utmost extent of Our said Province, on the East side of the said River, Yet the People living on the Borders of the said Counties, or some of them, for want of the said actual Running and Surveying of the said Partition Lines, protest sometimes that they are in one County, and sometimes within another, and on that pretence have committed several Abuses, and endeavored to elude all Process issuing from the Courts of Judicature, to the great hindrance of Justice, encouragement of Fugitives and Vagabonds, and to the disturbance of our Peace.

And Whereas, since the passing of the said Acts, the Christian Settlements and Plantations, have been greatly extended into the Indian Counties, particularly in that part of the Province, which is called and esteemed the County of Albany, from whence some Doubts have arose, Whether the Settlements made since the passing of the said Acts, are at present within the said County of Albany?

In order therefore, to remove such Doubts, remedy such mischiefs, and prevent the like Inconvenencies for the future, We do hereby Ordain and Direct, That the County of Westchester do and shall contain, All the Lands on the Main between Hudson's River and the Sound, to the Southward of an East Line drawn from a Red Cedar Tree on the North Side of a high Hill in the Highlands, commonly called and Known by the Name of Anthony's Nose, and running thence to the Colony Line, together with the adjacent Islands in the Sound.

Now We do hereby further Ordain and Direct, That the South Bounds of the County of Albany, do and shall begin at the Mouth of of a Creek or Brook called the Sawyer's Creek, on the West side of Hudson's River, and from thence Shall run West to the utmost extent of our Province of New-York. And that on the East side of the said River, the said County of Albany shall begin at the Mouth of a Brook called Roeloff Jansen's Kill, and shall run thence Eastward to the utmost extent of our said

[1] And John Pell who was the member for the County in 1691, and voted for the act of that year, was of that old family which then possessed the Manor of Pelham.

Province; and that the said County of Albany shall extend from the said South Bounds Northerly, on both sides Hudson's River, to the utmost extent of Our said Province, and shall comprehend therein the Mannor of Livingston, the Mannor of Ranslaerswyck-Schenectady, and all the Towns, villages, neighbours hoods and Christian Plantations, and all the Land, that now are, or at any time heretofore in possession of or claimed by any of the Indians of the Six Nations, the River Indians, or by any other Indians belonging or depending On Our said Province.

And we do hereby likewise Ordain and Direct, that the North Bounds of our County of Ulster shall begin at the Mouth of the said Sawyer's Creek or Brook, and extend from thence West to the utmost extent of Our said Province.

And We do hereby further Ordain and Direct, That the County of Dutchess do and shall contain All the Lands between Hudson's River and the Colony of Connecticut, from the North Bounds of the County of Westchester to the South Bounds of the County of Albany.

And Our Royal Will and Pleasure is, and We do hereby Direct and Require, That Our Surveyor General of Our said Province of New York, shall, with all convenient speed, Run, and Survey the Partition Line between the Counties of Westchester & Dutchess, the Partition Line between the Counties of Dutchess and Albany, and the Partition Line between the Counties of Albany and Ulster.

In Testimony Whereof, We Have caused these Our Letters to be Made Potent, and the Seal of Our Province of New York to be hereunto affixed. Witness our Trusty and Well-beloved William Cosby, Esq., Captain General and Governour-in Chief of Our said Province of New York and the Territories depending thereon in America, Vice-Admiral of the same, and Colonel in his Majesty's Army, &c. in and by and with the Consent and Advice of Our Council of Our said Province, at Fort George in Our City of New York, the Twenty nineth Day of August, in the Seventh Year of Our Reign Annoq; Dom. 1733."

This Ordinance really established the boundaries, not only of Westchester County but of the whole Province outside of Long Island, Staten Island, Manhattan Island and the County of Orange at its date. Its description of the County of Albany is believed to be the largest and fullest of that County extant, practically including in it the whole Indian territory of the Six Nations westward, wherever they ruled in 1733. By it the southern portion of the "Oblong" was formally annexed to, and made a part of the County of Westchester as it has ever since remained. It did not however extend the lines of the Manors and Patents granted before its date, and bounded by the original Colony line to the new one. The manor of Cortlandt was not thereby extended to the new Colony line established in 1731. Mr. Robert Livingston a few years after the date of this ordinance, undertook to claim that his Manor of Livingston was by implied intendment extended to the new Colony line, and instituted an ejectment suit against the then owners of the part of the Oblong adjoining his manor, but he did not succeed. Some of the papers in this matter which the writer has examined show, however, that the "Oblong" owners were exceedingly alarmed at this claim. This Ordinance is also of interest as being a good admirable example of an instrument of royal rule confined to the British Crown Colonies in America.

For the next thirty-five years the Bounds of the County remained unchanged, no other Ordinance or Act relating to the limits of Westchester was made or enacted. The division line in the Hudson River and in the Sound, however, became questioned in criminal Proceedings. To settle all questions on this subject of every kind, whatsoever, on the 30th of December, 1768, the very last day of that year, an Act was passed, "To ascertain Part of the Southern and Western Boundaries" of the County of Westchester, the Eastern Boundaries of Orange County, and Part of the Northern Bounds of Queens County."[1] It settled the jurisdiction over, and also the title to, all the islands and inlets in the Sound, many of them mere masses of naked rock, rising from its waters. It is in these words;

"Whereas there are many Islands lying and being in the Sound, to the Eastward of Frog's Neck, and Northward of the main channel, opposite to the County of Westchester, several of which are not included in any county in this Province.

And Whereas, also that part of Hudson's River, which lies opposite to the said County of Westchester, is not included in any County of this Province; in order to remedy which, and to render the Administration of Justice more effectual;

I. Be it Enacted by his Excellency the Governor, the Council, and the General Assembly, and it is hereby Enacted by the Authority of the same,[2] That by all the Islands lying and being in the Sound to the Eastward of Frog's Neck, and to the Northward of the Main Channel, and as far Eastward as Captain's Island, including the same, together with all that part of the Sound, included within these Boundaries shall be and remain in the County of Westchester; and all the Southernmost part of the Sound from the bounds aforesaid as far as Queens County extends Eastward, shall be, and is hereby, annexed to Queens County; and all that part of Hudsons River, which adjoins the County of Westchester, and is to the Southward of the County of Orange,[3] or so much thereof as is included within this Province, and the Easternmost half Part of said River, from the Southermost Bounds of the County of Orange, to the Northermost Bounds of the County of Westchester, shall also be and remain in the said County of Westchester.

[1] II. Van Schaack's Laws ch. 1376, p. 527.

[2] This was the form of enacting clause used in the Colonial Legislature of New York.

[3] Orange then included what is now Rockland County.

II. The second clause enacts that "The Middle of the said (Hudson) River shall be, and is hereby declared to be, the Boundary Line between the said Counties of Orange and Westchester," and that the western half "is declared to be included in, and annexed to the said County of Orange, together with all the Islands included within the said Bounds."

III. And be it further Enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That from and after the Publication of this Act, all the Islands and Premises hereby included in, and annexed to the said County of Westchester, shall be taxed and subject to all such Laws, Rules, and Regulations, with those Manors, Towns, or Districts, to which they are nearest in Situation."

The effect of this law was to remove all doubt that might arise in relation to the subject of the act. It affected the coast-line of every Manor in the County. From the ninth day of July, 1776, when the Provincial Congress sitting then at White Plains, accepted, while "lamenting the necessity which rendered that measure unavoidable,"[1] the Declaration of Independence, until 1789, when the Government of the United States, framed by the convention of 1787, went into operation, New York was an independent Sovereign State, mistress of herself, and as such was one of the thirteen independent Sovereignties so acknowledged by the British Treaty of Peace in 1783. While in this condition her Legislature divided her territory into counties and townships, and made some changes in the former from what they had been under the Province of New York. This was done by two acts passed on the 7th of March, 1788, chapters 63 and 64 of the Laws of 1788.[2] Both acts, however, were only to take effect from and after the first day of April, 1789. By the former, which related to the counties, the State was divided into sixteen counties, four more than by the act of 1691, to be called by the names of New York, Albany, Suffolk, Queen's, King's, Richmond, Westchester, Orange, Ulster, Dutchess, Columbia, Washington, Clinton, Montgomery, Cumberland and Gloucester."

Westchester is thus described: "The County of Westchester to contain all that part of this State, bounded southerly by the Sound, easterly by the State of Connecticut, northerly by the North Bounds of the Manor of Cortlandt, and the same line continued east to the bounds of Connecticut, and west to the middle of Hudson's River, and westerly by a line running from thence down the middle of Hudson's River until it comes opposite to the Bounds of the State of New Jersey, then west to the same, then southerly along the east Bounds of the State of New Jersey to the Line of the County of New York, and then along the same easterly and southerly to the Sound, or East River, including Captain's Island, and all the islands in the Sound to the east of Frog's Neck and to the northward of the main channel."

By the latter act Westchester County was divided into the following towns named in the following order: Westchester, Morrisania, Yonkers, Greenburgh, Mount Pleasant, Eastchester, Pelham, New Rochelle, Scarsdale, Mamaroneck, White-Plains, Harrison, Rye, Northcastle, Bedford, Pound-Ridge, Salem, North Salem, Cortlandt, Yorktown, and Stephentown, twenty-one in all,—the bounds of each being clearly set forth.

This was the first division of the County into townships, an organization which has since continued without variation except divisions of a few of the towns, some alterations of the bounds of two or three others and the incorporation of a part of Yonkers as the City of Yonkers, the details of which need not be given here.

The Boundaries of the County remained wholly unchanged, until the annexation of the new towns of Morrisania and Kingsbridge, formed from the southern portions of the old towns of Westchester and Yonkers to the City of New York of which they now form the twenty-third and twenty-fourth Wards. The upper part of the old town of Yonkers has been incorporated as the City of Yonkers. The County of Westchester therefore with these exceptions retains its original limits as fixed in 1683, and confirmed by the State County act of 1788.

The Township Act of 1788 is remarkable for its use of the Manors in enacting the bounds of the townships it created. No less than fourteen of those twenty-one townships are described and bounded in part by naming special lines of the old Manors, or the Manors themselves as a whole. Eleven towns out of the twenty-one, were formed wholly out of the Manors. These were Morrisania, Yonkers, Greenburgh, Mount Pleasant, Pelham, Scarsdale, Mamaroneck, North Salem, Cortlandt, Yorktown, and Stephentown. Two, Salem (now Lewisborough) and Poundridge, were partly so formed, about half of the former and one-third of the latter, being portions of the Manor of Cortlandt.

13.

The Manor of Cortlandt, Its Origin, First Lord and his Family, Special Franchises, Division, Local History, and Topography.

The most northern part of the County of Westchester, a tract reaching from the Hudson River on the west to the first boundary line between the Province of New York and the Colony of Connecticut, on the east, twenty English miles in length by ten in width, in shape nearly a rectangular parallelogram, formed, "The Manor of Cortlandt." Acquired by direct purchase from the Indians, in part, by Stephanus van Cortlandt, a native born Dutch gentleman of New York, and in part by others whose titles he subsequently bought, this tract, together with a small tract on the west side of the Hudson River opposite the promontory of Anthony's Nose, which he also purchased from the Indians, was, by King William the Third through his Governor, Benjamin Fletcher, on the 17th of June 1697, erected into "the Lordship and Manor of Cortlandt." The original Manor-Grant covering two skins of vellum beautifully written, and bearing the Great Seal of the Province, its opening words highly ornamented, still exists in perfect preservation. Above the writing is an elegantly engraved border nearly two inches in width, of rich Italian arabesque design of fruits, flowers, figures and birds, in the centre of which appear the arms of England in full. The initial letter "G" of "Gulielmus," the King's name in Latin, with which the instrument commences, is very large, is richly ornamented, and has within it a bust portrait of William wearing the large peruke, and full laced scarf, of that day. The great seal attached is that brought over by Governor Sloughter in 1691, made pursuant to a warrant of William and Mary bearing date the 31st of May 1690. It has upon its obverse the Arms of England as borne by the Stuarts with the addition of a shield of pretence in the centre, charged with the lion rampant of the house of Nassau; and, on its reverse, full length effigies of the King and Queen, the latter holding the orb and sceptre, and kneeling at their feet an Indian man and woman, the former offering a roll of wampum, and the latter a skin of a beaver. The legend around the obverse is in Latin, signifying "The seal of our province of New York in America," that around the reverse, also in Latin, is, "William III. and Mary II. By the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King and Queen, Defenders of the Faith."

[1] Resolution in I. Journals Prov. Congress, 518.
[2] II. Jones & Varick, 317 and 319.

It is attached to the fold of the vellum by a thick silken cord, is of wax, and lies in the covered metallic case originally made for it, and is three inches and one half in diameter. Upon the fold of vellum is the signature of Benjamin Fletcher, the Governor, and the countersignature of David Jamison, Deputy Secretary of the Province.

This description of the seal of William and Mary is given because it was that used in New York throughout their joint reign, the reign of William alone, and of Anne until the 6th of September 1705, on which day the new seal of that Queen was received, and this old one was defaced, and sent back to England to be broken, in accordance with the law. It authenticated every Manor-Grant and Patent in the Province from 1691 to 1705, and was appended to every Manor-Grant in the County of Westchester, except those of Fordham and Pelham, the former of which bore the seal of James as Duke of York, and the latter that of James as King, they being the two oldest Manors in the County. From the fact that this seal was so used, after the deaths of Mary and of William, upon patents and other instruments in New York issued in the early part of the reign of Anne, attempts were once made to deny their validity in Court, but always in vain. A notable example of which, was that of the original charter of Trinity church in 1697. This seal was decided to be the lawful seal of the Province until superseded by the first seal of Queen Anne, as above stated in September 1705. The ancient and important instrument just described, now nearly two centuries old, at present the property of Mr. James Stevenson van Cortlandt of Croton, the only surviving son of the late Colonel Pierre van Cortlandt, is the foundation of the title to the whole Manor of Cortlandt as possessed by Stephanus van Cortlandt, and of all existing titles within its limits. It is therefore here given in full:—

MANOR-GRANT OF THE MANOR OF CORTLANDT.

Gulielmus Tertius, Dei Gratia, Angliæ Scotiæ, ffranciæ, Hiberniæ, Rex, fidei Defensor, &ç. To all Whom these Presents Shall Come Sendeth Greeting.

Whereas our Loveing Subject Coll. Stephanus Van Cortlandt One of the Members of our Councill of our Province of New York &c., Hath by his Pettition presented unto our Trusty and well belove^{d} Coll. Benjamin Fletcher our Capt. General and Governour in Cheif of our Said Province of New York &c. and territorys Depending thereon in America &c. prayed our Grant and Confirmation for a Certain tract and parcell of Land Situate Lyeing and being upon the East side of hudsons River Begining on the North Line of the Mannor of Philipsburge Now in the tenour and Occupation of Fredrick Phillipse Esq^{r}. one of the Members of our Said Councill And to the South side of a Certain Creek Called Kightawank Creek and from thence by a Due East Line Runing into the Woods Twenty English Miles And from the said North Line of the Mannor of Phillipsburge upon the South Side of Said Kightawank Creek runing along the said Hudsons river Northerly as the said River runs into the north side of a high Hill in the high Lands Commonly Called and Knowen by the Name of Anthonys Nose to a Red Ceadar tree Which makes the south Bounds of the Land Now in y^{e} Tenour And Occupation of Mr. Adolph Phillipse Including in the Said Northerly Line all the Meadows Marshes Coves Bays and necks of Land and pennensulaes that are adjoining or Extending into Hudsons River within the Bounds of the Said Line and from said red ceadar tree another Due Easterly Line Runing into the Woods Twenty English Miles and from thence Along the Partition Line between our Colony of Conecticut and this Our province untill you Come unto the place Where the first Eastterly Line of twenty Miles Doth Come the Whole being Bounded on the East by the said partition Line between our said Collony of Conecticut and this our province & on the south side by the Northerly Line of the Mannor of Phillipsburg to the southward of Kightawank Creek aforesaid and on the west by the said Hudsons river and on the North side from the aforesaid red Ceadar tree by the south Line of the Land of Mr. Adolph Phillips; And also of a Ceartain parcel of Meadow Lying and being Situate upon the West side of the Said Hudsons river Within the Said High Lands over Against the aforesaid Hill Called Anthonys Nose Begining on the south Side of a Creek Called by the Indians Sinkeepogh and so Along Said Creek to the head thereof and then Northerly Along the high hills as the River Runeth to Another Creek Called Apinnapink and from thence along Said Creek to the said Hudsons River Which Certain tract of Land and Meadow our Said Loving Subject is Now possessed thereof and Doth hold the same of us by Virtue of Sundry grants heretofore Made unto him by Coll. Thomas Dongan Late Govr. of our Said province and Whereon our Said Loving Subject hath made Considerable Improvements haveing been at Great Cost Charge & Expence in the Purchasing the said Tract of Land and Meadows from the Native Indians, as well As in the Setling a Considerable Numbers of Famalies thereon, and being Willing To make Some further Improvements thereon doth by his Said Petition further Request & Pray that we should be Graciously pleased to Erect the Aforesaid tract of Land and meadows Within the Limitts and Bound Aforesaid Into a Lordshipp or Mannor of Cortlandt, Which reasonable Request for the future Incouragement of our said Loving Subject wee being willing to Grant, Know Ye that of our Especial grace Certain Knowledg and Mere motion We have given granted ratified and Confirmed And by these presents do for Us our heirs & Succesors give grant ratifie and Confirm unto our Said Loving Subject Stephanus van Cortlandt all the Afore recite[d] Ceartain Parcell & tract of Land and Meadows Within theire Several and Respective Limits and bounds Aforesaid Together with all and Every of the Mesuages Tenements buildings Barnes Houses out houses Stables edifices Gardens Inclosures fences pasture[s] fields Feeding[s] woods underwoods trees timbers Swamps meadows marshes pools ponds Lakes fountains waters Water Courses rivers Revulets runs Streams Brooks Creeks Harbours Coves Inlets Outlets Islands of Land and Meadows Necks of Land and Meadows Pennensules of Land and Meadows ferrys fishing fowling hunting and hawking and the Fishing on Hudsons River so far as the bounds of the Said Land Extends upon the same, Quaries, Mines, Minerals, (Silver and Gold mines only Excepted) And all the Other the rights, Members, Libertys, Priviledges, jurisdictions, prehemenences, Emoluments Royaltys, Profits, Benefits, Advantages, Heridittements, & apurtenances, whatsoever, to the afore recite[d] Ceartain parcells or Tracts of Land and Meadows Within their Severall and Respective Limits and Bounds aforesaid belonging or In any wise Appertoaning, or Eccepted, Reputed, taken, known, or Ocupied, as part parcell or member thereof, To Have And To Hold all the afore Recite[d] Ceartain parcell[s] and tracts of Land and Meadows within their Several and Respective Limits and Bounds Aforesaid; Together with all end Every of the mesuage Tennements Buildings barns houses out houses Stables Edefices Orechards Gardens Inclosures fences Pasture fields feedings Woods underwoods trees timber Swamps Meadows Marshes pooles ponds Lakes fountains Water Water Courses Rivers Revulets Rivulets Runs Streams brooks Creeks harbours Coves Inlets Outlets Islands of land and Meadows Necks of Land and Meadow Penninsules of Land and Meadow ferry[s] fishing fowling hunting and hawking and the fishing on hudsons River so far as the Bounds of the Said Land Extend[s] upon the said River, Quaries Mines minerals (Silver and Gold Mines only Excp[t]) And all other the Right[s] Members Libertys priveledges jurrisdictions prehemmenences Emoluments Royaltys profits benifits Advantages heridetiments and Appurtenances Whatsoever to the afore recited Certain parcell and tract of Land and Meadow within the several and Respective Limitts and bounds aforesaid belonging or in any wise apertaining or accepted Reputed taken Known or ocupied as part parcell or member thereof unto the Said Stephanus van Cortlandt his heirs and assigns to the Sole and only proper use Benefit and Behofe of him the said Stephanus van Cortlandt his heirs and assigns for Ever.

And Moreover Know ye tnat our further Especial Grace Certain Knowledge and mere Motion we have thought fitt according to the Request of our Said Loving Subject to Erect all the before Recited Ceartain Parcell and tracts of Land and Meadow Within the Limitts and Bounds aforesaid into a Lordship or Mannor, and therefore by these presents we do for us, our heirs, and Successors, Erect make And Constitute, all the afore Recited Ceartain parcells and tracts of Land and Meadows Within the Limitts and bounds aforesaid, together with all and Every the above Granted premises With all and Every of Appurtenances Into one Lordship and Mannour to all Intents and purposes, And it is our Royall will and pleasure that the said Lordship and Mannour Shall from henceforth be Called the Lordship and Mannour of Cortlandt; And further Know yee that wee Reposeing Especial trust and Confidence in the Loyalty wisdom Justice Prudence and Circumspection of our said Loving Subject do for us our heirs and Successors Give and Grant unto our said Loving Subject Stephanus van Cortlandt and to the heirs and assigns of him the said Stephanus van Cortlandt full power and authority at all times for Ever Heareafter in the said Lordship and Mannour one Court Leet and one Court Barron To hold and Keep at Such time and times and so Often Yearly as he or they Shall see meet, and all fines Issues and Amerciaments at the Said Court Leet and Court Barron To be holden within the said Lordship and Mannour to be Let forfited and Employed or payable or hapning at any time to be payable by any of the Inhabitants of or Within the said Lordship and mannour of Cortlandt or the Limitts and bounds thereof And Also all And every of the Powers and Authoritys herein beforemetioned for the holding and Keeping of the said Court Leet and Court Barron from time to time and to award Issue out the acCustomary writs to the Heirs and Assigns of the said Stephanus Van Cortlandt for ever or their or any of their steward Deputed and apointed with full and ample power and Authority to Distrain for the rents Services and Other Sums of Money payable by Virtue of the Premises and all other Lawfull remidies and means for the having possessing Receiving Levying and Enjoying the premmises and every Part and Parcell of the same and all waifes Estrayes Wrecks Deodands goods of felons happening and being Forfeited within the said Lordship and Mannour of Cortlandt and all and Every Sum and sums of Money to be paid as a Post fine upon any fine or fines to be Levied of any Land Tennements or Heriditements within the said lordship and mannour of Cortlandt together with the Advowson and right of patronage and all and Every the Church and Churches Erected or Established or heareafter to be had Erected or Established in the said mannour of Cortlandt.

And we do by these presents Constitute and Appoint our said Loving Subject Stephanus van Cortlandt and his heirs and Assinys to be our Sole and only Ranger of the Said Lordship and Mannour of Cortlandt and to have hold and Enjoy all the Benifits perqusites fees, rights priviledges Profits and Apurtenances that of Right doth belong unto a Ranger According to our Statutes and Customs of our Realm of England in as full and Ample Manner as if the same were perticularly Expressed in these presents anything to the Contrary Hereof in any ways Notwithstanding.

And we Likewise do further give and Grant unto the said Stephanus van Cortlandt and to his heirs and Assinys, That all and every the tennants of him the Said Stephanus van Cortlandt Within the Said Lord Ship and Mannour of Cortlandt Shall and May at all times heareafter meet Together and Chuse Assessors within the Mannour aforesaid According to such rules ways and Methods as are prescribed for Citys towns and Countys within our said province by the Acts of Generall Assembly for the Defraying the Publick Charge of Each respective City town and County aforesaid and all such sum or sums of Money So assessed and Levyed to Collect pay and Dispose of for Such Uses as the act of General Assembly shall Establish and Apoint.

And further of our Especial grace Certain Knowledge and Mere Motion we do by these presents for us our heirs and Successors give and Grant unto our Said Loving Subject Stephanus van Cortlandt and to his heirs and assinys forever that he the said Stephanus van Cortlandt his heirs and assinys Shall and May From time to time and after the Expiration of twenty Years Next Ensueing the Date of these presents Return and send a Discreet Inhabitant in and of the said mannour to be a Representitive of the said Mannour in every Assembly after the Expiration of the said twenty Years to be summoned and holden within this our said province which Representative so Returned and Sent Shall be Received into the house of Representatives of Assembly as a Member of the said house to have and Enjoy such priviledge as the other Representatives Returned and Sent from any other County and Mannours of this our said province have had and Enjoyed in any former Assembly holden within this our said province;

To have and to hold possess and Enjoy all and Singular the said Lordship and Mannour of Cortlandt and premisses with all their and every of their Royaltys and appurtunancys unto the said Stephanus van Cortlandt his heirs and assignes to the Sole and only proper use Benefitt and Behoof of him the said Stephanus van Cortlandt his heirs and Assignes forever To Be holden of us our heirs and Successors in free and Common Soccage as of ou rMannour of East Greenwich in our County of Kent within our Realm of England, Yielding Rendering and paying therefore yearly and Every year for Ever unto us our heirs and Successors at our City of New York on the feast Day of Annunciation of our Blessed Virgin Mary the yearly Rent of forty Shillings Current money of our said province in Lieu and Stead of all other Rents Services Dues Dutys and Demands whatsoever for the Afore Recited Tract and Parcell of Land and Meadow Lordship and Mannour of Cortlandt and premisses.

In Testimony whereof we have Caused the Great Seal of our said province to be hereunto affixed Witness our Said trusty and well beloved Coll. Benjamin Fletcher our said Cap: Generall and Governor in Chief or our Province of New York and the Territorys Depending thereon in America and Vice Admiral of the same, our Lieu[t] and Commander in Chief of the Militia and of all the forses by Sea and by Land within our Collony of Connecticut and of all the Forts and places of strength within the same, in Council at our fort in New York the Seventeenth day of June in the Ninth Year of our Reign Anno Domini 1697.

BENJAMIN FLETCHER.

By his Excelys. Command,
David Jamison D. Sec'y.[1]

The earliest movement of Stephanus van Cortlandt towards obtaining the Lands of the Manor, was to take out, pursuant to the law of the Province,[2] a License to purchase them from the Indians, in order to extinguish the Indian title. This instrument, from the original among the van Cortlandt papers, is in these words:

License from Gov. Andros.

"By The Governor:

Whereas application hath been made unto mee by divers persons for lands at Wyckerscreeke, or adjacent parts, on the east side of Hudson's River, the which have not yet been purchased of the Indyan Proprietors. These presents are to authorize you, Col Stephanus van Cortlandt, Mayor of this City, if fitting opportunity shall present, to treat with, and agree for, any part of the said Land for wh^ch there may be present occasion of settlement, or for the whole, with the Indyan Sachems or Proprietors. The payment whereof to be made publicly at the Fort or City Hall.

[1] Recorded in Book of Patents No. 7, begun in 1695, pp. 165-170.

[2] Explained above in this essay.

Given under my hand in New York this 16th day of Novem^ber, 1677.

Andros."[1]

This license, it will be seen, was general, and permitted van Cortlandt to buy of the Indians whenever it might conveniently be done. No time was mentioned and it operated as an indefinite permission to extinguish the Indian title in the region named. Six years after its date, in 1683, he bought the peninsula afterwards, and now known as Verplanck's Point, and another large tract adjoining it running to the eastward, the former called by the natives Meanagh,[2] and the latter Appamapogh, which were conveyed to him by the annexed Deed;—

SIECHAM, and six other Indians, to Stephanus van Cortlandt.

"To all christian people to whom this present writing shall come: Siecham, Pewimine, Oskewans, Turham, Querawighint, Isighera, and Prackises, all Indians, true and rightful owners and proprietors of the lands, hereinafter mentioned, as for themselves and the rest of their relations send, greeting, KNOW YE that for and in consideration of the sum of twelve pounds in wampum and several other merchandises, as by a schedule hereunto annexed more at large, doth and may appear, to them the same Indians in hand paid before the ensealing and delivering thereof, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and for other divers causes and considerations, they, the said Indians have granted, bargained and sold, aliened, enfeofted and confirmed, and by these presents do fully, clearly and absolutely grant, bargain, sell, alien, enfeof, and confirm unto Stephanus Van Cortlandt of the city of New York, merchant, his heirs or assignes forever, all that certain tract or parcel of land situate, lying or being on the east side of the Hudson River, at the entering in of the Highlands, just over against Haverstraw, lying on the south side of the creek called Tammoesis, and from thence easterly in the woods to the head of the creek called Kewightahagh, and so along said creek northerly to Hudson River, and thence westerly to the utmost point of the said tract of land, and from thence southerly along said Hudson River to the aforenamed creek, Tammoesis, which said tract or parcel of land known by the Indians by the name of Appamaghpogh and Meanagh, including all the lands, soils, meadows and woods within the circuit and bounds aforesaid, together with all, and singular the trees, timber-woods, underwoods, swamps, runs, marshes, meadows, rivulets, streams, creeks, waters, lakes, pools, ponds, fishing, hunting, fowling and whatsoever else to the said tract or parcel of land within the bounds and limits aforesaid, is belonging or in any wise appertaining without any restriction whatsoever, TO HAVE AND TO HOLD the said parcel or tract of land, and all and singular other the premises and every part and parcel thereof unto the said Stephanus Van Cortlandt, his heirs and assignees to the sole and only proper use, benefit and behoof of him, the said Stephanus his heirs and assignees forever, and they, the said Indians do for themselves their heirs and every of them consent, promise, and engage, that the said Stephanus Van Cortlandt his heirs and assignees shall and may from henceforth and forever lawfully peaceably and quietly have, hold, possess and enjoy the said tract or parcel of land, and all and singular the other the premises with their appurtenances without either let, hindrance, disturbance or interruption of or by them, the said Indian proprietors, or their heirs or any other person or persons claiming, or that shall hereafter, shall or may claim, by from under them or either of them, and that they shall and will upon the reasonable request and demand made by the said Stephanus Van Cortlandt, give and deliver peaceable and quiet possession of the said tract and parcel of land and premises, or of some part thereof and in the room of the whole under such person or persons, as by the said Stephanus Van Cortlandt shall be appointed to receive the same, in witness whereof the said Indians Pewemine, Oskewans, Turham, Querawighint, Siecham, Isighera, and Prackises, the Indian owners and proprietors aforesaid, have hereunto set their hands and seals in New York, this twenty-fourth day of August in the thirty-fifth year of his majesties reign, Anno Domini, 1683.

Signed sealed and delivered in presence of Francis Rumbouts, Guelyne Verplancke.

(Here follow the seals, and the marks, of Siecham and the other six Indians named).

Appended is the "schedule" of "other merchandises" mentioned in the deed as part of the consideration;

8 guns,	12 shirts,
9 blankets,	50 pounds powder,
5 coats,	30 bars of lead,
14 fathoms of Duffels,[3]	18 hatchets,
14 kettles,	18 hoes,

[1] This paper is recorded in the Sec. of State's off., Albany, Lib. 27, p. 238, and in West Co. Reg. off., Lib. A, 228. It is also in XIV. Col. Hist., 515.

[2] This word is so spelled in the original deeds and wills in which it occurs. The spelling "Meahagh" is simply a copyist's, or printer's, corruption.

[3] A coarse but soft woolen cloth made in Holland.

40 fathoms black wampum, 14 knives,
80 fathoms white wampum, A small coat,
2 ankers of rum, 6 fathoms stroud cloth,
5 half vats strong beer, 6 pair of stockings,
6 earthen jugs, 6 tobacco boxes."

On the ninth of March, 1682, Cornelis van Bursum of New York City, obtained the following License to purchase Indian Lands from Anthony Brockholes, who, as Senior Member of the Council had succeeded Andros in the Command of the Province when the latter went to England.

Lycense to Cornelis Van Bursum,
By the Commander in Chiefe.

"Whereas Cornelis Van Bursum of this City hath made Applicaçon for Liberty and Lycense to purchase of the Indyans a Certain parcel or Tract of Land Lyeing on the East side of Hudson River Behither the High-Lands, to Settle A ffarme or Plantaçon or for the Improvem[t] of Husbandry, These are to certify that I have and Doe Hereby with Advise of the Counsell Grant Liberty and Lycense to the said Cornelis Van Bursum to purchase of the Indyans the said Parcell or tract of Land and to Settle A ffarme or Plantaçon thereupon, he Makeing Due return thereof to the office of Records there in Order to Confirmaçon, and Makeing Improvement and performing what the Law in Such Cases Requires.

Given under my hand in New-Yorke this third Day ffeb[ry], in the thirty Fourth yeare of his Mat[ies] Reigne Annoy. Domini 1681-2. A. B.[1]"

Van Bursum acted immediately, and four months later received from Ackimak, and nineteen other Indians, a deed for the lower peninsula which forms the South bounds of Haverstraw Bay. It was called by the Indians Senasqua, and by the Whites "Sarah's," and "Teller's," Point, and later "Croton" Point. The last from the fact that it forms the North Side of the estuary of the Croton River. Sarah was the wife of William Teller who long lived upon the Point, she having survived her husband several years. It is decribed in the Indian deed to Van Bursum as, "all that parcell, neck, or point of Land, with the Marsh, Meadow ground, or valley thereto Adjoining and Belonging, Situate lying and being on the east side of the North or Hudson's River, over against verdrietye's Hooke, commonly called and Known by the name of Slauper's Haven, and by the Indians Navish, the Meadow[2] being called by the Indians Senasqua, being bounded by the said River and a certain creek called or known to the Indians by the name of Tanrackan, and divided from the Main land by certain trees marked by the Indians, together with half of the said creek &c. for, and in consideration of, a certain sum of Wampum, and divers other goods, paid by Cornelius van Bursum.[3]

The lands from the Croton River Northward to Stephanus van Cortlandt's Appamapogh purchase before mentioned, and running eastward to the Keakates or twin ponds, or Cedar Ponds, as they are called on the Manor Map, and thence down the Mescoot and Croton rivers to the latters mouth, were bought of the Indians by Governor Thomas Dongan himself. Their deed to him was dated August 1685. Dongan on the 20th March 1686, sold the land to one John Knights. Dongan's deed from the Indians thus describes the tract, which from the Indian name of the Croton, was called Kichtawanck, or Kitchtawong; — "all that Tract or parcell of Land situate Lying and being on the East side of Hudson's River, within the County of Westchester, beginning at Kichtawong Creek, and so running along Hudson's River northerly to the land of Stephanus van Cortlandt, from thence to the eastwardmost end of the Said van Cortlandts Land, and from thence to a great fresh Water Pond called Keakates, and from the said pond along the creek that runs out of the said Pond to Kichtawong Creek, and so downward on the south side of the said creek to Hudson's River, including all the land, soil, and meadow within the bounds and limits aforesaid." John Knights, on the 20th of April, 1687, reconveyed it by deed to Governor Thomas Dongan.[4] And from Dongan it subsequently passed to Stephanus van Cortlandt.

Previously to his purchase of the Dongan lands, and on the 13th of July, 1683, Stephanus Van Cortlandt bought from the Haverstraw Indians a tract on the West side of the Hudson River, directly opposite to the promontory of Anthony's Nose, and North of the Dunderbergh Mountain, forming the depression or valley,[5] through the upper part of which, in the Revolutionary War, Sir Henry Clinton came down and captured Forts Constitution and Montgomery, then commanded by his distant relatives and namesakes, Generals, George, and James, Clinton. The original deed, among the Van Wyck papers, which has never before been printed, is as follows:

Indian Deed to Stephanus van Cortlandt for Lands on the West Side of the Hudson.

"To All Christian people To whom this Present writing shall come Sakaghkeineck Sachem of Haverstraw, Werekepes, Saquogharup, Kakeros, and Kaghtsikroos, all, Indians true and Rightfull owners and Proprietors of the Land herein after mentioned and Expressed, Send Greeting. Know ye, That for and in Consideraion of the Sume of Six Shillings Curr: Silver money to them the said Indians in hand payed before the Enscaling and Delivery here of the Receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged and for Diverse other Valuable Causes and Consideraions they the said Indians have Granted Bargained Sold Aliened Enfeoffed and Confirmed and by these Presents Doe Fully

[1] XIII. Col. Hist., 554. [2] On the peninsula.
[3] West. Co. Reg. off. Lib. A, 182.
[4] Lib. A, 121, West. Co. Reg. off.
[5] This valley bears now the odd appellation of "Doodletown."

Cleerly and Absolutely Grant Bargain Sell Alien Enfeoff and Confirm unto Stephanus Van Cortlandt of the Citty of New Yorke Merchant his heires and assignes for ever All that A Certaine Tract or Parcell of Land Situate Lyeing and being on the West side of Hudsons River within the High Lands over Against a greate Hill Commonly called Anthonys Nose beginning on the South side at a Creeke called Sinkapogh[1] and so alongst the said Creeke to the head thereof and then northerly alongst the high hills as the River runneth to Another Creeke called Assinnapink[2] and from thence along The said Creeke to Hudsons River againe togather with A Certaine Island and Parcell of Meadow Land neere or adjoyneing to the same called Wanakawaghkin and by the Christians known by the name of Salsbury's Island[3] Includeing all the Lande Soile and Meadows within the Bounds and Limitts aforesaid togather with all and singular the trees Timber Woods Underwoods Swamps Moores Marshes Meadows Rivoletts Streames Creeckes Waters Lakes Pooles Ponds ffishing hunting and fowleing and whatsoever Else to the said Tract or Parcell of Land within the Bounds and Limitts aforesaid is belonging or in any wise appurteineing without any Reservaion whatsever To have and To hold the said Tract or parcell of Land and all and singuler other the Primisses and every Parte and Parcell thereof unto the said Stephanus Van Cortlandt his heirs and Assigns to the sole and only Proper use Benefitt and Behoofe of him Van Cortlandt his heires and Assigns for ever. And they the said Indians Doe for themselves and their heires and every of them Covenant Promise and engage that the said Steph: Van Cortlandt his heires and assignes Shall and may from henceforth for Ever Lawfully Peaceably and Quiettly have hold Possesse and Enjoye the said Tract or Parcell of Land and all and singuler other the Premisses with their Appurtenences without any Lett Hindrance Disturbance or Interrupion whatsoever of or by them the said Indian Proprietors or their heires or of any other Person or Persons Claymeing or that hereafter shall or may clayme by from or under them or either of them.

And that they shall and will upon reasonable Request and demand made by the said Stephanus Van Cortlandt Give and Deliver Peaceably and Quietly Possession of the said Tract or Parcell of Land and Premisses or of some Parte thereof for and in the name of the whole unto such Person or Persons as by the said Stephanus V. Cortlandt shall be appointed to Receive the same

In Witnesse whereof the said Sakaghkeineik Sachem of Haverstraw Werekepes Saquoghharup Kakeros and Kaghtsikroos the Indians owners and Proprietors aforesaid have hereunto Sett their hands and Seales in New Yorke the 13th day of July in the thirty-fifth yeare of his Ma[tie]s Reigne Anno Domin 1683.

Signed Sealed and Delivered in the Presence of Uss
By Sakaghkeineck, Werekepes & Kaghtsikroos
Fredryck Flypssen
Gulain Verplancke
John Weis
My Marke
†
Mantion

the mark of Sakaghkeineck † Sachem of Haverstraw
The marke of
†
Werekepes
The Marke of
†
Kaghtsikroos"

The last purchase which Stephanus Van Cortlandt is known to have made, was a tract on the east side of the Hudson, then belonging to "Hew MacGregor, Gentleman, of the City of New York," who previously obtained it from the Indians. The original deed from MacGregor is among the Van Wyck papers and bears date the 13th day of July 1695, only two years and twenty-five days before the date of the Grant of the Manor. It is a full covenant warrantee deed, signed by both Hew McGregor and Stephanus Van Cortlandt, the witnesses being Johannus Kip, Theunis De Key, and John Barclay. The consideration mentioned is "a certain summ of good and lawfull money." And the premises conveyed are thus described—"All that certain tract of land situate, lying, and being up Hudson's River on the East side thereof, beginning at the East side of the land late belonging to Jacob De Key and Company at a Creek called Pohotasack and so along a creek called by the Indyans Paquingtuk and by the Christians John Peak's Creek to another creek called by the Indyans Acquasimink, including two small water ponds called Wenanninissios and Wachiehamis, Together with all and singular meadows, marshes, woods, underwoods, waters, ponds, water-courses, improvements, privileges, hereditaments and appurtenances whatsoever to the said Tract of land and premises belonging or appertaining."

How extensive an area this description embraced cannot be stated its terms being too vague, but is was a very large tract lying east of the eighteen hundred acre tract called Sachus, or Sachoes, and known as "Rycke's Patent," which embraced the present village of Peeks Kill and its immediate neighbourhood, the fee of which was not owned by Stephanus van Cortlandt, although within the limits of the Manor, and subject to its jurisdiction, till 1770, when it was granted by special act a civil organization of its own, as will be hereafter shown.

These lands including all his purchases upon both sides of the Hudson River were granted and confirmed, to Stephanus van Cortlandt, June 17th, 1697, by the Manor-Grant of the Manor of Cortlandt. Its boundaries as therein stated are thus set forth, "a certain tract and parcell of Land situate Lying and being upon the East side of Hudson's River, Beginning on the North Line of the Mannor of Philipseburghe, now in the tenour[1] and occupation of Fredrick Phillipse, Esqr., one of the Members of our said Councill, and to the south side of a Certain Creeke called Kightawank Creek,[2] and from thence by a Due East Line Runing into the woods Twenty English miles, and from the said north line of the Mannor of Philipseburghe upon the south side of said Kightawank Creek running along the said Hudson River Northerly, as the said River runs, unto the North side of a High Hill in the highlands commonly called and Known by the Name of Anthony's Nose, to a Red Ceader tree, Which Makes the South Bounds of the Land now in y^e^ tenour and occupation of Mr. Adolph Phillipse[3] Including in the said Northerly Line all the Meadows, Marches, Coves, Bays, and Necks of Land and pennensulaes that are adjoining or Extending into Hudson's River within the Bounds of the said Lines, and from said red ceader tree another Due Easterly Line Runing into the Woods Twenty English Miles, and from thence along the Partition Line between our Colony of Conecticut and this Our Province untill you come into the place where the first Easterly Line of twenty miles Doth Come, the Whole being Bounded on the East by the said Partition Line between our said Collony of Conecticut and this our Province, and on the south side by the Northerly Line of the Mannor of Philipseburghe to southward of Kightawank Creeke aforesaid, and on the west by the said Hudson's River, and on the North side from the aforesaid red ceader tree by the south Line of the Land of Mr. Adolf Phillipse. And also a Ceartain parcel of Meadow Lying and being situate upon the West side of Hudson's River Within the said High Lands over against the aforesaid Hill called Anthony's Nose, Beginning on the South side of a creek called by the Indians Sinkeepogh, and so along said Creeke to the head thereof and then Northerly along the high hills as the River Runeth to another Creeke Apinnapink, and from thence along said Creeke to the said Hudson's River."

[1] Now called Snakehole Creek.
[2] The Creek South of Snakehole Creek.
[3] Now called Iona Island.

From this description we are able to see the outline and appreciate the extent, and area, of this magnificent Manor of Cortlandt, which contained on the East side of the Hudson River 86,213 acres, and on the West side at least 1,500 acres, making altogether the enormous total of Eighty-seven thousand seven hundred and thirteen acres of land.

About two years after receiving the Grant of the Manor Stephanus van Cortlandt, following the usual, and the wise, rule of the day in such matters, (the reason of which has been fully explained in the beginning of this essay in speaking of the Native owners of the County)[4] obtained from the Indian dwellers upon the lands of his grant as a whole, a special deed of confirmation. This Instrument is very important as it states specifically the lands in, and the bounds of, the region embraced in the Manor of Cortlandt. It is dated the 8th of August 1699, and is in there words;

Indian Deed of Confirmation of the Manor of Cortlandt.

"We, Sachima-Wicker, Sachem of Kightawonck," (and twenty two other Indians seven of whom were squaws) "all right, just, natural owners and proprietors of all the land hereinafter mentioned, lying and being within the bounds and limits of the Mannor of Cortlandt, &c., have sold, for a certain sum of money, all that tract and parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the Mannor of Cortlandt, in West Chester County, beginning on the South side Kightawonck Creek, and so along the said Creek to a place called Kewighecock[5], and from thence Northerly along a Creek called Peppeneghek[6] to the head thereof, and then due east to the limits of Connecticut, being the easternmost bounds of said Mannor, and from thence Northerly along the limits of Connecticut aforesaid to the river Mutighticus[7] ten miles, and from thence due west to Hudson's river, together with all the lands soils &c &c.[8] The witnesses were John Naufau (the Lieut. Governor) Abraham De Peyster, James Graham, and A. Livingston.

Thus Stephanus van Cortlandt became the undisputed and acknowledged Lord of "The Lordship and Manor of Cortlandt."

There were two small parcels of land within the above general limits of the Manor, the soil of which was not owned by either Stephanus van Cortlandt or his heirs, one of eighteen hundred acres and one of three hundred, the latter fronting on the north side of Peekskill bay, the former on the Hudson River between Verplank's Point and Peekskill creek. The former was the tract known as "Ryke's Patent." Its Indian name was "Sachus," or "Sackhoes," and it was purchased of the Indians on the 21st of April, 1685, under a license dated March 6, 1684, from Governor Dongan, by Richard Abrams, Jacob Abrams, TeunisDekey or De Kay, Seba, Jacob and John Harxse;[9] and on the 23rd of December, 1685, a patent was granted to these purchasers and one or two others for this tract, in which it is thus described:—"All that certain tract or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being on Hudson's River at a certain place called by [1] Tenure.

[2] The Croton River.

[3] A brother of Frederick Phillipse. The tract was called "Phillipse's Upper Patent," and included almost all of what is now Putnam County.

[4] Ante p. 34.

[5] Or Kewightequack, as spelled on the Map of the Manor.

[6] Now Cross River, an eastern branch of the Croton.

[7] Now called the Titicus.

[8] Book I of Indian Deeds, 88, Sec. of State's offi. Albany.

[9] So spelled and named in the original petition to Dongan for the Patent in vol. 2 of Land Papers of 1683, Sec. of State's Office, Albany.

the Indians Sachus, and stretching by the north side of Stephanus van Cortlandt, his land up to the said river, to another creek, and so runs up said creek in several courses, to a certain tree marked T. R. west of the aforesaid creek which lies by Stephanus van Cortlandt's land, including all the meadows both fresh and salt within said bounds, containing in all 1800 acres or thereabouts." The tenure like that of the Manor was "in free and common soccage according to the tenure of East Greenwich in the County of Kent in his Majesties Kingdom of England." The quit rent was "ten bushels of good winter merchantable wheat yearly, on the five and twentieth day of March [New Years Day according to the then "old style"] in the city of New York.[1]

From Richard Abrahamsen one of the six patentees this tract derives its name of Ryke's Patent, "Ryke" being a Dutch abbreviation of Richard, he having subsequently acquired the shares of several of the original owners.[2] From him and his brother Jacob Abrahamsen of "Upper Yonckers," their title passed by purchase to Hercules Lent who also acquired finally the title to the whole 1800 acres. Hercules Lent devised the patent in several parcels among his children and grandchildren by will in 1766.[3] The name of Lent is still very common in the neighborhood of Peekskill to this day, and some of the name still own portions of the original tract. The 300 acre tract, which was of little importance, fronted on the inner and upper part of Peekskill bay, and became prior to 1732 the property of John Krankhyte. Both these pieces are shown, colored in pink, on the accompanying map of the Manor of Cortlandt.

The earliest traces of the settlement of any part of the Manor was that at the trading station with the Indians, which resulted in the erection of the stone fortified building, at the north side of the mouth of the Croton, which subsequently became the present Manor House. The largest Indian village was upon the high flat at the neck of the peninsula of Senasqua, or Tellers, or Croton Point, which unites it with the main land, and over which now runs the River Road. Hence for convenience sake the Dutch traders sought the landing place of the Indians, in the sheltered North side of the Estuary of the Croton, then an open bay without the sedge flats which now nearly fill it. Here too was subsequently established the ancient ferry and ferry house, as the population, and the traffic, up and down the Hudson, began to grow and increase. The next point of settlement was about the mouth of the Peekskill Creek, and in the tract called Ryke's Patent. The method of settlement adopted by Van Cortlandt was the same as that, which was adopted by the early Dutch colonists, and subsequently continued by the English. What it was we learn from the "Information relative to taking up Land in New Netherland in the form of Colonies, or private bonweries" written in 1650 by Secretary Tienhoven, for the information of the States-General of Holland. "Before beginning to build" he says, "'Twill above all things be necessary to select a well located spot, either on some river or bay, suitable for the settlement of a village or hamlet. This is previously properly surveyed and divided into lots, with good streets according to the situation of the place. This hamlet can be fenced all round with high palisades, or long boards, and closed with gates." * * "Outside the village or hamlet, other land must be laid out which can in general be fenced and prepared at the most trifling expense."

"In a Colonie each farmer has to be provided by his landlord with at least one yoke of oxen or with two mares in their stead, two cows, one or two sows for the purpose of increase, the use of the farm, and the support of his family." * * "And as it is found by experience in New Netherland that farmers can with difficulty obtain from the soil enough to provide themselves with necessary victuals and support, those who propose planting colonies must supply their farmers and families with necessary food for at least two or three years, if not altogether, it must be done at least in part." Then the proprietor had to furnish mechanics of all kinds, carpenters, smiths, wheelwrights, millers, and boat builders, and if possible a doctor, and a clergyman or school master. In this document, there are descriptions of a few regions in New Netherland which he mentions as well adapted for settlement and among them, that of the eastern and northern part of West Chester county comprising the subsequent Manors of Cortlandt, the upper part of Philipsburgh, and lands immediately adjacent to them and the Manors of Scarsdale and Pelham. The region is thus mentioned, "The country on the East River between Greenwich and the Island Manhattans is for the most part covered with trees, but yet flat and suitable land, with numerous streams and vallies, right good soil for grain, together with fresh hay and meadow lands.

Wiequaeskeck, on the North River, five leagues above New Amsterdam, is very good and suitable land for agriculture, very extensive maize land, on which the Indians have planted. Proceeding from the shore and inland 'tis flat and mostly level, well watered by small streams and running springs. It lies between the East and North Rivers, and is situate between a rivulet of Sintinck and Armonk."[4]

This is the first topographical description of the upper part of the county that exists. Written twenty-seven years before Stephanus von Cortlandt obtained his license of 1677, and thirty-three before he made his

[1] Lib. A. of Patents, Sec. of State's Off., 114. Lib. I., West. Co., Reg. Off., 145.

[2] The "Von Rycken" origin of this name, given in Bolton's History, is fanciful.

[3] Lib. 25, Wills, N. Y. Surr. Off., 337.

[4] I. Col. Hist. 365–370. These streams were the Sing Sing creek and the Byaom river.

first purchase of its northern part from the Indians, it gives us a good idea of the clear-headedness and shrewdness of the man, and the obligations he took upon himself in undertaking to settle the tract. He undoubtedly did a good deal in bringing in inhabitants and stock, between 1683, the date of his first purchase, and 1697, the date of his Manor-grant. Here it was that he erected the mills, mentioned (in the plural) in his will, dated three years later in 1700, the year of his death, which by both Dutch and English law the Patroons and the Lords of Manors were bound to provide for the benefit of their tenants. Had Stephanus von Cortlandt lived to be seventy-five or eighty years old, like so very many of his descendants in every generation, instead of dying at fifty-seven, leaving a large family, mostly minors, it is probable that he would have left his manor as flourishing and as populous in proportion as that of Rensselaerswyck at the same date.

The general franchises and privileges of a Manor having already been described, those only which were peculiar to this particular Manor of Cortlandt will be mentioned here. The Rent Service on which the Manor was held, was "Forty shillings current money of our said Province" (five dollars), payable "at our city of New York on the feast day of the Annunciation of our blessed Virgin Mary." The peculiar franchises of the Manor of Cortlandt were two only, the Rangership of the Manor, and the right to be represented by its own member in the General Assembly after the expiration of twenty years next ensuing the date of the Manor Grant, the 17th of June 1697. In this as in all the other Manor-Grants was a clause giving to the Lord and his heirs the right for his tenants to meet and choose assessors and provide for public charges in accordance with the general laws of the Province.

Like all the other Manor-Grants silver and gold mines were excepted from the grant and reserved to the Crown. This reservation was actually acted upon by the Crown in the case of this Manor. And the last century a Crown-grant was made of a silver mine which was discovered just by Sing Sing village. But space will not permit more than this mention of the fact.

"Rangers" were sworn officers of the Crown, to whom were granted by the Sovereign the "Royal rights or franchises, of waifs, estrays, hunting, royal fish, treasure trove, mines, deodands, forfeitures, and the like. They were appointed, either, by a special royal grant, over a special district, which was the more usual, or else, as in this instance, the franchise was named among others in the grant of a Manor. The appointment by Governor Hunter on September 4th, 1710, of Major Thomas Jones, of Fort Neck, Queens County, the grandfather of Judge Thomas Jones the author of the "History of New York during the Revolutionary War" as 'Ranger-General of Long Island' is an instance of the former. That of Stephanus van Cortlandt in his Manor-Grant of Cortlandt one of the latter. Its value to the Lord of Cortlandt was, that it gave him the regulation and absolute control of the methods of Hunting and Fishing, throughout the Manor, the forests and waters of which were remarkable for their more than great numbers of deer, beaver, wild turkies, wild geese swans, ducks, and other feathered game, and the great-plenty of salmon, shad, herrings, and striped bass, which filled the Hudson, to say nothing of the trout, black bass, and pickerel of its beautiful fresh water lakes and streams, which gemmed in clear brilliance the vales and glades of the Manor amid its bold lofty hills, and dark, magnificent forests.

The other special franchise was that of sending a Representative to the General Assembly. This was a franchise of so high a character that it was granted to but two more out the many New York Manors, those of Rensselaerswyck in 1705 and Livingston in 1715, the former eight years, the latter eighteen years, after the grant to Cortlandt. The franchise in this case was not to be enjoyed till after the lapse of twenty years from the date of the Manor-Grant, June 17th 1697, that is until after June 17th, 1717. The reason of this was to allow a sufficient time to elapse for the coming in of a population numerous enough to require a representative.

In 1697 when the Manor was erected, except a few white people near the mouth of the Croton, and near Verplanck's Point, the whole Manor was occupied by the Indians. True, their title to the lands had been duly purchased, but, as in almost all Indian purchases a right to hunt and fish and plant corn, was practically reserved by the Indians. And this the whites always acknowledged. In consequence the entry of the whites was extremely gradual. Therefore, until people enough to require a representative had settled upon the Manor there was no need of one.

It was not until 1734, however, that the heirs of Stephanus van Cortlandt, who had died in 1700, chose to avail themselves of this privilege of representation. In that year at their instance Mr. Philip Verplanck[1] was chosen to represent the Manor in the General Assembly. The admission of its Members to the Assembly is interesting and curious. On the 10th of June 1734, says the Journal of the House, "Philip Verplanck, Esq., attending without, was called in, and produced to the House, an indenture that he was duly elected a Representative for the Manor of Cortlandt, in this present Assembly, as likewise the Letters Patent of the said Manor dated in the year 1697, whereby a Power and Privilege [was] granted to choose said Representative living within the same, to commence twenty years after its date—Ordered, that the same be taken into consideration to-morrow morning." The next day, the eleventh, the House resolved that Mr.

[1] The husband of Gertrude, only child of Johannes (John) van Cortlandt, the eldest son of Stephanus, which Johannes was then dead.

Verplanck "be admitted as a member of this House for the said Manor as soon as an act is passed for that purpose, and that leave be given him to bring in a bill accordingly." Four days afterwards, on the 15th of June 1734, "Mr. De Lancey" (Etienne or Stephen De Lancey, the first of that family in America, then the first named of the four members for the City of New York, a son-in-law and one of the heirs of Stephanus van Cortlandt) "according to leave presented to this House a bill entitled, An Act for regulating the choice of a Representative for the Manor of Cortlandt in the County of Westchester; which was read the first time and ordered to be read the second time. Two days later, on the 17th, in the morning session, the bill was read a second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole. In the afternoon session of the same day "Col. Lewis Morris, Jr.,[1] from the Committee of the whole House reported the bill with an amendment, "which were read and agreed unto by the House," and the same ordered to be engrossed. Five days later the Governor (Cosby) gave his assent to the bill and it was, with nine others, "published at the City Hall." After which and on the same day, on motion, Mr. Verplanck was admitted as the Representative for the Manor of Cortlandt. He was then called into the House, and Messrs. Le Count and Van Kleck were directed to go with Mr. Verplanck before the Governor, and see him take the oaths and subscribe the Declaration according to Law. This was done, and on their return Mr. Le Count reported that the duty had been performed, whereupon it was, "Ordered, that the said Mr. Philip Verplanck take his place as a Member of this House accordingly."[2] It is easy to see from these proceedings that the Assembly was very jealous of its own privileges, and careful to see that the admission was strictly according to law.

The Act itself consists of a long preamble and four sections, the last of which was the "amendment" added in Committee of the Whole. It is recited in the preamble that Mr. Verplanck had been elected "pursue ant to a Writ lately issued to the Freeholders of and in the said Manor," and it then gives the reason for enacting the law in these words;—"But inasmuch as the Heirs of the said Stephanus van Cortlandt, by Reason of the said Manor's remaining undivided among them, and otherwise, had not, untill very lately, asserted and claimed their said Privilege; and there not being sufficient Provision made in the said Grant for the regulating and orderly chusing such Representative, some Debates and Controversies did arise in the House of Representatives,[3] upon the Return made to them of the choice of the said Philip Verplanck as aforesaid; and thereupon for the regular admission of the said Philip, it was ordered that he should have leave to bring in a bill for that purpose; Wherefore and to the end such Representative may be more orderly and duly elected for the future." It was enacted;—first, that Verplanck's election should be confirmed; second, that the Freeholders of the Manor should elect "a fit and discreet Inhabitant and Freeholder" of the Manor to represent it in the Assembly; third that the Returning officer of the Manor should hold the elections precisely as the High Sheriff held the elections in the County, and be empowered to administer the same oaths;[4] and fourth and last, the amendment reported by Col. Lewis Morris, Jr., which as it is both curious and interesting, is here given in full; IV. Provided and Be it enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That the Freeholders and Inhabitants of the said Manor of Cortlandt, shall at all times pay the Wages of their own Representative; and that nothing herein contained shall exempt them from paying their due and equal proportion of the Wages of the Deputies or Representatives for the County of Westchester, and of all other the annual publick, and necessary charges of the same County."[5] It is certainly very evident that the Assembly of 1734 did not believe in Representation without double taxation. There was probably some jealousy, or political feeling at the bottom of the insertion of this provision, for three years later, in 1737 it was unconditionally repealed by an Act passed on the 16th of December in that year,[6] except as to the general County charges. This act also fixed the "Wages" of the Representative of the Manor at "Six shillings for every day he attends the Service of the said Assembly," and expressly provided that the Inhabitants of the Manor should "only pay the charges and Wages of their own Representative."

It also provided for the annual election in the Manor of "one Supervisor, one Treasurer, two Assessors, and one Collector" with all the powers and duties of those officers in the Counties of the Province, pursuant to "The Act" of William and Mary of 1691, "for defraying the public charges of the Province, maintaining the poor, and preventing vagabonds." This was the first time these officers became necessary in the Manor.

Elected and admitted to his seat under this franchise in 1734, Philip Verplanck was constantly re-elected to subsequent Assemblies and sat for the Manor of Cortlandt continuously up to the year 1768, the long period of thirty-four years. A continuous period of service without a parallel in Province of New York, and which has never occurred under the State of New York. The nearest approach to it under the State Government, singularly enough, being

[1] Son of the Chief justice of the same name.

[2] See journals of the Assembly vol. I. pages 666 to 669 for these proceedings.

[3] This term "House of Representatives" so familiar to all Americans now, was the term always used in New York in colony times, to distinguish the Assembly officially.

[4] See pp. 110, 111, Ante.

[5] I. V. S. Laws, chap. 607, p. 183.

[6] I. V. S. Laws, ch. 654, p. 192.

that of the distinguished, and very able, gentleman, who has, in our own day, represented this same Manor of Cortlandt and the portions of the County adjoining it, now the third Assembly District of Westchester County of which he is a native, for 16 years in the Assembly 11 of which were of continuous service, the Honorable James W. Husted of Peekskill; and who in the Assembly of this present year—1886—now presides over that Body as its speaker,—the fourth time to which he has been chosen to that high office.[1] Mr. Verplanck having died and Sir Henry Moore the Governor having dissolved the old Assembly on the 6th of February 1768, writs for a new election were issued on the 10th of February returnable on the 22d of March following, between which dates the new election was held, in the manner that has been before described, and "Pierre Van Cortlandt Esq." was duly elected representative for the Manor, and took his seat at the opening of the session on the 27th of October 1768.[2] This Assembly was a very short one, having been dissolved by the same Governor on the 2d of January 1769. New writs for a new election were issued on the 4th of the same month returnable on the 14th of the ensuing February.[3] The election in the manor took place on the 1st of February 1769 "Pierre Van Cortlandt Esq." being again elected. The following is a copy of the "return" of the election under the hands and seals of the returning officers, and as showing the method in use in Colony days is of much interest. It is endorsed "Copy of Indenture certifying the election of Pierre Van Cortlandt Esq^{r}. to serve as Representative of the Manor—1769."

Indenture of Election.

"This Indenture made and concluded this first day of February in the Ninth year of the Reign of Our Sovereign Lord George the Third by the Grace of God of Great Brittain France and Ireland King, Defender of ye Faith, etc., and In the year of Our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Sixty-Nine—With and Between Joshuah Traviss Constable of the one Part and Jeremiah Traviss, Charles Moore, Joseph Traviss, Abraham Purdy and John Stevens, Principal Freeholders of the Manor of Cortland of the Other Part, Witnesseth that the said Constable in obedience to His Majesties Writ to him directed bearing Date the Fourth day of Jannary did give Public Notice to the Freeholders of the said Manor of Cortland who assembled and met Together on the First Day of February and by Plurality of Voices made Choice of Pierre Van Cortlandt, Esq., one of the Principal Freeholders of the Said Manor to be the Representative to Assist the Captain General or Commander-in-Chief of the Province of New-York In General Assembly for Said Province, on the Fourteenth day of February. In Testimony Whereof we have hereinto set our Hands and Seals this day and year First Above Written.

Joseph Traviss, [L. S.] Joshuah Traviss, Constable [L. S.] Abram Purdy, [L. S.] Jeremiah Traviss, [L. S.] John Stevens, [L. S.] Charles Moore, [L. S.][4]

This Assembly was the last elected in the Province of New York, and sat till 1775. Pierre Van Cortlandt sat for the Manor during its whole existence.

In 1756 the population had so increased that an act was passed reciting the fact and authorizing the election of two Constables, one from those "having Habitations near Hudson's River," and the other from those whose "Habitations" were "on the Eastern parts of said Manor."[5]

By 1768 the numbers of the people had so much more increased that, the last mentioned act was amended by authorizing the election of three Constables, and dividing the Manor into three "Divisions" or Wards, each of which was to elect one of the three constables. The first of these "division" contained all the Manor West of the east bonds of North lot No. I. and South lot No. I., North of the Croton River, and West of the West bounds of lot No. 8 on the South of the Croton. The second division, lay east of the first, and West of the West bounds of North lot No. 8 and South lot No. 8, and West of the East bounds of lot No. 10 South of the Croton. The third was all the rest of the Manor East of the East bounds of the second division.[6] This act also provided for the annual election of "Overseers of Roads" in each of the above divisions and specified their powers and duties.[7]

In all these elections, and public actions under the foregoing laws, the inhabitants of the Krankhyte 300 acre tract, and of Ryke's Patent were included, being political portions of the Manor of Cortlandt, although the fee of the soil was in the owners of the patents solely. Several of the Manors in New York likewise embraced within their limits in the political sense, small parcels of land not owned in fee by their proprietors, in the same way. By 1770 the people in Ryke's Patent had so increased in number, that an act was passed on the 27th of January in that year, for their special benefit which provided "that for the better defraying the common and necessary charges of Ryke's Patent in the Manor of Cortlandt in Westchester County," the Freeholders thereof should elect on the first Tuesday in every April, one Supervisor, one Constable, one Assessor, one Poor-Master, two Fence-Viewers, one Pound-Master, and one or more Surveyors of Highways, with all the powers and [1] For one year of Mr. Husted's service in the Assembly, he sat for Rockland County directly across the Hudson.

[2] Assembly Journals of 1768, 3.

[3] Assembly Journals of 1769, p. 3, By a printer's error the Journals make the issue of the new Writs the "14th," instead of the "4th" of January, 1769.

[4] The original is among the Van Cortlandt papers.

[5] I. V. S. Laws, Ch. 1015, p. 359.

[6] These divisions are often spoken of in the documents of that day, as the three wards of the Manors.

[7] II. V. S. Laws, Ch. 1378, p. 529.

duties and subject to the same pains and penalties of the like officers under the Laws of the Colony.[1]

A singular law in regard to the Manor, as it appears to us now, was one passed the 13th of December, 1763, which enacted that in case any person whatsoever "shall carry on the Practice of Inoculation for the Small-Pox in the Manor of Cortlandt within the Distance of Half a Mile of any Dwelling House he shall forfeit the sum of Twenty Pounds ($50.) for every such offence, upon proof before a Justice of the Peace, one-third to go to the prosecutor, and the other two thirds "for the use of the Poor in the Said Manor." The patient had consequently to go through the operation and subsequent treatment, either in a barn or a shanty in the woods.

The Manor of Cortlandt was erected on the 17th of June, 1697. Stephanus van Cortlandt its first and only Lord died on the 25th of November 1700. Three years and about five months only did he possess it. This time was too short for any practical development of its Manor privileges, all that he seems to have done, was to make the stone trading house situated at or rather near, the northern terminus of the ferry across the mouth of the Croton River, better adapted to its purposes, to bring in some farmers and mechanics, and build mills. Precisely when this house was built is uncertain, but probably about 1683. Van Cortlandt's home was in New York, and this first building was intended as a station for Indian traffic. Naturally it became his place of temporary residence when visiting his lands after his first purchase, either for business, pleasure, or the enjoyment of hunting and fishing. It is a tradition that Governor Dongan often visited this region for the latter purposes, as he was a sportsman in his tastes, a thorough gentleman and a great personal friend of van Cortlandt. Dongan was fond of flowers and fruit culture, and he introduced a kind of apple into this region still known in the Manor District as the "Dongan Apple." Subsequently the House was enlarged and became the still existing well known "Manor House of Cortlandt's Manor." From the days of Stephanus to the present hour it has ever continued to be the property and the residence of one of his family and his name, and ever the scene of a continued, and generous hospitality. The main part of the structure is built of reddish free-stone, with a high basement and walls nearly three feet thick. The roof is a rather low pitched one, in the Dutch style with dormer windows. A piazza of modern construction, extends along the entire front above the high basement. It stands on the brow of a declivity sloping to, and overlooking, the wide estuary of the Croton River, and commands a magnificent view, to the southwest of the wide Tappan Sea of the Hudson, and its striking, beautiful, bold, and almost mountainous scenery. It was originally pierced with T shaped openings for defence, in case of hostile attacks, and one or two of them have been kept unwalled up, as a matter of interest, to this day. The ancient ferry near which it was built was then and long after the only method of crossing the Croton River from the south to the north, west of Pine's Bridge near the centre of the present Artificial Croton Lake, a distance of several miles. That bridge was not built till late in the 18th century. To the death of Stephanus van Cortlandt so shortly after the erection of his lands into a Manor, is probably to be ascribed the fact, that there are no records to show whether he ever organized his Manorial Courts. The probability is, from the then sparseness of the inhabitants, that he did not. Nor before his death, was there sufficient time to have introduced very many new settlers. We know however that all the privileges and franchises of the Manor, general and political, were enjoyed by his heirs, or their assigns during the whole Colonial era.

It will be remembered, that, by the terms of the surrender of New Netherland to the English under Nicolls in 1664, and afterwards under the provisions of the treaty of Breda in 1667, the Roman-Dutch law of inheritance was guaranteed to the new Netherland colonists. Hence it was, that when Stephanus Van Cortlandt died on the 25th of November, 1700, his will made on the 14th of the preceding April, was found to be in accordance with that law, and not with the law of England. Very ample and honorable provisions was made for his wife, both, in case she wished to marry again, or in case she did not, the latter of which proved to be the case, although she outlived her husband nearly four and twenty years. The peninsula of Verplanck's Point was devised to his eldest son Johannes, and all the rest of his property of all kinds was divided equally among all his surviving children, eleven in number, including Johannes. The devise of Verplanck's Point was all that Johannes received in addition to the others in virtue of his being the eldest son.[2] Had it not been for the terms of surrender and the treaty this eminently just will could not have been made, nor could the action under it which the widow and children adopted, have been taken.

Before describing that action and its results, it is necessary to state who Stephanus Van Cortlandt was, who was his father, what his family, and who were his children.

Stephanus Van Cortlandt was the eldest of the two sons, Stephanus and Jacobus (Stephen and James), of Oloff, (or Oliver), Stevens Van Cortlandt, the first of that name in America, by his wife Annetje (Ann) Lockermans. He was born at his father's house in "Brouwer," now Stone, street, in New Amsterdam on the seventh of May, 1643, and was baptized three days later, or the eleventh, in the Dutch church in the Fort. He married on the tenth of September, 1671, in his 28th year, Gertrude, daughter of Philip Pieterse Schuyler, of Albany; and died, as has been stated on the twenty-fifth day of November, 1700, at the comparatively early age of fifty-seven years, leaving him surviving his wife and eleven children.

[1] II. V. S. Laws, Ch. 1459, p. 576.

[1] The will is recorded in the N. Y. Surr. Off., Lib. 2 of Wills, p. 78.

His father, Oloff Stevens, or Stevense, van Cortlandt, came to New Netherland, a soldier in the service of the West India Company, arriving there in the Ship Haring (The Herring) with Director Kieft on the 28th of March, 1638.[1]

He was a native ot Wijk, a small town in the province of Utrecht, in Holland. But of the origin of his family nothing is definitely known. He had a good education and the positions he subsequently held, his seal with the van Cortlandt arms, still in the possession of his descendants, as well as articles of Dutch plate bearing the same arms, show that his position was good, and that of a gentleman. He remained only a short time in the military service, having been appointed by Kieft in 1639 "Commissary of Cargoes," or customs officer, and in 1643, Keeper of the Public Stores, of the West India Company, a responsible position under the provisions of the Charters of Freedoms and Exemptions, being the Superintendent of the collection of the Company's Revenue in New Amsterdam, most of which was paid in furs. In 1648 he resigned from this official position, was made a freeman of the City, and entered upon the business of a merchant and brewer, in which he was eminently successful, becoming one of the richest men in New Amsterdam. In 1649 he was chosen Colonel of the Burgher Guard, or City train Bands, and also appointed one of the "Nine Men" a temporary representative board elected by the citizens.[2] In 1654 he was elected Schepen, or a Alderman, and the next year, 1655, appointed Burgomaster, or Mayor, of New Amsterdam. This office he filled nearly uninterruptedly till the capture by the English in 1664, at which he was one of the Commissioners appointed by Director Stuyvesant to negotiate the terms of Surrender, was prominent in their settlement, and the document bears his signature with those of the other Commissioners. He was also engaged in several temporary public matters as a Councillor and Commissioner during the administration of Director Stuyvesant, notably in the Connecticut boundary matter in 1663, and the settlement of Capt. John Scott's claim to Long Island in 1664. He acted in similar capacities under the first English Governors, Nicolls, Lovelace, and Dongan, and was chosen the Trustee of Lovelace's estate to settle it up in 1673. He married on the 26th of February, 1642, Annetje Lockermans of Turnhout, near Antwerp, a sister of Govert Lockermans, who came out with Director von Twiller, in 1633, and was so prominent afterward in New Netherland affairs. "Govert Loockermans after filling some of the highest offices in the Colony," says O'Collughan, (vol. 2, p. 38, n.) died, worth 520,000 guilders, or $208,-000; an immense sum when the period in which he lived is considered." Oloff Stevense van Cortlandt died on the 4th of April, 1684, and his wife followed him about a month afterwards.[3] They had seven children, the oldest of whom was Stephanus, and the youngest Jacobus, who respectively, were the progenitors of all of the name now living. The former founded the oldest branch, the van Cortlandts of the Manor, the latter the younger branch, the van Cortlandts of Cortlandt House, Yonkers. The names of Oloff Stevense and Annetje van Cortlandt's seven children were:

1. Stephanus, born 7 May 1643, married Gertrude Schuyler.
2. Maria (Mary), born 30 July 1645, married Jeremias Van Rensselaer.
3. Johannes (John), born 11 Oct. 1648, died a bachelor.
4. Sophia, born 31 May 1651 married Andries Teller.
5. Catharine, born 25 Oct. 1652, married
   1. John Dervall,
   2. Frederick Philipse.
6. Cornelia, born 21 Nov. 1655, married Brandt Schuyler.
7. Jacobus, born 7 July 1658, married Eve Philipse.[4]

After the death of the oldest of these children, Stephanus, his Manor vested in his own surviving children as joint tenants under his will. Their Father, Stephanus van Cortlandt, the first and only Lord of the Manor, was one of the most eminent men of the Province of New York after it become an English Colony. Except the Governorship itself, he filled at one time or another every prominent office in that Province. And when Lt. Gov. Nicholson went to England at the outbreak of Leisler's insurrection and actual usurpation, to report in person to King William, he committed the Government itself in his absence, to Stephanus van Cortlandt and Frederick Philipse.[5] A fact that caused Leisler, to seek their lives and forced them to escape from the City of New York to save themselves. Space will not permit more than the briefest mention of the events of his career, perhaps the most brilliant and varied in the fifty-seven years it occupied, of any inhabitant of New York in the seventeenth century; and undoubtedly the first brilliant career that any native of New York ever ran. Born in New Amsterdam in 1643, he was a youth of twenty-one, when in 1664 the English capture took place and New Amsterdam became New [1] I. O'Coll. 180. Alk. Rec. 1., 89. The Dutch troops in New Amsterdam were detachments from the regular army raised in Holland by the West India Company, and were changed from time to time.

[2] He was also one of the "Eight Men" a similar body, in 1645.

[3] The facts stated in this sketch are found in I. O'Call. 180 and 212. New Netherland Register under its several headings, and the II. vol. of the Colonial History. Also in Brodhead's History, both volumes. And the Lookerman's Family Bible in the library of the Bible Society of New York.

[4] Daughter of the first Frederick Philipse.

[5] III. Col. Hist. 675.

York. Brought up under the eye of his father, and educated by the Dutch clergymen of New Amsterdam,[1] whose scholarship was vastly higher than it has pleased modern writers to state, and which would compare favorably with that of the clergy of the nineteenth century, young van Cortlandt long before the death of his father in 1684, showed how well he had profited by the example of the one, and the learning of the others. He was a merchant by occupation. His first appointment was as a member of the Court of Assizes, the body instituted under "the Duke's Laws" over which Sir Richard Nicolls presided, and which, as we have seen, exercised both judicial and legislative powers. In 1668 he was appointed an Ensign in the Kings County Regiment, subsequently a Captain, and later its Colonel. From 1677 when at the age of 34 he was appointed the first Native American Mayor of the City of New York, he held that office almost consecutively till his death in 1700. When by the Duke of York's Commission and Instructions to Governor Dongan, a Governor's Council was established in New York, Stephanus van Cortlandt and Frederick Philipse were named by the Duke therein as Councillors, and with them Dongan was to appoint such others as he deemed fit for the office. His name was continued in each of the Commissions of all the succeeding Governors down to and including Bellomont's in 1697, and he continued in the office till his death in 1700. Early in this latter year he was appointed Chief Justice, but he only filled the office till his death in November of the same year. He had many years before been appointed Judge of the Common Pleas in Kings County, and later in 1693 a Justice of the Supreme Court. In 1686 Dongan made him Commissioner of the Revenue—and on the 10th of November, 1687, he was appointed by the King's, Auditor-General in England, William Blathwayt, Deputy Auditor in New York, his accounts being regularly transmitted to England and approved.

He was appointed also Deputy Secretary of New York and personally administered the office, the Secretary always residing in England, after the British custom. He was prominent in all the treaties and conferences with the Indians as a member of the Council, and was noted for his influence with them. His letters and despatches to Governor Andros, and to the different Boards and officers in England charged with the care of the Colonies and the management of their affairs, remain to show his capacity, clear headedness and courage.[2] Equally esteemed and confided in by the governments of James as Duke and King, and by William and Mary in the troublous times in which he lived, and sustained by all the Governors, even though, as in Bellomont's case, they did not like him personally, no greater proof could be adduced of his ability, skill, and integrity.

[1] III. Col. Hist. 588.

[2] In vols. III. and IV. of the Col. Hist. of N. Y.

With this sketch of their Father we pass to the disposition he made of his Great Manor among his children, and their management and final division of it among themselves:

The whole number of the children of Stephanus van Cortlandt and Gertrude Schuyler, his wife, who were married on the 10th of September 1671, were fourteen;

1. Johannes (John), born 24 Oct. 1672, married in 1695 Anne Sophia van Schaack and left one child Gertrude, who married Philip Verplanck grandson of Abraham Isaacsen Verplanck the first of that family in America.
2. Margaret, born 12 Aug. 1674, married to Col. Samuel Bayard only son of Nicholas Bayard the youngest of the three nephews of Gov. Stuyvesant.
3. Ann, born 13 Feb. 1676, married Etienne (in English Stephen) de Lancey, the first of that family in New York, where he arrived, a fugitive Huguenot, on the 7th of June, 1686.
4. Oliver, born 26 Oct. 1678, died a bachelor in 1708.
5. Maria (Mary), born 4 Apl. 1680, married 1st, Kilian van Rensselaer fourth Patroon, and first 'Lord of the Manor,' of Rensselaerswyck, and 2nd John Miln, M.D., of Albany.
6. Gertrude, born 10 Jan. 1681, died unmarried.
7. Philip, born 9 Aug. 1683, married Catherine de Peyster, daughter of the first Abraham. From this couple spring the eldest line of the van Cortlandts, now British subjects.
8. Stephen, born 11 Aug. 1685, married Catalina Staats. These were ancestors of the 'van Cortlandt of Second River' (the Passaic) New Jersey, now extinct in the males.
9. Gertrude, born 10 Oct. 1688, married Col. Henry Beekman. No issue.
10. Gysbert, born 1689, died young.
11. Elizabeth, born 1691, died young.
12. Elizabeth, 2d, born 24 May 1694, married Rev. Wm. Skinner of Perth Amboy.
13. Catharine, born 24 June 1696, married Andrew Johnston of New Jersey.
14. Cornelia, born 30 July 1698, married Col. John Schuyler of Albany. These were the progenitors of the Schuylers descended from Gen. Philip, who was their son, and from his brothers and sisters.[3]

[3] The genealogy above given is taken from a transcript of the entries in the van Cortlandt family bible, obtained from one of the eldest branch, the English one, by the late Gen. Pierre van C. of Croton in 1826 and

This large family, of which four sons and seven daughters lived to maturity, the latter of whom married into the first families of the Province, and three of the sons, (one having died a young bachelor) marrying into the same or allied families, formed a family connexion, of great extent and influence. It wielded a power, social and political, during the Colonial era which largely controlled the society and the politics of the Province, and in social matters its influence has continued to be felt to this day. All the married daughters, except Mrs. Beekman who had no issue, had large families, and those of the sons were also numerous. And when to these were added the children of Stephanus's younger brother Jacobus van Cortlandt of Yonkers, and their wives and husbands, it will be seen what an enormous family circle it was, and will explain why at this day all these families now so widely extended, are by the marriages and inter-marriages, among their descendants, so connected together as to form an almost inexplicable genealogical puzzle. In no other American colony did there exist any such great kinship. It also explains why nobody can write correctly the history of New York under the English, without first making himself, or herself, the master, or the mistress, of at least the leading facts of this kinship of the different governing families of that Province.

The political influence of these New York families is best shown by the following extract from William Smith's History of New York, a most partizan and prejudiced work, but which in this instance can be relied on, as the language is that of a political enemy, and was written to explain the worsting of his own side in the party contest of the day to which it refers. Speaking of the New York Assembly of 1752, and the influence of Chief Justice James de Lancey, Smith says, "It may gratify the curiosity of the reader to know, that of the Members of this Assembly Mr. Chief Justice De Lancey was nephew to Col. Beekman, brother to Peter De Lancey, brother-in-law of John Watts, cousin to Philip Verplanck and John Baptist Van Rensselaer; that Mr. Jones the Speaker, Mr. Richard, Mr. Walton, Mr. Cruger, Mr. Philipse, Mr. Winne, and Mr. Le Count, were of his most intimate acquaintances; and that these twelve, of the twenty-seven, which composed the whole house, held his character in the highest esteem. Of the remaining fifteen he only wanted one to gain a majority under his influence, than which nothing was more certain; for except Mr. Livingston who represented his own Manor, there was not among the rest a man of education or abilities qualified for the station they were in."[1]

"The Seven Miss van Cortlandts," as they were long collectively spoken of, were noted for their characteristic decision of character, good sense, personal beauty, and warm affection for each other. When their mother died in 1723, the list of her descendants and family relatives present, which is still preserved, is most surprising for its numbers, length and prominent names. The funeral took place in New York and was one of the largest ever seen in that city up to that day. Space will not permit any mention of its details here, interesting as they are.

Of these children of Stephanus van Cortlandt, the eleven who survived their Father, are thus named in his will in the order of their births, Johannes, Margaret, Ann, Oliver, Mary, Philip, Stephanus, Gertrude, Elizabeth, Katharine, and Cornelia. With the exception of the devise of Verplanck's Point to Johannes as being the eldest son, the whole real estate after the decease of his wife, he divided among his children equally. It was very large, for besides the Manor of Cortlandt, it included, lots and houses in New York, his share of the great Patent above the Highlands, a tract in Pennsylvania, and other lands owned in connexion with Gulian Verplanck, in Dutchess county, and some small pieces in other counties. It is only the Manor of Cortlandt that can here be treated of. His wife Gertrude was made "sole Executrix," and with her as guardian of the minor children, of whom there were several, as well as of the others, he appointed "my Brother Jacobus Van Cortlandt, my Brother [in law] Brant Schuyler, and my cousin William Nicolls,[2] to be Guardians, Tutors, and Overseers over my said children." The personal and mixed estate including "plate and jewels" was bequeathed "to my well beloved wife Gertrude," whom he charged with the payment of all debts and funeral charges. And to her were also given "the full and whole rents, issues, and profits of all and every part of my said houses, lands, mills, and other such Estate whatsoever, without giving or rendering any inventory or account thereof to any person whatsoever." The will was dated the 14th of April 1700, and was proved the 7th of January 1701. There was a custom among the Dutch people of New York, not to have the will of a deceased parent opened till after the expiration of a month from the day of the death, as a token of respect.[3] Then it was read in a family council, and immediately offered for probate. This custom was probably followed in this case. The Witnesses who proved the will were, Thomas Wenham, Rip Van Dam, John Abeel, Richard Stokes, and Andrew Teller jr., names familiar in New York to-day.[4]

The third clause, after devising all his real estate whatsoever and wheresoever to his eleven children above named their heirs and assigns respectively, sent to the writers Grandfather John Peter de Lancey of Mamaroneck (the two gentlemen being second cousins) and now in the writers possession. It was printed by the writer in the Apl. No. , 1874, of the N. Y. Gen. & Biog Record.

[1] II. Smith's Hist. N. Y., 142, ed. of 1829.

[2] Son of Matthias Nicolls the first English Secretary of the Province, who had married Mrs. Van Rensselaer, widow of this Patroon.

[3] The writer has personally known instances of this custom, which in some families has come down to these days.

[4] Lib. 2 of Wills, N. Y. Surr. Off., pp. 78–84.

continues, "and it is my Desire and Appointment that the same houses, lands, and premises be Either Equally Divided amongst them my said children, or that they hold or enjoy the same in Common Amongst them, as my said children and Overseers and Guardians hereafter named shall judge and think most effectuall and proper for their best advantage, use, and benefit." The next clause directs "that upon a Division of my said houses, lands, mills, and other Real Estate, my Sons according to their priority of birth shall have the first choyce, alwayes allowing to the value of those parts they shall choose, that the respective partys and persons of my children may be made Equall in worth to one another."

The family was a very united one and deeply attached to the mother, who was a woman of a very affectionate, but strong, and decided, character. She never married again, but devoted herself to her children and their interests. Under these circumstances, very many of the children being minors at their father's death, and the above being the provisions of his will, it was determined, that the Manor should be kept in common and not divided. Ann, Mrs. de Lancey, and Margaret, Mrs. Bayard, were the only daughters married in their father's life-time, the former only in the January, and the latter only in the April, of the same year, 1700, in November of which he died. This determination continued not only during Mrs. van Cortlandt's life, which terminated in 1723, but up to the year 1730, when it was agreed to divide that part of the Manor lying north of the Croton River. During this period the population gradually increased, the rents were applied, in part, to its development in building of mills, the making of roads, and aiding those tenants who desired to take up lands, The few people brought in, and improvements undertaken, by Stephanus van Cortlandt between his first purchase and his death, were settled and made in the western portion of the Manor, along the river, and in its immediate neighbourhood. The progress was from west to east, not from east to west. The access to New York and from Albany was by water the landing places being at the ferry near the Manor House, and near the mouth of "John Peak's Creek" as well as at a spot south of the latter in Ryke's Patent. Johannes, or John, van Cortlandt the eldest son of Stephanus, had married Anna Sophia van Schaack of Albany, and had only one child a daughter who became the wife of Philip Verplanck son of Abraham Isaacsen Verplanck the first of that name in America. To her was devised by her Father at his death, the Point, from her husband's name called "Verplanck's Point," and his one eleventh interest in the Manor.[1] Oliver van Cortlandt, the second son of Stephanus, died in 1708, at the age of 30 years, a bachelor, and devised by will dated the 3d December, 1706, his entire share of his father's estate equally among his surviving brothers and sisters and their heirs.

Philip Verplanck was a man of good education, good ability, and one of the best surveyors in the Colony. To him his relatives entrusted the surveying and division into parcels of the whole Manor. How well and thoroughly he performed the duty his survey and map remain to attest to us to-day. The original of the latter disappeared, at a comparatively late day, but in 1774, before the American Revolution, a fac-simile copy (the oldest in existence, and often wrongly called the original Manor Map) was made from it by the well known surveyor of the City of New York of that period, Evert Bancker, and is now among the Van Wyck papers in the possession of that family; of which by their permission, a reduced copy accompanies this essay. To it are made all the references of parcels, lots, and owners herein mentioned. It speaks for itself of the ability of Philip Verplanck, who was the same Philip Verplanck mentioned above, who sat for the Manor of Cortlandt in the Assembly of the Province from 1734 to 1768, thirty-four years.

This survey was made in the spring of 1732, and is dated the thirtieth day of May in that year. The Agreement of the children and grandchildren to make a division of the estate was dated November the 13th 1730. It provided for a division into ten equal parts of the estates of Stephanus and his son Oliver, "and to that end all the said parties with an unanimous assent and consent did elect and choose Philip Ver planck, surveyor, to survey and lay out the same into thirty Lotts, by virtue of which nomination and appointment he the said Philip Verplanck did project and lay out the Greater part of the lands and meadow in the said Mannor into thirty Lotts, shares, and allotments," and made a map of the same, and the said parties "did further by the assistance of the said surveyor, and Daniel Purdy and Samuel Purdy, appraisers elected and chosen by all of them for that purpose, make a perfect dividend, separation, and division of the said thirty Lotts, shares, and allotments,"[1] which several shares were conveyed to each in October 1732, by partition deeds executed by all the parties to each other respectively. This division comprised only "the greater part of the manor lands."

In 1733 under the same articles of agreement, the parties in interest made in the same way, another division "of the other and remaining part of the lands aforesaid," into ten lots, and duly executed to each other similar deeds of partition dated November 1st, 1733. These two divisions, however, were confined to lands north of the Croton river about which there was no dispute. There were some lands of the manor

[1] Johannes has sometimes been called the "Second Lord of the Manor," but this is an error as the personal dignity was ended by the division made by Stephanus in his will.

[2] Recitals from one of the Deeds of partition to one of the heirs.

which had been encroached upon, others that had been entered upon by "squatters" who retained possession in spite of the owners, and others again adjoining adjacent tracts and patents, in which the boundary lines were contested. These had been omitted specifically from the first two Divisions on these accounts, and had continued to be held as undivided lands of the Manor. Some of these questions had been settled and others not, while the lands were held in this manner. At length, to settle all questions absolutely, and to effect a final division of these undivided lands and those south of the Croton river, a special agreement was entered into by all of the heirs as they stood, in 1753, in virtue of which a final disposition and distribution of the lands was effected, with some small exceptions.

At the first two divisions, the ten heirs who made them were these persons:—

1. Philip Verplanck, in right of Gertrude his wife.
2. Samuel Bayard, in right of Margaret his wife.
3. Stephen de Lancey, in right of Ann his wife.
4. Philip Van Cortlandt, of the Manor.
5. Stephen Van Cortlandt, of Second River, N. J.
6. John Miln, M.D., in right of Mary, (widow of Kilian Van Rensselaer) his wife.
7. Henry Beekman, and Gertrude, his wife.
8. William Skinner, in right of Elizabeth his wife.
9. Andrew Johnston, in right of Catherine his wife.
10. John Schuyler, Jr., in right of Cornelia his wife.

During the twenty years which elapsed between 1733, and the execution of the agreement for the division of 1753, changes by death had occurred, so that the heirs who joined in the latter were as follows:

1. Stephen Van Cortlandt (of Second River, N. J.).
2. John Miln, widower.
3. Henry Beekman and Gertrude his wife.
4. William Skinner and Elizabeth his wife.
5. Andrew Johnston, widower.
6. Cornelia Schuyler, widow.
7. Stephen Bayard, Nicholas Bayard, Samuel Bayard, sons, and Peter Kemble, son-in-law, James Van Horne, son-in-law, and Nicholas Van Dam and William Cockroft and Margaret his wife, grand children of Samuel and Margaret Van C. Bayard deceased.
8. The Honorable James de Lancey, of New York, Peter de Lancey, of Westchester, Oliver de Lancey of New York, Susannah Warren, widow of Sir Peter Warren, K.B., Admiral John Watts and Ann his wife, children of Stephen and Ann Van C. de Lancey deceased.
9. Stephen Van Cortlandt, Junr., and Pierre Van Cortlandt, of the Manor, children of Philip Van Cortlandt, dec^{d}.
10. Philip Verplanck and Gertrude his wife.

The method of the division of 1753 was a little different from that of the former ones. All the persons last above named in whom the undivided lands had vested in 1753, by lease and release, the latter dated the 14th of December in that year, conveyed them to Oliver de Lancey, John Watts, and John Van Cortlandt, in trust, to settle all disputes as to encroachments and trespasses on the lands, either by ejectment, or arbitration, as they saw fit; and all as to boundaries in the same way, and when the lands were recovered to sell the same and divide the proceeds among the heirs; and in case of all undisputed lands to have the same surveyed and divided equally among all the parties.

These details of these partitions and divisions have been taken from recitals in original deeds in possession of the Van Cortlandt, Van Wyck, and Kemble, families, and papers and documents in the writers own possession. In the Secretary of State's office in Albany, and in the Westchester County Register's office, at White Plains many of the original deeds may be found on record. The original release of 1753, last mentioned, is among the Van Wyck papers in the possession of that family.

The lands north of the Croton River were divided into two ranges called north and south "Great Lots" of the same Arabic numbers, from 1 to 10. Those north of the Croton but fronting on the Hudson River were called "Front lots" and were also numbered from 1 to 10. Number 11, was the tract on the west side of the Hudson. The lots south of the Croton were also numbered in the same way, and called "Lots South of Croton."

The fourth clause of the Will of Stephanus Van Cortlandt directed that when a division was decided upon it should be as follows: "ITEM. It is my will and appointment and Direction that upon a division of my s^{d} houses, lands, and mills, and other Real Estate my sons according to their priority of birth shall have the first choyce, alwayes allowing to the value of those parts they shall choose that the respective parties and persons of my children may be made Equall in worth one to another." Nothing is said as to how the daughters' shares should be chosen, which presumably was to be in the ordinary way, that is by lot. It is believed that when the first two divisions were made the sons first chose their parcels in the order of their births, and that the daughters drew lots for the remainder. But in whatever way these two divisions were made, the result was, that the following lots fell to the following named children—

To Philip Verplanck, Nos. two, and three of the South lots north of Croton, and No. two of the "Front Lots" on the Hudson.

To Samuel and Margaret Bayard, North lot No. three and South lot no. nine, North of Croton, and No. seven of the Front lots on the Hudson.

To Stephen deLancey, North lot No. ten, and South lot No 5, north of Croton, and Front lot No. six, on the Hudson.

To Philip Van Cortlandt, north lot No. six and South lot No. one, north of Croton, and Front lot No. one on the Hudson.

To Stephen Van Cortlandt, South lots Nos. six and seven, North of Croton, and Front lot No. 4 on the Hudson.

To John Miln,[1] North lots Nos. two and eight North of Croton and Front lot No. five on the Hudson.

To Gertrude Beekman, wife of Henry Beekman, North lot No. three, and South lot No. eight, North of Croton, and Front lot No. 10 on the Hudson.

To William Skinner, South lots Nos. four and ten north of Croton and Front lot No. three on the Hudson.

To Andrew Johnston, North lot Number one and Front lot Number nine on the Hudson.

To John Schuyler jr, North lots Nos. four and nine north of Croton, and Front lot No. nine on the Hudson.

It is easy to see, from the choice of the sons in this division and the extra value that must have been put upon the lots which fell to Andrew Johnston, to equalize, that, the lots on and nearest the Hudson were then deemed the most valuable and desirable.

When Verplanck's Map was made the ten lots South of the Croton, shown in it were not included in the "thirty lots" divided in the first two divisions of 1732 and 1733. Consequently no names of owners appear on them. They were however subsequently divided, later among the heirs by the same method, and they fell to the following persons:

To Philip van Cortlandt,	No.	one	South	of Croton
" Andrew Johnston,	"	two	"	"
" Stephen Bayard[2]	"	three	"	"
" Stephen van Cortlandt,	"	four	"	"
" Philip Verplanck,	"	five	"	"
" Philip Schuyler[3]	"	six	"	"
" William Skinner,	"	seven	"	"
" Henry Beekman,	"	eight	"	"
" Stephen de Lancey,	"	nine	"	"
" John Miln,	"	ten	"	"[4]

After the first two divisions there was a little changing among the heirs of their lots, either by exchange, or by purchase. Exactly what their arrangements were in all cases it is now difficult to say. One change, which will illustrate this matter, was made between Mr. de Lancey and Mr. Schuyler, and Mr. Miln, by which the latter two transferred to the former, North lot No. Nine North of Croton adjoining North lot No. ten and about two thirds of North lot No. 8 adjoining No. 9, to the West which fell to Mr. de Lancey. These two and two-third lots, together, comprise about nine-tenths of the present township of North Salem and extended from the old Colony line to the main Croton River, embracing the beautiful valley of Titicus, the easternmost branch of the Croton. Mr. de Lancey died in 1741, and under his will and the division of his Estate among his children, two of these lots became the property of his eldest son James, then the Chief Justice of the Province. In 1744 the latter conveyed them, as a gift, to his second son Stephen. Stephen a few years later began their settlement, and brought in many farmers, and some mechanics. The whole tract was laid out into farms rectangular in shape of two hundred acres each, as a rule. These were leased for long terms of years, at low rents, the highest not being more than ten pounds, and the lowest about two or three pounds. The rent rolls and map showed the farms, which were all numbered, the tenants names, and the rents payable by each, but are omitted for lack of space. It was always understood, that the tenants might buy "the soil right," as the fee was termed, at any time the parties could agree upon a price. In practice however the tenants did not begin to apply for the fee till about the time of the Revolution, and then but rarely. After that event, more were sold to applicants, but many farms continued in the families of the tenants till late in this century. The last, which had descended to himself and the widow of a deceased brother, the writer sold in 1875, after the expiration of a lease for ninety-nine years. Stephen de Lancey, the younger, the son of James, likewise about the year 1765 built a very large double frame house on the Titicus River and resided there many years. It is still standing, and, from just after the revolution was "The Academy of North Salem," having been sold for that purpose. It was One of the very first established in this State, and has only recently been discontinued, under the present School policy of the State, which has put an end to the numerous "Academies" which formerly existed all over New York. Until late in this century it was the largest building upon the whole Manor. These facts are mentioned because, the same system of leasing out their lots in farms was carried out by all the other owners of the Manor Lands. Some sold the fee of their lands at an early day to relatives who thus increased their holdings. Others retained them. The result of this was, that some portions of the Manors acquired in common parlance distinctive names, which long continued. Mrs. Beekman's estate on the [1] This is the correct name. It has been spelled Melin, and Milin, in some papers and maps. He was a physician of Albany, N. Y., and married Maria, or Mary, van C., the widow of Kilian van Rensselaer, the Patroon of his day, and first Lord of Rensselaersburgh as a Manor.

[2] For himself and the other children of his mother Margaret Bayard.

[3] For himself and the other children of his mother Cornelia Schuyler.

[4] From a MSS. statement in the Van Wyck papers.

Hudson, was from her Christian name, styled "Gertrudesborough," that of Philip van Cortlandt "Cortlandttown" (now with adjacent lands called "The town of Cortlandt," and that of Mr. de Lancey, "De Lanceytown" now "The Town of North Salem." "Hanover" was also a name for part of the present "Somers" town.

The number of acres in the shares of the respective heirs and their valuation, in the division of 1732 and 1733 are of much interest, when the present enormous value of the present townships formed out of the Manor is considered.

The contrast is almost incredible notwithstanding the century and a half which have elapsed since the valuations were made.

The following statement showing the numbers and contents in acres of each of the lots is from Verplanck's survey of May 30 1732. The first column shows the numbers and areas of the first or north range of Great Lots north of the Croton; the second those of the south range of the Great Lots north of the Croton; and the third those of the Front lots on the Hudson.

North range of the Great Lots North of the Croton.

No.	1,	contents 4095	acres.
,,	2,	,, ... 2784	,,
,,	3,	,, ... 2904	,,
,,	4,	,, ... 2864	,,
,,	5,	,, ... 2811	,,
,,	6,	,, ... 3168	,,
,,	7,	,, ... 3696	,,
,,	8,	,, ... 3696	,,
,,	9,	,, ... 3696	,,
,,	10,	,, ... 3273	,,
		32,887

South range of Great Lots north of the Croton.

No.	1,	contents 2225	acres.
,,	2,	,, ... 2994	,,
,,	3,	,, ... 2904	,,
,,	4,	,, ... 3712	,,
,,	5,	,, ... 2982	,,
,,	6,	,, ... 2760	,,
,,	7,	,, ... 2660	,,
,,	8,	,, ... 2394	,,
,,	9,	,, ... 3568	,,
,,	10,	,, ... 2565	,,
		28,765	,,

Front lots on the Hudson.

No.	1,	contents 1255	acres.
,,	2,	,, ... 932	,,
,,	3,	,, ... 1886	,,
,,	4,	,, ... 1447	,,
,,	5,	,, ... 1220	,,
,,	6,	,, ... 1720	,,
No.	7,	contents 1027	acres.
,,	8,	,, ... 808	,,
,,	9,	,, ... 1233	,,
,,	10,	,, ... 2764	,,
			,,
		14,333	,,

Recapitulation.

Great North lots.....	32,887	acres.
,, South lots.....	28,765	,,
Front Lots on Hudson.....	14,333	,,
Total in the Divisions of 1732 and 1733.....	75,985	,,
Lots South of Croton	7,128	,,
		,,
	83,113	,,
Lands in Poundridge.....	3000	,,
Parson's Point on the Hudson	100	,,
Total east of the Hudson...	86,213	,,
[1] Tract on West side of the Hudson.....	1500	,,
Total number of acres in the whole Manor.....	87,713	,,

The areas and valuations of the shares of each of the heirs named above in the divisions of 1732-3 are thus stated in an "Estimate of the Value in the Manor of Cortlandt, 1733."[2]

Names.	Acres.	Value in pounds.
P. Verplanck.....	932.....	.....215.
	2995.....	.....345.
	2904.....	.....413.
	6831	£973.
Margaret Bayard.....	1027.....
wife of Samuel Bayard.....	2811.....
	3560.....
	7398	£948.[3]
Stephen De Lancey.....	1172.....	.....234.
	3273.....	.....210.
	2932.....	.....555.
	7377	£999.
Philip Van Cortlandt.....	1255..	.....300.
	2225.....	.....195.
	3168.....	.....480.
	6648	£975.
Stephen Van Cortlandt,.....	1474.....	.....214.
	2760.....	.....383.
	2660.....	.....375.
	6894	£972.

[1] This is not in Verplanck's survey, but is added as an estimate from the best information the writer could obtain.

[2] From the MS. in the Van Wyck papers.

[3] The separate values of each of these three lots are omitted in the original, though the total is given; evidently an accidental error.

Names.	Acres.	Value in pounds.
John Miln	1234	238.
	2784	300.
	3696	450.
	7714	£988.
Gertrude Beekman	2764	210.
	2904	596.
	2394	106.
	8062	£912.
William Skinner	1886	120.
	3712	675.
	2565	156.
	8163	£951.
Andrew Johnston	4095	339.
	1233	240.
	3695	310.
	9023	£889.
John Schuyler, jr.	808	218.
	2860	575.
	3696	225.
	7364	£1018.

Recapitulation.

Names.	Acres.	Amounts in N. Y. Currency.
Philip Verplanck	6831	£ 973.
Margaret Bayard	7398	£ 948.
Stephen De Lancy	7377	£ 999.
Philip Van Cortlandt	6648	£ 975.
Stephen Van Cortlandt	6894.	£ 972.
John Miln	7714	£ 988.
Gertrude Beekman	8062	£ 912.
William Skinner	8163	£ 951.
Andrew Johnston	9023	£ 889.
John Schuyler, jr.	7364	£1018.
	75474[1]	£9625.

The above values are in New York currency in in which the pound was equal to two dollars and a half of United States Currency. Hence the entire value in money of the 75,000 acres and upwards, in 1733, when the division among the heirs took place, was only $25.062, or about $2,500 per share; and as the shares averaged 7000 acres each, it is seen at once how extremely low was the value of land per acre in New York and in Westchester County at that time.

This valuation also is evidence of the good sense and sound judgment of Mrs. Stephanus van Cortlandt, the sole executrix of her husband's will, and of William Nicolls, Jacobus van Cortlandt, and Brandt Schuyler, his relatives and her advisers under the same, in deciding to hold, and not divide up, the Manor, soon after Mr. van Cortlandt's death. It likewise proves conclusively the little actual value, the enormous New York Manors and Great Patents really had at the period they were erected and granted.

When the Manor was divided into townships by the Act of 1788, there were carved out of it four entire Townships, 'Cortlandt,' 'Yorktown,' 'Stephentown,' (now changed to 'Somers'), 'Salem,' and about one-third of a fifth, 'Poundridge.' 'Salem was subsequently in 1790 divided, into 'North Salem' and 'South Salem,' the name of the latter being changed in 1840 to Lewisborough. So that five of the old townships and about a third of a sixth, were formed out of the Manor of Cortlandt. The following tabular statements of the valuation of the land in these five and one-third townships, in 1829 and in 1875, the former about a century and the latter about a century and a half, after the valuation of the Manor as a whole in 1732-33 above given, show in the most striking manner the tremendous increase in value of the Manor between the time of its division among the ten heirs of Stephanus van Cortlandt and the present day.[2]

Valuation of 1829.[3]

Township of Cortlandt,	$505,801
" of Yorktown,	499,404
" of Somers,	450.945
" of North Salem,	244,665
" of South Salem,	292,574
" of Poundridge, ⅓	55,440
	$2,048,829

Valuation of 1875.[4]

Township of Cortlandt,	$4,316,150
" " Yorktown,	1,258,641
" " Somers,	1,402,108
" " North Salem,	1,123,500
" " Lewisborough,[5]	952,435
" " Poundridge, ⅓	114,202
	$9,167,037

It must be borne in mind, however in comparing these tables of 1829 and 1875, that the valuation of 1732-3 embraced only the divisions of those years

[1] This amount is 511 acres less than the total acreage of the same lots (75,985 acres) in Verplanck's survey, printed above. As the MS. from which this last statement is taken is a rough one and unsigned, it is probable that its author made this error, and that the survey is correct.

[2] It is greatly to be regretted that a party squabble about the political patronage in the taking of it, should have prevented the taking of any State Census in 1885, so that a comparison of values up to that year could have been here given. It is, perhaps, fair to say, that, taking one town with another, an addition of ten per cent. to the figures of the census of 1875 would be about the actual value in 1885.

[3] From the Table appended to Westchester County, in the great Atlas of the Counties of New York, compiled by the celebrated Simeon De Witt, under an Act of the Legislature, in 1829 and published at Ithaca, N. Y., by David H. Burr. This is the most authentic Atlas of New York that exists, and is now rare.

[4] From the State Census of 1875, Table no. 68.

[5] Formerly South Salem.

among the heirs, while the valuation of the Townships embrace in addition the lands subsequently divided among the heirs in 1753, and a small portion of lands then leftundivided, as mentioned above; and also that in North Salem and Lewisborough the "Oblong" lands are included in their respective valuations, which were never a part of the Manor. But allowing for these corrections, they are sufficient to show the great increase of value in a century, and a century and a half, of the lands forming the Manor of Cortlandt.

Precisely which of the great lots of the Manor, were embraced within the limits of each of the five Townships, and one-third, which were carved out of it, is a matter of interest, to the antiquarian at least, at this day. The following statement of the areas of the respective townships in Great Lots and Acres, is taken from a MS. among the Van Wyck papers, undated, but drawn up, as appears by an indorsement, relative to the calculation the payment of the quit rents. It bears no signature, and was probably made up as a basis for their commutation, sometime, within the first twenty-five years of this century. As will be seen by the footing at the end, the gross number of acres somewhat exceeds the figures of the gross number by Verplanck's survey as stated above. Without attempting to explain this discrepancy the statement is given as in the original, because it shows clearly which great lots of the old Manor were embraced in each Township, carved out of it, and the amount of the quit rent due for each Township at the time the statement was prepared, whenever that was.

Town of Cortlandt.

	Acres.
All the Front Lots	14,333
South Lot No. 1	2,225
North Lot No. 1	4,095
No. 1, South of Croton	562
No. 2, South of Croton	586
½ of No. 3	300
Tellers Point	300
Parsonage Point	100
Ph. V. Planck (Verplancks Point)	915
	23,416

Yorktown.

N. Lot No. 2	2,784
N. Lot No. 3	2,908
N. Lot No. 4	2,864
S. Lot No. 2	2,995
S. Lot No. 3	2,904
S. Lot No. 4	3,712
All the Lots South of Croton River	7,128
2½ Lots taken off for Cortlandt Town	1,484
	5,644
	23,811

Somers Town.

	Acres.
N. Lot No. 5	2,811
N. Lot No. 6	3,168
N. Lot No. 7	3,696
About a third of N. Lot No. 8	1,232
S. Lot No. 5	2,982
S. Lot No. 6	2,760
Half of S. Lot No. 7	1,330
	17,979

North Salem.

⅔ of N. Lot No. 8	2,464
N. Lot No. 9	3,696
N. Lot No. 10	3,273
	9,433

South Salem.

½ of S. Lot No. 7	1,330
S. Lot No. 9	3,696
S. Lot No. 10	3,273
	9,433

Poundridge, Stone Hills.[1]

About	3,000

Town of Cortlandt	23,416
Yorktown	23,811
Somerstown	17,979
North Salem	9,433
South Salem	9,857
Poundridge, Stone Hills	3,000
	87,496

Recapitulation.

	Acres.	Share of quit rent.
Town of Cortlandt	23,416	$137.00
Yorktown	23,811	138.00
Somers Town	17,979	103.00
North Salem	9,433	54.00
South Salem	9,857	57.00
Poundridge, Stone Hills	3,000	17.00
		$506.00

Philip von Cortlandt the third son of Stephanus, born the 9th of August 1683, was a man of clear head, of good abilities, and possessed of great decision of character. He was a merchant in New Amsterdam, and like his father took an active part in public affairs. In June 1729 he was recommended to the King for appointment as a Councillor of the Province by Governor Montgomerie in place of Lewis Morris jr. The appointment was made the 3d of February 1730, he took his seat in April of the same year, and continued in the Council until his death on the 21st of August 1746, when he was succeeded by Edward [1] This is the common name of the northern part of this Town.

Holland through the recommendation of Governor Clinton. He was a prominent member of the Commission on the part of New York, in the case of the Colony of Connecticut and the Mohegan Indians. His wife was Catharine daughter of Abraham de Peyster to whom he was married in 1710.[1] He left him surviving, six children, five sons and one daughter, Catharine, who was killed by the bursting of a cannon on the Battery while watching the firing of a salute in honor of the King's birth day June 4th 1738, in her 13th year. By the death of his elder brothers, Johannes who left only a daughter, Gertrude, the wife of Philip Verplanck, and Oloff, or Oliver, who died a bachelor, Philip became the head of the Van Cortlandt family. His five sons were Stephen, Abraham, Philip, John, and Pierre. Of the five, Abraham, Philip, and John, all died unmarried.

Stephen the eldest who succeeded his father as the head of the family, was born the 26th of October 1710, married, in 1738, Mary Walton Ricketts, and died the 17th of October 1756, leaving two sons Philip and William Ricketts, Van Cortlandt. Philip the elder, the fourth head of the family born 10th November 1739, preferring a military life, entered the British Army, in which he served many years, dying on the 1st of May, 1814, in his 75th year. He is buried in Hailsham Church where a mural monument is erected to his memory. He married on Aug 2d, 1762, Catharine, daughter of Jacob Ogden of New Jersey. They had the large number of 23 children (several being twins) of whom twelve lived to grow up, five being sons and seven daughters. The former all became officers in the British Regular Army. They were

1. Philip
2. and Stephen } twins, b. 30 July 1766, the latter died young, the former married Mary Addison and died, having had one son, George W., who died young.
3. Jacob Ogden von Cortlandt, Captain 23d Fusiliers, killed in Spain in 1811, leaving issue.
4. Henry Clinton van Cortlandt, Lt. Col. 31st Foot, died a bachelor.
5. Arthur Auchmuty van Cortland, Capt. 45th Foot, died a bachelor in India.

The daughters were, 1. Mary Ricketts, married John M. Anderson; 2. Elizabeth, married William Taylor, Lord Chief Justice of Jamaica, and left one son, Colonel Pringle Taylor of Pennington; 3. Catharine, twin with Mrs. Taylor, married Dr. William Gourlay of Kincraig Scotland; 4. Margaret Hughes, married O. Elliott-Elliott of Berkshire and died without issue; 5. Gertrude married, Admiral Sir Edward Buller and left issue;[2] 6. Sarah Ogden van Cortlandt, died single; 7. Charlotte, married Gen. Sir John Fraser; 8. Sophia married Sir Wm. Howe Mulcaster R. N.

The second son of Philip, William Ricketts van Cortlandt, born the 12th of March 1742, married Elizabeth Kortright, and had two sons, the eldest of his own name, who married 1st Miss Stevens, and 2ndly Miss Cornell, and Philip, who married Mary Bunker, and one daughter Eliza, married to her cousin Mr. William Ricketts. Descendants of William Ricketts van Cortlandt still own and dwell upon portions of the property that fell to his Grandfather Philip van Cortlandt at the division of the Manor in 1732–33.

Pierre van Cortlandt, the youngest son of Philip the third son of Stephanus, born the 10th of January 1721, and who died the 1st of May, 1814, in consequence of the deaths in early manhood of his brothers Abraham, Philip, and John, unmarried, and of the death in 1756, of his eldest brother Stephen, and the absence in the army of his nephew Philip, Stephen's eldest son, became early and closely identified with the affairs of the manor and the interests of his relatives therein. Marrying Joanna a daughter of Gilbert Livingston he naturally leaned to political side of his wife's family in the party contests anterior to the opening of the American Revolution. He was the representative of the Manor in the Colony Assembly from 1768 to 1775, and unlike his nephew, Philip, the head of the family, he took the American side in the Revolution. He was a member of the Provincial Convention, the Council of Safety, and the Provincial Congress; and upon the organization of the State Government in 1777, was chosen Lieutenant Governor of New York, and served as such till 1795. In 1787 he was President of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States. He had four sons Philip, Gilbert, Stephen, and Pierre, and four daughters, Catharine the wife of Theodosius P. van Wyck, Cornelia, wife of Gerard G. Beekman, Anne wife of Philip S. van Rensselaer, so long the Mayor of Albany, at which city she died in 1855 at the age of 89 years, and Gertrude who died, a child in her eleventh year in December 1766. Of the four sons, two, Gilbert, and Stephen, died in early life unmarried. The eldest was the celebrated Colonel Philip van Cortlandt of the Revolution, who at its close was made a Brigadier General, and died a bachelor Nov. 21st 1831. To him the portion of the Manor containing the Manor House descended, and there he lived all the latter part of his life. Upon his death it passed to his youngest brother Major-Gen[l] Pierre van Cortlandt. The latter was born the 29th of August, 1762, and died in 1848. He married 1st in 1801, Catharine, a daughter of Governor George Clinton, by whom he had no issue, and 2nd Anne Stevenson, of Albany. He was all his life a resident of the Manor, and one of the most prominent men of Westchester, and its representative in Congress. By his second wife he had one child, a son, the late Colonel Pierre van Cortlandt, who died only on the eleventh of July 1884, leaving him surviving, his widow, Catherine, eldest daughter of the late eminent Theodrick Romeyn Beck, M.D., of Albany, one son, Mr. James Stevenson van Cortlandt, and two daughters, Catharine, the wife of the Rev. John Rutherfurd Mathews, and Miss Anne Stevenson van Cortlandt. The Manor House and adjoining estate is still the home of Col. Pierre van Cortlandt's widow and children, having continued in the family and name of Stephanus van Cortlandt since 1683, a little upwards of two hundred years.

[1] Col. Hist. N. Y. V, and VI.

[2] Lady Buller's only surviving daughter, Anna Maria, married, 25th of February, 1824, Lt. Col. James Drummond Elphinstone, when he assumed the name of Buller before Elphinstone. She died 26 Feb. 1845, leaving four sons and four daughters, the eldest of which sons William Buller Fuller Elphinstone R. N. is the 15th and present Baron Elphinstone.

The necessarily very brief sketches of the van Cortlandts in this essay are only intended as an outline, to show the general descent of the elder branch of the van Cortlandt family, the van Cortlandts of the Manor of Cortlandt.

The nature, origin, and existence of the Quitrent, payable from the Crown granted lands, to the Colonial, and, subsequently, to the State, Government of New York, have already been explained.[1] Those for which the Manor of Cortlandt, and all the prior grants within its limits were liable were paid at intervals, but in full, till their final extinction by commutation under the acts of the Legislature, and the action of the state government of New York as late as 1823.

In the case of the Manor of Cortlandt the first payments of its quitrent, were receipted for by the King-Receiver-General and Collector, on the back of the Manor-Grant itself, which has been already described. This course was unusual and was owing probably to the early death of its first lord and the careful attention of his widow and executrix. The receipts for similar payments being generally given on separate pas pers. These receipts are four in number, and cover from 1697, the date of the Manor Grant to 1732,—the date of the first division—thirty-five years, and are as follows:

1st Endorsement.

"Received this 29th March A D 1716 of Mrs Gertruyd van-Cortlandt the sum of Twenty-eight Pounds, Proclammation monney in full of Quit-rent for the Lands Lying in the within Pattent, untill the 25th day of this instant month of March as witness my hand

T. Byerley Collr.

2nd Endorsement.

Received (In Quality as Receiver-Generall of this province) this 16 August 1720 of Mrs Geertruydt Van Cortlandt Executrix of Stephanus Van Cortlandt deceased, the Sum of Eight pounds proclamation money. In full of Quitrents for all the Lands Lying within the Mannor of Cortlandt, to the 25 of March Last Pursuant to the within Pattent as wittness my hand

T. Byerley Collr.

3d Endorsement.

Received of Phillip Cortland Esqr for account of Mrs Geertruydt Van Cortland two pounds procl. money in full for one years quitt rent to the 25 of March last for the lands mentioned in the within Instrument. Wittness my hand this 29 day of June 1721

T. Byerley Collr.

4th Endorsement.

Received of the heirs of Coll. Stephanus Van Cortlandt, by the hands of Samuell Bayard Esqr Thirty-two pounds procln money which together with thirty-eight pounds like money Received by Mr Byerley is in full for His Majestys quitrent from June 1697 to the 17 of last witness my hand Novr 7th 1732

Archd Kennedy Recr Genl.

Thomas Byerly the Receiver General and Collector whose bold signature appears to these receipts, arrived in New York on the 29th of July 1703,[2] and was a prominent official in New York and New Jersey, of both which Provinces he was of the Governor's Council. He died in 1725, and was succeeded as Receiver-General in New York by Archibald Kennedy, who signs the last of the above receipts, in 1726.

Subsequent to the divisions of 1732–33 among the heirs, the quit rents were paid proportionably by the different owners. During the Revolutionary war and after it nothing seems to have been paid, till the state Comptroller advertised to sell the lands to pay the arrears under a State law. The following correspondence with, and memoranda of, General Philip Van Cortlandt will show how the quit rents were settled.

"Mamaroneck November 7, 1815

Sir

In a conversation I had with Judge Purdy a few days since, I understood from him that you had gone to Albany to ascertain if the quit-rents now demanded for the Manor of Cortlandt had not already been paid, if not on what part of the Manor those now demanded were due, and how the different proprietors are to proceed in estimating their respective proportions. As I am interested in a part of the Manor, I will thank you for any information you can give me on this subject. I hope you will excuse the trouble I give you, and believe me, Sir

Respectfully Yours

J. P. deLancey[3]

General Philip Van Cortlandt.

Manor House

Nov. 29 1815

Dear Sir

On my return from Albany I was favored with yours of the 7th, and am happy to inform you that [1] Part 10, of this essay, ante pp. 95, 96.

[2] IV. Col. Hist., 1066.

[3] MS. Letter. Mr. John Peter de Lancey, of Mamaroneck, the writer of this letter succeeded to the unsold portion of the Manor lands

I have settled and paid up all the Q. Rent of the Manor of Cortlandt and also commuted for all future Q. R. in such manner as not to be obliged to call on any of the Proprietors. Neither will any tax be necessary. So that you may Henceforward rest perfectly contented. There remained some undivided land which was sold to accomplish it.

I am with great respect

Yours

Ph. V. Cortlandt.[1]

Mr. J. P. deLancey
Mamaroneck.

The following letter and certificate written by Gen. Philip Van Cortlandt explains fully this matter of the Quit Rents.

"The Comptroller is requested as soon as convenient to make out what amount of Quit Rent is due from the Manor of Cortlandt Pattent, which includes in its bounds, the Pattents granted to Stephen V. Cortlandt for lands on both sides of the Hudson, Dated March 16, 1685—John Knight, dated March 24 1686—and Hugh McGregory dated the 2d of April 1690—which became the property of the said Stephen Van Cortlandt, and no Q. Rent from them is expected to be paid as by the words expressed in the said Mannor Pattent, which is dated the 17th of June 1697, will appear.

"Of this a part to be sold—see below.

"A patent granted to Tennis DeKey and others altho within the said Manor was not the property of Said Stephen Cortlandt, and is subject to Q. Rent.

"This was mentioned to the Comptroller, and it was requested of him to wait a few days and the money should be paid. This the Comptroller must have forgot when the same was sold to Mr. Lawrence who is very willing to give up the same if agreeable to the Comptroller.

"This is to be paid and commuted for.

"There is another small Patent granted to Tennis Dekey, Sybout Harchie and Jacobus Harchie which is also included in the Manor and is subject to pay Q. Rent.

"Of this a part to be sold.

"There is about eighty acres called Parson's Point, which was left by the Proprietors of the Manor undivided and now is in the possession of the Dutch Minister—and if sold a title can be obtained, which can not be done without. Further information will be given by the Comptroller's.

Humble Serv[t]

Ph. V. Cortlandt."

"I do hereby certify that it appears from papers in my possession, that when the Manor of Cortlandt was divided in about the year 1732—there was left a piece of land said to contain about eighty, or a hundred acres, which I have always understood was originally intended by the Proprietors for a Parsonage, and which was not divided among the Heirs, although they all held an undivided right therein. After the Revolutionary War I obtained possession thereof and put the Dutch Reformed Congregation in possession. As they cannot obtain a complete title from the Heirs, I want it sold for the benefit of the said church, or as much thereof as will pay the Quit Rent now due from the said Manor of Cortlandt.

Ph. v. Cortlandt.[2]

Parson's Point is bounded on the West and South by Hudson's River, and on the East and North by Divided lands of said Manor of Cortlandt."

At the time of the first divisions of the Manor there were settlers upon all the lots more or less. The lots were divided up into farms averaging 250 acres in some parts of the Manor and 200 acres in others. Each farm numbered, and leased as "Farm No.——, in Great Lot No.——," and when described the tenants name was generally added, thus "and in possession of so and so." By 1750, the whole Manor had become populated, as appears by the list of farms and tenants names in the accounts still extant rendered to many of the heirs and their representatives. A very few farms here and there had been sold in fee. About 1770, as the tenants had prospered and their families increased, they began to acquire the "soil right" as they termed it by purchase from the landlords. The Revolution checked this movement entirely for the time being, nor was it till 1787 or 8 that it began again. But from that time it progressed continually, so that by 1847, there were only about 2500 or 3000 acres of "leased land," exclusive of the estate belonging to Gen. Pierre Van Cortlandt, left throughout the Manor. Of this about 1200 acres divided into five farms are, at this moment, still held, in the Great Lot, No. 6, south of Croton, by descendants of the heir to whom that lot fell at the original division. In Nine cases out of ten the tenants themselves acquired the fee of their own farms. And the result has been that in every township in the Manor, very many of the descendants of the original tenants still live, as owners in fee, upon the same lands which their ancestors originally took upon leases, and thus have held them for four, five, and sometimes six generations.

In all the townships there are a few instances where dishonest persons have by trick and chicanery acquired farms, by a series of "squattings" and fraudulent transfers and so-called sales of leases. But as a body the old tenants dealt honestly and squarely with the owners.

Some of the leases it may be said, provided for a partial payment of the rent fixed, in kind, as in wheat, in two or four fat fowls, and in so many of his brother, Stephen de Lancey, in the town of North Salem. The latter died in 1795 without issue.

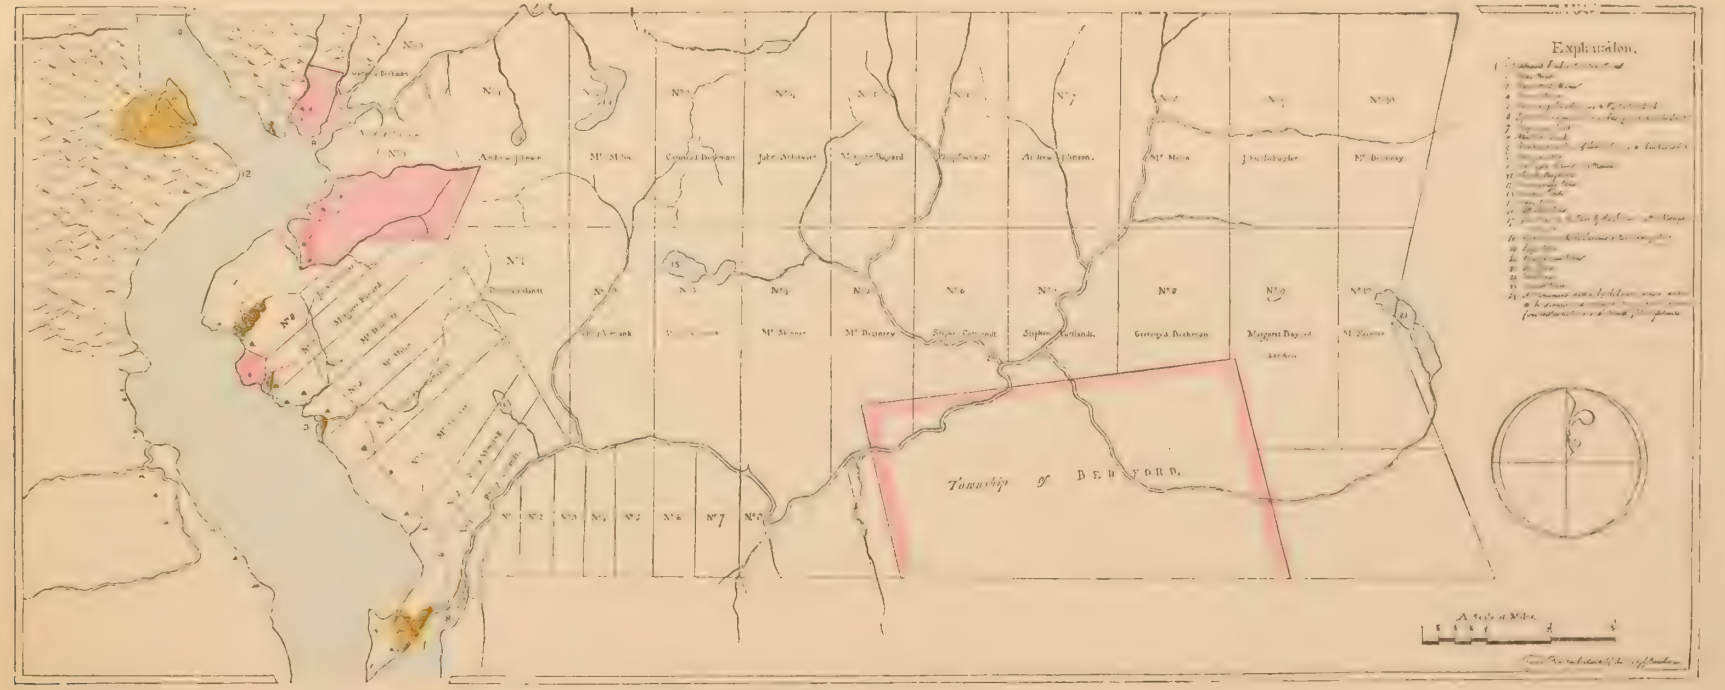
[1] MS. Letter.

[2] Original MS.

"days work with carriage and horses," meaning not "a carriage" in our sense of the word to-day, but a day's work with wagon and team. This latter was often spoken and written of as a "day's riding." These were all originally introduced as an easy way for the tenants in those times when there was very little money in the country to pay a part of the rents reserved in the leases, which as a rule ran from one or two, to ten pounds a year, New York currency. During the latter part of the last century, especially after the Revolution, the landlords and tenants made between themselves a private commutation, in money, for these rents in kind.

The Manor as far as the personal dignity of the Lord of the Manor was concerned, ended with the death of Stephanus Van Cortlandt in November, 1700. In all other respects manorial, parochial, civil, and political, it continued intact, until its final termination by being divided up into townships under the Act organizing the State into Townships in 1788.

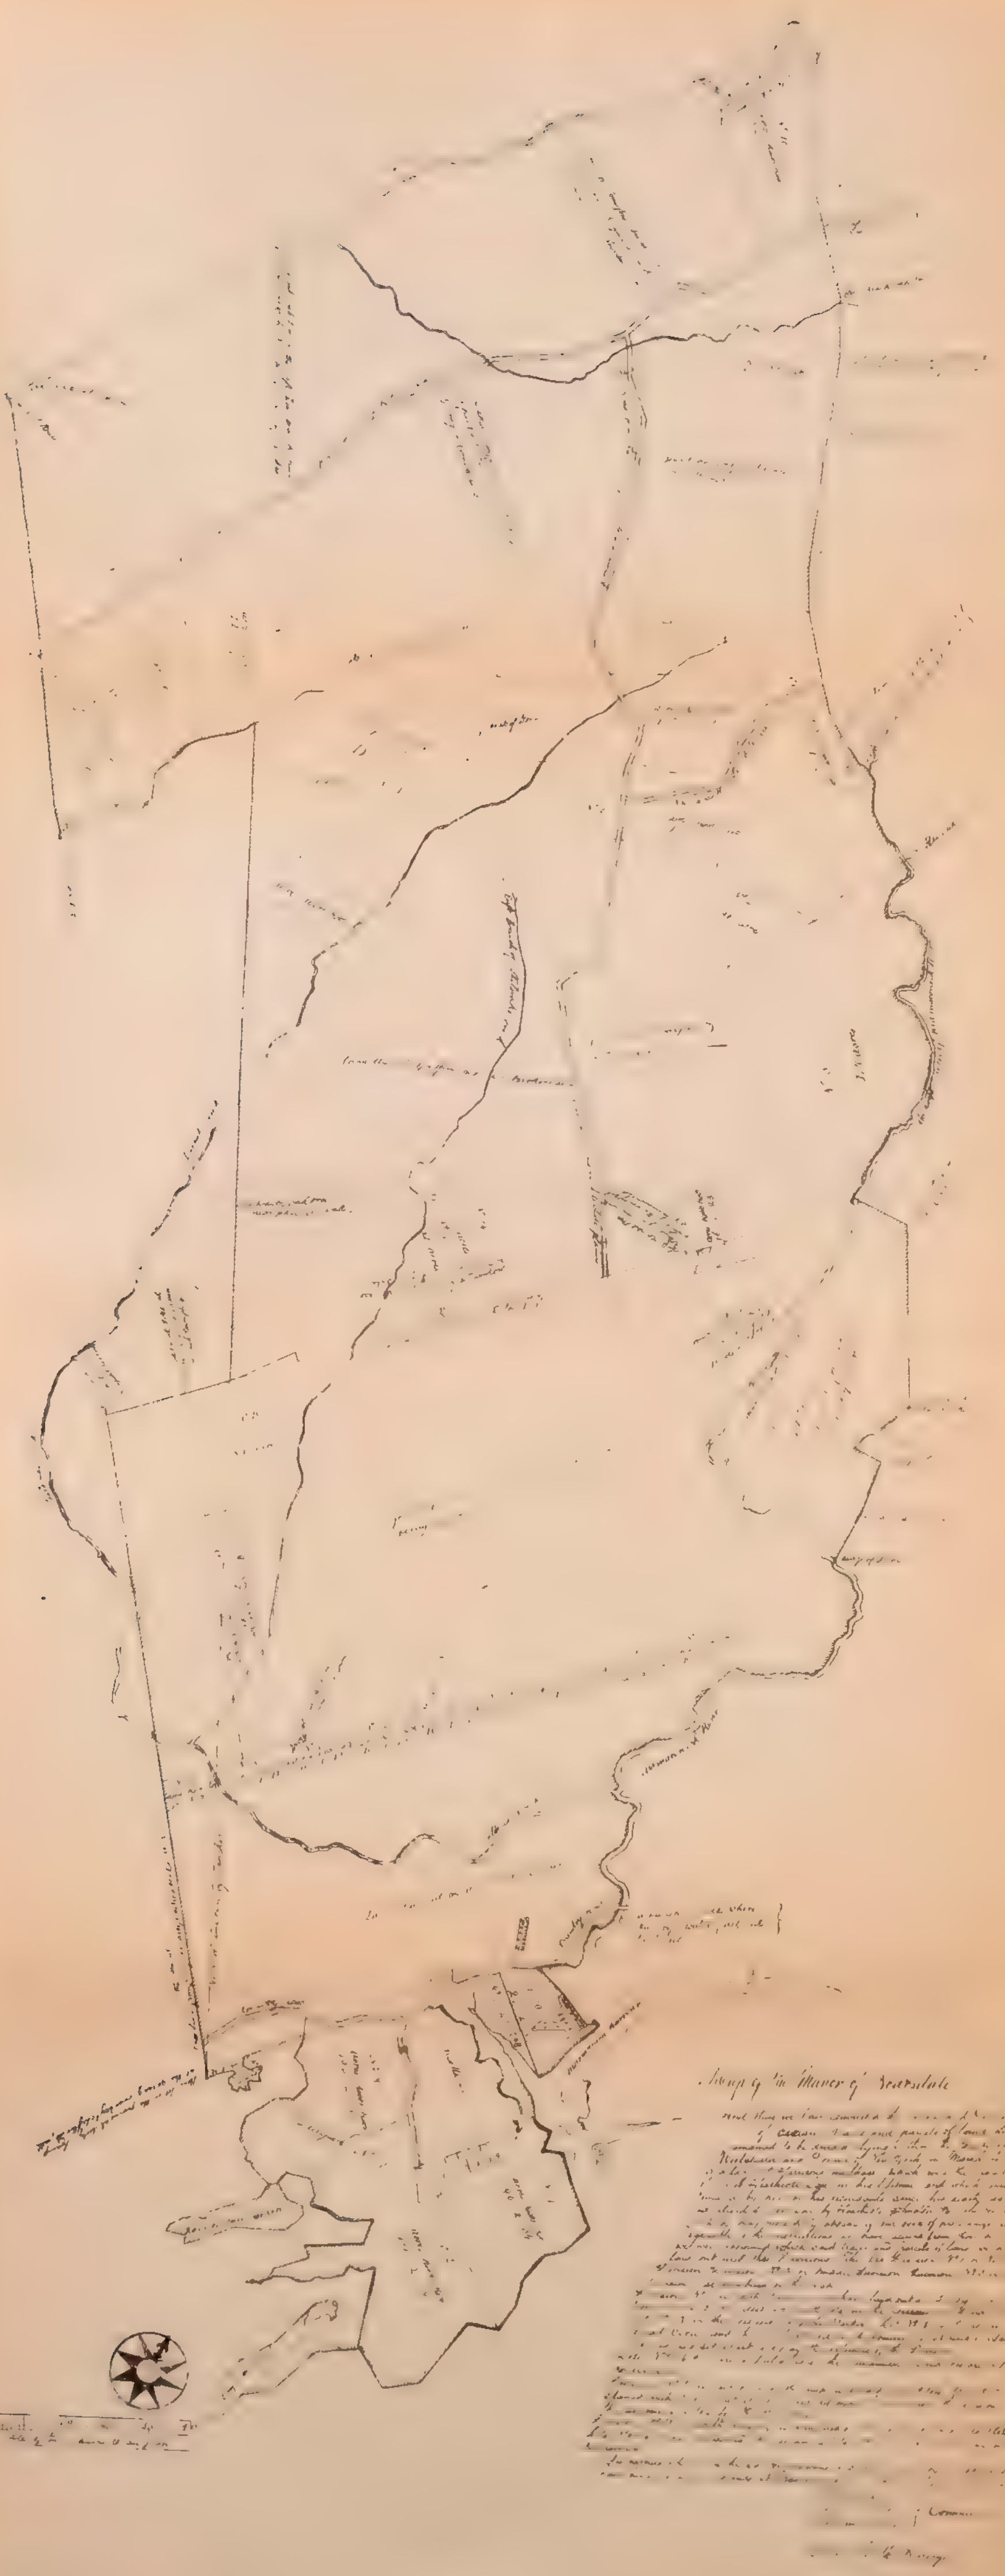
The topography of the Manor is very remarkable, and very beautiful. The valley of the Croton lies almost wholly within its limits. The northernmost branches of that River rising in Putnam County and the easternmost, in Connecticut, each receiving in its course many small affluents, meet near its centre, and form the main stream of the Croton, which falls into the Hudson on the south side of the striking peninsula of Teller's, or Croton, Point. Five or six small streams, the largest of which, is "John Peaks Creek," now Peekskill (kill being the Dutch word for creek) also fall into the Hudson. These streams form deep sinuous valleys between the high, rocky hills through which they force their way to "The Great River of the Mountains. They take their rise in the range of hills dividing the valley of the Croton from that of the Hudson, which run nearly parallel to the latter at a distance to the east of it about three or four miles. From the eastern slopes of these hills to the Connecticut line extends the valley of the Croton proper, broken by lesser ranges of wooded hills, and high fertile ridges, into numerous smaller valleys, through which run perpetually, clear and winding streams. Notwithstanding this fair region has been the abode of a numerous and thriving population for more than a century and a half, it still possesses extensive forests, and rocky, wooded hills, amid which glisten, like diamonds, numbers of small transparent lakes. So many are they that only a few of the larger are to be found upon the Maps. This region so remarkably wooded and watered, formerly abounded in beaver, all kinds of deer, and the ever present foes of the latter, wolves. Many are the provincial statutes offering bounties for the destruction of the latter. The beaver lived on the streams and in the forests of Corelandt till early in this century, the last having been killed near Lake Waccabuc in 1837. To this day one beautiful branch of the Croton bears the name of "The Beaver Dam," and a high wooded ridge, not far from it is still called, "The Deer's Delight." There are two points, from which the greater part of this splendid region can be looked down upon almost as a whole. The first is "Knapp's Hill," or "Lounsberry Hill," just over the Manor line in Bedford, which was used as a military station of observation during the Revolution. The second, and the finer, is Prospect Mount in the eastern part of North Salem. It is just within the "Oblong," and though a part of North Salem since 1731, was not originally within the Manor. From its summit looking west the eye ranges over the whole twenty miles in length of the Manor of Cortlandt, the view being only terminated by the Rockland Mountains across the Hudson. The depression in which the latter lies is distinctly seen. Immediately in front of the spectator spreads the rich and affluent valley of the Titicus, the "Mughtiticoos" of the Indians, the eastern branch of the Croton, bounded on each side by high, irregular forest clad hills, the silver stream winding and gleaming through green smiling meadows till it falls into the Croton itself five miles away. Beyond it are seen the rich, rolling, fertile lands of Somers and Yorktown, the foot hills of the Highlands their northern boundary. And further still the fair heights of the eastern bank of the Hudson and above them the lofty High Tor upon its western side. No more splendid scene can be looked upon in America, than to witness from this Mount the setting of the sun on a clear summer evening. The whole twenty miles of the Manor, hill, valley, river, and forest, glowing in the most brilliant radiance beneath the deep red tints of a gorgeous sky, and then as the great luminary, tinting their peaks with gold, sinks behind the blue Rockland Mountains, the whole suddenly blotted out in a deep purplish sombre gloom.



Upon the lower slopes of the height stands the old home of the Keelers, now the residence of Hobart Keeler, the fourth or fifth in a direct line who for a century and a half have always dwelt there. And yet it is so high, that from his dining room windows on a clear day, High Tor and the other Rockland mountains are plainly visible.

In the southeastern part of the Manor is a range of heights trending from northwest to southeast dividing the valley of the Croton from that of Long Island Sound, in which rise streams running southerly to the Sound the chief of which are the Myanos, now known as the Mianus, and the Armonck, or Byram River. Thus within the Manor are three distinct water-sheds, two carrying their waters into the Hudson, and one into the sound.

The origin of the name of the river, the great natural feature of the Manor, the waters of which supply the great city of New York by means of a magnificent aqueduct without a rival in Ancient or Modern times, is not certainly known. Different theories have been and are held upon this subject. What is



CORTLANDT MANOR MAP.

PREPARED EXPRESSLY FOR THIS WORK.

EXPLANATION.

1. Kightewank Creek or Groatan's River.
2. Tellers Point.
3. The Old Mill Stream.
4. Parson's Point.
5. The Neck of Land belonging to Philip Verplank.
6. Eighteen hundred Acres, now belonging to Hercules Lent, &c.
7. Magrigaries Creek.
8. John Peek's Creek.
9. Three hundred Acres of Land belonging to John Krankhyte.
10. Antonye's Nose.
11. Salsburge's Island and Meadow
12. Thunder Bergh Hill.
13. Magrigarie's Pond.
14. Crooked Pond.
15. Cedar Pond.
16. Call bergh Pond.
17. The Elbow of the River by the Indians called Kewightequack
18. Kiskow River by the Indians called Pepenighting.
19. Cross River.
20. Matsghtecoos River.
21. Long Pond.
22. Peach Pond.
23. Mescoot River.
24. A Monument erected by the Commissioners, and is to be deemed and esteemed twenty Miles distant from Cortlandt's Point, on the mouth of the Highlands.

certain is that the Indian name of "Kichtawank," or "Kightawong" is that given to the River in all the earliest Deeds and Patents. In Philip Verplancks survey and map made in 1732 the name he gives to it is the "Kightewank Creek or Groatun's River."[1] As Mr. Verplanck lived many years prior to 1732 in the Manor, and knew every one interested in it, from shortly after the death of Stephanus Van Courtland to his own death a period of about seventy years, his opportunities of knowing the English name of the stream were certainly better than those of any one of whom we now have knowledge. He was also a surveyor, and hence obliged to be particular in giving correct names to natural features. Now he called it on his map of 1732 "Groatun's River," hence at that date such was certainly its English name. Therefore the name must have originated between 1697 the date of the Manor Grant in which it is described by its Indian name and 1732, the date of the Manor Map, that is within the period of thirty-five years. But whether "Groatun" from which the change to "Croton" was very easy, was the name of an Indian or a Dutchman can never be known. The probability is that if there was such a man he dwelt near the mouth of the stream, and his name given to it at his dwelling-place was extended gradually throughout its entire length. But whatever the origin, "Croton" it has been for more than a century, and "Croton" it will forever remain.

14

The Manor of Scarsdale, Its Origin, Local History, Adjoining Patents and Manors, Its First Lord and his Family, Division and Topography.

Named by its Lord after that division of the beautiful county of Derby, nearly the geographical centre of England, in which the city of Chesterfield, crowning a lofty verdant height, sits like a queen upon her throne, the rivers Rother and Hipper flowing together at her feet, termed the "Hundred of Scarsdale," in which he was born, Colonel Caleb Heathcote proved at once his own good taste and his love for the ancient home of his fathers. The name describes equally well the English locality and its American namesake. "Scarrs" was the Saxon word for rocky crags, and "dale" for valley. The western and northwestern parts of the Hundred of Scarsdale are noted for the rocky heights and deep valleys which form that striking Derbyshire scenery immortalized in the "Peveril of the Peak" of Sir Walter Scott. The western and northwestern parts of the Manor of Scarsdale are overlooked by the hills and crags, half covered with forests, at the foot of which flows the river Bronx; while the vales and glades of the lower heights which separate the valleys of the Bronx and the Sound, upon one of which he dwelt in his earlier life, are also immortalized in the "Spy" of the Neutral Ground of Fenimore Cooper.

The Manor of Scarsdale was of irregular shape owing chiefly to the winding course of the Mamaroneck River, which formed a large part of its eastern boundary. By its terms the Manor-Grant included a tract embracing the present towns of Mamaroneck, Scarsdale, a small part of Harrison, with White plains, and a portion of Northcastle. But as a dispute existed with "some of y^e^ inhabitants of y^e^ town of Rye" as to White plains at the time of Colonel Heathcote's[2] purchase of the tract, the Manor-Grant expressly provided that it should give no further title to White plains to Colonel Heathcote than what he already had before it issued. Irrespective of White plains and the lands beyond, the length of the Manor was about nine miles by an average width of a little more than two miles. The following is the

MANOR-GRANT OF THE MANOR OF SCARSDALE.

WILLIAM THE THIRD by the Grace of God of England, Scotland, France & Ireland, King, Defender of the faith &c. To all to whom these presents shall come sendeth greeting; Whereas our loving subject CALEB HEATHCOTE, Esqr. hath petitioned the Hon.ble John Nanfan our Lt. Govern'r, & Comand^r^ in Cheif of the Province of New Yorke in America, & our Councill of the said Province, for a confirmation of a tract of land in the County of Westchester, Beginning at a marked tree by Mamoronack River w'ch is the eastermost side of the Northern bounds of Mamoronack Township, being about two miles from the country road & to run along the sd. River to the head thereof, & thence on a north line untill eighteen miles from the said marked tree is compleated; westerly, beginning at the marked tree or a great rock being the westermost part of the northern bounds of the aforesd. township, being about two miles from the country road, & thence to run northerly eighteen miles as the line on the eastermost side of the said land runeth, including in the sd. Mannor his eighth parte of the two miles laid out for the town of Mamoronack, with the lott he now liveth on, & the lott bought of Alice Hatfeild, w^th^ the lands & meadows below westerly to a path to him belonging by virtue of his deeds & conveyances, parte of w^ch^ land within ye bounds aforesd. was purchased by Jno. Richbell from ye Native Indian Proprietors w^ch^ sd. Jno. Richbell had a grant & confirmation for ye same from Coll. Fra.^cs^ Lovelace, late Gov^r^. of ye sd. Province, & the right of ye sd. Jno. Richbell therein is legally vested in the sd. Caleb Heathcote, & other parte has been purchased by ye sd. Caleb Heathcote of ye Native Indian Proprietors; & whereas ye sd. Caleb Heathcote hath further petitioned our sd. Lt. Governor & Councill that ye sd. tract of land may be erected into a Mannour by ye name of ye Mannour

[1] See the Manor map and his "explanations" appended to it.

[2] This name is properly pronounced as if spelled "Hethent," not "Heethcote," as often heard.

of Scarsdale, whereupon our sd. Lt. Govern^{r} by & wth ye advice of o^{ur} Councill Directed a Writt to ye high Sherrife of ye sd. County of Westchester to enquire to w^{t} damage such patent would be, w^{ch} writt issued accordingly, wth a proviso that it should not give ye sd. Caleb Heathcote any further title then which he already hath to ye lands called ye White Plains, w^{ch} is in dispute between ye said Caleb Heathcote & some of the inhabitants of the town of Rye, whereupon the sd. sherrife returned y^{t} the Jurors found that there is no damage to the King, or his subjects, in erecting the Mannour aforesd., except ye sd. white Plaines w.$^{ch.}$ are in dispute & contest between ye sd. Caleb Heathcote & the town of Rye, & excepting James Mott & the rest of ye freeholders of Mamoronack who have deed within the patent of Richbell; Know yee that of our special grace, certain knowledge, & meer motion, wee have given, granted, ratified, & confirmed, & by these presents, doe for us, our heires & successors, give, grant, ratifye, & confirme, unto ye sd. Caleb Heathcote, his heires, & assignes, All & every ye aforesd. tracts & parcells of land and meadow w$^{th.}$ in ye respective limits & bounds beforementioned & expressed, together w$^{th.}$ all & every ye messuages, tenem$^{ts.}$, buildings, barnes, houses, out-houses, fences, orchards, gardens, pastures, meadows, marshes, swamps, pools, ponds, waters, water courses, woods, underwoods, trees, timbers, quarries, runs, rivers, rivoletts, brooks, lakes, streames, creeks, harbores, beaches, bayes, islands, ferries, fishing, fowling, hunting, hawking, mines, mineralls, (royall mines excepted) & all the rights, members, libertys, privilledges, jurisdiccons, royaltys, hereditam.^{ts}, profitts, benefitts, advantages, & appurtenances, w^{t}soever, to aforesd. severall & respective tracts & parcels of land and meadow belonging, or in any wise appurteining, or accepted, reputed, taken, known, or occupied, as parte parcell or member thereof, To Have and to Hold all the aforesd. severall & respective tracts, & parcells of land & meadow & premises w.thin the respective limitts & bounds aforesaid, w.th all & every of their appurtenances, unto him the sd. Caleb Heathcote, his heirs, & assigns, to the only proper use & behoof of him the sd. Caleb Heathcote, his heires & assignes forever, provided that nothing herein conteined shall be construed, deemed, or taken, to give the sd. Caleb Heathcote any further title then what he now, by virtue of these our letters patents, lawfully hath to ye sd. white Plaines in dispute as aforesaid nor any jurisdiction wthin the sd. White Plaines untill the same shall happen to belong to the sd. Caleb Heathcote, and moreover, Know yee that of our further speciall grace, certain knowledge, & meer motion, wee have thought fitt to erect all the aforerecited tracts & parcells of land & meadow, wthin the limitts & bounds aforesaid, into a Lordship and Mannour, except as before excepted, and therefore by these presents wee doe for us, our heires, & success$^{rs.}$, erect make & constitute all the aforerecited tracts and parcells of land and meadow within the limits & bounds beforementioned (except as before excepted), together w.$^{th.}$ all & every the above granted premises, w.$^{th.}$ all, and every, of their appurtenances, into one Lordship or Mannour, to all intents and purposes, & it is our royal will and pleasure, that the sd. Lordship and Mannour shall from henceforth be called the Lordship and Mannour off Scarsdale; and Know yee that wee reposing especiall trust & confidence in the loyallty, wisdome, justice, prudence, & circumspection, of our sd. loveing subject, doe for us our heires & success.^{rs} give & grant unto the sd. Caleb Heathcote, his heires & assignes, full power & authority, at all times forever hereafter, wthin the sd. Lordship or Mannour, one Court Leet & one Court Baron, to hold, & keep, at such time & times, & so often yearly, as he or they shall think meet, & wee doe further give & grant to ye sd. Caleb Heathcote, his heires & assignes, all fines, issues, & amerciaments, at the sd. Court Leet & Court Baron to be holden within our said lordship or manor, to be sett, forfeited, or imposed, or payable, or happening, at any time to be payable, by any of the inhabitants of, or wthin, the said Lordshipp or Mannour of Scarsdale or the Limitts & bounds thereof, & also all & every power & powers, authority & authorityes, for the holding & keeping, the sd. court leet, & court baron, from time to time, & to award & issue out, the accustomed writts to be issued & awarded out of courts leet & courts baron, as also that the sd. court leet & court baron be kept by the sd. Caleb Heathcote his heires and assignes forever, his, or their, or any of their, stewards deputed & appointed, wth full & ample power & authority to distrain for the rents, services, & other sumes of money, payable by virtue of ye premises & all other lawful remedys & means for the haveing, possessing, levying, & enjoying the premises, & every parte & parcell of the same, & all waifes, estrayes, deodands, & goods of fellons, happening, or to happen, being or to be, forfeited, w.thin the sd. Lordship or Mannour of Scarsdale. And wee doe further give & grant unto the said Caleb Heathcote his heires & assignes, that all & singular ye tenants of him the sd. Caleb Heathcote, within the sd. Mannour, shall & may at all times hereafter meet together & choose assessors within the man.^{r} aforesd. according to such rules, wayes, & methods, as are prescribed for cities towns & counties within our sd. province, by ye acts of Generall of Assembly for defraying the publick charge of each respective city, town, & county, aforesaid, & all such sumes of money so assessed & levyed, to collect & dispose of, for such uses, as any act or acts of the sd. gener.^{ll} assembly shall establish & appoint, to have, hold, possess, & enjoy, all & singular the sd. Lordship or Mannour of Scarsdale & premises, with all & every of their appurtenances, unto ye sd. Caleb Heathcote, his heires & assignes, forever, and that the sd. Lordship or Man.^{r} aforesd. shall be & forever continue free & exempt from the jurisdicson of any town, township, or Manour, whatsoever, to be holden of us, our heires & successors, in free & comon soccage according to the tenure of our Mannour of East Greenwich in the county of Kent, wthin our Kingdome of England, yielding rendering and paying therefore, yearly, & every year, forever, at our city of New Yorke, unto us our heires & successours, or to such officer or officers as shall from time to time be impowered to receive the same, five pounds currant money of New Yorke, upon the Nativity of our Lord, in lieu & stead of all services, dues, duties, or demands, whatsoever.

In testimony whereof wee have caused the great seale of our province of New Yorke to be hereunto affixed. Witness John Nanfan Esq.^{r} our Lt. Governour & Comander in Chief of our Province of New York & territories depending thereon, in America.

Given at fort William Henry in our city of New Yorke this 21st day of March in the fourteenth year of our reign Anno Domini 1701.

John Nanfan.

By his Hon^{rs} comand

M. Clarkson Secry.

I do hereby certify the aforegoing to be a true copy of the original record word & 5th line page 229 being obliterated and or interlined in its stead as in said record. Compared therewith by me.

Lewis A. Scott, Secretary.

State of New York,
Office of the Secretary of State. } ss.:

I have compared the preceding copy of Letters Patent with the record thereof in this office, in Book Number Seven of Patents at page 195 and I do hereby certify the same to be a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

Witness my hand and the seal of office of the Secretary of State, at the City of Albany, the 1*st* day of September, one thousand eight hundred and eighty four.

L.S.

Anson G. Wood
Deputy Secretary of State.

John Richbell who is stated in this Manor-Grant, to Colonel Heathcote (which expressly vested Richbell's title in the latter), to have been the purchaser of part of the Manor-land originally "from ye native Indian proprietors," was one of a family of Hampshire-men either in, or from the neighbourhood of the city of Southampton, in that County, in England. They were also merchants in London engaged in trade with America. In the seventeenth century a large trade was carried on between England, the West Indies, and the 'Plantations on the Maine' of America. Of this trade the central point in the West Indies was Barbadoes then, as now, a British Island. The voyages were from England to Barbadoes, thence to New York or Boston, and thence back to England. Hence the continual reference in the accounts and letters of that day to the "news from home via Barbardoes." Precisely when John Richbell left England is not known. He was a merchant in Charlestown, Massachusetts, according to Savage's Genealogical Dictionary in 1648. In an inventory of the estate of Robert Gibson of Boston, dated the 11th of August 1659, appears this item, "due from Mr. John Richbell for wages and wine £36, 4, 0, under date of 8th August 1656.[1] The next year 1657 he was apparently in the Island of Barbadoes. Prior to this latter date he was in the island of St. Christopher's, where he received from his mother-in-law Margery Parsons "certain goods formerly delivered and paid unto me by Mrs. Margery Parsons upon the Island of St. Christopher's."[2]

When in Barbadoes he met with two other Englishmen, Thomas Modiford a resident of that island, and William Sharpe of Southampton in England. The three entered into an agreement to undertake a business which the oppressive navigation laws of England tempted, and practically compelled, many Englishmen and Colonists to go into. These laws increased in extent, and vigorously enforced by Cromwell, bore harshly upon England's "Plantations in foreign parts" at that time just beginning to exist. Then began that illicit contraband trade in America which continued and increased from that time during the whole colonial period. And which proved, in consequence of the very stringent measures adopted by England late in the eighteenth century to suppress it, thereby injuring the business interests of the colonies, one of the potent, if not the most potent, of the causes which produced that great event, the American Revolution.

The "Instructions" to Richbell from his partners in relation to their business still exist in the public Archives of New York. The parties named, were "Thomas Modiford of Barbadoes, William Sharpe of Southampton [England], and John Richbell of Charlestown, New England, Merchants." All were in Barbadoes apparently at the date of the "Instructions," which, as clear and specific, as they are interesting and curious, are here given in full They are headed :—

"Instructions delivered to Mr. John Richbell in order to the intended settlement of a Plantation in the south-west parts of New England, in behalf of himself and of subscribers."

They piously begin, and are in these words :—

"God sending you to arrive safely in New England, our advice is that you informe yourself fully by sober understanding men of that parte of [the] land which lyeth betwixt Connecticott and the Dutch Collony, and of the seacoast belonging to the same, and the Islands that lye betwixt Long Island and the Maine, viz. : within what government it is, and of what kinde that government is, whether very strict or remisse, who the Chiefe Magistrates are, on what termes ye

[1] N. E. Gen. Rec., p. 347.

[2] Recital in a deed to her of 14th Nov., 1668, in the writer's possession.

Indians stand with them, and what bounds the Dutch pretend to, and being satisfyed in these particulars, (viz.) that you may with security settle there and without offence to any. Then our advice is that you endeavour to buy some small Plantation that is already settled and hath an house, and some quantity of ground cleared and which lyeth so as you may enlarge into the woods at pleasure in each,—be sure not to fayle of these accommodations.

I. That it be near some navigable Ryver, or at least some safe port or harbour, and that the waye to it be neither long nor difficult.

II. That it be well watered by some running streame, or at least by some fresh ponds and springs, near adjoining.

III. That it be well wooded, which I thinke you can hardly misse of. That it be healthy, high, ground, not boggs or fens, for the hopes of all consists in that consideration."

Then after cautioning him to obtain a good title, and directing him how to begin and carry on the actual settling and planting of the location, the instructions, with a sharp eye to their main object, thus conclude;—"Lastly, we desire you to advise us, or either of us, how affairs stand with you, what your wants are, and how they may be most advantageously employed by us, for the life of our business will consist in the nimble, quiet, and full, correspondence with us; and although these instructions we have given you, clearly indicates [our views] yet we are not satisfied that you must needs bring in the place so many difficultyes, and also observe so many inconveniences, which we at this distance cannot possibly imagine; and therefore we refer all wholly to your discretion, not doubting but that you will doe all things to the best advantage of our designe, thereby obliedging your faithful friends and servants

Thos. Modiford
Barbadoes Sept. 18, 1657. Will. Sharpe.[1]

Certainly John Richbell carried out these "instructions" to the letter. No better description of the situation of Mamaroneck and its peculiar local characteristics could be written than they contain. Directly on the Sound, close to Connecticut and claimed by that Colony, yet within the Dutch jurisdiction, with a deeply indented harbour, and a fine ever running stream of fresh water falling over a reef directly into it, backed by high wooded hills, and skirted by the cleared planting fields of the Indians; and within a day's sail of the "Manhadoes," Richbell could not have found on the whole coast a locality better adapted to the "nimble" business of himself and his Barbadoes friends. There was only a single point in which it failed to meet their "instructions." It was not "already settled," and had no "house" already built. The Siwawoy tribe of Mohican Indians were its sole inhabitants when Richbell first saw Mamaroneck, and their Sachems were Wappaquewam and Mahatahan,[2] brothers in authority, but not in blood.

How soon Richbell left Barbadoes, after the date of his instructions, or when he arrived in New Netherland, or on Long Island, is not known. He purchased that beautiful peninsula, or a part of it, in Oyster Bay, afterwards, and still, known as Lloyd's Neck, on the 5th of September 1660, which six years later he subsequently sold.[3] He was a resident of Oyster Bay from 1660 to 1663 or 1664, and afterwards of Mamaroneck.

A year later, in September 1661, he made the first purchase of the Mamaroneck lands of the Indians, the deed for which is as follows:—

The Indian Deed to John Richbell.

Mammaranock, y^e^ 23^d^ Sept. 1661. Know all men by these presents;—That I Wappaquewam Right owner and Proprietor of part of this Land, doe by order of my brother who is another Proprietor & by Consent of the other Indyans doe this day Sell, Lett, & make over from mee my heyres and assignes forever, unto John Richbell of Oyster Bay his heyres & assignes forever, three Necks of Land, the Eastermost is called Mammaranock neck, and the Westermost is bounded with Mr. Pell's purchase: Therefore Know all men whom these presents concerne, that I Wappaquewam Doe this Day alienate and Estrange from mee, my heires, and assignes for ever unto John Richbell his heyres and assignes forever these three Necks of Land with all the Meadows Rivers and Islands thereunto belonging, Also the said Richbell or his Assignes may freely feed cattle, or cutt Timber Twenty miles Northward from the marked Trees of the Necks, ffor and in consideracion the said Richbell is to Give and Deliver unto the aforenamed Wappaquewam the goods hereunder mentioned, the one halfe about a month after the date here of, and the other halfe the next Spring following, as the Interpreters can Testifye, & for the true performance hereof I Wappaquewam doe acknowledge to have Received two Shirts & Ten Shillings in Wampum the Day and Date above Written.

The mark of
+
Wappaquewam,

Twenty Two Coats,
One hundred fathom of Wampum,
Twelve Shirts,
Ten paire of Stockings,
Twenty hands of powder,
Twelve barrs of Lead,
Two firelockes,
ffifteen Hoes,

[1] Deed book III., Sec. of State's off., 122, 126.

[2] In a single paper of the time, this name is spelled "Mathetuson," but in all the others "Mahatahan."

[3] See chapter on "Mamaroneck" for some details of Richbell and his residence in Oyster Bay.

ffifteen Hatchets,
Three Kettles.[1]

In the December following the execution and delivery of the foregoing deed one Thomas Revell also of Oyster Bay a merchant, and rival of Richbell attempted to claim the same lands under a deed from an Indian, for "two Necks" dated the 27th of October 1661. This led to an examination into the facts by the Dutch authorities when Richbell presented to them his memorial for a "grondbref," or permit to extinguish the Indian title, in December 1661. This examination shewed Revell's claim to be a fraud, and the Dutch Government accordingly issued their ground brief to Richbell, and later, their "Transport," or Patent. When the change of rule came and the English were in power and the Dutch Transports, or patents, had been confirmed by English ones under the Duke of York, Richbell had recorded with his English Patent, in the Secretary's office of the Province, the numerous affidavits made in 1661 and 1662 and laid before the Dutch authorities, on which they condemned Revell's Indian deed and claim, and decided in his own favor, together with another by an eye witness made in 1665,[2] and an Indian certificate of Confirmation of the foregoing Indian deed to him of September 23d, 1661.[3]

The latter is in these words:—

Indian Certificate of Confirmation to John Richbell.

"Recorded for Mr. John Richbell the 6th day of June 1666 this Indyan deed.

I Wampaquewam, together with my brother Mahatahan, being the right owners of three Necks of Land, lying and being Bounded on ye East side with Mamaranock River, and on ye West side with the Stony River which parts the said Land and Mr. Pells purchase, Now These are to certify to all and every one of whom it may concerne, That I Wampaquewam did for myselfe and in the behalfe of my aforesaid Brother Mahatahan, firm firmly Bargain and Sell to Mr. John Richbell of Oyster Bay, to him and his Heires forever, the above mentioned three Necks of Land, together with all other Priviledges thereunto belonging, Six weeks before I sold it to Mr. Thos. Revell. And did mark out the Bounds, and give Mr. Richbell possession of the said Land, and did receive part of my pay there in hand, as Witness my hand.

Witnesse — The mark of Jacob Yough — +
Catharine Yough.[4] — Wampaquewam.

In December, 1661, John Richbell made his application to the Dutch Governor and Council for the grond-bref above alluded to. His memorial, dated the day before Christmas, 1661, is in these words:

JOHN RICHBELLS PETITION TO THE DUTCH GOVERNMENT FOR A PATENT.

Amsterdam in New Netherland, 24 Dec., 1661.

To the Most Noble, Great, and Respectful Lords, the Directors-General and Council, in New Netherland, solicits most reverently John Richbell, that it may please your Honours to grant him letters patent for three Necks of Lands, the east Neck being named Mammoranock Neck, the western with the adjacent Land by some named Mr. Pells Land, promising that all persons who with the supplicants permission or order would settle there with him, shall be willing to solicit letters patent for such a parcel of land as they may intend to settle. In the meantime he supplicates that your Honours may be pleased to grant him letters patent for the whole tract, which he is willing to enforce and instruct them of your Honours Government and will, in similar manner, on terms and conditions as are allowed to other villages. Hoping for your assent he remains, respectfully,

John Richbell.[5]

This memorial was read and considered by director Stuyvesant and his Council on the 19th of January, 1662, and the applicant was requested to explain more fully the extent and meaning of his proposal. Richbell subsequently did so, and on the 6th of the succeeding May (1662) there was granted him the annexed "grond-bref" or ground-brief signed by Stuyvesant himself.

Dutch Ground-Brief for Mamaroneck.

We, the Director-General and Council of State of New Netherland, doe declare by these presents, that we, upon the memorial or petition of Mr. John Rissebel and his friends, that he be under the protection of the high and subordinate Authority of this Province, upon terms and conditions that other inhabitants doe enjoy, may take up and posssess a certain Neck and parcel of Land called Mammarinikes, provided that the aforesaid Mr. John Rissebel, his associates, and every one that are now hereafter to come, in due and convenient time, shall present themselves before us to take the oath of fidelity and obedience,[6] and also as other inhabitants are used, to procure a transport of what they possess.

Given under our hand and seal the 6th day of May, 1662, in Fort Amsterdam in New Netherland.

P. Stuyvesant.[7]

[1] This deed is recorded in the Secretary of State's office at Albany, Book of Entries No. 4, p. 125; and is here printed from a copy certified by W. Bobin Depy Secy of the Province on 12th March, 1722, in the writer's possession. In the Books as now numbered at Albany, it is in Liber 2 of Deeds, p. 192. The mark of Wappaquewam is omitted in the record.

[2] As explained above in this essay.

[3] Liber 2 of Deeds, 192–199, Sec. of state's offe Albany.

[4] Liber Two of Deeds p. 128.

[5] Deed Book iii. 37, Sec. State's Office. See ante pp. 54–57 for the "terms and conditions" referred to in this document.

[6] As required by the charter of "Freedoms and Exemptions" mentioned above in part "4" of this chapter."

[7] The original in Dutch of this paper in the writer's possession, was a few years ago accidentally destroyed. It is recorded in vol. xx. of the State Records at Albany, 127.

The Dutch "Transport" which was formerly in the writer's possession was unfortunately destroyed by accident at the same time with the original Groundbrief as stated above. It vested the lands in Richbell absolutely.

The English Patent of Confirmation of the Transport to John Richbell was granted by Governor Francis Lovelace on March 16, 1668, and is as follows:—

The English Patent of Confirmation to John Richbell

Francis Lovelace, Esq., Governor General, under his Royal Highness, James, Duke of York and Albany, &c. &c., of all his territories in America, to all to whom these presents shall come, sendeth greeting. Whereas, there is a certain parcel or tract of land within this government, upon the main, contained in three necks, of which the eastermost is bounded with a small river, called Mamaronock river, being almost the east bounds or limits of this government upon the main, and the westermost with the gravelly or stony brook or river, which makes the east limits of the land known by the name of Mr. Pell's purchase. Having to the south, the sound, and running northward from the marked trees upon the said neck, twenty miles into the woods, which said parcel or tract of land hath been lawfully purchased of the Indian proprietors, by John Richbell of Mamaronock, gentleman, in whose possession now it is, and his title thereunto sufficiently proved, both at several courts of sessions, as also at the general courts of assizes, now for a confirmation unto him the said John Richbell, in his possession and enjoyment of the premises: Know ye, that by virtue of the commission and authority unto me given by his Royal Highness, I have given, ratified, and confirmed and granted, and by these presents do give and ratify, confirm and grant, unto the said John Richbell, his heirs and assigns, all the aforecited parcel or tract of land as aforesaid, together with all woods, beaches, marches, pastures, creeks, waters, lakes, fishing, hawking, hunting and fowling, and all other profits, immunities and emoluments to the said parcel or tract of land belonging, annexed, or appertaining with their and every of their appurtenances, and every part and parcel thereof, and in regard to the distance of the plantations already settled, or to be settled upon the said necks of land, from any town, the persons inhabiting, or that shall inhabit thereupon, shall have a petty constable chosen amongst themselves yearly, for preserving of the peace, and decision of small differences under the value of forty shillings, and they shall be excused from all common attendance at training or other ordinary duties at Westchester. But in matters of assessment and public rates, they are to be assessed by the officers of that town to which they do properly belong, being the nearest unto them, to have and to hold the said parcel and tract of land in the said three necks contained, and premises with all and singular the privileges and appurtenances to the said John Richbell, his heirs and assigns, to the proper use and behoof of the said John Richbell, his heirs and assignees forever, as free land of inheritance, rendering and paying as a quit rent for the same yearly, and every year, the value of eight bushels of winter wheat, upon the five and twentieth day of March, if demanded, unto his Royal Highness and his heirs, or to such governor or governors as shall from time to time be appointed and set over them. Given under my hand and seal, at Fort James, in New York, on Manhattans Island, the 16th day of October, in the twentieth year of the reign of our sovereign, Lord Charles the second, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. &c., Anno Domini, 1668.

FRANCIS LOVELACE.[1]

The three Necks described in this patent, were called the "East" the "Middle," and the "West" Necks. The Middle Neck was sometimes styled the "Great Neck," from its longer extent of water front, which led to the supposition that its area below Westchester Path was greater than that of the East Neck. The "East Neck" extended from Mamaroneck River to a small stream called "Pipins Brook" which divided it from the Great Neck and is the same which now crosses the Boston Road just east of the house of the late Mr. George Vanderburgh; the "Middle Neck" extended from the latter stream westward to a much larger brook called "Cedar or Gravelly Brook," which is the one that bounds the land now belonging to Mr. Meyer on the west; and the "West Neck" extended from the latter to another smaller brook still further to the westward, also termed "Stoney or Gravelly Brook," which was the East line of the Manor of Pelham. A heated controversy arose between John Richbell and John Pell, as to which of the two brooks last named was the true boundary between them, Pell claiming that it was the former and that the "West Neck" was his land. After proceedings before Governor Lovelace and in the court of assizes the matter was finally settled on the 22d of January 1671 by an agreement practically dividing the disputed territory between them. This was approved by Governor Andros and permission given for a survey.[1]

For some reason not now known, the survey and division was not actually effected till 1677, when it was made by Robert Ryder the Surveyor-General as follows;—

"Whereas there hath been a difference between John Richbell and Mr. John Pell which by virtue of an order from the Right Honourable Major Edmund Andros Esqr. Governor Generall of New York, I have made a division of the within mentioned Neck of Land by and with the mutual consent of both parties,

[1] This patent is recorded in Book of Patents II. p. 75, at Albany.

[2] A cotemporary copy of this agreement signed by Pell, with Andros' permit annexed is in the writer's possession.

which is in manner and form as is hereafter expressed viz.[1] That the said Richbell shall extend from Cedar Tree Brook or Gravelly Brook, south westerly fifty degrees to a certain mark'd Tree, lying above the now comon Road thirty and four chains in length, marked on the east with R and on the west with P, thence extending south sixty three degrees East by certain marked Trees pfixed[1] ending by a certain piece of Meadow at the Salt creek which runs up to Cedar Tree Brook or Gravelly Brook, extending from the first marked Trees Nor Nor West to Brunkes's River by certain Trees in the said Line marked upon the west with P. and upon the east with R. performed the twenty second day of May 1677.

p[r] me Robert Ryder Surv.[yr]

The preceeding Surveyor above mentioned is mutually consented unto by the above mentioned Mr. John Richbell and Mr. John Pell in presence of us.

Thomas Gibbs
Walter Webbs
John Sharp
Joseph Carpenter.[2]

Thus was permanently settled the controversy regarding the West Neck, a settlement which finally determined the eastern boundary of the Manor of Pelham. As neither the Middle or Great Neck, nor the West Neck, formed any part of the Manor of Scarsdale, an account of them will not be given here, but will be found in the chapter on the Town of Mamaroneck as now erected.

In Richbell's Petition of the 24th of December 1661 to the Dutch Government for a ground-brief above given, he says the name of the "East Neck" is "Mamaranock Neck." A misreading by Mr. Bolton of the first of these two words in this document as recorded led to his stating in the first edition of his History of Westchester County issued in 1848, (vol. i. 282) that the "aboriginal name" of the East Neck was "Wanmainuck," and the error has continued in the second edition, (vol. i. 463). This has led subsequent writers to repeat the statement. It was however purely a mistake of Mr. Bolton. The true "aboriginal name" of the East Neck was "Mamaranock," the same as the river which formed its eastern boundary. This word was spelled in very many ways, in early days, by the Dutch and English in public and private letters, documents, and instruments, but all aiming at giving the original Indian sound. In the early part of the eighteenth century the present spelling "Mamaroneck" obtained and has ever since been used. It is the Indian name of the River flowing into the head of the Harbour.

Like most Indian names it is descriptive of a striking natural object and effect, and signifies "The Place where the Fresh water falls into the Salt." A short distance above the present bridge between the towns of Mamaroneck and Rye where the river bends suddenly to the east and then takes a northerly course, a rocky reef originally crossed it nearly at right angles, causing the formation of "rapids." It was high enough to prevent the tide rising over it at high-water, so that the fresh water of the river always fell directly into the salt water of the harbour, and at low water with a strong rush and sound. It was thus a striking and unusual occurrence in nature, and is the source of the Indian name of the River itself and of the East Neck of which it was the eastern boundary. No authority has been found for another signification "the place of the rolling stones" that has been ascribed to the word "Mamaroneck" by Mr. Bolton. Rolling stones are not found anywhere in the neighborhood, the rocks being what the geologists call in situ, and the boulders of huge size and weight.

Richbell's Patent of confirmation from Governor Lovelace is dated October 16th, 1668. On the 14th of the ensuing November, twenty-eight days later, he conveyed the East Neck to Margery Parsons, his wife's mother, "for valuable consideration of certaine goods formerly delivered and paid unto me by Mrs. Margery Parsons upon the Island of St. Christopher's in America.[3] Two days afterward, on the 16th of November 1668 Margery Parsons conveyed to her daughter Mrs. Richbell the East Neck "for that singular and dear affection I have and bare to my most dear daughter Mrs. Ann Richbell wife of the said Mr. John Richbell for her dutiful observance towards me."[4] By way of making this provision for his wife more secure, John Richbell settled the same East Neck upon her as a jointure, by a deed in trust to John Ryder dated 23d of April, 1669, "in consideration of a marriage long since had and solemnized between the said John Richbell and Ann his present wife," and therein describes the Neck as follows, "All that parcell or neck of Land where he now Lives called the East Neck, and to begin at the Westward part thereof at a certaine creeke lying, being, and adjacent by and betwixt y[e] Necks of Land commonly called y[e] Great Neck, and the East Neck, and so to run eastward as farr as Momorononeck River, including therein betwixt the said two lines, all the land as well North into y[e] woods above Westchester Path twenty miles, as the lands belowe the Path southward towards the Sound."[5]

John Richbell died the 26th day of July 1684,[6] leaving his widow him surviving, in whom his entire real estate vested in fee absolutely under the above deeds and jointure, except what little he and his wife had together conveyed in his lifetime.

[1] So in the original.

[2] From a cotemporary copy of the original in the writer's possession.

[3] Ancient copy of the deed in writer's possession. It is also Recorded in Secr[s] office and in West. Co.

[4] Ancient copy of this original in the writer's possession, original not recorded.

[5] Ancient copy in writers possession. Also recorded in book A, 236 &c West. Co.

[6] West. Co. Records Lib. A. p 34.

On the 23d of December 1697 Mrs. Ann Richbell conveyed the entire East Neck and all her right, title and interest therein and thereto, by a full covenant warranty deed, in consideration of £600 New York currency, to "Coll. Caleb Heathcote, Mayor of the Borough of Westchester," his heirs and assigns forever in fee simple absolute, excepting only a small tract previously deeded as a gift to James Mott and his wife in 1684, and another small piece deeded as a gift to John Emerson on the 30th of Sept 1686, which latter was subsequently conveyed by Emerson to Mott by deed dated 25th of June 1690, the wives of both being daughters of Mrs. Richbell. The deed to Colonel Heathcote also provided that "this Deed of Sale shall not obliedge the said Ann Richbell to make good to the said Caleb Heathcote any of the outlands within the Two Miles further than her right and title therein." With these exceptions Ann Richbell's entire right title and estate under the deeds and Patents of her husband John Richbell was conveyed to, and vested absolutely in, Colonel Caleb Heathcote.[1]

The above reservation to Mott referred to a small piece of upland at the entrance to that portion of the East Neck, subsequently, and to this day, called "De Lancey's Neck," of about thirty acres deeded by Mrs. Richbell to Mary and James Mott on the 8 August 1684, which from Mott's heirs finally became vested in the late Giles Seaman after whose death it passed by sale to the late Isaac Hall, who sold it in his lifetime to its present owner, who built upon the premises the fine summer hotel now called, from his own name, the "Rushmore."

The last and only other reservation in the above deed to Col. Heathcote related to some lands which Richbell and his wife in his lifetime had sold in small parcels which he called "Alottments or House Lotts." It will be recollected that Richbell's object was to establish a quiet place for trade at Mamaroneck. In his application to the Dutch Director and Council for leave to purchase the Indian title and their groundbrief, above given, authorizing him so to do, mention is made of some persons who, with his permission, would settle there with him, and for whom he made himself, and was held to be, responsible. These appear to have been persons from Oyster Bay on Long Island and Manussing Island in Rye, between which places a sort of ferry communication across the Sound then existed. Nothing remains to show whether the trade of Modiford Sharpe and Richbell was, or was not, profitable. If the latter, it could not have been so very long, for the English conquest of New Netherland in 1664, three years after Richbell's purchase of Mamaroneck, put an end to its advantages for a contraband business. After his controversy with Pell was terminated in 1671 as shown above, Richbell did little or nothing practically towards settling Mamaroneck. His English Patent was issued October 16, 1668. A few months later he apparently set apart a strip adjoining the north side of the old Westchester path or road from the crossing of Mamaroneck river down to and along the shore of the harbour westward for what he termed, "Alottments or House Lotts" eight in number. The first deed from himself and wife was, it is believed, made to one John Bassett on the 4th of March 1669, for number "four" of these "House Lotts." It was a deed of gift, the consideration being "the Good opinion and Good affection we beare to Mr. John Bassett." It was bounded east by No. three, and west "with my own house lot named No. five." It reserved a rent of "one bushel of winter wheat payable annually on the 25th of March," and "one day's work each yearly harvest;" and prohibited any sale of the land "but by and with the consent and approbation of the said John Richbell or Ann his wife." Of the other six "House Lotts" those which were sold were conveyed in a similar manner and with similar reservations, except that the consideration was in money. To each "House Lott" was appurtenant an undivided eighth part of a tract in the rear of the "House Lotts," which, with, and including, the latter, extended two miles "northwards into the woods."[2] Later with the consent of his grantees he had a survey made of this tract, by Robert Ryder the Surveyor-General of the Province. The original is in the writer's possession, and is in these words:

THE FIRST SURVEY OF MAMARONECK.

"These may certifie all whom it may conserne y^t^ by a mutual consent agreed on betweene Mr. John Richbell & the inhabitants of Momoronacke I have runn out a certaine tract of Land w^ch^ is in partnership betweene the said Inhabitants and the said Mr. Jo.^n^ Richbell, beginning at Momaronacke [River] running thence southwesterly fifty degrees along the harber ninety and two chains: to a certaine runn or Swamp called Dirty Swamp: running thence to the ffalls of Sheldrake River including the said ffalls within the said line: N. W. 20 degrees: forty and five chaine: running thence upon a N. W.ly [line] 45 degrees to a certaine Rocky hill being upon the Southermost pt. of the greate plaine, one hundred twenty and two chaines: running thence by pt. of the edge of the plaine & threw the woods to Momoronacke River one hundred twenty & seaven chaines: ffrom thence running by the side of the River to the Going over of the said River: one hundred & sixty chaines. & in testimony hereof I have hereunto sett my hand this 16^th^ ffeb: 167⅞. Ro. Ryder Surueye^r^:"[3]

[1] This deed was acknowledged by Ann Richbell March 22^d^ 1697 before "Joseph Theal Justice" and was recorded in Lib. B, of West. Co. Records; p 371 &c June 15^th^ 1698.

[2] These details are taken from a copy of the deed to Bassett, in the writer's possession. It does not appear on the Westchester Records nor on those of the town, which begin only in 1697.

[3] This survey was subsequently on the 11^th^ of August, 1687, recorded in West^r^. Co Lib A, 149.

Richbell's Patent of 1668 ran according to its terms North Northwest twenty miles into the woods, its eastern boundary being the Colony line fixed December 1st 1664 by Governor Nichols, and Commissioners Cartwright and Mavericke on the part of the Duke of York and Gov. Winthrop Secretary Allyn, and Messrs. Richards, and Gold, on the part of Connecticut. That line these Commissioners thus officially describe in their formal treaty between the two Colonies ;—" We order and declare that the creeke or river called Mamoroneck which is reputed to be about thirteen miles to the east of Westchester, and a line drawn from the east point or side where the fresh water falls into the Salt at Highwater-Mark North Northwest to the line of the Massachusetts to be the western bounds of the said Colony of Connecticut." This line remained unchanged till 1683, nineteen years later, when the boundary was fixed at the mouth of Byram River as its starting point. Consequently the direction of the lines of Richbell's Patent being the same as that of the Colony line of 1664,they could not be legally set aside or successfully disputed in a Court of law. But certain " Ryemen " being of Connecticut origin did make a claim to Richbell's lands in the Whiteplains, as belonging to them by virtue of a deed from an Indian named Shapham, and several other Indians to " the Town of Rye " dated 22d Novemb. 1683—twenty-two years after Richbell's purchase of the lands in September 1661. But this deed was not obtained, nor the claim under it made by the " Ryemen," until Richbell was about to dispose of his lands in Whiteplains. What a perfect " Yankee trick " this claim was is shown by the fact that it describes the Whiteplains as being "within the town bounds of Rye," when six days after its date the then pending public negotiations fixed the boundary line at Byram River, and Rye ceased to be a part of Connecticut, as she claimed to be and from which she got her " town bounds." It was obtained in a hurry so as to base on it a claim for the land as a part of Connecticut. Smart as it was, it proved, in the end a complete failure. The claim of the " Rye Men " was simply a claim under the charter of Connecticut, which they insisted took in every part of Westchester County across to the Hudson River. Richbell at once brought the matter before Governor Dongan by the following complaint and petition for redress :

RICHBELL'S PETITION AGAINST THE CLAIM OF RYEMEN TO WHITEPLAINS.

To the Right hono:^{ble} Coll Tho Dongan Leiv^{t} Govern^{r} and vice admirall under his Roy^{ll} high^{ss} of N. Yorke and Dependences in America &c. And to the hono^{ble} Councell.

The humble Peticon of John Richbell of Momoroneck Gentl.

Humbly Sheweth That whereas your Petition^{r} hath been for Severall years Possessed and Enjoyed of a Certain Tract or Parcell of Land within this Governm^{t} upon the maine, Contained with a small River Commonly called Momoroneck River being also the East bounds or Limitts of this Governm^{t} upon the maine, and the Westermost with the gravelly or Stony brooke, or river which makes the East limitts of the Land knowne by the name of W^{m} Pell's Purchase haveing to the south the sound and runing northward from the marked Trees upon the said Neck's twenty miles into the woods the which said Parcell or Tract of Land hath been heretofore Lawfully purchased of the Indian Proprietors by the said John Richbell Gentl and his Right and Title thereunto Sufficiently Proved as ℔ his Pattent from Governour Lovelace bareing Date the 16th of October in the 20th yeare of his Ma^{r} Reigne Anno Dom 1668.

Relation being thereunto had will more fully & at large appeare. Butt now soe it is may it please your hono^{r} and the hono^{ble} Councell haveing a Desire to dispose of some Quantity of said Land which is Called the Whiteplaines and is mençoned within said Pattent to Severall Persons whose names[1] are Subscribed to a writeing hereunto annexed for the better Improvem^{t}. And manureing the same & to Settle thereon with themselves and familyes is wholly Obstructed and hind^{d} by Ryemen haveing made a greate Disturbance amongst them and Pretends a right to the Same therefore Cannot dispose of any part or p'cell thereof till your hono^{r} will be pleased to grant an Order to Cleare the Same.

Therefore humbly pray and beseech your hono^{r} and the hono^{ble} Councell that you will bee pleased to take the Premises into your serious consideration and grant an order to Cleare the same Accordingly Desireing only the privlidges as farr as his Pattent doth Extend. And shall pray &c John Richbell.

This petition came up for hearing before the Governor on the 17th of March 1684, and the people of Rye were summoned to show cause at the next Court of Assize why John Richbell was not the true owner of the lands in question. But before the next Court sat, Richbell passed from earth, his death occurring on the 26th day of July 1684. He left his widow Ann and three daughters, Elizabeth, second wife of Adam Mott, of Hempstead, Mary, the wife of Capt. James Mott and Anne, the wife of John Emerson, of Maryland, his only children him surviving. The Rye claim however did not die, but remained a source of annoyance to his widow. In 1694 the matter came to a head. Mrs. Richbell served the following Protest upon the Rye people at a town meeting, and subsequently began a suit at law to test the question.

PROTEST OF MRS. RICHBELL AGAINST RYE.[2]

" To all Xt^{ian} People to whome this present Protest

[1] These names do not appear upon the record at Albany.

[2] From the original in the writer's possession. It is recorded in Lib. A West. Co. Records, 168.

shall Come Greeting: Know yee that whereas I Ann Richbell of Momorronock in the County of Westchest[r] in the province and Colony of New yorke the Widdow and Relict of Jn°. Richbell Esq[r]., Deceased Am Credebly Informed that Humphry Underhill and severall other persons belongeing to the Towne of Rye have made a forcable Entry: and are further proceeding in the Like Manner Upon and into Severall parcells and Tracts of Land within the pattent Right of me the said Anne Richbell as may and dos Appeare by the Grand Pattent Granted under the hand and Seale of Coll Frances Lovelace the then Geverno[r] of this Province: it Contrary to y[e] Peace of their Maj[ties] & Therefore know Yee y[t] I Ann Richbell of Momorronock aforesaid being the true & Absoelute Owner of the said Tracts or parcells of Land doe Protest Against & forbidd any Person whatsoever for making any forcable Entry upon the same or any part or parcell thereof and likewise do warne and desire all such persons that have already made such forceable entry thereon or upon any part or parcell of the said Pattent as aforesaid that they expell and forthwith remove therefrom, and further do protest ag[t] the Register of the County and doe forbid him at his perrill no[t] to enter any of their privite agreem.[ts] or writing in the Records of the County in presence of James Mott Justice of the peace and Benjamin Collier Esq[r] High Sheriff of the said County: In Consideration whereof I doe hereby obleidge myselfe and my heirs Execut[rs] and Administrators firmly by these p[e]sents: to Indemnifie and Keepe harmless the said Register concerning y[e] Premises aforesaid In wittness whereof I have hereunto put my hand and seale this twenty sixth day of February in the sixth year of their Maj[ties] Reigne Annoq[e] Domj 169¾ Acknowledged before us by the above Ann Richbell to be her Act & deed the day and date above written.

Ann Richbell L.S.

James Mott Justis Pece.
Joseph Lee Pub. Not[e].

This Instrum[t] was Read at a publick Towne meeting at y[e] Towne house of Rye the day and date above written, and their Answer was if they did not meddle or make with any Lands that belongs to M[rs] Richbells Patent But at the same Time they was makeing a Generall Agreem[t] to Lay out and devide a parcell of Land the said M[rs] Richbell Layeth Clame Too by virty of her said Pattent.

Test Joseph Lee t[h] Comitt.
Westchest[r]."

This Instrum[t] is Recorded in the Records of the County of Westchest[r] in Booke N° B. Foleo, 168: 169.

The suit referred to was tried at the then County town of Westchester in December 1696 and resulted in favor of Mrs. Richbell. The following is the verdict, which is printed from a copy certified by the Court clerk at the time, now in the writer's possession. It is believed to be the only Westchester County Court document of the kind of the seventeenth century which has come down regularly to a present representative in interest of one of the parties to the original action. Its form being somewhat different from that now used, and showing the names of the Judges, Jurors, and Counsel, and the summary of the evidence, gives it great and curious interest.

Verdict for Mrs. Richbell.

" Westcheste[r]
Countys Ss. Att a Court of Pleas held at Westchester for the said County Dec. y[e] 3[rd], & fourth in the Eight year of his Majestie's Reigne, Annoq[e] Domj. 1696.

Present

The Honob[le] James Graham, Judge, John Pell, John Hunt, Wm Barnes, Thos Pinkney, Esq[rs].

Maddam Richbell by Peter Chock Atturney Read the Pattent & Joynt[e][1] &c.

Upon which the Jury was Impanneld & Swore, viz.

Edm[d]. Ward	Thomas Bedient
Jno. Bayly	Robt. Hustice Jun[r]
Gabriell Leggatt	Wm Davenport
Joseph Hunt, Sen[e]	John Barrett
Thomas Baxter	Roger Barton
Charles Vincent	Thomas Shuite

Mr. Underhill Reads an ord[r] about the Line betweene this Province and Canniddecott and Pleads the Land in question not within this Governm[t] but in Canniddecott.

Mr. Peter Cock[2] Pleads that Joseph Lee[3] might be swore to give what Report he cann about the Surveigh of the now Surveyo[r] Generall, who upon oath, saith, that he begun his Survey at or about Momoronock Bridge:[4] and soe Runn up by the River till till he Came where Umphry Underhill Lives, who made opposition with Gunns, Stones, &c. and soe went no further.

(vert.)

The Pattent with the rest of Papers needfull Given to the Jury, and the Sherrife Sworne to Keepe them from fire and candles &c. untill they bringe in their verdict, viz.

The Jury find that Momorronack River is the bounds of Richbells Pattent where the ffresh water ffals into the salt in said River, and from thence a northerly line into the woods: and if the Tenn[t] in Possession be on the West side of said Line then wee find for the plaintive, otherwise for the Defendant.

Joseph Lee, Cl."

It would have been of more interest still at this

[1] Jointure.
[2] So in the original.
[3] The County Register, and also Clerk of the Court.
[4] The original bridge, which was some distance north of the present bridge, the location of which was only made in 1800, by the Westchester Turnpike Company under their charter of that year.

day, had it given the exact location of the premises for which the suit was brought. It is believed to have been the land of one Hunt, son-in-law of Underhill, who lived above and adjoining him on the upper part of Mamaroneck River; but this is only a surmise.

This decision finally established the east boundary of Richbells Patent and settled the legal as well as actual direction of both the east and the west boundary lines of that Patent. In the next century two controversies arose regarding the location of the dividing line between the east and the Middle Necks of Richbell's Patent, one in 1731 and the other in 1768, both of which were decided in favor of the Proprietors of the Manor of Scarsdale, which included the East Neck, the particulars of which belong more appropriately to the history of Mamaroneck as a town under the Act of 1788.

We now turn to Colonel Heathcote's title to the part of the Manor which he obtained directly from the Indians. This was the portion between Hutchinson's River and the Bronx, bordering to the south on the Eastchester Patent, now a part of the town of Scarsdale, a tract which in the Colony days bore, and to a certain extent still bears, the local name of "The Fox Meadows." It is thus described in the Indian deed from Patthunke, Beopo, Cohawney, and Wapetuck to Colonel Heathcote, "To begin on the west side at southermost end of a ridge known by the name of Richbell's or Horse-Ridge at a great Rock and so to run a north-northwest line to Broncks's River, and on the eastermost side from Mamaroneck River, and from the head thereof to Broncks's River." [1]

Nearly a year later, another deed was executed to Colonel Heathcote by three of the above named Indians, Pathunke, Wapetuck, and Beopo, for that part of the land lying between the above tract and the Eastchester Patent line in which it is thus described, "butted and bounded as followeth Eastwardly by the marked trees or westermost bounds of a certain tract of Land sold by the said Beopo Patthunke Wapetuck & Cohawney to the said Heathcote bearing date the thirtieth day of March one thousand seven hundred and one, northwardly by Bronxe's River Southwarcly and Westwardly by Henry Fowler's purchase and others." [2] Thirty years afterward, in the first of the two suits above alluded to instituted by the then proprietors of the Manor of Scarsdale against one Quimby for trespass, Henry Fowler gave the following account of the circumstances of this purchase of Colonel Heathcote, in the form of an affidavit;—"Memorandum that on y^e^ Sixth day of May 1731 in the fourth year of his Majesties Reign Annoq. Dom. 1731, Henery ffowler Sen^r^ of Eastchester in y^e^ County of Westchester and Collony of New York, yeoman, of full age Being sworne on ye Holly Evangelist of Almighty God, Saith;—that about the time Coll. Caleb Heathcot was lying out the purchase which is commonly called the fox meadow purchase, Coll. Heathcott Desired said Henery Fowler, this Deponent, to show him said Coll. Heathcott the bounds of the Indian purchase, that the said Henery ffowler this Deponent had purchased of the Indians Ann Hook, Woupatopas, &c. for himself and others his neighbours · this Deponent further saith that Coll. Heathcott further said to him, I have purchased a tract of Land of the Heathen Joyning to your bounds; this Deponent further saith that he went along with Coll. Heathcott and showed him his bounds of the land he had purchased of the Heathens for himself and neighbours, which was from the Head of Hutchinsons River a straight course to Brunksis River to a marked tree, which Coll. Heathcott acknowledged to be his Bounds of his Indian Purchase, and this Deponent further Saith that he hath no claim to any parts of the lands in y^e^ Indian purchase or lands therein contained which the said Henery ffowler purchased for himself and neighbours adjoining to Coll. Heathcotts; and that he Doth not now Declare this truth either in hopes of loss or gain, or through any fear, or in hopes of gaining any favour or affection of any person whatsoever, and further this Deponent saith not.

Henery ffowler.

This Deponent being about Seventy four years of age was sworn before me ye date aforesaid.
Sworn before me one of his Majesties Justices of the peace for Westchester County.

John Ward, Justice.[3]

In 1696, the year before Colonel Heathcote purchased from her the Mamaroneck lands, he obtained from Mrs. Richbell her written consent to his getting the usual deeds of Confirmation[4] from the then Indians of the neighborhood for the lands formerly bought from Wappaquewam and other Indians by her husband John Richbell. The above deeds seem also to have been obtained to remove any possible claim to the Fox meadows from any parties whatever whether Indians or whites. He also obtained on the eleventh of June 1701 from the same Indians Patthunke, Beopo, and Wapetuck a similar deed of confirmation for Richbells Mamaroneck two miles tract.[5]

In the course of the same year and the next he obtained, with others in interest, similar Indian deeds of Confirmation for all the lands in the great "West," "Middle" and "East Patents" which together covered all the county between the Manors of Cortlandt on the north, Philipsburgh on the west, Scarsdale on the south, and the Connecticut line on the east,

[1] From the original deed dated 30 March 1700-1.

[2] Original deed in the writer's possession dated 24 Feb. 1701-2.

[3] From an ancient copy of the original in the writer's possession.

[4] Before explained in this essay.

[5] West. Co. Records Lib. D 52.

a short account of which will be given in another connection.

At the time of his purchase from Mrs. Ann Richbell of the entire estate and rights in her Mamaroneck and Scarsdale lands, in 1697, Colonel Heathcote was residing at Westchester, which the year before, through his influence, had been created a Borough-Town, with all its municipal privileges of a Mayor and Aldermen and Assistants, and the additional one of a representative of its own in the Assembly of the Province,[1] its charter, by which he was named its first Mayor, bearing date April 16th, 1696. He was a merchant in New York, where he also had a town residence, and a member of the Council of the Province. He had been a property holder in both Westchester and Eastchester, from about the time of his coming from England to New York, which was in 1691. Being a man of education and means and of affable manners, he took a prominent part in the affairs of both settlements. and, in accordance with the popular wish, was appointed Colonel of the Military of the whole County. Hence the title of "Colonel," by which he was ever afterwards known, and spoken of, notwithstanding the many higher and more distinguished positions and appointments he afterwards held, one of which was the judgeship of Common Pleas of the County, which he filled at the same time he was colonel of its militia.

Succeeding to all the Richbell estate in the East Neck, including the proprietary rights in the township tract of Mamaroneck, after obtaining the Indian confirmations and other deeds for the lands, and acquiring those from the head of Hutchinson's River to the Bronx, he had the whole erected into the Manor of Scarsdale under the Manor Grant above set forth in 1701.

Upon an eminence at the head of Mamaroneck harbor, overlooking the two beautiful peninsulas forming its eastern and western sides, the blue waters of the wide Sound into which it opens, and the distant hills of Long Island, called from him to this day, "Heathcote Hill," Colonel Heathcote erected a large double brick Manor-House in the English style of that period, with all the usual offices and outbuildings, with the purely American addition, however, of negro quarters, in consonance with the laws, habits, and customs of that day. Here he dwelt during the remainder of his life.

The people then living at Mamaroneck were very few. One of the first movements of Colonel Heathcote was to obtain the confirmation deed from the then Indian chiefs for Richbell's two-mile township tract above referred to. This instrument, dated June 11th, 1701, not quite three months after he obtained his Manor-Grant of Scarsdale, gives us the names of the then owners of the tract which was divided into eight house or home lots. It is executed by two Indian chiefs, Patthunk and Wapetuck, and confirms the tract "unto Collon.[e1] Caleb Heathcote, Capt. James Mott, William Penoir,[2] John Williams, Henry Disbrough, Alice Hatfield, John Disbrough and Benjamin Disbrough.[3]" Henry Disbrough's deed from John and Ann Richbell, of 16th of February, 1676,[4] for his eighth part gives us the precise boundaries of this tract, which it terms "Mammaroneck limmits," "being in length two miles and in Breadth one mile a half and Twenty-eight rods."[5] The object was to show that no difficulty with the natives might be apprehended by persons desirous of settling at Mamaroneck. Colonel Heathcote established a grist mill on the Mamaroneck River near the original bridge crossed by the "old Westchester Path," and a saw mill high up on that river, now the site of the present Mamaroneck Water Works, upon which site there continued to be a mill of some kind until it was bought two years ago to establish those works. He made leases at different points throughout the Manor, but did not sell in fee many farms, though always ready and willing to do so, the whole number of the deeds for the latter on record being only thirteen during the twenty-three years or thereabout which elapsed between his purchase from Mr. Richbell and his death. Some of these farms, however, were of great extent. He did not establish as far as now known any Manor Courts under his right to do so. The population was so scant, and the Manor like all others in the county, being subject to the judicial provisions of the Provincial Legislative acts, there was really no occasion for them. He personally attended to all duties, and matters, connected with his Manor and his Tenants, never having appointed any Steward of the Manor. Papers still in existence show that his Tenants were in the habit of coming to him for aid and counsel in their most private affairs, especially in the settlement of family disputes, and he was often called upon to draw their wills. But space will not permit mention of incidents and facts of only personal or local interest, or of details of his general management of the Manor, or his agricultural management of his demesne lands, which included besides those attached to his Manor House the whole of that portion of the East Neck below the old Westchester Path now called De Lancey's Neck.

Colonel Heathcote died very suddenly in the city of New York from a stroke of apoplexy on the 28th of February, 1720–21. In the Philadelphia American Weekly Mercury of March 11, 1721, is a letter from New York, under date of March 6th, which says, "On the 28th day of February last, died the Honorable Caleb Heathcote, Surveyor-General of His Majesty's

[1] It and Schenectady were the only "Borough-Towns" erected in the Province of New York. Both were perfect exampies of the old English Borough-Towns in every respect.

[2] Penoyer was really this name.

[3] Ancient copy in the writer's possession. Rec. Lib. C, West. Co., p. 52.

[4] Lib. A, 33, West. Co. Rec.

[5] The length was north and south, and the breadth east and west.

Caleb Heathcote

Reproduced from the Engraving from the Original Painting in possession of the Rt. Rev. W. H. De Lancey, Bishop of Western New York.

Customs for the Eastern District of North America,[1] Judge of the Court of Admiralty for the Provinces of New York and New Jersey and Connecticut, one of His Majesty's Council for the Province of New York, and brother of Sir Gilbert Heathcote of London.

"He was a gentleman of rare qualities, excellent temper, and virtuous life and conversation, and his loss lamented by all that knew him, which on the day of his death, went about doing good in procuring a charitable subscription in which he made great progress." He was buried in his "family burial-place" in Trinity church yard, where his widow and three of his children who died young are also buried. His grave was in the church yard, almost beneath the southwest window of the second Trinity Church.[2] His widow Martha survived him till August 18th, 1736, when she died, and was buried in the same place the evening of the next day.[3] She was the daughter of Colonel William Smith, of St. George's Manor, Long Island, Chief Justice and President of the Council of New York. He had previously been Governor of Tangiers, in Africa, while it was an appanage of the British crown, where his daughter, Martha Heathcote, was born on the 11th of September, 1681.

Colonel Caleb Heathcote was the sixth son of Gilbert Heathcote, Mayor of Chesterfield, Derbyshire, England, by his wife, Anne Chase Dickens. He was born in his Father's house in that city, still standing, in 1665. He was the sixth of seven sons who lived to maturity—Gilbert, John, Samuel, Josiah, William, Caleb and George. Of these, who all became successful merchants in England and foreign countries, three—John, William and George—died unmarried, the latter at sea in 1678, in his thirtieth year. Josiah's family line became extinct in August, 1811, while the families of Gilbert, Samuel and Caleb continue to this day, but the latter only in the female line. Gilbert, the eldest, was Lord Mayor of London, Member of Parliament, one of the founders and the first Governor of the Bank of England, knighted by Queen Anne, and created a Baronet in 1732 by George II. His grandson of the same name was raised to the Peerage in 1856, as Baron Aveland, of Aveland, in the County of Lincoln, and his great grandson is the present Lord Great Chamberlain of England. Samuel, the third son, who made a large fortune at Dantzic, was the ancestor of the Heathcotes, Baronets, of Hursley Park, in the County of Hampshire; his son William having been created a Baronet in 1733, and his great grandson was the late Right Honorable Sir William Heathcote, Bart., of the Privy Council, late Member of Parliament for the University of Oxford, the pupil and warm friend of the poet Keble, whom he preferred to the Rectorship of Hursley, which will ever be as famous as that of George Herbert at Bemerton, and father of Sir William Heathcote, the sixth and present Baronet.

Caleb, the sixth son, left six children—Gilbert and William and four daughters: Anne, Mary, Martha and Elizabeth. Three of these—William, Mary and Elizabeth—died young. Gilbert, while a youth of twenty, completing his education in England under the care of his Uncle Gilbert, took the small pox and died, and is buried in that city. Anne, the eldest daughter, married James de Lancey (born 1703, died 1760), eldest surviving son of Etienne—in English Stephen—de Lancey, the first of that family in America, subsequently Chief Justice and Governor of the Province of New York, of whom the late Rt. Rev. William Heathcote de Lancey (born 1797, died 1865) was the eldest surviving grandson, and the father of the writer of this essay. Martha, the only other child of Colonel Caleb Heathcote, who came to maturity, married Lewis Johnston, of Perth Amboy, New Jersey, and left two sons—John L. and Heathcote—and two daughters—Anne and Margaret. The line of Heathcote Johnston is now extinct, and that of John L., it is said, is now extinct in the males. Anne married William Burnet, son of Governor Burnet of New York, and grandson of the famous Bishop Burnet of King William's and Queen Anne's day, but this line is also extinct. Margaret, the other daughter of Martha Heathcote Johnston, married Bowes Read, a prominent and distinguished public man of New Jersey, and her grandson was the late Rt. Rev. Charles P. McIlvaine, Bishop of Ohio, who has many descendants.

The Father of Colonel Heathcote, Gilbert the Mayor of Chesterfield, was a Roundhead in the English Civil War, and served with credit in the Army of the Parliament against King Charles the First. He died in 1690 and lies in the burial place of the Heathcotes on the north side of the altar rails, in the ancient Parish Church of Chesterfield, the cruciform church 600 years old, with the central twisted spire 230 feet high and 14 feet out of the perpendicular, yet perfectly secure, which, like the Leaning Tower of Pisa, is a puzzle whether it was or was not so erected originally. Against the wall of the chancel arch is a very handsome mural monument in the ornamented style of the 16th century, erected jointly by all his sons to his memory bearing this inscription;

At the foot of this here lieth, in hopes of a blessed resurrection,
the body of Gilbert Heathcote late of this town, Gentleman, who departed this life the 24th April, 1690, in the 69th year of his age.

[1] The commission appointing him to this office is in the writer's possession. It is an enormous parchment document dated, 1715.

[2] This fact was told the writer by his Father, the Rt. Rev. William H. De Lancey, who was told it and shown the place by his father, John Peter De Lancey, of Mamaroneck, a grandson of Colonel Heathcote. All stones were destroyed when the First Trinity was burned, Sept. 15, 1776.

[3] New York Gazette, No. 564, of 23 Aug., 1736.

By his wife Ann, daughter of Mr George Dickens of this town
he had eight sons and one daughter, viz.
Gilbert, John, Samuel,
Elizabeth, Josiah, William
Caleb, George, and Thomas;
of which Elizabeth and Thomas died in their infancy;
but he had the particular blessing to see all the rest Merchants adventurers, either in England or in foreign parts.
This was erected by his sons,
as well to testify their gratitude, as to perpetuate the Memory of the best of fathers.
Here also lieth interred
the body of Ann, his said wife, who departed this life
the 29th of November, 1705 in the 76th year of her age.

The family was an ancient one, the first of whom there is authoritative mention having been a Master of the Mint under Richard II. The Arms were Argent, three Pomeis, each charged with a cross or. And for Crest, on a wreath of the colours, a mural coronet azure surmounted with a Pomeis charged with a cross or, between two wings displayed, ermine. Motto: Habere et Dispertiri.[1]

Colonel Heathcote singularly enough was Mayor of the City of New York in 1711 to 1714 at the same time that his elder brother Gilbert was Lord Mayor of London. He was one of the strongest and most active Churchmen of his day. To him was the Church of England in New York and in Westchester County indebted for its foundation and growth more than to any other one man. He formed an organization of a few churchmen in the City of New York termed the Managers of the Church of England in New York, of which he was the chairman.

This was the body which took the earliest steps to establish an English Church in that city which eventually became the well known "Parish of Trinity Church," subsequently the Mother Church of all the earlier churches in the city and to a large extent of those in the State of New York. Heathcote was the moving spirit and the active man in the whole movement, a fact which being fully admitted by them has drawn down upon him the ire of many writers of dissenting bodies of Christians. He also was the leading man in founding the parishes of Westchester East Chester, and Rye, in the County of Westchester to all of which he contributed his efforts and his means. His Manor of Scarsdale and Mamaroneck formed one of the precincts of the Parish of Rye,[2] of which he was elected by the inhabitants a warden and vestryman. And from it he and the Rector of Rye, the Rev. George Muirson, went forth upon those Missionary tours which first brought the knowledge of the Church of England into the then benighted Colony of Connecticut, of which he has left us reports so full that to them friends and foes have gone for the most authentic account of men and affairs at that day in that Colony. So strong was the opposition and savage the threats, that he always went fully armed to defend both Muirson and himself.

In consequence of the death of all his children except Ann, Mrs. de Lancey and Martha, Mrs. Johnston, his entire estate, real and personal, descended to those ladies in equal shares. By Indentures of lease and release dated the 1st and 4th days of July 1738 Lewis Johnston and Martha his wife conveyed her undivided half part of her Father's estate to Andrew Johnston a relative of her husband. And he by deed dated July 7th 1738 reconveyed it to Lewis Johnston and his heirs in fee. This was for the easier management only. By James de Lancey and wife and Lewis Johnston jointly, were all the lands in the Manor sold and conveyed, or leased, up to the death of James de Lancey on the 30th of July 1760. He died intestate, and Mrs. de Lancey's share of the Manor thereupon reverted to her alone absolutely in fee. From that time to 1774 all deeds and leases ran jointly in the names of Anne de Lancey and Lewis Johnston, they holding the estate jointly in fee. During this period a great deal of the Manor was sold, both to tenants and strangers. The former were always given the first right to purchase their farms in fee, and no farm was ever sold to strangers except with the tenants' assent, notwithstanding the proprietors were not bound to do so.

In 1773 Anne de Lancey and Lewis Johnston determined to have a partition of all the lands in the Manor that remained unsold, and proceedings to that end were begun under the act of the Provincial Legislature of 1762, for that purpose. But before they had gone very far Dr. Johnston died. The Proceedings were therefore begun anew in the names of Anne de Lancey and the Heirs of Lewis Johnston.

These Proceedings in Partition were instituted under "An Act for the more effectual collection of his Majesty's Quit-rents in the Colony of New York and for the Partition of Lands in order thereto" passed the 8th of January 1762, and of another amendatory Act passed the 30th of December 1768. The original Petition was in the name of Lewis Johnston; after his death his children were substituted in his place. They were Heathcote Johnston, John Burnet, Anne Burnet, Bowes Reed and Margaret Reed. The other party in both Petitions was of course, Anne de Lancey. The Commissioners to make the partition were, Philip Pell, Jacobus Bleecker, and William Sutton, "all of the County of Westchester."

[1] On the 2d of December, 1708, at the request of Gilbert and his brothers, these arms were confirmed, with the change of the shield from argent to ermine, by the Herald's College of England.

[2] See ante p. 99 for the facts of the establishment of the Church of England and its parishes in Westchester County.

After the proper advertisements had been published the proper time in Rivington's New York Gazetteer and Holt's New York Journal, two of the newspapers of the day, the Commissioners met to organize "at the house of Thomas Besly in New Rochelle" on the 5th of April 1774. Philip Pell, Jr, was appointed clerk. The Commissioners and clerk were sworn in by Judge Thomas Jones of the Supreme Court[1] who attended for the purpose, and delivered to each a certificate of their appointment, signed by himself. The Commissioners ordered a notice that they would proceed to make the survey and partition on the 6th of June 1774, to be published, and also to be served on Alexander Colden, Surveyor-General. This notice, with a full description of the lands, was published weekly for six weeks in Rivington's New York Gazetteer and Holt's New York Journal. On the 6th of June 1774 the Commissioners met at the house of William Sutton, on what is now De Lancey's Neck, accordingly. William Sutton was the leading man of his day at Mamaroneck. He was one of the Commissioners, and had been the tenant of De Lancey's Neck for a great many years previously and continued such to his death about the close of the Revolutionary war. He knew every one of note in the County, and was as thoroughly acquainted with the Manor lands in general as he was with those he himself had in cultivation. Jacobus Bleecker was a prominent resident and land holder of New Rochelle, and the grandfather of the late Anthony J. Bleecker, the well known Real Estate Auctioneer of New York. Philip Pell was of the old manorial family of the Pells of Pelham, and Philip Pell, Jr., the clerk was his oldest son. All were persons thoroughly acquainted with the extent, situation, and value, of the Heathcote estate, and the Manor of Scarsdale.

"Sutton's House" long the farm house of the Neck, stood near, and a little south west of, the new farm house built about 1844, by the late Mr. Thomas J. de Lancey, which is now a part of the house standing at the angle of Mamaroneck and Long Beach Avenues, recently bought of the James Miller estate by Mr. J. A. Bostwick. At the meeting at Sutton's on the 6th of June 1774, the clerk reported that he had served Surveyor-General Colden with notice on the 2nd of the preceding May. The Commissioners then appointed Charles Webb, at that time and for thirty years after, one of the best Surveyors of the Province and State, Surveyor to make the Survey under oath, which was duly administered to him, and also to Joseph Purdy and Gilbert Robinson as chain bearers and Doty Doughty as "flagg carrier," and then they adjourned to the next day, the 7th. when the survey was begun. It was carried on daily till near the middle of the following August, on the 16th of which month, Maps, Field books, and Journals of the Commissioners, were duly signed in triplicate, one copy of each of which was filed in the office of the Secretary of the Province, one in the clerk's office of Westchester County, and one retained by the owners. On the 25th of August notice of the filing, and appointing the 11th of October 1774 as the day of balloting for the lots as surveyed, was ordered advertised in the papers. On the 4th of October notice to John Harris Cruger to attend the balloting as one of the Council of the Province was served. On the 11th of October the Commissioners and Cruger met in New York at Hull's Hotel, in Broadway, on the site of which now stands the "Boreel Building," and the drawing took place. The Survey and Map, a reduced copy of the latter of which is annexed, divided all the unsold lands then, in 1774, remaining in the possession of Colonel Heathcote's heirs, into three divisions, the North, the Middle, and the South Divisions, designated by the number of the respective lots in each. The balloting was thus effected, a boy blindfolded, one John Wallis by name, was appointed to draw the numbers of the lots, and the names of the parties to whom they fell. He drew the lots in the different divisions seriatim, beginning at the north division, taking out first a ticket with the number of the lot, and then one with the name of an owner. The latter tickets bore either the name of "Anne de Lancey," or the words "The Heirs of Lewis Johnston." After the whole was completed the proceedings were duly certified to in triplicate, by the Commissioners, and each copy duly approved by the signature of John Harris Cruger, as the Councillor of the Province, present.

The Map gives the perimeter of the whole Manor, and those of some of its interior parts, besides the unsold portions included in the partition, necessary to a right understanding of the latter. The portions left blank are those parts of the Manor which had previously been sold by the Proprietors. It also shows the "Great Lotts" or the "Long Lotts" being those in the northern part of the township Tract which Colonel Heathcote and the other owners had so laid out in 1706, in the former's lifetime, and also the short lots at their southern end, all of which took up the whole of that tract northward and beyond the home lots, to the township line. The latter are not shown. Colonel Heathcote had in 1708, and in 1716 long after his Manor-Grant, and at other later times, bought several parts and parcels of the original home lots as Richbell had laid them out, which in the course of time had been divided up by their owners. All these were either owned separately in 1774, by his heirs, or had been previously disposed of by them, the two extremely small ones fronting on the Westchester path or Boston road being all that were in joint ownership at the date of the partition. The accompanying map being on so small a scale gives only a very general idea of the Manor, without showing the details on the original maps, which are all very large.

From the respective owners who received their particular lots under this final partition of the Manor

[1] The author of the "History of New York during the Revolutionary War."

Lands of Scarsdale in fee, have those lands passed to the great number of parties now owning and occupying them, with, of course, all the rights and privileges of all lands granted by the Crown of England prior to the 14th of October 1775, and guaranteed and confirmed by all the successive constitutions of New York, both as an Independent Sovereignty, and as one of the United States.

The Topography of the Manor of Scarsdale is peculiar, the Bronx and the Hutchinson rivers flow southwesterly from its northwestern part, the Mamaroneck river with its main affluent the Sheldrake, and its uppermost branches flows southeasterly into the Sound. It is well watered, hilly, and has singularly enough among the hills two or three extensive flat fertile plains. The valleys between the hills are beautiful and some of them very deep. The country is well wooded and the "Saxton Forest," formerly 300 acres, though much reduced in size, is still one of the largest single forests in the county. The drives are exceedingly fine, abounding with great and varied beauty. The soil is fertile and yields abundantly.

In closing this chapter the writer regrets that space will not permit specific local details of the other Manors in the county, as was the original intention, but having assented to the editor's request to permit a portion of the pages allotted him to be employed by others, it cannot be done.

The manor grants for them are therefore only given.

MANOR GRANT OF PELHAM.

THOMAS DONGAN, Captain General and Governor-in-chief in and over the province of New Yorke, and the territories depending thereon in America, under his most sacred Majesty, James the Second, by the grace of God Kinge of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c.,—to all to whom these presents shall come, sendeth greeting: Whereas, Richard Nicolls, Esq., late governor of this province, by his certaine deed in writing, under his hand and seale, bearing date the sixth day of October, in the eighteenth year of the reigne of our late sovereigne lord, Charles the Second, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Kinge, defender of the faith, &c., and in the yeare of our Lord God one thousand six hundred sixty and six —did give, grant, confirme and rattefye, by virtue of the commission and authoritye unto him given by his (then) royal highness, James, Duke of Yorke, &c., (his now Majesty,) upon whome, by lawful grant and pattent from his (then) Majesty, the propriety and government of that part of the maine land, as well of Long Island and all the islands adjacent. Amongst other things was settled unto Thomas Pell, of Onkway, alias Fairfield, in his Majestye's colony of Connecticut—gentleman—all that certaine tract of land upon the maine lying and being to the eastward of Westchester bounds, bounded to the Westward with a river called by the Indians Aquaconounck, commonly known to the English by the name of Hutchinson's River, which runneth into the bay lyeing betweene Throgmorton's Neck and Anne Hooke's Neck, comonly caled Hutchingson's Bay, bounded on the east by a brooke called Cedar Tree Brooke, or Gravelly Brooke; on the south by the Sound, which lyeth betweene Longe Island and the maine land, with all the islands in the Sound not before that time granted or disspossed of, lyeing before that tract of land so bounded as is before expresst; and northward to runne into the woods about eight English miles, the breadth to be the same as it is along by the Sound, together with all the lands, islands, soyles, woods, meadows, pastures, marshes, lakes, waters, creeks, fishing, hawking, hunting and fowling, and all other proffitts, commodityes and heridetaments to the said tract of land and islands belonging, with their and every of their appurtenances, and every part and parcel thereof; and that the said tract of land and premises should be forever thereafter held, deemed, reputed, taken and be an intire infranchised towneshipp, manner and place of itself, and should always, from time to time, and at all times thereafter, have, hold and enjoy like and equall priviledges and immunities with any towne infranchised, place or manner within this government, &c., shall in no manner of way be subordinate or belonging unto, have any dependance upon or in any wise, bounds or the rules under the direction of any riding, or towne or townesshipps, place or jurisdiction either upon the maine or upon Longe Island—but should in all cases, things and matters be deemed, reputed, taken and held as an absolute, intire, infranchised towneshipp, manner and place of itselfe in this government, and should be ruled, ordered and directed in all matters as to government, accordingly, by the governour and Councell, and General Court of Assizes—only provided, always, that the inhabbitants in the said tract of land granted as aforesaid, should be oblidged to send fforwards to the next townes all publick pachquetts and letters, or hew and cryes coming to New Yorke or goeing from thence to any other of his Majestie's collonys; to have and to hold the said tract of land and islands, with all and singular the appurtenances and premises, togaither with the privilidges, imuneties, franchises, and advantages therein given and granted unto the said Thomas Pell, to the proper use and behoofe of the said Thomas Pell, his heirs and assigns for ever, ffully, ffreely and clearely, in as large and ample manner and forme, and with such full and absolute imunityes and priveledges as before is expresst, as if he had held the same immediately ffrom his Majesty the Kinge of England, &c., and his suckcessors, as of the manner of East Greenwich, in the county of Kent, in free and common sockage and by fealtey, only yealdeing, rendering and payeing yearely and every yeare unto his then royall highness, the Duke of Yorke and his heires, or to such governour or governours as from time to time should by him be constituted and appoynted as an acknowledgement, one lambe on the first day of May, if the same shall be demanded as by the said deede in writeing, and the entrey thereof in the bookes of records in the secretarie's office for the province aforesaid, may more fully and at large appeare. And whereas, John Pell, gentleman, nephew of the said Thomas Pell, to whom the lands, islands and premises, with appurtenances, now by the last will and testament of him, the said Thomas Pell, given and bequeathed, now is in the actual, peaceable and quiett seazeing and possession of all and singular the premises, and hath made his humble request to mee, the said Thomas Dongan, that I would, in the behalf of his sacred Majesty, his heirs and suckcessors, give and grant unto him, the said John Pell, a more full and firme grant and confirmation of the above lands and premises, with the appurtenances, under the seale of this his Majestie's province: Now Know Yee, that I, the said Thomas Dongan, by virtue of the commission and authority unto me given by his said Majesty and power in me being and residing, in consideration of the quitt rent hereinafter reserved, and for divers other good and lawfull considerations me thereunto mouving, I have given, rattefied and confirme and by these presents do hereby grant, rattefie and confirme unto the said John Pell, his heirs and assigns for ever, all the before mentioned and rented lands, islands and premises, with the heridatements and appurtenances, priveledges, imuneties, ffranchises and advantages to the same belonging and appertaining, or in the said before mentioned deede in writing expresst, implyed or intended to be given and granted, and every part and parcell thereof, together with all that singular messuages, tenements, barnes, stables, orchards, gardens, lands, islands, meadows, inclosures, arable lands, pastures, feedeings, commons, woods, underwoods, soyles, quarreys, mines, minnerally, (royall mines only excepted,) waters, rivers, ponds, lakes, hunteing, haucking, ffishing, ffowleing, as alsoe all rents, services, wasts, strayes, royaltyes, liberties, priviledges, jurisdictions, rights, members and appurtenances, and all other imunityes, royaltyes, power of franchises, profitts, commodeties and heredatements whatsoever to the premises, or any part or parcell thereof belonging or appertaining: and further, by vertue of the power and authority in mee being and residing, I doe hereby grant, rattefie and confirme, and the tract of land, island and premises aforesaid are, by these presents, erected and constituted to be one lordship and manner—and the same shall henceforth be called the lordshipp and manner of Pelham; and I doe hereby give and grant unto the said John Pell, his heirs and assigns ffull power and authority at all times hereafter, in the said lordshipp and manner of Pelham aforesaid, one court leete and one court barron, to hold and keepe at such times so often yearly as he and they shall see meete, and all sines, issues and amerciaments at the said court leete and court barron, to be holden and kept in the manner and lordship aforesaid, that are payable from time to time, shall happen to be due and payable by and from any the inhabitants of or within the said lordshipp and manner of Pelham abovesaid; and also all and every the powers and authorities herein before mentioned, for the holding and keepeing of the said court leete and court barron, ffrom time to time, and to award and issue forth the costomary writts to be issued and awarded out of the said court leete and court barron, and the same to beare test and to be issued out in the name of the said John Pell, his heirs and assignes, and the same court leete and court barron to be kept by the said John Pell, his heirs and assignes, or his or their steward, deputed or appoynted; and I doe further hereby give and grant unto the said John Pell, his heirs and assignes, full power to distraine for all rents and other sums of money payable by reason of the premises, and all other lawful remedys and meanes for the haveing, receiving, levying and enjoying the said premises and every part thereof, and all waifts, strayes, wrecks of the sease, deodands and goods of ffellons, happening and being within the said manner of Pelham, with the advowson and right of patronage of all and every of the church and churches in the said manner, erected and to be erected—to have and to hold all and singular the said tract of land, islands and manner of Pelham, and all and singular the above granted or mentioned to be granted premisses, with their rights, members, jurisdictions, privileidges, heredaments and appurtenances, to the said John Pell, his heirs and assignes, to the only proper use, benefitt and behoofe of the said John Pell, his heirs and assignes forever; to be holden of his most sacred Majestye, his heirs and successors, in free and common soccage, according to the tenure of East Greenwich, in the county of Kent, in his Majestye's kingdom of England, yielding, rendering and praying therefore yearly and every year forever, unto his said Majestye, his heirs and successors, or to such officer or officers as shall from time to time be appointed to receive the same—twenty shillings, good and lawful money of this province at the citty of New Yorke, on the five and twentyth day of the month of March, in lieu and stead of all rents, services and demands whatsoever.

In testimony whereof, I have signed these presents with my handwriting, caused the seale of the province to be thereunto affixed, and have ordained that the same be entered upon record in the Secretary's office, the five and twentyeth day of October, in the third yeare of the Kinge Majestye's reigne, and in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred eighty and seven.[1]

THOMAS DONGAN.

MANOR-GRANT OF MORRISANIA.

William the Third, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the [1] Alb. Book of Pat. No. ii. 306., Co. Rec. Lib. A., 240.

Faith, &c., to all to whom these presents shall come, sendeth greeting: Whereas, the Hon'ble Edmond Andross, Esq., Seigneur of Sausmarez, late governor of our province of New York, &c., by a certain deed or patent, sealed with the seal of our said province of New York, bearing date the 25th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1676, pursuant to the commission and authority then in him residing, did confirm unto Col. Lewis Morris, of the Island of Barbadoes, a certain plantation or tract of land laying or being upon the maine over against the town of Haerlem, commonly called Bronckse's land, containing 250 margin or 800 acres of land, besides the meadow thereunto annexed or adjoining, butted and bounded as in the original Dutch ground brief and patent of confirmation is set forth; which said tract of land and meadow, having been by the said Col. Lewis Morris long possessed and enjoyed, and having likewise thereon made good improvement, he, the said Edmond Andross, late governor of our said province, did further, by the said deed or patent, sealed with the seal of our said province, and bearing date as aforesaid, we grant and confirm unto the said Col. Lewis Morris, for his further improvement, a certain quantity of land adjacent unto the said tract of land—which land, with the addition, being bounded from his own house over against Haerlem, running up Haerlem River to Daniel Turner's land, and so along this said land northward to John Archer's line, and from thence stretching east to the land of John Richardson and Thomas Hunt, and thence along their lands southward to the Sound, even so along the Sound about southwest through Bronck's hill to the said Col. Lewis Morris' house—the additional land containing (according to the survey thereof) the quantity of fourteen hundred and twenty acres, to have and to hold the afore-recited tract of land before possessed by him, and the additional land within the limits and bounds aforesaid, together with the woods and meadows, both salt and fresh waters and creeks, belonging to the said lands, unto the said Col. Lewis Morris, his heirs and assignees forever, under the yearly rent of four bushels of good winter wheat, as by the said deed or patent, registered in our secretary's office of our said province of New York, &c.,—relation being thereunto had—may more fully and at large appear. And whereas, our loving subject, Lewis Morris, (nephew unto the said Col. Morris, lately deceased, his sole and only heir,) who is now, by right of descent and inheritance, peaceably and quietly seized and possessed of all the aforesaid tracts of land and premises within the limits and bounds aforesaid, hath, by his petition, presented unto our trusty and well beloved Benj. Fletcher, our Captain General and Governor-in-chief of our said province of New York and territories dependent thereon in America, &c., prayed our grant and confirmation of all the afore-recited tracts and parcels of land and premises within the limits and bounds aforesaid; and likewise that we would be graciously pleased to erect the said tracts and parcels of land, within the limits and bounds aforesaid, into a lordship or manor, by the name or title of the manor or lordship of Morrisania, in the county of Westchester; and whereas, it is publicly manifest that the said Col. Lewis Morris, deceased, in his lifetime, and our said loving subject, his nephew and sole and only heir since his decease, have been at great charge and expense in the purchasing, settling and improving of the said tracts and parcels of land, whereon considerable buildings have likewise been made; and our said loving subject, being willing still to make further improvements thereon—which reasonable request, for his further encouragement, we being willing to grant; and know yee, that we, of our special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, we have given, granted, ratified and confirmed, and by these presents do for us, our heirs and successors give, grant, ratify and confirm unto the said Lewis Morris, his heirs and assignees, all the aforesaid tracts and parcels of land within the limits and bounds aforesaid, containing the quantity of one thousand, nine hundred and twenty acres of land, more or less, together with all and every the messuages, tenements, buildings, houses, out houses, barns, barracks, stables, mills, mill dams, mill howles, orchards, gardens, fences, pastures, fields, feedings, woods, underwoods, trees, timber, meadows, (fresh and salt) marshes, swamps and pools, ponds, waters, water courses, brooks, rivulets, baths, inlets, outlets, islands, necks of land and meadow, peninsulas of land and meadow, ferries, passages, fishing, fowling, hunting and hawking, quarries, mines, minerals, (silver and gold mines excepted,) and all the rights, liberties, privileges, jurisdictions, royalties, hereditaments, benefits, profits, advantages and appurtenances whatsoever to the afore-recited tracts, parcels and necks of land, and mill, within the limits and bounds aforesaid belonging, adjoining, or in any way appertaining, or accepted, reputed, taken, known or occupied, as part, parcel or member thereof, to have or to hold all the aforesaid recited tracts and parcels of land within the limits and bounds aforesaid, containing the quantity of one thousand nine hundred and twenty acres of land, more or less, together with all and every the messuages, tenements, buildings, houses, out houses, barns, barracks, stables, mills, mill dams, mill houses, orchards, gardens, fences, pastures, fields, feedings, woods, underwoods, trees, timber, meadows, fresh and salt, marshes, swamps, pools, ponds, waters, water courses, brooks, rivers, rivulets, streams, creeks, coves, harbors, bridges, baths, strands, inlets, outlets, islands, necks of land and meadow, peninsulas, land and meadow, ferries, passages, fishing, fowling, hunting and hawking, quarries, mines and minerals, (silver and gold mines excepted,) and all the rights liberties, privileges, jurisdictions, royalties, hereditaments, tolls, and benefits, profits, advantages, and appurtenances whatsoever, to the afore recited tracts, parcels and necks of land and mill within the limits and bounds aforesaid belonging, adjoining, or in any appertaining or accepted, reputed, taken, known unto him, the said Lewis Morris, his heirs and assinees, to the sole and only proper use benefit and behoof of him the said Lewis Morris, his heirs and assinees forever, and moreover, that if our further special grace, certain knowledge, and mear motion, we have brought it according to the reasonable request of our said loving subject to erect all the the aforerecited tracts and parcels of land and premises within limits and bounds aforesaid into a lordship and manor, and therefore, by these presents, we do, for us, our heirs and successors, erect, make and constitute all the afore-recited tracts and parcels of land within the limits and bounds aforementioned, together with all and every the above granted premises, with all and every of their appurtenances, unto one lordship or manor, to all intents and purposes, and 'tis our royal will and pleasure, that the said lordship and manor shall from henceforth be called the lordship or manor of Morrisania; and know yee, that we reposing especial trust and confidence in the loyalty, wisdom, justice, prudence, and circumspection of our said loving subjects, do, for us, our heirs and successors, give and grant unto the said Lewis Morris and to the heirs and assignees of him the said Lewis Morris, full power and authority at all times forever hereafter, in the said lordship or manor, one court leet, and one court-barron, to hold and keep at such time and times, and so often yearly as he or they shall see meet, and all fines, issues and amerciaments, at the said court-leet and court barron, to be holden within the said lordship or manor, to be set, forfeited or employed, or payable or happening at any time to be payable by any of the inhabitants of or in the said lordship or manor of Morrisania, or the limits and bounds whereof, and also all and every of the power and authority therein-before mentioned, for the holding and keeping the said court-leet and court barron from time to time, and to award and issue out the said accustomary writs, to be issued and awarded out of the said court-leet and court barron, to be kept by the heirs and assinees of the said Lewis Morris, forever, or their or any of their stewards deputed and appointed with full and ample power and authority to distraine for the rents, serveses, and other sums of money, payable by virtue of the premises and all other lawful remedies and means, for the having, possessing, recovering, levying and enjoying the premises, and every part and parcel of the same, and all waifes, estrages, meeks, deadodans, goods or felons, happening and being forfeited within the said lordship or manor of Morrissania, and all and every sum and sums of money to be paid as a post fine, upon any fine or fines to be levied, of any bounds, tenements or hereditaments within the said lordship or manor of Morrissania, together with the advowson and right of patronage, and all and every the church and churches erected or established, or thereafter to be erected or established within the said manor of Morrissania, and we do also give and grant unto the said Lewis Morris, his heirs and assinees, that all and each of the tenants of him the said Lewis Morris, within the said manor, may at all times hereafter, meet together and choose assesors, within the manor aforesaid, according to such rules, ways and methods, as are prescribed for cities, towns and counties within our province aforesaid, by the acts of general assembly for the defraying the public charge of each respective city, town and county aforesaid, and all such sums of money assesed or levied, to dispose of and collect for such uses as the acts of the general assembly shall establish and appoint, to have and to hold, possess, and enjoy, all and singular the said lordship or manor of Morrissania and premises, with all their and every of their appurtenances, unto the said Lewis Morris, his heirs and assinees forever, to be holden of us, our heirs and successors, in free and common socage, according to the tenure of our manor of East Greenwich, in our county of Kent, within our realm of England, yielding, rendering and paying therefor, yearly and every year, on the feast day of the Annunciation of our blessed virgin, unto us, our heirs and successors, at our city of New York, the annual rent of six shillings, in lieu and stead of all former rents, dues, services and demands whatsoever, for the said lordship and manor of Morrissania, and premises: in testimony whereof, we have caused the great seal of the said province to be affixed. Witnesse our trusty and well beloved Benjamin Fletcher, our capt. gen. and gov. in-chief of our province of New York, and the territories and tracts of land depending thereon, in America, and vice-admiral of the same, our lieutenant commander-in-chief of the militia and of all the forces by sea and land within our colony of Connecticut, and of all the forts and places of strength within the same, in council at our fort in New York, the 8th day of May, in the ninth year of our reign, Anno Domini, 1697.[1]

By command of his excellencey.

BEN. FLETCHER.

David Jamieson, Sec'y.

MANOR-GRANT OF FORDHAM.

Francis Lovelace, Esq., one of the gentlemen of his Majestie's Hon'ble Privy Chamber, and Governor-General under his Royal Highness, James, Duke of York and Albany, and of all his territories in America, to all to whom these presents shall come, sendeth greeting: Whereas, there is a certain parcel or tract of land within this government, upon the main continent, situate, lying and being to the eastward of Harlem River, near unto ye passage commonly called Spiting Devil, upon which land ye new dorp or village is erected known by the name of Fordham—ye utmost limits of the whole tract or parcel of land beginning at the high wood land that lyes due northwest over against the first point of the main land to the east of the island Pepiriniman—there where the hill Moskuta is—and soe goes alongst the said kill, the said land striking from the high wood land before mentioned east southeast, till it comes to Bronk's, his kill; soe westward up alongst ye main land to the place where Harlem Kill and Hudson River meet, and then forth alongst Harlem Kill to the first spring or fountain, keeping to the south of Crabb Island; soe eastward alongst Daniel Turner's land, the high wood land, and ye land belonging to Thomas Hunt; and then to Bronk's Kill afore mentioned, according to a survey lately made thereof by the surveyor-general—the which remains upon record; all which said parcel or tract of land before described being part of the land granted in the grand patent to Hugh O'Neal, and Mary his wife, purchase was made thereof, by John Archer, from Elyas Doughty, who was invested in their interest as of the Indian proprietor, by my approbation, who all acknowledge to have received satisfaction for the same: and the said John Archer having, at his own charge, and with good success, begun a township in a convenient place for the relief of strangers, it being the road for passengers to go to and fro from the main, as well as for mutual intercourse with the neighboring colony, for all encouragement unto him, the said John Archer, in prosecution of the said design, as also for divers other good causes and considerations: know yee, that by virtue of ye commission and authority unto me given by his royal highness, upon whom, by lawful grant and patent from his majestie, the propriety and government of that part of the main land, as well as Long Island, and all the islands adjacent, amongst other things, is settled, I have given, granted, ratified and confirmed, and by these presents do give, grant, ratify and confirm to ye afore mentioned John Archer, his heirs and assignees, all the said parcel or tract of land butted and bounded as aforesaid, together with all the lands, soyles, woods, meadows, pastures, marshes, lakes, waters, creeks, fishing, hawking, hunting and fowling, and all ye profits, commodityes, emmoluments and hereditaments to the said parcel or tract of land or premises belonging or in any wise appertaining, and of every part and parcel thereof; and I doe likewise grant unto ye said John Archer, his heirs and assignees, that the house which he shall erect, together with ye said parcel or tract of land and premises, shall be forever hereafter held, claimed, reputed, and be an entire and enfranchised township, manor and place of itself, and shall always, from time to time, and at all times hereafter, have, hold and enjoy like and equal privileges and immunities with any town enfranchised or manor within this government, and shall, in no manner of way, be subordinate or belonging unto, have any dependence upon, or in any wise be under the rule, order or direction of any riding, township, place or jurisdiction either upon the main or Long Island, but shall, in all cases, things and matters, be deemed, reputed, taken and held as an absolute, entire, enfranchised township, manor and place of itself in this government, as aforesaid, and shall be ruled, ordered and directed, in all matters as to government, by ye governor and his council, and ye general court of assizes, only always provided that the inhabitants of the said town, or any part of the land granted as aforesaid, shall be obliged to send forward to ye next town or plantation all public pacquetts and letters, or hue and cryes, comming to this place or going from it towards or to any of his majestie's colonies; and I do further grant unto the said John Archer, his heirs and assignees, that when there shall be a sufficient number of inhabitants in the town of Fordham aforementioned, and the other parts of ye manor capable of maintaining a minister, and to carry on other public affairs; that then the neighboring inhabitants between the two kills of Harlem and Bronk's be obliged to contribute towards the maintenance of their said minister and other necessary public charges that may happen to arise, and likewise that they belong to the said town, according to the direction of the law, although their said farms and habitations be not included within this patent, to have and to hold ye said parcel and tracts of land, with all and singular the appurtenances and premises, together with the privileges, immunities, franchises and advantages herein given and granted unto the said John Archer, his heirs and assignees, unto the proper use and behoof of him, the said John Archer, his heirs and assignees forever, fully, truly and clearly, in as large and ample manner, and from and with such full and absolute immunities and privileges as is before expressed, as if he held the same immediately from his majesty, the King of England, and his successors, as of the manor of East Greenwich, in the county of Kent, in free and common soccage and by fealty, only yealding, rendering and paying yearly and every year unto his royal highness, the Duke of York and his successors, or to such governor and governors as from time to time shall by him be constituted and appointed, as all acknowledgment and quit rent, twenty bushels of good peas, upon the first day of March, when it shall be demanded. Given under my hand, and sealed with the seal of the province at Fort James, in New York, on the island of Manhattan, this thirteenth day of November, in the twenty-third year of the reign of our sovereign lord, Charles the Seccond, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, and Anno Domini, 1671.

[1] Lib. vii. of Patents, Albany.

FRANCIS LOVELACE.

MANOR-GRANT OF PHILIPSEBOROUGH.

William and Mary, by the grace of God, &c., king and queen of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, defenders of the faith, &c., to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting: whereas, the Honorable Richard Nicolls, Esq., late governor of our Province of New York, &c., by a certain deed or patent, sealed with the seal of our said Province, bearing date the 8th day of Oct., in the year of our Lord, 1666, pursuant to the authority in him residing, did give and grant unto Hugh O'Neale and Mary his wife, their heirs and assigns, all that tract of land upon the main, bounded to the north by a rivulet called by the Indians, Meccackassin, so running southward to Nepperhan, from thence to the kill Shorackkapock and to Paparinnomo, which is the southermost bounds, then to go across the country, eastward by that which is commonly known by the name of Bronx's river, together with all the woods, marshes, meadows, pastures, waters, lakes, creeks, rivulets, fishing, hunting and fowling, and all other profits, commodities and emoluments to said tract of land belonging, with their and every of their appurtenance, to have and to hold unto the said Hugh O'Neale and Mary his wife, their heirs and assigns forever, as by the said deed or patent, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear, and whereas, the said Hugh O'Neal and Mary his wife, by their certain deed or writ, dated 30th day of Oct., in the said year of our Lord, 1666, did sell, alien, assign and set over all and singular their right and title and interest of in and to the aforenamed tract of land and premises, unto Elias Doughty of Flushing, in the Co. of York, on Long Island, unto the said Elias Doughty, his heirs and assigns forever, as by the said deed or writing, relation being thereunto had, as may more fully and at large appear, and whereas, the said Elias Doughty by his certain deed or writing, bearing date 29 day of Nov., in the year of our Lord, 1672, for the consideration therein expressed and mentioned, did assign and set over, all and singular his right and title and interest, of, in and to the aforementioned tract of land and premises unto Thomas Deleval, Esq., Frederick Philips and Thomas Lewis, mariner, to hold to them, their heirs and assigns forever, as by the said deed or writing relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear; and whereas, the said Thomas Deleval, in and by a certain codicil annexed unto his last will and testament in writing, bearing date the 10 day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1682, amongst other things did devise unto John Deleval his only son, all that his interest in the aforementioned land and premises, his one full, equal and certain third thereof, as by the said codicil in writing, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear; and, whereas, the Hon. Col. Thomas Dongan, late gov. of our said province &c., and as by a certain deed or patent, sealed with the seal of our said province, &c., and bearing date the 19th of Feb., in the year of our Lord, 1684-5, pursuant to the authority in him then residing, for the consideration therein expressed, did further grant, ratify and confirm, unto the said Thomas Deleval, Frederick Philips, Geertje Lewis, relict of the said Thomas Lewis, due their heirs and assigns, all the aforesaid tract and parcel of land beginning at a small rivulet known and called by the Indians, Makakassin, from thence into the woods due east by a great rock stone and a lyne of marked trees, to Bronx's river, and thence by said river, four miles and something more, to a marked white oak tree upon the middle of a great ledge of rocks, which is the north-east corner of the land of Francis French & Co., in the mile square formerly sold out of the aforesaid patent, then by the said land, west, 35 deg. northerly, 1 mile or 80 chains from thence east 35 deg. southerly to Bronx's river to a marked tree, which is the south-east corner of the mile square, excepted out of the said patent, from thence by Bronx's, his river, 89 chains to a marked tree, which is the north-east corner of Wm. Betts and George Tippets, and then by a certain lyne of marked trees due west 30 chains to the marked tree or south-east corner of the purchase of John Heddy, then due N. 34 chains, from thence due west by their purchase, 90 chains to the north-west corner of the 300 acres, then due south 16 chains to the north-west corner of the 20 acres purchased of John Heddy, thence and by the said land west 12 chains to the north-west corner, then by the side of the kill, south 18 chains to the land of Wm. Betts and George Tippetts, from thence by a lyne of marked trees due west 79 chains, to a white oak tree standing on the bank of Hudson's river, to the south of Dog-wood brook 16 chains and ½ and then northerly by the Hudson's river to Nepperha, which is near the Yonkers mills, and so continue by Hudson's river to the first mentioned small rivulet, Maccakassin, the whole being bounded to the north with a lyne of marked trees and a great rock stone, to the east by Bronx's river and the land of Francis French and Co., to the south by the land of Wm. Betts, George Tippets and Thomas Heddy, to the west by Hudson's river, containing in all, 7,708 acres, together with all and singular the messuages, tenements, buildings, barns, stables, orchards, gardens, pastures, meadows, mills, mill-dams, runs, streams, ponds, rivers, brooks, woods, under-woods, trees, timber, fencing, fishing, fowling, hunting, hawking, liberties, privileges, hereditaments and improvements whatsoever, belonging or in any way appertaining, to have and to hold all the aforementioned tract and parcel of land, with all and singular the aforementioned premises, unto the said John Deleval, Frederick Philips, Geertje Lewis, their heirs and assigns forever, as by the said deed or patent registered in our secretary's office of our province of New York aforesaid, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear; and, whereas the said Thomas Deleval, by a certain deed of indenture, sealed with the seal, and bearing date the 27th day of August, in the year of our Lord, 1685, did, for the consideration therein mentioned, grant, bargain and sell, all that one full third part of all and singular the said tract of land, afore recited, described and bounded within the limits aforesaid unto him the said Frederick Philips one of the parties aforesaid, together with all that one full and equal third part of all and singular the houses, out-houses, barns, stables, mills, mill-dams, buildings, fences and edifices thereon erected and built, and likewise one full third part of all and singular the waters, water-courses, streams, woods, underwoods, fishing, fowling, hawking, hunting, hereditaments and appurtenances to the same belonging, or in any way appertaining, to have and to hold unto the said Frederick Philipse, his heirs and assigns forever, as by the said deed or indenture, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear; and whereas, the said Geertje Lewis, executrix of the last will and testament of Thomas Lewis, late of New York, mariner, her late husband, deceased, and Lodivick Lewis, Barrent Lewis, Leonard Lewis, Katharine Lewis and Thomas Lewis the children and co-heirs of said Thomas Lewis and Geertje his wife, by a certain deed of indenture, sealed with the seal bearing date the 12 day of June, in the year of our Lord 1686, did, for the consideration therein mentioned, grant, bargain and sell, all that the full one-third part of all and singular the said tract of land afore-recited, described and bounded with the limits aforesaid, unto him, the said Frederick Philips, one of the parties aforesaid, together with all that one full and equal third part of all and singular the houses, out-houses, barns, stables, mills, mill-dams, buildings, fences and edifices thereon erected and built, and likewise one full third part of all and singular the water, water-courses, streams, woods, underwoods, fishing, fowling, hunting, hawking, hereditaments and appurtenances to the same belonging or in any wise appertaining, to have and to hold unto the said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assigns forever, as by the said deed or indenture, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear, and whereas, the Hon. Sir Edmund Andross, late governor of our said province of New York, &c., by a certain writing or patent, sealed with the seal of our said province, bearing date the first day of April, in the year of our Lord, 1680, pursuant to the authority in him then residing, did give and grant unto the said Frederick Philips, a certain tract or parcel of land, beginning at a creek or river called by the Indians, Pocanteco or Wackandeco, with power thereon to set a mill or mills, with a due portion of land on each side, adjoining unto the said river, lying within the bounds of the Indians land at Wickers creek, on the east side of the Hudson river, which said Indian land was by the said Frederick Philips purchased from the said native Indian proprietors thereof, by the licence and approbation of the said Sir Edmund Andross and the said Indian proprietors did, in the presence of Sir Edmund Andross aforesaid, acknowledge to have received full satisfaction of him the said Frederick Philips for the said land adjoining, to each syde of the creek or river aforesaid, which said land is situate, lying and being on each side of the said creek or river, north and south 1600 treads or steps which at 12 ft to the rod, makes 400 rod and runs up into the country so far as the said creek or river goeth, with this proviso or restriction that if the creek or river called by the Indians, Nippiorha, and by the charters Yonkers creek or kill shall come within the space of land of 400 rods on the south side of the aforenamed creek or river, that shall extend no farther than the said creek or river of Nippiroha, but the rest to be so far up into the country on each side of the said creek or river called Pocanteco as it runs, being about north-east, to have and to hold all the aforesaid recited tract or parcel of land unto him the said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assigns forever, as by the said grant or patent registered in our secretary's office of our province of New York, &c., aforesaid, relation being thereunto had may more fully and at large appear, and whereas the Honorable Thomas Dongan late gov. of our province of New York, &c., aforesaid, by virtue of the power in him then residing hath, by another grant or patent sealed with the seal of our said province of New York, and registered in our secretary's office of our province aforesaid, bearing date 23d of September, in the year of our Lord 1684, given, granted, ratified, and confirmed, unto said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assigns, several tracts and parcels of land with the limits and bounds hereafter mentioned, that were according to the usage, custom, and laws of our said province purchased by the said Frederick Philips from the native Indians and proprietors, in manner and form following, (that is to say,) all those certain parcels and pieces of land lying about the Wigquaskeek that was on the 24th day of October, in the year of our Lord, 1680, purchased by the said Frederick Philips of the Indian Goharius, brother of Weskora, sachem of Wigquaskeek, for himself and by the full order of Goharius, which certain parcel or parcels of land are lying about Wigquaskeek to the north syde and tending from the land of the aforesaid Frederick Philips running along the North river to the north of the small creek called by the Indians Sepackena creek, as far as it goeth into the woods, and coming to the end of the aforesaid creek, then shall the aforesaid pieces or parcels of land have their line north-east, or if the creek Pocanteco Wackandeco upon which at present[1] stands the mills of the said Frederick Philips, shall run upon a north-east lyne, then the said land shall run along the said creek Pocanteco, or Weghkandeco, into the woods as the said creek or kill shall go, and there shall be the end or utmost bounds of the said certain pieces of land, as by the said writing or Indian deed, relation being thereunto had may more fully and at large appear, as likewise another tract or parcel of land on the east side of Hudson's river that was by said Frederick Philips purchased of the Indians Goharius, Cobus, and Togquanduck, on the 23d day of April, in the year of our Lord, 1681, which tract or parcel of land being situate on the east side of the North or Hudson's river, beginning at the south side of a creek called Bissigktick, and so ranging along the said river northerly to the aforesaid land of the aforesaid Frederick Philips, and then alongst the said land north-east and by east until it comes to and meets with the creek called Nippiorha, if the said creek shall fall within that lyne, otherwise to extend no further than the head of the creek or kill called Potanteco, or Puegkanteko, and southerly alongst the said river Neppiorha if the same shall fall within the said line as aforesaid, or else in a direct lyne from the head of the said creek or kill called Pocanteco Puegkandico, untill it comes opposite to the said first mentioned creek called Bissightick, and from thence westwardly to the head of the said creek and alongst the same to the North or Hudson's river, being the first station, as by the said writing or deed, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear, as also another certain tract or parcel of land on the east syde of the said Hudson's river that was by the said Frederick Philips purchased of the native Indians Armaghqueer, Seapham alias Thapham, on the 8th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1682, which certain tract or parcel of land is situate, lying, and being on the east side of the North or Hudson's river to the south of the land formerly bought by the said Frederick Philips, of the said Indians, beginning at the south side of a creek called Bissightick, and so ranging along the said river southerly to a creek or fall called by the Indians Weghquegsik, and by the Christians Lawrences's plantation, and from the mouth of the said creek or fall upon a due east course to a creek called by the Indians Nippiorha, and by the Christians the Yonkers kill, and from thence alongst the west side of the said creek or kill as the same runs to the before mentioned land, formerly bought by the said Frederick Philips of the sayd Indians, and so along that land to the first station, as by the said writing or Indian deed, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear, as also another tract or parcel of land on the east side of Hudson's river that was by the said Frederick Philips purchased of the native Indians Warramanhack, Esparamogh, Anhock, &c., on the 6th day of September, in the year of our Lord, 1682, which certain tract or parcel of land is situated, lying, and being on the west side of the North or Hudson's river, beginning at the north side of the land belonging to the Yonkers kill, Nipperha, at a great rock called by the Indians Meghkeckassin, or the great stone, (as called by the Christians,) from thence ranging into the woods eastwardly to a creek called by the Indians Nipperha aforesaid, and from thence along said creek northerly till you come to the eastward of the head of a creek called by the Indians Wegquiskeek, being the utmost bounds of the said Frederick Philips's land, formerly bought of the Indians, and from thence westwardly along the said creek Wegqueskeek to Hudson's river aforesaid, as by the said Indian deed, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear, and also another tract or parcel of land that was by the said Frederick Philips purchased of the native Indians Sapham, Ghoharius, Kakingsigo, on the 7th day of May, in the year of our Lord, 1684, which tract or parcel of land is situate, lying, and being to the eastward of the land of the said Frederick Philips between the creek called Nippiorha, or the Yonkers kill, and Bronk's river, beginning on the south side at the northerly bounds of the Yonkers land, and from thence along the aforesaid creek, Nippiorha, however it runs, till you come to the most northerly bounds of the said Frederick Philips's lands, and from thence north-east into the woods unto Bronk's river, as it runs southerly to the eastward of the Yonkers land aforesaid, and from thence with a westerly lyne to the aforenamed Yonkers kill, or Nippiorha, as by the said Indian deed, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear, all which several tracts and parcels of land within the several respective limits and bounds aforementioned, and purchased by the said Frederick Philips of all and every the respective native Indians aforesaid, in manner aforesaid, were by the said Thomas Dongan, late gov. of our province under the seal of our said province, bearing date as aforesaid, given, granted, ratified, and confirmed unto him, said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assigns, together with all and singular the houses, buildings, messuages, tenements, and hereditaments, mills, mill-dams, rivers, runns, streams, ponds, with liberty to erect other mills or dams, or places convenient, woods, underwoods, quarries, fishing, hawking, hunting, and fowling, with all liberties, priviledges, and improvements whatsoever to the said land and premises belonging or in anywise appertaining, to have and to hold all the aforesaid tract and tracts, parcel and parcels of land and premises with their and every of their appurtenances unto said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assignees forever, as by the said grant or patent sealed with the seal of our said province, and registered in our secretary's office of our said province bearing date 23d day of December in the year of our Lord 1684, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear, and whereas the aforesaid Thomas Dongan late Gov. of our said province, by virtue of the said power and authority in him residing hath moreover by another grant or patent sealed with the seal of our said province and registered in our secretary's office aforesaid bearing date the 11th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1686, given, granted, ratified, and confirmed unto Philip Philips, eldest son, of him the said said moiety or equal half part of the said meadows and premises with the appertinences unto the said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assigns forever, as by the said grant or patent, sealed with the seal of our said province and registered in our secretary's office aforesaid, bearing date the said 27th day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1687, and as by the said deed of conveyance, under the hands and seals of the said George Lockhart and Janet his wife, bearing date 20th day of February, in the year of our Lord, 1685, relation being thereunto had respectively may more fully and at large appear; and whereas Augustine Grayham our surveyor general for our said province of New York, &c., hath by warrant bearing date the 11th of February, in the fourth year of our reign, surveyed and laid out for the said Frederick Philips, a certain small parcel of salt meadows situate and being on the north side of Tappan creek in the county of Orange, beginning at a certain stake set on the east side of the said creek, and from thence run east 37° 40 min. northerly to Hudson's river six chains and ninety links, thence along the said river twelve chains and ninety links south one degree, westerly to the mouth of the aforesaid creek, and from thence along the said creek west five degrees thirty-five minutes, northerly eleven chains, thence north twelve degrees, eastwardly two chains and forty links, thence east forty degrees, southerly three chains forty-five links along the said creek, thence east eleven degrees thirty minutes, southerly two chains twenty links, thence north six degrees twenty-five minutes, seven chains and seventy links, to the stake where the line first began, being bounded on the north-west by a certain parcel of Frederick Philips all that tract or parcel of land commonly called by the Indians Sinck Sinck, and situate, lying, and being on the east side of Hudson's river by the northermost part of the land purchased by the said Frederick Philips, and so running alongst Hudson's river to a certain creek or river called Kichtawan, and from thence running alongst the said creek two English miles, and from thence running up the country upon a due east lyne untill it comes unto a creek called Nippiorha, by the Christians Yonkers creek, and so running alongst the said creek untill it comes unto the northerly bounds of the said land of Frederick Philips aforesaid, and from thence alongst the said land untill it comes to Hudsons river, together with all manner of rivers, rivulets, runns, streams, feedings, pastures, woods, underwoods, trees, timbers, waters, water courses, ponds, pools, pits, swamps, moors, marshes, meadows, easements, proffits and commodities, fishing, fowling, hunting, hawking, mines, minerals, quarries, (royal mines only excepted) and all royalties, profits, commodities, hereditaments and appurtenances whatsoever to the said tract or parcel of land within the bounds and limits aforesaid, belonging or in any ways appertaining, to have and to hold the said tract or parcel of land and all and singular other the premises with their and every of their appurtenances, unto the said Philip Philips, his heirs and assigns forever, as by the said grant or patent, relation being thereunto had, may more fully and at large appear, and whereas the said Philip Philips did by mean assurance in the law, sell, alienate, enfeoff, and confirm unto his said father Frederick Philips all the afore-recited tract or parcel of land within the limits and bounds above mentioned and expressed, together with all and singular the premises with their and every of their appertinences, to have and to hold unto him the said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assigns forever, as by his deed of conveyance under his hand and seal bearing date the ——— day of ——— in the year of our Lord 168–, relation being thereunto had more fully and at large appear; and whereas the aforesaid Thomas Dongan, late Gov. of our said province, by virtue of the said power and authority in him residing hath, by another grant or patent sealed with the seal of our said province and registered in our secretary's office aforesaid, bearing date the 27th day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1687, given, granted, ratified, released and confirmed unto the said Frederick Philips all that the moiety or one equal half part of a certain entire parcel of meadow ground, situate, lying, and being at a certain place called Tappan near Hudson's river, bounded to the north by a certain creek called or known by the name of Tappan creek, to the east by Hudson's river aforesaid, to the west by a certain parcel of upland now in possession of George Lockhart, and to the south by Hudson's river aforesaid, the said moiety or equal half part of the said meadows to be laid out along the side of Hudson's river aforesaid throughout the whole length of its bounds upon said river from Tappan creek aforesaid, and to be bounded to the north by Tappan creek, to the east by Hudson's river, to the west by the other moiety or half part of the said meadows, still running to the said George Lockhart's, and so to run southerly to the end of the said meadows, nothing excepted or reserved thereof, to the said George Lockhart, his heirs or assigns, but one cart or waine way through the said moiety or half part of the meadow aforesaid, which moiety or equal half part of the meadow aforesaid was by mean assurance in the law conveyed to the said George Lockhart and Janet his wife unto the said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assigns, to have and to hold the meadow said to belong to Cornelius Claater, on the east by Hudson's river on the south and west by the said creek, containing in all six acres three roods and eight perches, as by the return of the survey, bearing date the 19th day of April, in the said fourth year of our reign, and in the year of our Lord, 1692, relation being thereunto had may more fully and at large appear, all which several tracts or parcels of land lying together, and bounded and limited in manner hereafter expressed and mentioned, (that is to say) all the said tract and parcels of land that are on the east side of Hudson's river are bounded to the northward by a creek or river commonly called by the Indians Kightowank and by the English Knotrus river, and now belonging to Stevanus van Cortlandt, Esq., and so eastward into the woods along the said creek or river two English miles, and from thence upon a direct east line to Bronxes river, and so running southward along the said Bronxes river as it runs until a direct west line cutteth the south side of a neck or island of land at a creek or kill called Papparinemo which divides York island from the main, and so along the said creek or kill as it runs to Hudson's river, which part of the said creek is called by the Indians Shorackhappok, and continues dividing the said York island from the main, and so from thence to the northward alongst Hudson's river untill it comes into the aforesaid creek or river called by the Indians Kightawank and by the English Knotrus river and the salt meadow ground on the west side of Hudson's river, are bounded and limited as here before is plainly mentioned and expressed. And whereas our loving subject the said Frederick Philips, one of the members of our council of our said province of New York, and the territories depending thereon in America, hath by his petition presented to Benjamin Fletcher, our captain-general and governor-in-chief of our said province of New York, &c., prayed our grant and confirmation of all and every the tracts and parcels of land within the limits and bounds aforesaid, and that we would likewise erect all the said tracts and parcels of land within the limits aforesaid into a lordship or manor of Philipsborough, and that we would further grant unto our said loving subject a certain neck or island of land called Paparinemo adjoining to the land aforesaid, with the salt meadows thereunto belonging, together with power and authority to erect a bridge over the water or river commonly called Spiten devil ferry or Paparinemo, and so receive toll from all passengers and droves of cattle that shall pass thereon according to rates hereinafter mentioned; and whereas it is manifest that our said loving subject hath been at great charge and expense in the purchasing and settling of the aforerecited tracts of land, whereupon considerable improvements have been made, and that he is likewise willing at his own proper cost and charge to build a bridge at the ferry aforesaid for the benefit and accommodation of travellers, which reasonable request for his future encouragement we being willing to grant, Know ye, that of our special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, we have given, granted, ratified, and confirmed, and by these presents do, for us, our heirs and successors, give, grant, ratify, and confirm unto said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assigns, all and every the aforerecited tracts and parcels of land and meadow ground within the limits and bounds before mentioned and expressed, and likewise the aforesaid neck or island of land called Paparinemo, and the meadow thereunto belonging, with power, authority, and privilege to erect and build a dam bridge upon the aforesaid ferry at Spitendevil or Paparinemo, and to receive rates and tolls of all passengers and for droves of cattle according to the rates hereafter mentioned, (that is to say,) three pence current money of New York for each man and horse that shall pass the said bridge in the day time, and three pence current money aforesaid for each head of neat cattle that shall pass the same, and twelve pence current money aforesaid for each score of hogs, calves, and sheep that shall pass the same, and nine pence current money aforesaid for every boat, vessel, or canoe that shall pass the said bridge and cause the same to be drawn up, and for each coach, cart, or sledge, or waggon that shall pass the same the sum of ninepence current money aforesaid; and after sunset each passenger that shall pass said bridge shall pay two pence current money aforesaid, each man and horse six pence, each head of neat cattle six pence, each score of hogs, calves, and sheep two shillings, for each boat or vessel or canoe one shilling and six pence for each coach, cart, waggon or sledge one shilling and six pence current money aforesaid, together with all the messuages, tenements, buildings, barns, houses, out-houses, mills, mill-dams, fences, orchards, gardens, pastures, meadows, marshes, swamps, moors, pools, woods, under-woods, trees, timber, quarries, rivers, runs, rivulets, brooks, ponds, lakes, streams, creeks, harbours, beaches, ferrys, fishing, fowling, hunting, hawking, mines, minerals, (silver and gold only excepted,) and all the other rights, members, liberties, priviledges, jurisdictions, royalties, hereditaments, proffits, tolls, benefits, advantages and appurtinances whatsoever to the aforesaid tracts and neck or island of land and meadows, ferry, bridge, and mills belonging or in any ways appertaining, or accepted, reputed, taken, known, or occupied as part, parcel, or member thereof; and moreover, know ye, that of our further special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, we have thought fit, according to the request of our said loving subject, to erect all the aforesaid recited tracts and parcels of lands and meadows with the limits and bounds aforesaid, into a lordship or manor, and, therefore, by these presents we do erect, make, and constitute all the aforesaid recited tracts and parcels of land and meadows, within the limits and bounds aforesaid mentioned, together with all and every the afore granted premises with all and every of the appertinances into a lordship or manor, to all intents and purposes; and it is our royal will and pleasure that the said lordship and manor shall from henceforth be called the lordship or manor of Philipsborough, and the aforesaid bridge to be from henceforth called Kingsbridge in the manor of Philipsborough aforesaid. And know ye, that we, reposing special trust and confidence in the loyalty, wisdom, justice, prudence, and circumspection of our loving subject, do, for us, our heirs and successors, give and grant unto the said Frederick Philips, and to the heirs and assignees of him the said Frederick Philips, full power and authority at all times forever hereafter in the said lordship or manor, one court leet and one court baron to hold and to keep at such times, and so often, yearly and every year, as he or they shall see meet; and all fines, issues, and amercements as the said Court Leet or Court Baron to be holden within said lordship or manor to be sett, forfeited, or employed, or payable, or happening at any time to be payable by any of the inhabitants of or within the said lordship or manor of Philipsborough, in the limits and bounds thereof, as also all and every of the power and authority herein before mentioned, for the holding and keeping the said Leet and Court Baron from time to time, and to award and issue out the customary writs to be issued and awarded out of the said Court Leet and Court Baron to be kept by the heirs and assignees of the said Frederick Philips forever, in their or every of their stewards deputed and appointed, with full and ample power and authority to distrain for the rents, levies, or other sums of money payable by virtue of the premises, and all other lawful remedies and means for the having possession, receiving, levying, and enjoying the premises and every part and parcel of the same, and all waifes, estrays, wrecks, deodans, and of the fellons happening and being furnished within the said lordship and manor of Philipsborough, and all and every sum and sums of money to be paid as a parte fine upon any fine or fines to be levied of any lands, tenements or hereditaments with in the said lordship or manor of Philipsburgh, togather with the advowson and right of patronage of all and every the church or churches erected or to be erected or established or hereafter to be erected or established within the said manor of Philipsborough; and we do also further give and grant unto the said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assignees, that all and singular the tenants of the said Frederick Philips, within the said manor shall and may at all times hereafter meet together and choose assessors within the manor aforesaid, according to such rules, ways, and methods as are prescribed for the cities, towns, and counties within our province aforesaid by the acts of General Assembly, for the defraying the publick charge of each respective city, town, and county aforesaid, and such sums of money so assessed or levied to collect and dispose of for such uses as the acts of General Assembly shall establish and appoint, to have and to hold, possess, collect, and enjoy all and singular the said lordship or manor of Philipsborough, togather with the aforesaid halls and premises, with all their and every of their appertinances, unto the said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assignees, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of him, the said Frederick Philips, his heirs and assignees forever, reserving unto us, our heirs and successors, free egress and ingress of all our and their forces, horse or foot, of our and their coaches, waggons, stores of war, ammunition, and expresses, that shall from time to time pass the said bridge for our or their service, or any thing contained to the contrary herein in any ways notwithstanding, to be holden of us, our heirs and successors, in free and common soccage according to the tenure of our manor of East Greenwich within our county of Kent in our realm of England, yealding, rendering, and paying therefor, yearly and every year, on the feast day of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, at our fort at New York unto us, our heirs and successors, the annual rent of £4 12s. current money of our said province in lieu and stead of all former rents, services, dues, duties, and demands for the said lordship or manor of Philipsborough and premises. In testimony whereof we have caused the seal of our province of New York to be hereunto affixed. Witness Benjamin Fletcher our captain-general and governor-in-chief of our province of New York aforesaid, province of Pennsylvania and county of New Castle, and the territory and tracts of land depending thereon in America, at Fort William Henry, the 12th day of June, in the fifth year of our reign, and in the year of our Lord, 1693.[1]

[1] 12 June, 1693.

[1] Lib. vii. Sec. of State's offᵉ, Albany.

A PLAN
OF THE
MANOR of PHILIPSBURG
IN THE
COUNTY OF WESTCHESTER, IN THE STATE OF NEW YORK surveyed agreeable to the order and instructions of Isaac Stoutenburg SP to V Cortlandt unto John Hill
1 93

With the addition of the Southern end
of
L E N D O N C K

NOTE

This portion of Hill's original Map of the Manor North [illegible] East of the [illegible] up around this Divisional Spot having been omitted out until the north [illegible] to Manor to where [illegible] and to the Head of the Bronx and that River and due [illegible] according to the County Map issued by Simeon DeWitt the State Surveyor General in 1[illegible]

The act of 17[illegible] erecting the County into Townships provides that the [illegible] Rear Bounds of the Township of Morrisania thereby created shall be the [illegible] North and East lines of the Manor of Philipsburgh and as such they were in DeWitt's County Map and are here represented. The interior Divisions and Topography of the [illegible] cannot be represented [illegible] hereafter [illegible] of the explanation given in lieu thereof.

NORTH RIVER.

EAST RIVER.

HARLEM RIVER

NORTH

HUDSON'S

EAST CHESTER TOWNSHIP.

SOUTHERN END OF COLEN-DONCK

CHAPTER V.

THE COLONIAL PERIOD.

BY REV. WILLIAM S. COFFEY, M.A.

General History from 1683 to the Revolution—Chief Families—Trade—Mails—Newspapers—Modes of Travel—Rise of Churches—Influence of the Clergy—Relations of the County to the Colony—Early Census.

In 1683, nine years after the surrender by the Dutch Government to the English of its Province of New Netherlands, the Duke of York (afterwards James the Second) sent over Colonel Thomas Dongan, brother of the Baron of that name in the Irish peerage, and himself afterwards Earl of Limerick, to be Governor of the colony, henceforward to be styled "New York."

In the instructions to Dongan are to be noted, first, the naming of Frederick Philipse and Stephen Van Cortlandt, large landed proprietors in Westchester County, as members of his Council, and, second, the order to assemble eighteen representatives of the freeholders of the colony to consult with the Governor and his Council. Dongan arrived in August, and, in less than a month, summoned the people to elect representatives to the first Assembly, which he ordered to meet on the 17th of October, in the city of New York. Westchester County, being one of the three Ridings of Long Island, returned two members to this body, whose names, unfortunately, are not known, the acts of the old New York Assembly being, "for the most part, rotten, defaced or lost."[1] An important law passed by this Assembly was the division of the province into twelve counties. The County of Westchester is marked out as "East and West Chester, Bronxland, Fordham and all as far eastward as the province extends" and northward along the Hudson to the Highlands. Acts bearing upon the interests of this County were passed, establishing courts, repealing rate laws, for defraying expenses, for the destruction of wolves, and providing for damages by swine, and also settling that Westchester should henceforth have two representatives in the Assembly.[2]

In the latter part of November, after an intimation from the Governor, that, unless there was an abatement of her claims, he would proceed to extremities, a delegation from Connecticut was sent to New York to settle the boundary line between the two provinces. In the previous determination, in 1664, the understanding drawn up in formal manner was, that the dividing line should run about twenty miles from any point on the Hudson River, and, as Mamaroneck Creek was, on the assurance of the Connecticut commissioners, discovered to be at that distance from the nearest locality on that river, an amendment was made that the western bounds of Connecticut should find there their starting-point, and proceed in a straight direction north-northwest to the Massachusetts line. Little did the New York commissioners imagine into what a blunder, in their confidence, they were being led. The mistake or deception was found out, and hence the necessity now for a new conference and decision. The commissioners present were the two Governors, Dongan and Treat, with Messrs. Brockholst, Philipse, Van Cortlandt and Younge for New York, and Messrs. Gold, Allyn and Pitkin for Connecticut. The mouth of the Byram River was settled as the boundary point, and, as not less than five towns (always regarded in Connecticut) would be thrown out of it by following this line, an equivalent tract, quantity for quantity (ever since called the "Oblong"), was, in consideration, assigned in lieu of the towns, to New York.[3] These lines, partitions, limits and bounds, it was resolved, should be run during the next October and the whole matter transferred to the King and Duke of York for their approval.

The disposal of them thus made was exceedingly distasteful to the people of Rye and Bedford, and, notwithstanding a letter to them from the Connecticut government urging the propriety of submission, was positively resisted. A summons of Governor Dongan to appear in New York and show title to their lands was disobeyed, and, eventually, an open request to the General Court of Connecticut for recognition as belonging to the latter colony was made, the approval of the home government to the agreement being for years delayed. The result of this dissatisfaction was an open rupture on the occasion of the election of a member of the General Assembly, in 1697, in which the sheriff's authority was disputed and an armed force from Connecticut interposed to prevent the accomplishment of the election. The course of these towns and the government of Connecticut received a practical rebuke when, in 1700, King William confirmed the agreement of 1683 and the action of the surveying party of the next year. The Assembly of Connecticut thereupon ordered that information of the fact be sent to the inhabitants of Rye and Bedford, and that they are freed from duty to that government, but are henceforth under the government of New York.[4]

In the management of the affairs of the Province Dongan seems to have displayed the greatest energy and ability amid difficulties and disadvantages which sorely taxed his powers. One of his troubles, because it gives us a chance to look into Westchester, we recall: The Duke of York's Collector (Santen) seems to have been so lax with his deputies that several of them were defaulters. Among these was one Collins, receiver of the revenue in Westchester County, from

[1] Vide Brodhead, Hist. of N. Y., vol. ii. p. 382.

[2] Vide Dunlap, Hist. of N. Y., vol. ii. Ap. N. xliii.

[3] "Boundaries of the State of New York." Report of the Regents of the University, pp. 24–58.

[4] Baird's Rye, p. 118. Public Records of Connecticut, vol. iv. p. 335.

whom no returns having been made, Santen was compelled to be satisfied with two bonds, payable in the succeeding March. These Governor Dongan looked upon to be of no value and all the revenue of that county lost, "the man having hardly bread to put into his mouth."

The Acts of the New York Assembly of 1783 were duly transmitted for approbation to the Duke of York; but although they were, with some amendments, approved by him and his Commissioners, and although the documents were signed and sealed which were to declare this, the death of Charles II., in the succeeding February, changed the whole current of action. The Duke ascended the throne as James II. The approving papers were never returned, and the King, after issuing new instructions to Dongan nullifying much that had been done, soon determined to merge the different provinces north of the Delaware into one government. Dongan was recalled, and Sir Edmund Andros made Governor of what His Majesty was pleased to call "our Territory and Dominion of New England in America." A council of forty-two of the principal inhabitants was named by the King, to whom was assigned the making of laws and imposing of taxes. In the list of these counselors we again find the names of Philipse and Van Cortlandt, who were far from being pleased with the change. In a letter of theirs to the Board of Trade they join with Lieutenant-Governor Nicholson and Mr. W. Bayard in saying "how fatall it hath been to this city and the Province of New York for to be annexed to that of Boston, which, if it had continued, would have occasioned the totall ruin of the Inhabitants of said Province."[1] It must easily appear that these changes, with the consequent thwarting of their political hopes, produced much dissatisfaction among the people of this county. Ruled by a King who differed with them in religion, with no voice in the legislation by which to protect themselves, and now even their colonial existence destroyed, they were loud in their denunciations and threats. But the effect of this act of union the people had but a short time, in murmuring mood, to consider, as the great Revolution at the close of the year 1688 compelled James to abdicate his power, and placed upon the throne his daughter Mary and her husband, the Prince of Orange. This event brought out the glad sympathies of the English as well as the Dutch-descended inhabitants of the whole colony of New York. But, strange to say, instead of a united congratulation, the anxiety on the part of the populace for the change, and dread lest it should miscarry, combining with the untoward situation of things, the absence of any accredited representative of the higher power and of any official information of the accession of William (which would have been followed by a public proclamation of it), caused in New York one of the saddest and most absurd illustrations of that state of affairs when "the people furiously rage together and imagine a vain thing."

The news of the insurrection in Boston, in which Governor Andros was seized and imprisoned, reached New York on the very day that word also came that France, whither James had fled, had commenced war with England and Holland. The fears of the people were aroused. It was immediately determined by the city authorities that as the Royal garrison of the town was very weak, the militia should be summoned to share in the defense of the Fort. Colonel Bayard accordingly assigned the six companies of the city, which he commanded, to mount guard in turn. So deep was the suspicion of Mr. Bayard and of the other citizens who, as members of the Council, had been associated with Dongan and Andros in the adminstration of affairs, and who now, with Nicholson, having indeed no orders, were delaying the proclamation of William and Mary, that the captains of the train-bands, induced by Jacob Leisler, one of their number, took possession of the Fort, and declared their determination to protect the province until the coming of the accredited Governor to be sent by William.

Besides the six captains and four hundred men of New York, a company of seventy men from East Chester seems to have been present on this 3d of June and subscribed to the following declaration:

"Whereas, our intention tended only but to the preservation of the protestant religion and the fort of this city, to the end that we may avoid and prevent the rash judgment of the world in so just a design, we have thought fit to let every body know by these public proclamations that till the safe arryval of the ships that we expect every day from his royal highness, the prince of Orange, with orders for the government of this country in the behalf of such person as the said royal highness had chosen and honored with the charge of a Governor, that as soon as the bearer of the said orders shall have let us see his power, then and without any delay execute the said orders punctually, declaring that we do intend to submit and obey not only the said orders but also the bearer thereof committed for the execution of the same.[2] In witness hereof we have signed these presents the third of June, 1689.

It appears also that there was a company of soldiers from New Rochelle, commanded by Captain Cottomear. When it is remembered that it was at this very time that the French settlers of New Rochelle obtained through Leisler their lands in that town from John Pell, and when also the rumors industriously circulated are presented, which pictured the French as having, among other designs in taking New York, one to seize their countrymen, the Huguenots, and torture them or ship them back to France,[3] it will be obvious how easy it was for Leisler to involve them in his designs, as subserving thereby their own safety. The interest of Westchester in these proceedings also appears in the fact that when, after the destruction of Schnectady, Leisler sent an expedition against the French and the Indians, there is no doubt that there was, for its size, a large representation of the County in these troops.[4]

[1] N. Y. Col. Mans., vol. iii. p. 576.

[2] Vide Smith's New York, 2d Ed., 1792, p. 74.

[3] Instructions to Count de Frontenac. N. Y. Doc. Hist. vol. i., p. 295.

[4] N. Y. Doc. Hist. vol. ii. pp. 12–15. Baird's Rye, p. 48 and 198. N. Y. Col. Mans.

When Leisler took possession of the fort at New York, Lieutenant-Governor Nicholson without delay set sail for England, leaving the government in charge of the Council, the members of which were, Philipse, Van Cortland and Bayard. Of course, the public confidence was still more diminished. Leisler, taking advantage of this state of things, invited from each of the counties a delegation of two to meet in convention, and also two men from each to guard the fort.

This convention, which met June 26, 1689, and in which Westchester was represented, authorized ten of their number to be a committee of safety, who, in their turn, commissioned Leisler to exercise the powers of commander-in-chief of the Province. In this committee were Richard Panton and Thomas Williams, of this County, who seem to have been most active supporters of Leisler.

Some months afterwards a letter from King William to Nicholson was intercepted by Leisler, who appropriating its directions to himself, set up the claim that "he had received a commission to be their Majesties Lieutenant-Governor," and then proceeded to appoint his Council, among whom was Thomas Williams, of Westchester.

The new Governor, Sloughter, did not appear until March 9th, but meanwhile acts of lawlessness and tyranny, rashness and demagogism abounded in the city and other parts of the colony, in which Leisler and members of his Council and their followers were the most active.

In a suit tried at Westchester in 1693, Williams, then sixty-two years of age, deposed that "the first reason of this difficulty was a big look violently from me. Captain Panton commanded him (Leggett, the plaintiff) to hold his peace, but he still continued abusing the defendant, and said, 'here comes the father of rogues' and many scurrilous words, upon which I got a warrant against him." Williams lived in West Farms, and Gabriel Leggett was, as appears by a deed of March 3, 1695, his near neighbor.[1]

Upon the arrival of Sloughter, Leisler and his associates, who, with mad infatuation, held on to their usurped authority after three different demands from the Governor, were immediately upon their surrender arrested and confined on the charge of treason. Upon indictment they were soon tried, and upon conviction sentenced to death.

In the order of the King to Sloughter, appointing his Council, we find again the names of Philipse and Van Cortlandt, who, with their associates, were now sworn into office.

Sloughter, reports to England that many of Leisler's followers "were well enough affected to their Majesties Government, but through ignorance were put upon to do what they did," and advises as an example, the execution only of the ringleaders.

[1] Court of Sessions Journal. Bolton's "Hist. of Westchester County," vol. ii. p. 183.

The first Assembly of the province, which the new Governor summoned, met on the 9th of April, 1691, and the member from Westchester County was John Pell. The position taken by this Assembly was that the acts passed in 1683, not having received the approbation of Charles the Second nor the Duke of York were null and void, and it proceeded to enact some of the laws supposed by the people to be in force. An act making a division of the province into twelve counties, as intended in 1683, was passed. In addition, the following laws for Westchester County were enacted: "An act for settling a ministry and raising a maintenance for them in Westchester County. An act for settling the militia. An act offering twenty shillings for a grown wolf killed by a Christian in Westchester County, and ten shillings for such a wolf killed by an Indian; one-half that sum respectively for a whelp. An act for the further laying out and regulating and better clearing public highways throughout this Colony," in which Adolph Philipse, Esq., Caleb Heathcote, Esq., Mr. Joseph Drake, Mr. John Stevenson and Mr. John Haitt are made commissioners to take a review of the roads. These and the other acts of this Assembly were sent to England for approval.

After much delay and hesitation, and under circumstances not too strongly to be reprehended, the execution of Leisler and his son-in-law and confederate, Jacob Milborne, was ordered and took place on the 16th of May, 1691. The punishment of Williams and his associates was deferred. But little more than two months passed when Sloughter himself, after an illness of only two days, died under circumstances at first deemed suspicious, but afterwards differently regarded. His death occurred on the 26th of July, 1691, and after a disadvantageous interregnum of thirteen months, his successor, Colonel Benjamin Fletcher, landed in New York. The day after his arrival his commission and the names of members of his Council were proclaimed. Some changes of this body, which was substantially that under Sloughter, were afterwards deemed necessary, which introduced Colonel Caleb Heathcote, of the Manor of Scarsdale, and thus gave Westchester additional weight in the Province.

In the succeeding March, 1693, the Assembly met the County being represented by John Pell and by Joseph Theale, of the town of Rye. From the report of Governor Fletcher to the home government, in April of this year, we extract the following from his list of those employed in civil office in the province of New York:

The justices in Westchester County were Col. Caleb Heathcote, Judge of Common Pleas, Joseph Theale, Wm. Barnes, Daniel Strange, James Mott, John Hunt, Wm. Chadderton, Thomas Pinkney, Esqrs.; Benjamin Collier, Esq., Sheriff; Joseph Lee, Clerk of the county.[2]

[2] N. Y. Col. Mans, London Doc. IX. vol. iv, p. 27.

Theale, Strange and Collier were of the town of Rye; Barnes and Hunt, of Westchester; Chadderton and Pinkney, of East Chester; Mott, of Mamaroneck, and Lee in all likelihood, from Yorktown. In the same report the militia of the county is represented to consist of six companies of foot, commanded by Colonel Caleb Heathcote, and to number two hundred and eighty-three men.

In the following September a new Assembly was convened by Fletcher, and Pell is again a member of the House, and has as his colleague, in place of Theale, Humphrey Underhill, also of Rye. At this session of the Colonial Legislature the act was passed, which, after approval, was carried out, in reference to the maintenance of religion in the province. The bill provided for good, sufficient Protestant ministers to officiate and have the care of souls. It required that there should be two ministers in the county of Westchester, one of whom should have care of Westchester, East Chester, Yonkers and the Manor of Pelham, and the other of Rye, Mamaroneck and Bedford, and that fifty pounds should be raised for each of the incumbents; and also whatever sum might be necessary for the maintenance of the poor, which amounts were to be levied by the wardens and vestrymen, for whose election the act also provided.[1] It appears that the Governor took the deepest interest in the spiritual welfare of the colony. He was a man of great earnestness and promptness, and made himself felt to the general advantage. The Indians, in their appreciation of him, styled him Cayenguirago, or the "great swift arrow." What he counseled and did reached directly the difficulty. The necessity for his anxiety as to religion will appear from the strictures upon our county, contained in a letter of Colonel Heathcote, written in 1704,—

"I first came among them . . . about twelve years ago. I found it the most rude and heathenish country I ever saw in my whole life, which called themselves Christians, there being not so much as the least marks or footsteps of religion of any sort. Sundays were only times set apart by them for all manner of vain sports and lewd diversion, and they were grown to such a degree of rudeness that it was intolerable. I having then command of the militia, sent an order to all the captains . . . that in case they would not in every town agree among themselves to appoint readers and to pass the Sabbath in the best manner they could . . . that the captains should every Sunday call their companies under arms and spend the day in exercise." [2]

It was a matter of great satisfaction to the many of all parties in the province when the news was received about this time that the King had wisely granted a full pardon to Williams and the others with Leisler, who all this while, though released on bail, yet remained under sentence of death. Their course had awakened no little enthusiasm in their determined refusal "to own their liberty a favor," or depart "from the justification of their crimes." "What they did was for King William and Queen Mary."[3] It was determined in England very properly, for the sake of harmony, to waive the point of humility and grant a full release to all concerned.

In 1695 the Assemblymen from Westchester County were Joseph Purdy, of Rye, and Humphrey Underhill; but in April, 1697, Underhill, for non-attendance, was expelled, and Joseph Theale returned in his stead. In 1698 the Earl of Bellamont succeeded Fletcher in the Governorship, and in the new Assembly Joseph Purdy, and John Drake of East Chester, appear for Westchester County. A complaint of undue election was made to the House by Henry Fowler, of East Chester, and Josiah Hunt, of Westchester; but after thorough consideration Purdy and Drake were unanimously declared to have been duly elected. Mr. Drake was chosen again in 1699, with John Hunt, of Westchester, as his associate. From a table of the different regiments in the province of New York, it would seem that that of Westchester County had greatly diminished in strength by 1700. It is reported as consisting of only the three companies in Eastchester, New Rochelle and Mamaroneck, and of not more than one hundred and fifty-five men.[4] In 1701, at the election in midsummer, while Mr. Drake was again chosen, the other seat for the county was in dispute between Joseph Purdy and Henry Fowler, of East Chester. The matter having been referred to a committee on the petition of Fowler, David Provoost, from this committee, reported that it had sent for several persons and papers and had found that Henry Fowler was elected a member of the House. The report was approved, and the clerk of the crown was ordered before the House to amend the returns by putting out the name of Joseph Purdy and putting in that of Henry Fowler, who, by direction, went then before the Governor and took the oath of office.[5]

But a more serious matter at this same session was the expulsion of Mr. John Drake, who, with others, violently withdrew, refusing to act with the Speaker (Governeur) on the ground of his being an alien and disqualified for public office. A new election was ordered, and William Willett, of Westchester, chosen, who, after ten days' occupation of his seat, was expelled for representing the organization of the House illegal, Mr. Willett assuming the same position on the question as Mr. Drake. Another election was ordered, and Colonel Heathcote was now chosen, who, after taking the oath, would not sit. Another election was ordered for the next spring, but the Assembly was itself dissolved on the 3d of May.

On the 30th of September, 1701, as signers of a petition to King William from the Protestants of New York, evidently anti-Leislerians, appear the names of Caleb Heathcote, John Horton, Joseph Purdee, John Drake, William Willett and William Barnes, who

[1] Baird's Rye.
[2] Dunlap's "History of New York," vol. i. p. 217.
[3] New York Col. Mans., vol. iv. pp. 55, 83.
[4] New York Col. Mss., vol. iv. pp. 807, 810.
[5] Journal of New York Assembly.

speak, they say, for themselves and two-thirds of the freeholders and inhabitants of Westchester County. In this paper they complain of unjust proscription and imputations and profess most thorough submission and loyalty.[1] The same names are found subscribed to an address of welcome to Lord Cornbury, the newly-appointed Governor. This paper is dated October 2, 1702, and in it they again state that they represent two-thirds of the inhabitants and freeholders of the county of Westchester.[2] We safely gather from these papers, legislative proceedings and elections the high state of political feeling throughout the colony, in which the people of Westchester thoroughly shared. The course of Lord Bellamont and of his temporary successor, Lieutenant-Governor Nanfan, had been in the interest of the friends of Leisler. Abraham Governeur, who had married Leisler's widowed daughter, Mrs. Milborne, was the head of the faction, and they had succeeded in placing him in the Speaker's chair. Drake, Purdy, Willett and Heathcote were pronounced opponents of these radicals, whose representative in this county evidently was Henry Fowler, of East Chester. Is it not probable that John Drake,—Lieutenant of the militia company in East Chester, which went down to aid Leisler, took the gauge of this ambitious and arrogant man from dealings with him at the Fort, and hence easily fell into line with those who made common cause with the friends of law and order, rather to resist the aspirations of the new man, when his claims for consideration above others heretofore leaders were only his own presumption and self-importance?

At the election of 1702, upon Lord Cornbury assuming the reins of government, Joseph Purdy and William Willett were chosen to the Assembly from Westchester County. The resolution of this body is recalled to mind, which declared that any bills passed when an alien is Speaker are not binding on the subject. This action, of course, vindicates the conduct of Drake and Willett, who would not countenance Governeur as Speaker. Mr. Willett, with the exception of two years, held a seat in the Assembly consecutively for the next thirty odd years. Mr. Edmund Ward, of East Chester, was his colleague from 1705 to 1712, Mr. John Hoit held the place for a year, and Mr. Joseph Budd, of Rye, from 1716 to 1722, when Mr. Adolph Philipse was elected and also became Speaker of the Assembly. In 1709, Joseph Purdy and John Drake, and in 1715, Josiah Hunt and Jonathan Odell were returned. In 1726, Frederick Philipse accepted the position, which he held until his death, in 1751, and which his son, of the same name, held after him until the Revolution. From 1739 to 1743, Daniel Purdy, of Rye, and from 1743 to the Revolution, Judge John Thomas, of the same town, was the other member from the county. The courtesy of Mr. Willett and the election of Lewis Morris in 1733 will be spoken of hereafter.

During the first fifty years of its existence Westchester County steadily increased in population and material prosperity. Large areas of land were placed under cultivation. The public advantages of churches, schools, highways, mills, tanneries, etc., were greatly multiplied, and the harsh life of the pioneer was moderating into the regulated one of the sturdy yeoman. In the numerous measures necessary for the development of its resources and the increase of its facilities, privileges and comforts, its inhabitants exhibit quickness to devise, and zeal and perseverance to prosecute to the needed accomplishment. By petitions, representations and remonstrances to the Assembly, to the Council, to the Governor, the various towns made their wants and wishes, even if not always answered, pressingly known. And so in all questions of rights, no communities in the province appear more sensitive and determined. "Our representatives," says Smith, "agreeable to the general sense of their constituents, are tenacious in their opinions that the inhabitants of this colony are entitled to all the privileges of Englishmen; that they have a right to participate in the legislative power, and that the session of Assemblies here is wisely substituted, instead of a representation in Parliament."[3] And yet this same historian is inconsistent enough to charge "that the views of these representatives seldom extend further than to the regulation of highways, the destruction of wolves, wild-cats and foxes, and the advancement of the other little interests of the particular counties which they were chosen to represent."[4] How much more correct the first statement is, if not seen from what has already been offered, will be abundantly manifest, as we now turn to record the excitements and troubles which commenced with the second third of the eighteenth century.

Upon the death of Governor Montgomery, Mr. Rip Van Dam, the president of the Council, assumed the duties of the position until a successor should be appointed, which was immediately done upon the receipt of the news in England. Colonel William Cosby, formerly Governor of Minorca, was commissioned for New York, but remained in England nearly a year before embarking for his position, under the declared motive of preventing the passage of a bill, called the Sugar Bill, which was disastrous to the interests of the New York colony. Very early after his arrival a pecuniary disagreement sprang up between the Governor and Van Dam, growing out of this delay, which it was found necessary to offer to the courts for settlement.

The case was brought before Chief Justice Lewis Morris and his associates, De Lancey and Philipse. The decisions of the Chief Justice in the prelimin-

[1] New York Col. Mans., vol. iv. p. 938.
[2] New York Col. Mans., vol. iv. p. 1007.
[3] Smith's "History of New York," part vi. chap. v. Carey Ed. p. 260.
[4] Smith's "History of New York," part vi. chap. v. Carey Ed. p. 262.

ary proceedings greatly exasperated the Governor. The suit was not further pressed, but the most bitter animosities were engendered between these two high functionaries, and two violent parties arose in the province. The Governor, having in the spring written home and presented a number of points against the general conduct of the Chief Justice and declared his intention to remove him, proceeded in the summer of 1733 to the step. To the vacant office the Governor appointed the First Associate Judge, James De Lancey, who, with Judge Adolph Philipse, had not justified the course of Morris. The excitement in this matter extended to Westchester County. To allow of the election of Chief Justice Morris to the Assembly, William Willett, his friend and townsman, resigned his seat in that body. The person named to oppose the Judge was William Forster, Clerk of the County, who had held the office for many years and was greatly respected. The election took place on the 29th of October, and the following from the New York Weekly Journal, of the 24th of December, is a full detail of the event, under the coloring given to it by the successful party. It is described as an election of great expectation, and that the Court and County's interest was exerted to the utmost: [1]

[1] New York Weekly Journal, 1733.

"WEST CHESTER, OCT. 29TH, 1733.

"On this day Lewis Morris, Esq., late chief justice of this province, was, by a majority of voices, elected a representative from the county of Westchester. Nicholas Cooper, Esq., high sheriff of the said county, having, by papers affixed to the church of East Chester and other public places, given notice of the day and place of election without mentioning any time of the day when it was to be done, which made the electors on the side of the late judge very suspicious that some fraud was intended—to prevent which about fifty of them kept watch upon and about the green at East Chester (the place of election), from 12 o'clock the night before till the morning of that day, the other electors beginning to move on Sunday afternoon and evening, so as to be at New Rochelle by midnight—their way lay through Harrison's Purchase, the inhabitants of which provided for their entertainment as they passed each house in their way, having a table plentifully covered for that purpose. About midnight they all met at the house of Wm. Le Count, at New Rochelle, whose house not being large enough to entertain so great a number, a large fire was made in the street, by which they sat till daylight, at which time they began to move. They were joined on the hill at the east end of the town by about seventy horse of the electors of the lower part of the county, and then proceeded towards the place of election in the following order, viz.: First rode two trumpeters and three violins; next, four of the principal freeholders, one of which carried a banner, on one side of which was affixed, in gold capitals, 'King George,' and on the other, in golden capitals, 'Liberty and Law;' next followed the candidate, Lewis Morris, Esq., late chief justice of this province; then two colors; and at sunrising they entered upon the green of East Chester, the place of election, followed by above three hundred horse of the principal freeholders of the county, (a greater number than had ever appeared for one man since the settlement of that county.) After having rode three times round the green, they went to the houses of Joseph Fowler and —— Child, who were well prepared for their reception, the late chief justice was met, on his alighting, by several gentlemen who came there to give their votes for him. About 11 o'clock appeared the candidate of the other side William Forster, Esq., schoolmaster, appointed by the Society for Propagation of the Gospel, and lately made, by commission from his Excellency (the present Governor), Clerk of the Peace and Common Pleas in that county, which commission, it is said, he purchased for the valuable consideration of one hundred pistoles, given the Governor; next him came two ensigns, borne by two of the freeholders; then followed the Honorable James De Lancey, Esq., chief justice of the province of New York, and the Honorable Frederick Philipse, Esq., second judge of the said province and baron of the exchequer, attended by about a hundred and seventy horse of the freeholders and friends of the said Forster and the two judges. They entered the green on the east side, and, riding twice round it, their word was 'No Land Tax!' As they passed, the second judge very civilly saluted the late chief justice by taking off his hat, which the late judge returned in the same manner, some of the late judge's party crying out 'No Excise!' and one of them was heard to say(though not by the judge) 'No Pretender!' upon which Forster, the candidate, replied, 'I will take notice of you.' They after that retired to the house of —— Baker, which was prepared to receive and entertain them. About an hour after, the high sheriff came to town, finely mounted, the housings and holster-caps being scarlet, richly laced with silver, belonging to —— ——. Upon his approach, the electors on both sides went into the green, where they were to elect, and, after having read his majesty's writ, bid the electors proceed to the choice, which they did, and a great majority appeared for Mr. Morris, the late judge; upon which a poll was demanded, but by whom is not known to the relator, though it was said by many to be done by the sheriff himself.

"Morris, the candidate, several times asked the sheriff upon whose side the majority appeared, but could get no other reply but that a poll must be had; and, accordingly, after about two hours' delay in getting benches chairs and tables, they began to poll. Soon after, one of those called Quakers, a man of known worth and estate, came to give his vote for the late judge. Upon this Forster and the two Fowlers Moses and William, chosen by him to be inspectors, questioned his having an estate and required of the sheriff to tender him the book to swear in due form of law, which he refused to do, but offered to take his solemn affirmation, which, both by the laws of England and the laws of this province, was indulged to the people called Quakers, and had always been practiced from the first election of representatives in this province to this time, and never refused; but the sheriff was deaf to all that could be alleged on that side; and, notwithstanding that he was told by the late chief justice and James Alexander, Esq., one of his Majesty's counsel and counseller-at-law, and by William Smith, Esq., counseller-at-law, that such a procedure was contrary to law and a violent attempt of the liberties of the people, he still persisted in refusing the said Quaker to vote, and in like manner did refuse seven-and-thirty Quakers more,—men of known and visible estates. This Cooper, now high sheriff of the said county, is said not only to be a stranger in that county, but not having a foot of land or visible estate in it, unless very lately granted, and it is believed he has not where withall to purchase any. The polling had not been long continued before Mr. Edward Stephens, a man of very considerable estate in said county, did openly, in the hearing of all the freeholders there assembled, charge William Forster, Esq., the candidate on the other side, with being a Jacobite and in the interest of the Pretender, and that he should say to Mr. William Willet (a person of good estate and known integrity, who was at that time present and ready to make oath to the truth of what was said), that true it was, he had taken oaths to his Majesty King George and enjoyed a place in the Government under him which gave him bread; yet, notwithstanding, that should James come into England he should think himself obliged to go there and fight for him. This was loudly and strongly urged to Forster's face, who denied it to be true and no more was said of it at that time. About eleven o'clock that night the poll was closed, and it stood thus,—

For the late chief justice	231
Quakers	38
	269
For William Forster, Esq	151
For difference	118
	269

So that the late chief justice carried it by a great majority without the Quakers. Upon closing the polls the other candidate (Forster) and the sheriff wished the late chief justice much joy. Forster said he hoped

The conduct of the sheriff with reference to the Quaker vote was for some time afterward the subject of ardent denunciation on the one side and of determined defense on the other. It was also made a matter of complaint against Cosby, who had appointed Cooper. The Governor, replying to the home government, justified the action of the sheriff as strictly conforming to the letter of the law, and defended him and the defeated candidate, Mr. Forster, from all aspersions. In this vindication of these gentlemen, the Council, with much spirit, joined. In course of time provision was made by special enactment,[1] by which, where the usual form of oath could not conscientiously be taken, affirmation should be allowed. Thus future misunderstanding was prevented. The excitement that characterized this special election did not, it would seem, attend that of the next year, when Frederick Philipse and Judge Morris were re-elected. In 1738, the Judge resigning, Mr. Willett was again restored.

Perhaps no subjects more engaged the thoughts of the New York colonist in the decade before 1763 than the encroachments of the French upon the frontiers of several of the English colonies, his own included, and then the seven years' war which was the consequence. Every county and town cheerfully made up its contingent. The names on the muster-rolls, which have been so wonderfully preserved, indicate how largely Westchester County contributed to swell the armies sent forth in the several campaigns. As the fortunes of the several battles, sieges and marches varied, the firesides of these country homes were illumined or darkened. When, for example, the capitulation of Fort William Henry, in August, 1757, was reported (seven officers and fifty men of the garrison, all New Yorkers, thereby becoming prisoners of war), a deep thrill of indignation stirred every breast,[2] but the feeling was more intense when the word came that "the French General Montcalm, under his own eyes and in the face of about three thousand of his regular troops, suffered his Indian allies to rob and strip officers as well as men of all they had, and left most of them naked."

On the other hand, when the French surrendered Niagara in 1759, Montreal in 1760 and Canada in 1763, that the joy was almost immoderate may well be imagined. The various muster-rolls of companies raised in Westchester County for this war, to which allusion has been made, offer a suggestion or two worthy of notice. The existence of a well-organized militia force at this period is established by the designation of the captains of the companies to which the recruits belonged. Captains Theale, Griffin, Lockwood, Crain, Holmes, Dennis, Embury, Israel Underhill, Secord, Vermilye and at least twenty others are mentioned. Christian Marks, a German, twenty-seven years of age, five feet seven inches in stature, with dark eyes and hair, is described to be "of the Troop." Can it be that Benedict Arnold, born in Connecticut, eighteen years of age, a weaver, five feet seven inches, with light eyes and black hair, is he of infamy unequaled, and has this county then the stigma of having introduced him into a military career whose later chapters he made so foul and dark?

Another remark comes from the number of foreigners enlisted. So large is the proportion of such that it would appear that the County during this period was receiving large accessions to its population from other nations and other colonies. Ireland, "Old England" and Connecticut are frequently indicated as the place of nativity. We find also that more than half of these soldiers were under twenty-five years of age. A result of these military experiences was to prepare these men, by the knowledge gained, for that other and much more serious contest, which, though less thought of in that time of danger than before it, was imminent and inevitable.

The twelve years before the Revolution which succeeded the Peace of Paris were, however, to develop to the proportions necessary for action the antagonism of which the wilful assumptions of the mother-country was the occasion. Had untrammeled legislation for the interest of the colonies been allowed, it is possible that the military successes just obtained might have been turned into a matter of national pride among the people on this side of the Atlantic, as well as the other. But with an indifference to their welfare ever apparent, an interference was carried on even farther than a concern for her own manufacturing and other industries required. And the consequence, as was to be expected, was deep and universal discontent. And when this is said, it is but just to remember that in those years the most thoroughly loyal were exasperated with the course pursued by the home government, and deemed it neither wise nor fair. Some of these were pronounced enough; others there were who took perhaps too much account of the excitable elements which the war especially had thrown into society,[1] the late judge would not think the worse of him for setting up against him, to which the judge replied he believed he was put upon it against his inclinations, but that he was highly blamable, and who did or should know better, for putting the sheriff, who was a stranger and ignorant in such matters, upon making so violent an attempt upon the liberty of the people, which would expose him to ruin if he were worth £10,000, if the people aggrieved should commence suit against him. The people made a loud huzza, which the late chief judge blamed very much, as what he thought not right. Forster replied, he took no notice of what the common people did, since Mr. Morris did not put them upon the doing of it. The indentures being sealed, the whole body of electors waited on their new representative to his lodgings, with trumpets sounding and violins playing, and in a little time took their leave of him. Thus ended the West Chester election to the general satisfaction."

"NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 5TH.—On Wednesday, 31st October, the late chief justice, but now representative for the county of Westchester, landed in this city about five o'clock in the evening, at the ferry-stairs. On his landing he was saluted by a general fire of the guns from the merchant-vessels lying in the road, and was received by great numbers of the most considerable merchants and inhabitants of this city, and by them with loud acclamations of the people as he walked the streets conducted to the Black Horse tavern, where a handsome entertainment was prepared for him at the charge of the gentlemen who received him, and in the middle of one side of the room was fixed a tablet with golden capitals, 'King George, Liberty and Law!'"

[1] New York Col. MSS., vol. v, p. 983.

[2] N. Y. Col. MSS., vol. vii, p. 274.

[1] The truth is that the cessation of hostilities had set adrift a large number of reckless men, to whom were added, as influenced by their example and fortunes, many of the young men of each community. In his letter to the Lords of Trade, November 5, 1765, speaking of a mob in New York City, which it was thought might storm the fort, Lieutenant-Governor Colden says, "Probably it might be attended with and were balancing the after all inconsiderable, however unquestionable, ills they were suffering against those of outrage and violence which might follow. Indeed, as in the city, so in the county of Westchester itself, there had been already displays of lawlessness. What must have been the consternation in the lower towns as, in May, 1765, five hundred men—country levelers they are called—at first reported to be two thousand strong, marched down to Kingsbridge, and sent into town the threat to Mr. Van Cortland, that unless he would give them a grant forever of his lands, they would enter the city and pull down his house, and also one belonging to Mr. Lambert Moore.[1]

The arrest and condemnation of the ringleaders in these disturbances were satisfying and quieting, but it is not reasonable to suppose that they would allay the apprehension that like outrages would follow should there be a breach with the mother-country.

A glance at the action of the four Westchester representatives at this time of excitement would seem to show at first entire accord with their fellow-members in the Assembly, in their regret at the Stamp and Tariff Acts, in their assertion of the right of the Colonial Assembly of each province exclusively to impose taxes upon its inhabitants, in the lawfulness of intercommunication between the Legislatures of the several colonies and of united petitions to the King "in favor of the violated rights of America."[2]

But the journal of the House in March, 1775, evidences the differences that had developed.

In the preparation of an address to the King, Mr. Clinton (afterward Governor George Clinton), the Assembly having before it for approval the words, "We, in many instances, disapprove of the conduct of that province (Massachusetts)," moved to substitute in place of them the following strong assertion: "The ill-policied scheme of colonial administration pursued by your Majesty's ministers since the close of the late war has been productive of great warmth in every part of your empire, nor can we avoid declaring that we view those acts with that jealousy which is the necessary result of a just sense of the blessings of freedom, and abhor the principles they contain as establishing precedents subversive of the rights, privileges and property, and dangerous to the lives of your Majesty's American subjects." Mr. Van Cortlandt and Mr. Thomas voted aye on this amendment, and Mr. Philipse and Mr. Wilkins voted nay.[3] And yet although this was the last Colonial Assembly of New York, this session lasting but a few days after the adoption of this address to the King, yet how little its members realized the dangers which were so near at hand! This is shown in the following action, within a month previous, bearing upon the interests of the east side of the county. A petition from Joseph Rodman and one hundred and twenty-six others, freeholders and inhabitants of the Manor of Pelham, East and Westchester and New Rochelle, in the County of Westchester, having been presented to the House and read, praying that Joshua Pell, Jr., may have leave to bring in a bill to enable him to erect a bridge across the old creek, so-called, that runs between the said Manor of Pelham and Eastchester, ordered That the members of Kings and Queens Counties, together with the members for the borough of Westchester, or the major part of them, be a committee to view the premises and report their opinion to this House within fourteen days after the beginning of the next session thereof, and that the clerk of this House serve Philip Pell, Esq., and Stephen Ward with a copy of the said petition and of this order.[4]

Chief Families.—In any review of the history of this period, memory will easily recall the names of Pell, Philipse, Morris, De Lancey, Van Cortlandt as of families possessing large influence in the county of Westchester. To these may be added the Bartows, Wards, Drakes, Fowlers, Hunts, Purdys, Guions, Pinkneys and Thomases as families which, for intelligence, wealth, public spirit and valuable services in the foremost positions, have been held in the highest estimation. In them are found the leaders of thought and action in religion, in the State and in society. The judicial, executive and legislative functions of government were being exercised by members of these families during the colonial period. How largely the production of its prosperity is to be attributed to the thoughtfulness and energy of the original Patentees of Westchester County may readily be conceived when the faithfulness which they displayed and the high respect continually accorded to them is considered. If to their successful exertions for the common material advantage be added the example afforded in the whole range of moral excellences, no portion of the province of New York was more favored.

The first member of the Pell family in the county was Thomas, to whom several patents from the English crown and sales by the Indians were made. Dying without issue, in his will he made his nephew, John Pell, his heir, who then resided in England, but removed to this country in 1670. He became a Judge of the county and was returned for the first session of the Colonial Assembly of the province of New York. He married "Rachel Pinckney" and died about the year 1700, leaving a number of children and grandchilmuch bloodshed, because a great part of the mob consists of men who have been privateers and disbanded soldiers, whose view is to plunder the town."

[1] Journal of Captain John Montressor, N.Y. Hist. Soc. Col., 1881, p. 363.

[2] "this House doth Concur with and adopt the resolutions of the House of Burgesses of the Dominion of Virginia."—N. Y. Assembly Journal, May 16, 1769.

[3] Of course in not suggesting before this, the able political pamphlets under the name of A. W. Farmer, written by Mr. Wilkins, the member of the General Assembly from the Borough of Westchester, we have no intention to ignore his determined opposition to all efforts beyond those of remonstrance; and yet we read those papers amiss, and his speeches, and his vote, with all his earnestness of diction, if we are not justified in saying that, beneath, is all the wounded spirit of one who feels the wrongs of his brethren, whom a selfish and imprudent parent has provoked to wrath.

[4] Journal of Gen. Assembly of New York, February 24, 1775.

dren. The family intermarried in the eighteenth century with the Eustises, Honeywells, Bartows, Sands, Wards, Treadwells, Archers, Snedens, Lawrences, Pinkneys and other families of the County. At the commencement of the Revolutionary period the following members of the Pell family were living in Pelham and towns adjacent: Thomas Pell, who married Margaret Bartow, and who lived at the homestead in Pelham, now known as the residence of Robert Bartow; John Pell, who lived on what is now the Schuyler Place; Joshua, Jr., who married Abigail Archer, and who lived on what is now the property of Mr. George A. Prevost; James, who married Martha Pugsley, and who lived on Prospect Hill, in the house which General Howe took possession of, October 18, 1776, as his headquarters; Philip, in the war Judge-Advocate of the American army, who lived on the old Boston Post Road, above Pell's Bridge; David I. his brother, who lived near the same bridge, but on the road sometimes called Pelham Lane, where Mr. James Hay afterward built the fine stone house now standing; Caleb, a brother of James, who lived in Eastchester town, on the old Boston Post Road, where is now the Bathgate estate, and Joseph, who resided in Upper Eastchester, on the westerly side of the White Plains Road, nearly opposite the road running down to Burtis's Mill on the Hutchinson's River.

The first of the Philipse family in Westchester County emigrated from Holland to New York City in 1658, bringing with him his son of the same Christian name, Frederick, to whom at his decease descended his estate, the largest part of which was in this county. This second Frederick was for many years one of the council of the Governor. He was a merchant in the city much respected. His grandson, Frederick, represented Westchester for a quarter of a century in the Assembly, as did also a Fifth Frederick, whose estates were confiscated after the Revolution. This family was connected by marriage with the Van Cortlandt and Morris families. The estates of Philipse were in the towns of Yonkers and what is now known as Mount Pleasant.

The connections of the Van Cortlandt family, both in this country and England, during the colonial period, were very numerous and distinguished. It is a family which an honored State and country gladly recalls to memory.[1]

The first of the De Lancey family, Stephen, appears as early as 1686, having been compelled to flee from the religious persecutions which were then so bitterly going on in France. He settled in New York as a merchant, and married Anne, daughter of Stephen Van Cortlandt. Their oldest son, James, the Chief Justice and Lieutenant-Governor of New York, married Anne, daughter of Colonel Caleb Heathcote. James's brother, Peter, married Alice, daughter of Governor Caldwallader Colden, and Oliver, another brother, held many positions of trust, among which were Receiver-General and member of the Governor's Council. He was also an officer in the French War, rising afterwards, in the Revolution, to the rank in the British service of Brigadier-General. This family, so marked for its political influence, became connected by marriage with the Allens of Pennsylvania, the Lloyds and Joneses of Long Island, the Waltons, Barclays and Crugers of New York.

In the contest with the mother-country, the De Lanceys unflinchingly adhered to the royal cause. Bishop De Lancey, of Western New York, who was a grandson of Governor De Lancey, sustained in his professional career the old reputation of the family for soundness of judgment, fidelity to convictions and trusts, cordiality and philanthropy.

The Morris family, of the county, has held its own under the earlier and later régime and offers a race of stalwart citizens of Westchester County as marked mentally as physically. In 1670, Richard Morris, afterward a merchant of New York, purchased a large tract of land in the lower portion of the east side of the county, since called Morrisania. His property went to his brother Lewis by reason of an agreement made between them, but at the decease of Lewis passed to his nephew of the same name, who afterwards became Chief Justice of New York, as also, in 1733, under circumstances of excitement and self-defence already narrated, the Representative of Westchester County. The different limbs and branches of this ancestral tree are very numerous. The connections of this family are with the Grahams, the Van Cortlandts, Wilkinses, Ludlows, Randolphs, Ogdens, Lawrences, Rutherfords, Governeurs and foreign families whom it is not necessary to detail. The old mansion is at Morrisania, near Harlem.

The Bartow family, of Huguenot descent, has occupied a much respected position of influence and usefulness in the country during both the eighteenth and ninteenth centuries. The head of the family in this country was the Rev. John Bartow, who, in 1702, settled in the town of Westchester, and there reared a large family. His descendants have been among the most valued citizens of Westchester County, and indeed of the country North and South.

TRADE.—In the development of Westchester County, its proximity to New York City was from the first an important element to its advantage. Here was a ready market for the products of the soil. The early settler entered upon his work of raising the supply for his family and neighbors with the knowledge of a sure and easy disposal of the surplus of his crop. There is no doubt that in a coasting trade much was sent both north and south, to Rhode Island and Boston and the Carolinas, direct from the villages of the County, but the vast bulk of what it had to sell went through New York City, the port of entry, to the mother country and various other lands at greater or less distances. At first, wheat, barley, rye, peas and Indian corn were exported, but afterward live stock, hemp, flax, apples, onions, tobacco, cheese,[1] pickled oysters prepared, and then other articles, as tar, bacon, butter, candles, linseed oil, inferier cloths and, for a short time, hats.

[1] A trustworthy and highly interesting history of the Van Cortlandt family, specially prepared from original family documents by Mrs. C. E. Van Cortlandt for this work, is given elsewhere

During the war between France and England, in the reign of Queen Anne, when there was a great scarcity of provisions in Europe, the farmer of the New York colony received a high price for his wheat, and was much encouraged. This effect was far from satisfactory to his kinsman beyond the seas. In that selfishness which borders on nervous jealousy, and which would suppress all industries that conflict with its own, the colonial planter and merchant found his enemy in his own household.

This petty interference was carried still farther, in the discouragement of even what was not known in the commercial dealings of the mother country. The trade with foreign ports and the production of what might be carried directly to the stranger and even to the fellow colonist was ordered to be discontinued. The blindness and injustice of such a policy is obvious. Gov. Clinton, seeing the stupidity of this proceeding, in a letter to the home government, asks, "May not a Colony . . . of Freemen who consume a vast quantity of the Manufactures of Great Britain, tho' this Colony raise no staple which can be imported directly into Great Britain, be more useful to her than a Colony which raises a considerable staple imported into Great Britain, and this Staple is entirely raised by the hands of Slaves, who consume very little or none of the Manufactures of Great Britain."?[2] This narrow course with a people described by Dr. Bray as "so well versed in business as even the meanest planter seems to be,"[3] produced much irritation and remonstrance. But the colonist's labors went on, and under the services of his factor a large enrichment took place. This is indicated in the additions by purchase to the estates of the settlers of the unappropriated lands of the several towns, the frequent changings of the boundaries and the multiplication of mills, smaller roads and modes of conveyance.

Mails.—There seems not to be any indication of a postal communication between New York and any point in this county earlier than 1672. Of course, letters were passing by private conveyance from the very first of the settlements. Expressions showing this occur again and again in the public documents. But in the year mentioned Governor Lovelace authorized a messenger or post to set forth from the city of New York monthly, "and thence to travail to Boston, from whence within that month he shall return again to this city."[4] This arrangement began on the 1st of January, and letters or small portable goods were to be carefully carried to "Hartford, Boston, or any other points on the road," "by a sworn messenger and post purposely imployed in that Affayre," "All persons paying the Post before the Bag be sealed up." The postman was also directed to allow passengers to accompany him. In the "Instructions for the Postman" are the following: "You are to comport yourself with all sobriety and civility to those that shall intrust, and not exact on them for the prices, both of Letters and Pacquets;" "you are likewise to advise where the most commodious place will be to leave the Letters out of your road, which, when having it once well fixt, you are not only to leave the Letters there, but at your return to call for answers and leave a publication of your Resolution, the w^ch^ you must cause to be disperst to all parts, that so all may know when and where to leave their letters." . . . "You shall doe well to provide yor selfe of a spare Horse, good Port Mantle, that soe neither letters nor Pacquets receive any damage under your hands.

"Ffran Lovelace.

"Ffort James, ye 22d of Jan'y 1672."[5]

The following is a portion of the oath taken: "You do sweare by the Everlasting God, that you will truly and faithfully discharge the trust reposed in you as a Postmaster. . . . Neither directly nor indirectly detayne, conceale or open any Letters, Packetts, or other goods committed to your charge, but deliver, etc." This arrangement lasted but a short time. But this project for a mail between New York and the more northern British colonies—a favorite scheme with Lovelace,—it fell to the fortune of Governor Dongan, in 1685, to permanently establish. He had previously, however, conferred with the authorities "at home" and received their concurrence. The Duke of York's secretary, Sir John Werden, on the 27th of August, 1684, writes "As for setting up Post Houses along the coast from Carolina to Nova Scotia, it seems a very reasonable thing, and you may offer the privilege thereof to any undertakers for ye space of 3 or 5 yeares, by way of farme, reserving w^t^ part of ye profitt you thinke fitt to the Duke (not less y^n^ one-tenth)."[6] The next February he fully determined upon the step, after consultation with Governor Treat, of Connecticut, and on the 2d of March ordered that, for the better correspondence between the colonies of America, a post-office be established and that the rate for riding post be per mile three pence; for every single letter not above one hundred miles, three pence; if more, proportionably. It must be stated however, on the authority of Governor Dongan himself, that at the very time this Government arrangement commenced, this transferring of letters was "practiced in some places by foot and horse messengers."

[1] In the Post Boy of Feb., 1766, the society awarded the premium to Caleb Peil, of Pelham Manor, for largest and best cheese, weighing 82¾ lbs., and we are informed afterward that the great cheese which gained the premium was sold at vendue for eight pence per pound.

[2] N. Y. Col. Mans., vii. 7, p. 612 (1764).

[3] Prot. Epis. Hist. Col., 1857, p. 103.

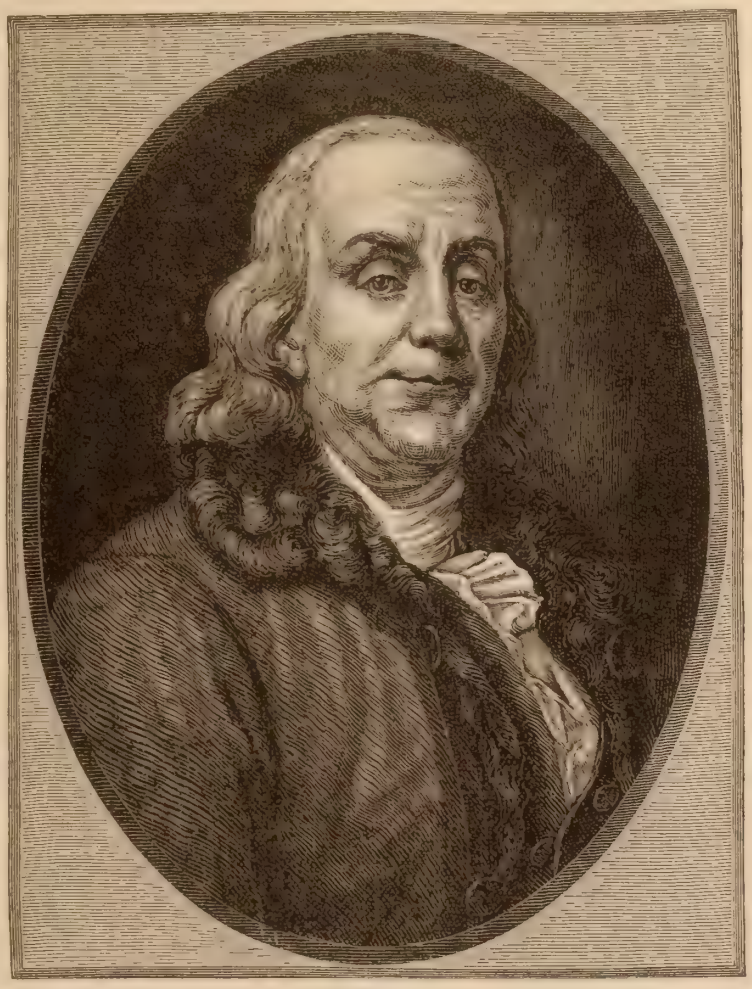
[4] Baird's Rye, p. 72.

[5] "Valentine's Manual;" Gen. Entries, iii. 252, Sec. office, Albany.

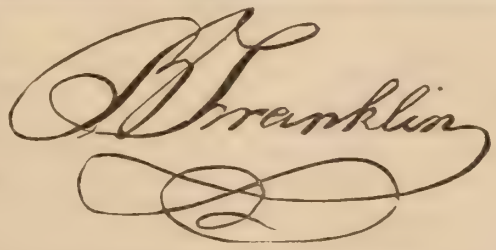
[6] N. Y. Col. MSS., vol. iii. p. 349.

The following are noticeable indications of the existence of this mail:

On the 16th of January, 1689, the mail having just left the house of Colonel Lewis Morris, in this county, was seized by Leisler's order and returned to New York and examined.[1]



The Earl of Bellamont, writing May 25, 1698, from New York, says: "the sure way of conveying letters to me is by the way of Boston, whence the post comes every week to this place."[2]



Lord Cornbury, in a letter to the Lords of Trade June 30th, 1704, writes: "The post that goes through this place, goes Eastward as far as Boston, but Westward he goes no farther than Philadelphia and there is no other post upon all this continent."[3]

In a letter describing the effects of Her Majesty's proclamation as to the rates of coin, Governor Cornbury writes as follows: "It was on Monday the 5th day of February, 1705, the day the Boston Post sets out from hence, several persons here sent away as much money by the Post as he could carry."

In 1704 we have from Madam Knight's journal an account of her trip from Boston to New York herself, and the postman on horseback.[4]

In 1705 Lord Cornbury, sending home for approval several bills passed by the Assembly, speaks of one as "An Act of absolute necessity, for without it the Post to Boston and Philadelphia will be lost."[5]

In 1708, Lord Cornbury states that "From Boston there is a Post by which we can hear once a week in summer, and once a fortnight in winter."[6]

In the New York Gazette of December 9, 1734, is the following advertisement:

"On Tuesday the Tenth instant, at Nine O'clock in the Fore-noon, the Boston and Philadelphia Posts set out from New York to perform their stages once a fortnite during the 3 Winter months and are to set out at 9 o'clock on Tuesday Mornings. Gentlemen and Merchants are desired to bring their Letters in time. N. B.—This Gazette will also come forth on Tuesday mornings during that time."[7]

With little variation this through mail arrangement, from which doubtless the inhabitants of Westchester County derived the same advantages as others on the route, continued on for twenty years longer, when, Benjamin Franklin having been made Postmaster-General for the colonies, entered upon office with determination to increase the postal facilities.[8] The weekly mail was soon started, through the winter months as well as summer, and letters leaving Philadelphia on Monday morning reached Boston by Saturday night. We have the names of two of the old mail-carriers, whose faces must have been very familiar and welcome at the various points along the post-road. They were both of Stratford, Conn., and must have started on their stirring careers about the same

[1] N. Y. Col. MSS., vol. iii. p. 682.
[2] N. Y. Col. MSS., vol. iv. p. 317.
[3] N. Y. Col. MSS., vol. iv. p. 1113.
[4] N. Y. Col. MSS., vol. iv. p. 1131.
[5] N. Y. Col. MSS., vol. iv. p. 1168.
[6] N. Y. Col. MSS., vol. v. p. 55.
[7] Valentine's Manual, 1864, p. 710.
[8] "Franklin himself set out on a tour of inspection, and, traveling patiently over the routes, erected mile-stones (some of which are still standing)." Mrs. Lamb's Hist. of the City of N. Y., vol. i. p. 668.

time, 1728. The first was Deacon Thomas Peet, "employed as a Post-rider between New York and Saybrook for the last thirty-two years of his life, in which station he gave general satisfaction. He died of a Fever in the sixty-second year of his age."[1] The second was Ebenezer Hurd, who was forty-seven years, at least Post-rider and was in the position at the commencement of the Revolution.[2]

NEWSPAPERS.—Although not one newspaper seems to have been published in Westchester County in ante-Revolutionary times, the city press found here its firmest patrons. The weekly mail brought out with it the just published Journal, and afforded for the instruction, amusement and excitement of the farmer, as of the citizen, not merely the events that were happening, but the stirring thoughts and purposes which were offering for examination and advantage. In these city papers are found frequent advertisements and notes appertaining to the country, —farms to be disposed of; runaway slaves to be recovered; stage-lines started; vessels freighting for distant points; wrecked vessels that will be restored; rewards for recovery of stolen goods; prices of merchandise to be sold. Events occurring in the County are also noticed. The New York Post Boy, February 6, 1758, has "the following most shocking and melancholy account from East Chester, N. Y., that, on Friday morning, the 27th of January, Mrs. Mary Standard, aged about seventy years, wife to the Rev. Doctor Thomas Standard, of that place, was found dead on the chimney-hearth of one of the apartments in the house, having her head, the chief part of both her breasts, with her left arm and shoulder entirely burnt to cinders. It appears that the unfortunate old gentleman and his more unfortunate old lady had, upon some necessary occasion the evening before, agreed to lay separate; and the doctor, taking his leave, went to bed, leaving his wife sitting before the fire, where, it is imagined, the poor old gentlewoman must either have been seized with a fit, or, in rising from her chair had fallen into the fire, and, being undoubtedly rendered unable to move herself, she became the most moving spectacle imaginable to the most affectionate and tender husband, who first discovered her in the morning."[3]

The same journal, on the 14th of March, 1765, announces that "last week was killed at Morrisania, at the farm of Lewis Morris, Esq., in the county of Westchester, where it was reared, an ox of six years old that weighed nineteen hundred and forty-seven pounds."

The following advertisements, of an earlier date, are given:

"Stolen, on Sunday night, the 8th of March, out of the Stable of John Ryder, at Philipseborough, in the County of West Chester, a large brown horse, about fifteen hands high. has a small star on his Forehead and goes narrow with his Hams behind. he is branded in several Places, but not very plain, on his Foreshoulder with I H, and on his Left Thigh with I R. Whosoever takes up the said Horse and brings him to his said owner shall have Five Pounds reward and all reasonable charges paid by

"JOHN RIDER."[4]

"TO BE SOLD,

"A very good Farm and Tract of Land thereunto belonging, containing seventy-three acres or thereabouts, lying in New Rochelle, in the County of West Chester, on which is a good brick dwelling House, a well-bearing orchard and good Timber Land; as also three acres of Salt Meadow, in the Township of East Chester, late belonging to Lewis Guion, of East Chester, deceased. Those that are intended to purchase the same may apply to Charles Johnston, of New York, schoolmaster, or Charles Vincent, of East Chester, Blacksmith, and the title thereto sufficiently warranted."[5]

MODES OF TRAVEL.—There were no doubt from the very first intimate relations throughout the length and breadth of the County with New York City and the adjoining State of Connecticut. Business called to the one and ties of blood and friendship to the other. Of course, in a region devoted to agriculture the facilities of travel were in each family, and neighborly exchanges of opportunities were equal to the demand. So also the rivers on both sides of the county offered large advantages from the very first for trade and other interests. But the first known public conveyance, outside of postal arrangements, through this county was established in 1772, as appears by the following advertisement in the New York Journal of July 9th:

"The

Stage Coach

between

New York and Boston

"Which for the first Time sets out this day from Mr. Fowler's Tavern (formerly kept by Mr. Stout) at Fresh Water in New York will continue to go the Course between Boston and New York, So as to be at each of those places once a fortnight, coming in on Saturday Evening and seting out to return by the way of Hartford on Monday Morning. The price to Passengers will be 4 d New York or 3 d lawful Money per Mile and Baggage at a reasonable rate.

"Gentlemen and Ladies who choose to encourage this useful, new and expensive Undertaking, may depend upon good Usage, and that the Coach will always put up at Houses on the Road where the best Entertainment is provided. . . . If on Trial the Subscribers find Encouragement they will perform the Stage once a Week, only altering the Day of setting out from New York and Boston to Thursday instead of Monday Morning.

"JONATHAN and NICHOLAS BROWN."

As stages had been running for some years before this from New York to Philadelphia it appears hardly possible that communication eastward from New should be established so much later. However, very soon two and three trips were made every week between the two cities.[6] And next a stage for Westchester County, going as far as Rye, was started, with, however, the very strange selection of six o'clock in the evening for the return trip on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

[1] New York Mercury, Oct. 27, 1760.

[2] Supplement to the New York Gazette and Weekly Mercury, April 10, 1775.

[3] This occurred in the house of Dr. Standard, opposite the church.

[4] Weekly Post Boy, March 23, 1747.

[5] Weekly Post Boy, January 19, 1747.

[6] Frank's New York Directory, 1787.

It would seem that in 1785 the first stages between New York and Albany through this county began their trips. The stages were drawn by four horses, and the charge was four pence a mile.[1]

Philadelphia STAGE-WAGGON, and New-York STAGE BOAT performs their Stages twice a Week.

JOHN BUTLER, with his waggon, ſets out on Mondays from his Houſe, at the Sign of the Death of the Fox, in Strawberry ally, and drives the ſame day to Trenton Ferry, when Francis Holman meets him and proceeds on Tueſday to Brunſwick, and the paſſengers and goods being ſhifted into the waggon of Iſaac Fitzrandolph he takes them to the New Blazing Star to Jacob Fitzrandolph's the ſame day, where Rubin Fitzrandolph, with a boat well ſuted, will receive them, and take them to New-York that night. John Butler returning to Philadelphia on Tueſday with the paſſengers and goods delivered to him by Francis Holman, will again ſet out for Trenton Ferry on Thurſday, and Francis Holman, &c. will carry his paſſengers and goods, with the ſame expedition as above to New-York. Tcetf.

Beside the sloop advantages for reaching the city and points along the shores of the county, to which allusion has been made, there were also very early ferries between it and the opposite sides of the Hudson and the Sound.

In 1739 a ferry was established between Rye and Oyster Bay,[2] and as early certainly as 1743 one by periauger was running between Ferry Point, in the town of Westchester, and Powell's Point, near Whitestone, Long Island.

Dobbs Ferry, in the town of Greenburg, was so called from a Swedish family of this name—early settlers, who kept a ferry from this place to the opposite shore of Rockland County. Again, in 1755, a public ferry between Ann Hook's Neck, or Rodman's Neck, and Cedar-Tree Brook, in Hampstead Harbor, was in operation, Samuel Rodman and John Wooley being the patentees.[3] On a map of the road from Federal Hall to New Rochelle, passing over the Harlem River at Kingsbridge, and over the Bronx at Williams' Bridge and through East Chester, there is laid down a side-road in that village, which is described as "road leading to Whitestone Ferry," which shows undoubtedly that water communication had been established through Hutchinson's River, East Chester Bay and the Sound with the shore at Long Island.

RISE OF CHURCHES.—The colonists of Westchester County, Dutch or English or French, gave their attention from the first to their religious interests, and held their assemblies for religious worship as soon as they took up their new abodes. We must imagine that for the most part these early services were held in their private residences, in turn perhaps, or at some house permanently by common consent. Their thoughts early turned to the subject of church-building, which was accomplished in some localities sooner than others. In New Rochelle, in three years after its settlement by the Huguenots, a place of worship was erected. It took the people of East Chester thirty years before they were determined to build, although they had asked permission twenty years before, and after this resolve near seven years elapsed before the Meeting-house was ready for use. Bedford, which was settled about 1680, and which that very year expressed its determination to build, had a place of worship within a few years. The following is supposed to be the order in which the early church edifices of the county were erected. The date of the first Quaker Meeting-house at West Chester is certainly much earlier than 1729, for Dr. Standard in that year speaks of it as then in use.[4] Mr. Bolton seems to mark it out as 1747, but perhaps he refers to a second edifice.[5]

NO.	YEAR.	PLACE.
.....	.....	Westchester.....	Independents.
.....	.....	Westchester.....	Friends.
.....	1680–1704.	Bedford	Presbyterians.
.....	1692–93.	New Rochelle.....	Huguenots.
.....	1699.	Mount Pleasant.....	Reformed Dutch.
.....	1700.	East Chester.....	Independents.
.....	1700.	Westchester.....	Independents.
.....	1706–8.	Fordham	Reformed Dutch.
.....	1708.	Rye.....	Church of England.
.....	1710.	New Rochelle.....	Church of England.
.....	1724.	New Rochelle.....	Reformed Protestant.
.....	1727 *	White Plains.....	Presbyterians.
.....	1729.*	Rye.....	Presbyterians.
.....	1732–40.	Cortlandt.....	Reformed Dutch.
.....	1737.	Yorktown.....	Presbyterians.
.....	1730–40.	Harrison.....	Friends.
.....	1739.	Marmanwick	Friends.
.....	1747.	Westchester.....	Friends.
.....	1752.	Yonkers.....	Church of England.
.....	1752.*	South Salem.....	Presbyterians.
.....	1761.	New Castle.....	Church of England.
.....	1763.	North Salem.....	Church of England.
.....	1764.	East Chester.....	Church of England.
.....	1764.	North Salem.....	Presbyterians.
.....	1766.	Peekskill.....	Church of England.
.....	1770.	Poundridge.....	Presbyterians.

* About this date.

The church at Mount Pleasant is the famous building at Sleepy Hollow, and is still standing in excellent preservation. Catherine Philipse, daughter of Oloff Stevens Van Kortlandt, and wife of Frederick Philipse, seems to have taken great interest in its erection and to have been largely its benefactor.

INFLUENCE OF THE CLERGY.—Certain it is that no class of persons contributed more to influence the people of this county during its colonial existence than the Clergy of the various religious societies within it. The Connecticut Congregationalist, the Huguenot, the Reformed Dutch and the Church of England minister

[1] Stone's "Hist. of New York," p. 188.

[2] Baird's "Rye," p. 78.

[3] Bolton's "History of Westchester County," vol. i. p. 546.

[4] Hawk's MSS. from Archives at Fulham, vol. ii. pp. 26–35.

[5] Bolton "Hist. of Westchester Co.," vol. ii. p. 227.

served, in his presence and labors, not merely to supply the religious wants of the many who realized them, but to counteract the lowering tendency of the situation and circumstances of the new settler. Wherever any demoralization appeared for the time, one can easily trace it to the absence of this exalting power for the common good. While it is fully allowed that the clashing claims diminished much then, as it does now, the result of professional efforts, it is yet apparent enough how, in the setting forth of the moral code, in the urgent use of ordinances and customs, in encouraging calls to individual reform, in the exhibition of the results of good and evil, in the discountenancing—sometimes denunciation—of bad men, in the enforcement of rights, individual and magisterial, as well as those Divine, in examples of domestic felicity and order,—in these and so many other ways the servant of God and friend of the people filled up his mission of usefulness. In a scattered population, growing in eighty years from one thousand one hundred to sixteen thousand, these clergy, never ten in number at one time, in some decades not more than three, held up in the most remarkable manner in the face of all opposing influences the moral tone of the various communities of the County. Of course, traditional sentiments and healthy prejudices, still fresh, much assisted, and might be readily invoked; for a very large proportion of the Westchester new-comers were religious people. But the gratifying fact is the more conspicuous, as, amid much to discourage them, the standard under the care and efforts of godly men is again and again restored. No doubt a great source of their strength was the establishment of the Christian dogma by law. The assistance, too, of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts could not but bear witness in the minds of thoughtful people to the value of Christian truth and duty felt by the devout and humane people of the mother-country in thus assisting in the support of the colonial clergy.

But the teachers who seeing these points with the people, and in private and public discourse taking care that they should not fail of appreciating them, the more courageously and effectively delivered and urged the Word of God. In the month of July 1719, Rev. John Bartow, taking for his text, Jeremiah xiv. 22: "Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain? or can the heavens give showers? Art not thou he, O Lord, our God; therefore we will wait upon thee, for thou hast made all these things." Taking up the words of his text, evidently upon the last expression, he comments as follows: "Now, by waiting upon God, in the Prophet's phrase is undoubtedly meant, The making our humble addresses day by day unto ye most wise and perfect being, who is endowed with Infinite power and goodness, the author of our life and well-being, who formed our bodys of the dust and created our souls out of nothing, who in his unsearchable providences placed us in this material world and controuls influences and directs every accident that can befall us, whilst we continue here, and therefore to wait upon God in ye actual exercise of such desires and affections as acknowledge God to be the author and giver of all things is most reasonable and tending to our own comfort in all our temporal and Eternal Interests." Worldliness and vice were thus by public sentiment under the ban and the maxims and manners that are so elevating countenanced.

It is but fair to remember these gentlemen in the difficulties they met with. Isolated, meagrely supported, separated from each other, if not by distance, more by questions that did not allow of confidence, with so many frowns upon them, either from the people or from the ruling power in the colony, they yet went on quietly in their work, to the untold advantage of the County. The Rev. Dr. Johnson, President of King's College, in a sermon at East Chester, in 1755, from Heb. xiii. 14: "For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come" urges, "Let us not be so foolish as to raise any great expectations from this fleeting uncertain world for we shall be wretchedly frustrated and the greatness of the misery of our disappointment will be proportioned to the greatness of our expectations." It is, moreover, to be remarked that the influence thus exerted is in a degree to be referred to the extended pastorates of a number of the clergy, half a dozen of them at least lasting over thirty years.

It is also suggested with no little pleasure that what Dr. Douglass, quoted by William Smith, the historian of New York, absurdly proposes in order to increase the usefulness of the clergy, was realized for their people in the intermarriage of their children. "Our missionaries," says this far-sighted propagandist, "may procure a perpetual alliance and commercial advantages with the Indians, which the Roman Catholic clergy cannot do, because they forbid to marry. I mean our missionaries may intermarry with the daughters of the Sachems, and other considerable Indians, and their progeny will forever be a certain cement between us and the Indians." Contempt for such insolence!![1] But as from the fireside of a Bartow, a Wetmore, a Smith, a Sackett, a Mead, a White, a Thomas, a Monroe went forth son or daughter, to be joined unto godly wife or husband, to perpetuate the principles and heart wishes of their devoted fathers, date the commencement of influences for the highest welfare of the people, which in their effects are seen as visibly in the post-Revolutionary periods as in the years before the strife. Nor is it amiss in this connection, when speaking of the usefulness of the Westchester clergy, to mention the moral support which they received from the efforts and assistance of prominent citizens of the county and province during these eighty years. Col. Caleb Heathcote here readily recurs to mind. He was a conscientious and devout gentleman, whose convictions of truth and duty were definite and decided. His philanthropy was broad and absorbing; but his courage was ever moderated by his prudence. "Artful," he was never. No good man ever misunderstood him, nor without regret withstood him. He was the friend of all that were striving for the public good, and it is not too much to say that the dissenting preacher as well as the Church of England priest had a kind and a wise word from him. Throughout this county the odor of his good work was spread, to the discomfort at the time of none, but the benefit of all. The attempt to change the color of a life, which has been preserved undimmed with one hundred and fifty years of cherished admiration, affords little evidence of sagacity. It is far better to account for its successes, if not by the truth of the principles which swayed it, then by the purity and loveliness of that natural character which they brought to such perfection and winning attractiveness.

[1] Smith's New York Carey Ed. p. 247. Douglass, Sam. & C., vol. ii. p. 138, Boston Edit. 1753.

But we must not omit here the judicious use which the Church of England clergy made, through the liberality and wisdom of the Society for Propagating the Gospel, of two instrumentalities—schoolmasters and religious books—in furthering the best interests of the people of the county. Westchester, East Chester, Rye, New Rochelle, North Castle, Yonkers, Mile Square, White Plains, at the instigation and under the direction of the clergy, were provided almost continuously with school advantages. Says Dr. Berrien, in his "History of Trinity Church, New York," "There is nothing with which I have been so much struck as the zeal, the earnestness and devotedness of the school-masters and catechists of that day. The former seem to have been selected from among the laity with great caution and care. . . Some of these were men of liberal education. . . . Intellectual was not then, to the extent that it is now, separated from religious improvement, but both went hand in hand throughout the week."[1] What the wise Rector of Trinity says of the schoolmasters of his parish was equally true of those whose work was in Westchester County. In answer to the question of the society, "Have you in your parish any public school for the instruction of youth? If you have, is it endowed, and who is the master?" the Rev. John Bartow answers: "We have a public school in Westchester, of which Mr. Forster is the society's schoolmaster, and we have private schools in other places—no endowment. Some family of the name of Pelham that are adjacent come to East Chester Church."[2]

The following are the names of some of the schoolmasters of the county in colonial times: Delpech, Forster, Cleator, Collier, Dwight, Purdy, Timothy Wetmore, James Wetmore, Basil Bartow, Thomas Huddlestone, John Carhart, William Sturgeon, John Rand, John Avery, Daniel Clarke, Charles Glover, Nathaniel Seabury, George Young, Mr. Gott.

The presence of these educated men in the community as levers of usefulness was not a little aided by the circulation among the people of books of sterling merit on theology and practical religion and smaller essays treating on subjects of passing interest.[3] Some of these treatises were controversial, which characteristic in those days was not at all incongenial; many of them would be regarded in our times as very dryly written, but not so by those early settlers. Among the volumes known to be furnished by the Society, were Beveridge's several works, Lewis' Catechisms, Taylor's Holy Living and Dying, The Whole Duty of Man,[4] Leslie's Discourses, Bishop Potter on Church Government, Dr. Bray's books, Hooker's Eccles. Polity, Hoadly vs. Calamy.

Of course there were other books which were reaching the people, some of lowering tendency, some with teachings that the books spoken of were to antidote; but it must be evident, that all this reading, limited as compared with that of our day, both as to range and extent, must have quickened the intellectual and elevated the moral tone. The clergy here were giving the same direction to the thought of the people, towards the true, the good and the useful, that they were pursuing and urging in their discourses.

Relations of the County to the Colony.—It will be quite evident from what has been presented that the county of Westchester occupied no passive position in the progress of the colony of New York, but largely assisted in the development of the city and the regions upon which it was continually advancing. What must be said of the influence of the towns upon each other is true also of their bearings upon the intellectual, social and religious condition of the whole Province. The energy, sturdiness, promptness and firmness of the inhabitants were everywhere appreciated, and while much was received, much was communicated. Sometimes the excessive ardor of the populace found its check in the sober thoughtfulness, the festina lente temper of their country neighbors on the north, and sometimes the dormant sensibility to justice and right was stirred to activity and fervor by boiling floods of resentment pouring down from our Westchester hills. But the relations between these portions were too continuously intimate to allow much of spasmodic action. A more correct statement of what was taking place is that the different portions of the province were all contributing to the making up of its general character and fortune, and this county was among the most potential.

[1] Pages 86–87.

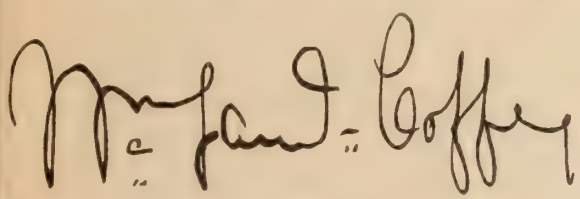
[2] New York history from archives at Fulham, Vol. 1, 635.

[3] Vide Henderson Walker Letter to Ld. Bp. London, Prot. Episc. Hist. Soc. Coll., vol. 1851, p. 182.

[4] This book was widely disseminated, and I have under my eye a very fine quarto edition of this early date.

At this time, New York, though not as thickly settled as her eastern or western neighbors, was the centre of influence. Her geographical position, with the broad Hudson and the great bay at its mouth dividing the colonies, made her the key of the Continent. Her exposed situation as the great border bulwark against the encroaching French and their Indian allies was a source of constant care both to the colonies and the Home Government. Upon her safety depended the framework of British colonization. "Whatever happens in this place," wrote Colden to Secretary Conway, "has the greatest influence in the other colonies. They have their eyes perpetually upon it and they govern themselves accordingly." On the other hand, no colony was in so direct sympathy with England. New York was not a chartered government, but a province of Great Britain. The leading merchants were Britons born, and held close relations with their kindred in the old country. Moreover, the salubrity of the climate and the natural charms of the favorite city of the continent rendered it even then the preferred choice of British officials. The markets then, as now, abounded in the choicest provisions, native and tropical, and there was an elegance and luxury in life which was not only entirely unknown in some of the other colonies, but was a source of surprise even to English visitors, who found the residences and tables of the New York gentry not inferior to those of the better classes at home. Between New York and the English ports there was a constant and rapid communication by swift sailing-vessels, whose arrival was eagerly looked for on either side. Even the local elections in Great Britain excited as much attention and interest in New York and in Westchester County as in many of their own boroughs. Visits to the old country were frequent; nothing was more common than notices in the journals "of gentlemen intending for Great Britain by the next packet." Frequent intermarriages added family ties to commercial intercourse.

BRITISH STAMP.



When the differences with the mother country began, New York being the most English in sentiment of all the colonies, was naturally selected for the place of meeting of a Congress, the declared purpose of which was a loyal demand for redress of grievances. The "Stamp Act Congress" met on the 7th o October, 1765. There were present delegates from nine colonies. John Cruger, one of the oldest and best known, a leading merchant, who for ten years had held the office of mayor of the city; Philip Livingston, also a merchant of great wealth, later signer of the Declaration of Independence, and Robert R. Livingston, known as Judge Livingston, the soul of the opposition to the ministry, worthily represented New York. After a brief session of several days the Congress adjourned on the 25th of October, after adopting an address to the King, a memorial and petition to the Lords, and a petition to the House of Commons.

While the delegates were thus engaged in their endeavor to reach a pacific solution of the differences with the Home Government, the mass of the people were not idle. The years which immediately followed the French War were years of great distress in the colonies. The war period was one of abnormal and unnatural excitement in all kinds of trade, which, ceasing all at once with the peace, was followed by the usual depression. In their distress and discontent, the people, as much from necessity as from choice, began to look about them and to study how they could supply themselves from their own resources, independent of Great Britain. This was the beginning of home manufactures. In this the colonies were encouraged by the arrival of skilled artisans from England.

In May articles began to appear in the papers congratulating the public on the patriotic and frugal spirit that was beginning to reign in the province of New York. The principal gentlemen of this city clad themselves in country manufactures or turned clothes, the material of which was largely made by the industrious farmers of Westchester County. Spinning was daily in vogue by the people of Westchester. Materials being more wanted than industrious hands in the city, the farmers of Westchester soon supplied this need by sowing more flax-seed and raising more sheep. At this time sassafras, balm and sage were greatly in use instead of tea, and the patriotic inhabitants declared it to be more wholesome. Funerals and mourning, which were then expensive luxuries, were modified and their extravagance curtailed. In September we find it announced that women's shoes were made cheaper and better than in England, and that there was a good assortment on hand; wove thread stockings were made in sundry places; the making of linen, woolen and cotton stuffs was fast increasing; gloves, hats, carriages, harness and cabinet-work were plenty. The people were now self-dependent; cards now appeared recommending that no true friend of his country should buy or import English goods, and the dry-goods men were warned that their importations would lie on hand, to their cost and ruin. At a general meeting of the Merchants and Traders of the City of New York, held on November 7, 1765, it was resolved by them (and to strengthen their resolutions they entered into the most solemn engagements with each other) that they would not import any goods from Great Britain until the Stamp Act was repealed, and the inhabitants of Westchester County were not behind any class in the province in patriotism and sacrifice.

The hated stamps reached New York later than the other colonies. They were brought over in the ship

"Edward," which arrived on the 23d October, but the people openly resisted their distribution by violence. The attitude of the other colonies being equally firm, the English ministry were compelled to yield and finally repealed the act. The news of the repeal reached New York on May 20th, simultaneously by expresses from Boston and Philadelphia, and diffused great joy among all classes of the people. On the anniversary of the King's birthday, June 4, 1766, there were outbursts of popular rejoicing throughout the province, and loyal toasts were drunk. The gratitude of the people to Pitt was everywhere displayed, and New York erected a statue of the great commoner at the intersection of Wall and Smith (now William) Streets, in the city of New York, on the 7th of September, 1770.[1]

CHAPTER VI.

WESTCHESTER-COUNTY, NEW-YORK, DURING THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.[2]

BY HENRY B. DAWSON,

Corresponding Member of the Massachusetts Historical Society, Etc.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1886, by Henry B. Dawson, in the office of the Librarian of Congress in Washington, D. C.

During the entire period extending from the first settlement which was made by Europeans, within that portion of New Netherland which, subsequent to the first of November, 1683, was known as the "COUNTY "OF WESTCHESTER," in New York, until within the memory of living men, the inhabitants of that portion of the country, with rare exceptions, were either cultivators of its soil or employed in other occupations which were, then, necessary for the comfort and well-being of such a purely agricultural community.[3] A very large proportion of those farmers, however, especially during the earlier Colonial period, was not composed of owners, in fee-simple, of the soil which they cultivated, that having been held, in such instances, on Leases from the Lords of the several Manors into which the County was largely divided;[4] but those Leases were generally for long terms of years, on easy terms of rental, with liberal provisions for renewals; and those who held them were seldom disturbed in their continued and quiet possession of their respective properties.[5]

[1] John Austin Stevens, Magazine of American History, June, 1877.

[2] This clear, complete and interesting chapter on the American Revolution, in Westchester County was written expressly for this work by the eminent historian, Henry B. Dawson, of Morrisania. No person in the United States is more thoroughly acquainted with the history of the subject here treated, or more competent to discuss it in an original and comprehensive manner than Mr. Dawson. We regret that the want of space has compelled us, with Mr. Dawson's consent, to omit from his chapter a few details which, we think, belong more properly to the history of the City and State of New York than to the County of Westchester. As it is, the reader will find that the entire subject is clearly unfolded before him in a new and original manner from the store-house of history at the command of this able writer.—EDITOR.

[3] "The Inhabitants indeed live all upon their own; but are generally "poor."—Rev. John Bartow to the Venerable Society, "WESTCHESTER IN "NEW YORK PROVINCE, 4th Nov., 1702."

"The people of this County, having generally land of their own, al- "though they dont want, few or none of them much abound."—Colonel Caleb Heathcote to the Venerable Society, "MANOR OF SCARSDALE, Nov. "9, 1705."

In 1711, Rev. John Bartow wrote to the Venerable Society, from Westchester, which was, then, the County-seat and principal Village: "The "Inhabitants of our Parish live scattered and dispersed up and down in "the Woods, so that many cannot repair constantly to the Church, by "reason of their great distance from it."—Quoted by Mr. Bolton, History of Westchester County, Second edition, i., 340. The "Parish" referred to, included, then, the more recent Towns of Westchester, West Farms, Morrisania, Kingsbridge, Yonkers, East Chester, Pelham, and New Rochelle.

See, also, the letters of Rev. Robert Jenney to the Venerable Society, "RYE, Dec. 15, 1722;" Rev. John Bartow to the Bishop of London, "WEST- "CHESTER, IN THE PROVINCE OF NEW YORK, IN AMERICA, July 13, 1724;" Rev. Robert Jenney to the same, "AT RYE, IN THE PROVINCE OF NEW "YORK, July 18, 1724;" Rev. Peter Stouppe to the Venerable Society, "NEW ROCHELLE, Dec. 11, 1727;" Rev. James Wetmore to the same, "RYE February 20, 1727–28;" etc.

"As the people of this Country are all farmers, they are dispersed up "and down the Country; and even in Towns every one has a plott of at "least ten acres, which distances his neighbor from him."—Rev. Thomas Stannard to the Venerable Society, "WESTCHESTER, Nov. 5, 1729."

See, also, letter of Rev. James Wetmore to the Venerable Society, "RYE, "March 25, 1743;" The Parish of Rye to the same, "PROVINCE OF NEW "YORK, BEDFORD, March 6, 1744;" Rev. Joseph Lampson to the same, "NORTHCASTLE, IN THE PARISH OF RYE, February 10, 1746–47;" Rev. Ebenezer Dibble to the same, "STAMFORD, IN CONNECTICUT, IN NEW ENG- "LAND, March 25, 1761;" Rev. Harry Munro to the same, "PHILLIPS- "BURGH, February 1, 1766;" Rev. Epenetus Townsend to the same, "SALEM, "WESTCHESTER COUNTY, March 25, 1771;" etc.

In 1811, Rev. Timothy Dwight, President of Yale-college, passed through Westchester-county, and wrote, of the Town of Eastchester, except "a small scattered Village," "the rest of the Township is covered "with plantations"—Travels, iii., 486—and, of the Town of Mamaroneck, "it is wholly a collection of plantations; and can scarcely be said to "contain even a hamlet. It is set, however, with a number of good houses "and excellent farms."—Ibid, iii., 487.—Of the County, as a whole, he wrote thus: "It is universally settled, so far as the nature of the ground "will admit; and is almost merely a collection of Farms."—Ibid, iii., 489.

We have resorted, also, to our own recollections of Westchester-county, which extend far beyond that day when the quiet and the morals of the County were first disturbed by the rush of a train of railroad-cars and the screeching of a locomotive, within its territory.

[4] In the Autumn of 1769, it was stated in the Assembly that the Manors of Philipseborough and Cortlandt, exclusive of all other portions of the County, contained "one-third of the people in the County;" but the number of Freeholders was somewhat increased, during the later Colonial period, as it was the practice of the greater number of the Proprietors to sell the fee-simple, whenever it was applied for.—Edward F. de Lancey to Henry B. Dawson.

[5] An instance of the permanence of occupation, by tenants on the Manors, is seen in the case of the Anjevines, thus referred to by Mr. Bolton: "Under the Heathcotes and De Lanceys, the Anjevines held "the large farm," [in Scarsdale,] "bearing their name, now owned by "Alexander M. Bruen, M.D., for four Generations."—History of Westchester County, second edition, ii., 231.

Although the Manors of Livingston and Rensselaerwyck and the Scott and Blenheim and Duanesburg and Clark and Kortright and Hardenburg and Desbrosses and Livingston and Montgomery and Armstrong and Banyar and Hunter and Overing and Lewis and Verplanck and other Patents were not in Westchester-county, the relations of landlord and tenant were the same, unless in the rentals, in all; and they were the same as those which generally prevailed on the Manors and other large estates, in Westchester-county. The student who shall desire to learn more on that subject of American feudalism, as it existed before and since the American Revolution, may find very much which will be useful to him, in the Report on the Difficulties existing between the Proprie-

With the exception of the frequently seen Grist-mills and Sawmills and an occasional Fullingmill,[1] the aggregate amount of whose manufactured products did not generally exceed the demands of the several neighborhoods in which they were respectively situated, there were no Manufactories of any kind, within the County; and those who owned and ran the Mills to which we have referred, when those Mills were not owned and managed in the interest of the Lords of the Manors in which they were respectively seated,[2] more frequently than otherwise, were also occupants and cultivators of adjacent farms. The Blacksmiths and the Wheelwrights, the Masons and the Carpenters, the Tailors and the Shoemakers, the Storekeepers on the roadside and the Tavernkeepers on the corners, all of them reasonably regarded as peculiarly necessary portions of every rural community, were, very often, in this, also farmers on a smaller scale.[3] The Market-sloops which, then, made their periodical trips between the many landing-places, on the North-river or on the Sound, and the neighboring City, affording the only means, unless those which were supplied by teams, for the transportation of passengers and freight, which the County then possessed, were generally owned, wholly or in part, by well-to-do farmers living in the vicinity of the landing-places from which they respectively sailed; and, not unfrequently, those Sloops were navigated by younger members of their owners' families or by the young sons of some of their neighbors, of whom one, in every instance, discharged the double duty of "Captain" and Marketman.[4] Even the little Villages which were, then, scattered over the County, some of them made famous in the history of the world because of notable events which have occurred near them, were inhabited, principally, by those aged or more than usually wealthy people—the greater portion of them also cultivators as well as owners of neighboring farms—whose more abundant means enabled them to spend their days, more agreeably than on their own farms, in the enjoyment of the greater social privileges afforded in a country village life.[5] In short, as was said in the beginning, there were few, among the residents of that portion of the country, during the later Colonial period, who were not either actual cultivators of the soil or in some way connected with or dependent on those who were thus employed.

With a more than usually productive Soil, not yet exhausted by a vicious system of cultivation; with a temperate Climate, which was not only conducive to healthfulness, in the inhabitants, but promotive of the best interests of the farmers, in the ripening and harvesting of their crops; with moderate Rentals for the properties held by those of them who were not Freeholders; and with Taxes which were only nominal in amount; too far removed from the frontier to be harassed by the inroads of hostile Savages; and near enough to the not distant City to enjoy the great advantages which it afforded, in a constant Market, at the highest prices, for all the surplus products of their farms which they should desire to sell, and, at the lowest prices, for whatever, of necessities or of luxuries, the products of this or of other countries, which they should desire to buy—in the enjoyment of all these, the farmers of Westchester-county, especially during the later Colonial period, were favored as few other purely agriculturists have been favored, then or since, in any part of the world.

With rare exceptions, these Westchester-county farmers were intelligent men, sufficiently educated for all the purposes of their business and of their recreation—even among the earlier of the several Towns, those farmers included, in their Westchester-county homes, men and women of culture, whose names, and characters, and abilities, as scholars and statesmen, in several instances, are matters of history, known throughout the world;[6] while the intelligence of those of later Colonial periods is seen in the multitude of ecclesiastical and political papers, signed by large numbers of them, and rarely disfigured by the "marks;" of those signers which have always been apologetic of the illiteracy of those who have thus used them. There were very few among them, during the latter days of the Colony, who were not temperate, industrious, and prudent in the management of their farms and their business affairs; they were commonly very mindful of their duties to their families and of those to their neighbors; and they were generally diligent in the discharge of at least their outward duties to God. During the period last referred to, not many among them were not in comfortable circumstances: many of them were what is called "well-"to-do:" some of them, particularly those who were members of the older families, in those days of simple habits, were considered wealthy. All of them were tors of certain Leasehold Estates and their Tenants, presented to the Assembly of New York, in 1846, and reproduced, with an introductory Note, in The Writings and Speeches of Samuel J. Tilden, edited by John Bigelow i., 186.

[1] The notorious Captain Cornelius Steenrod was the proprietor of more than one Fulling-mill, in Cortlandt Manor, at the opening of the War of the Revolution.

[2] The old Mill, on the Pocantico, near the ancient Manor-house of the Philipses, is a notable example of a Manorial Mill, continued until our own day.

[3] "Their employment is husbandry, even Innkeepers, Shopkeepers, "Smiths, and Shoemakers not excepted; so that we pray, pay, and wait "too, for everything done in this Country."—Rev. Thomas Stannard to the Venerable Society, "WESTCHESTER, Nov. 5, 1729."

Within the period of our own recollection, this primitive combination of occupations was widely continued; and every one who is acquainted with the County, now, can readily call to mind more than one instance still existing.

[4] The personal recollections of members of our own family, extending further back than our own, afford ample authority for this statement.

[5] "Even in Towns every one has a plott of at least ten acres, which "distances his neighbor from him."—Rev. Thomas Stannard to the Venerable Society, "WESTCHESTER, Nov. 5, 1729."

[6] Mrs. Anne Hutchinson, of Pelhem, Adriaen Van der Donck, of Yonkers, and Colonel Caleb Heathcote, of Mamaroneck, may be referred to, in this connection.

noted for their open-handed hospitality; but, among the older and more wealthy families, whose fields, and barnyards, and granaries, and storerooms were generally teeming with all the comforts and many of the luxuries of life, the sturdy farmer and his tidy wife, his healthful children and his faithful negroes, vied in their efforts to secure to the acceptable guests of the family, a hearty welcome; to make the stay of those sojourners agreeable; and, when the time for their departure had come, to induce them to regret the shortness of their visit. Where the necessaries and comforts of life were so abundant and so generally enjoyed, Pauperism was comparatively unknown; and where Pauperism and Intemperance were so uncommon, there was a minimum of Crime.[1]

Especially during the Colonial period, there was no Village, at the County-seat or elsewhere, within the County, which contained a population sufficiently numerous to supply the neighboring farmers, nor even its own inhabitants, with the current news of the day;[2] nor was there any Settlement, within the County, which possessed sufficient influence to lead the fashions of the wives and daughters of those farmers. There was not, therefore, nor could there have been, any central coterie or clique, with lofty pretentions and extended ambition, to prompt the County, in what should be said or done by its inhabitants, in support of or in opposition to any proposition, whether moral, or ecclesiastical, or political; nor was there any influence, in any one or in any number, sufficient to associate and organize those farmers, for any purpose whatever. Every one was dependent on his own resources and on his roadside or fireside chats with his neighbors, for whatever information he acquired concerning the passing events of that eventful period; he was dependent, mainly, on his own intelligence and his own intellectual powers, for whatever opinions he entertained, on any subject; and, except on some extraordinary occasions, he was left, undisturbed, in all his relations, by any outside influence.[3]

Such a community as that which constituted the Colonial County of Westchester—a community of well-situated, intelligent, and well-to-do farmers, diligently and discreetly attending to its own affairs, without the disturbing influence of any Village or County coterie—has generally been distinguished for its rigid Conservatism, in all its relations; and such a community has always been more inclined to maintain those various long-continued, well-settled, and, generally, satisfactory relations, with more than ordinary tenacity, preferring, very often, to continue an existing inconvenience or an intangible wrong, to which it had become accustomed, rather than to accept, in its stead, the possibility of an advantage, indefinitely promised, in an untried and uncertain change. The tenure under which so many of those Westchester-county farmers held their lands, which did not permit them to enjoy the rights of Freeholders, at the Polls, had, from the beginning, removed that portion of the inhabitants of the County from the arena of politics, without having created any discontent; and, to a great extent, it had served, also, to increase that Conservatism, even in political affairs, which would have undoubtedly controlled even those who were Tenants, under any other circumstances. There is not, indeed, any known evidence of the existence, at any time, within the County, of any material excitement, among the great body of those farmers, on any subject;[4] and, consequently, there is very little, if any, evidence that the excitement of the earlier opposition to the Home Government, which had so seriously disturbed the peace of the neighboring City, as well as that of other Towns and Cities, on the seaboard, prior to the Summer of 1774, had found any active sympathy, in West-

[1] A personal examination of the Records of the County, preserved in the office of the Clerk of the County, at the White Plains, has revealed, to us, the significant fact that, although the Records of Civil Actions in the Court of Common Pleas, the Records of Roads, and other similar Records, from a very early period, have been carefully made in books provided for the purpose (in one instance, if in no more, one volume, by being reversed, has been made to serve for two distinct lines of Records) and as carefully preserved, the Records of Criminal Actions, in any and all the Courts, within the County, were not thus made in books, until long after the time of which we write—until long, very long, after the close of the peaceful and prosperous and happy period of the Colonial era—when the greater number and more important character of the Criminal Actions—until then too insignificant, in number and character, to entitle them to such a distinction, among the County Records—warranted, the first time, the employment of books in which to keep the Records of them.

If the rough Minutes of the Courts, in Criminal Actions, prior to 1787, were preserved, at all, they have all disappeared; and we feel justified in saying, as we have said, in the text, that where Pauperism and Intemperance were as uncommon as they were in Westchester-county, during the later Colonial period, there was, in consequence, a minimum of Crime.

[2] It is understood that there was no Newspaper established in Westchester-county, until about 1810, when one was published at Somers, and one at Peekskill.

[3] Except wherein our authorities for particular statements have been already given, we have depended, for what we have stated, in this and in the two other paragraphs which immediately precede this, on the knowledge which we have acquired, concerning Westchester-county, its inhabitants, and its history, from the numerous books and manuscripts and newspapers, bearing on those subjects, which have fallen into our hands and been examined by us, during more than forty years past; on the information, relating thereto, which was given to us, personally, in our earlier life, by aged natives of the County, some of them dear relatives, and one, if no more, whose personal recollections extended back, beyond the Declaration of Independence; and on what remained of the character and habits of its Colonial inhabitants, in those old families who continued to linger within the County, when we first knew it.

[4] We are not insensible of the discontent, among the tenantry on the Cortlandt Manor, which led a considerable number of them and of those who favored them, in April and May, 1766, to move down, as far as Kingsbridge, demanding a redress of grievances, and making serious threats against their Landlord; but it was only a local disturbance, reaching only to the limits of that single locality. It possessed no political significance whatever—it was grimly said of it, by a contemporary, "Sons of Liberty great opposers to these Rioters as they are of opinion "no one is entitled to Riot but themselves"—and it was promptly suppressed, without loss of either property or life. Those who are curious to know more of this outbreak of early "Antirenters," are referred to the Journals of Captain John Montresor, 361, 363; and to the Colonial Manuscripts of that period.

chester-county, beyond the very limited circles of those who had held public offices within the County, of those who had aspired to the honors and emoluments of office which they had not been able to secure, and of those very few who had assumed to be either socially or intellectually or pecuniarily above the general grade of those among whom they lived. Indeed, there had been no good reason for those farmers, comfortably situated on their inland homesteads, to take any particular interest in those struggles which, from an early period, the Boston, the Salem, the New York, or any other Ship masters and Merchants had been waging, for the protection of that long-continued and profitable "illicit trade," from which no benefit had ever accrued to any one beyond those who were thus noisily defying the well-known and reasonable Laws of the Country; and, in the more recently and more generally created political excitement, it had mattered very little to the thrifty housewives, in Westchester-county, from whose warehouses—whether from those of John Hancock and the revolutionary Merchants of Boston and New York, or from those of the Agents of the East India Company, in those ports—their teacups should be supplied, since the Tea which had been smuggled into the Colonies, in violation of law, by the former, was quite as expensive, and not always as well-flavored, as that which had been imported, legally and legitimately, by the latter. Now and then, it is true, those of these farmers who were Freeholders, had been engaged, among themselves, in a political contest between the friends of the De Lanceys and those of the Morrises, or between the supporters of the Van Cortlandts and those of the Philipses, all of them Westchester-county Landlords, for seats in the General Assembly of the Colony[1] or for some local object; but, beyond such merely local contests, they had never gone—the "Sons of Liberty" were not represented and had no correspondents, within that County.

It will be evident to every one, from what has been stated concerning Colonial Westchester-county and those who occupied it, that the purposes of this work, which is devoted especially to the history of that purely agricultural community, do not require us to notice the long-continued and ably-conducted struggle of parties, throughout the Colony, in which the Livingstons and the Morrises had been pitted against the De Lanceys and the Colonial and Home Governments; nor will it be necessary, for those purposes, that we shall present, in all their different phases, the antagonism of "the Merchants and Traders" of every family and party and sect, united only in that one opposition to the Colonial policy of the Home Government[2]—of "the Gentlemen in Trade," as they sometimes called themselves—within the several Towns and Cities on the Atlantic seaboard, to some of the long-established Laws of the Kingdom, as well as to those which had been enacted, since the close of the War with France and Spain, for the purpose of meeting the necessities of the Mother Country, occasioned by the enormous expenses of that eventful contest—the unfranchised Mechanics and Working-men of that period, within the Cities and Towns referred to[3] (sometimes, courted and caressed by those

[1] Doctor Sparks, in his Life of Gouverneur Morris, i., 20, told us of an "important cause in which that gentlemen was engaged," before the Courts, during the Colonial era—"that of a contested Election, in West-"chester-county, where he had Mr. Jay for an opponent." We are not told who the contending parties, in that action, were; but it is said, "it involved principles of evidence, questions about the right of "suffrage, as then exercised, and a complication of facts, local and gen-"eral, which gave full scope for the display of legal knowledge and "forensic skill."

[2] It is proper for us to say that that opposition to the Colonial policy of the Home Government, as it was developed within the City of New York, overpowered every difference of family or of sect or of party which had been previously known; and that the De Lanceys and the Livingstons, the Churchman and the Dissenter, the Jacobin and the Georgian, for the purposes of that opposition and of whatever might be necessary to establish its power, became as one man—one in purpose, one in determination, one in action, one in everything.

[3] Inasmuch as frequent mention will be made, in this narrative, of these unfranchised Mechanics and Working-men, it is proper that, in this place, we should explain our meaning of the phrase, in order that the reader may not be misled, concerning it.

By the Act of May 8, 1699, it was provided that Representatives to the General Assembly "shall be chosen in every City, and County, and "Manor of this Province, who have Right to chuse, by People dwelling "and resident in the same Cities, Counties, and Manors; whereof, "every one of them shall have Land or Tenements improved to the "value of Forty Pounds in Free-hold, free from all Incumbrances, and "have possessed the same Three Months before the Test of the said "Writ" [for an Election;] "and they which shall be chosen, shall be "dwelling and resident within the same Cities, Counties, and Manors; "and such as have the greatest Number of them, who shall have Lands "or Tenements improved, to the Value of Forty Pounds in Free-hold, "free from all Incumbrances, as aforesaid, shall be returned by the "Sheriffs of every City, Counties, and Manors, Representatives for "the Assembly, by Indentures sealed betwixt the said Sheriffs and the "said Chusers, so to be made."—(Laws of New York, Chapter LXXIV., Section I., Livingston and Smith's edition, New-York: 1752, 29, 30; the same, Chapter LXXIV., Section I., Van Schaack's edition, New-York, 1774, 28.)

By the Charter of the City of New-York, granted by Governor Dongan, in 1686, the Mayor and three or more of the Aldermen were authorized to make Freemen of the City from among certain specified classes, on the payment, in each instance, of Five Pounds, not an insignificant sum, at that early period.* No person could do business of any kind, within the City, unless he were a Freeman of the City; and as the Freedom of the City also vested in those who held it the Right to vote for Representatives of the City in the General Assembly, it will be seen that, within the City, the unfranchised were only those Freeholders who were not Freemen and whose Real Estate was encumbered with debt; those Freeholders whose inexpensive homes were not worth Forty Pounds—a large sum, for that period; those who labored for others, as Clerks, Journeymen, or Laborers; and those of that shiftless, characterless class, who encumbered the City of New York, during the Colonial Period, as similar classes continue to encumber every City, especially every Seaport, holding itself in constant readiness to join in any act of violence into which such as Alexander McDougal and Isaac Sears, of the period under consideration, shall incline to lead them.

In Westchester-county, the heirs and assigns of Stephanus Van Cortlandt having failed to exercise the privilege which had been given to the latter, as the Lord of the Manor of Cortlandt, of electing a Representative for that Manor in the General Assembly, that privilege was transferred, by the Act of June 22, 1734, to the body of the Freeholders resi-

* A complete list of those who were admitted to the Freedom of the City of New York, from 1749 until 1775, may be seen in the Manual of the Corporation of the City of New York for 1856, 477–502.

who had usually assumed to be their social and political superiors, in order to secure their sturdy assistance in the intimidation of the Government, and, at other times, unrecognized by those whom they had thus befriended, as if they possessed no Rights, in political matters, which the franchised well-born were required to respect) constituting, also, another and entirely independent factor in the political elements of that period, in each of the several Colonies, which, in its very important relations with the politics and the politicians of its day, must, also, be generally disregarded, in this place, because it, and its aspirations, and its doings, are not, generally, germain to the purposes of this work. To other hands, therefore, must be left the labor of describing, in detail, the bold and persistent opposition of "the Merchants "and Traders" to those long-established Navigation and Revenue Laws, which, by reason of a more honest administration of them, by those whom the commercial classes had not succeeded in corrupting with their accustomed bribes, had so seriously interfered with the very profitable "illicit trade"—that more elegant phrase which was used, and which continues to be used, to describe what, elsewhere and among less comely offenders, was and is called by the more expressive term of "SMUGGLING"—in which those "Merchants and Traders" had been so long and so profitably engaged;[1] and we can only glance, also, at that subsequently adopted system of intimidation which had been resorted to, by the same confederated mercantile offenders, under the guise of patriotism, but really for the promotion of their own selfish purposes, in their employment and direction of that other, less responsible and, not unfrequently, less respectable, populace, a marketable class which every large seaport can produce, sometimes in one manner and sometimes in another, quietly or violently, as had best answered the ends of those who had em-dent on the Manor. (Laws of New York, Chapter DCVII., Section II., Livingston and Smith's edition, New York: 1752, 219, 220; the same, Chapter DCVII., Section II., Van Schaack's edition. New-York: 1774, 183, 184.) It will be seen, therefore, that none, except those who were Freeholders holding improved and unencumbered Real Estate worth Forty Pounds, agreeably to the Act of May 8, 1699, could vote, in Colonial Westchester-county; but, on the other hand, the Freeholders on the Cortlandt Manor possessed and, undoubtedly, exercised the Right to vote twice, at every such Election for Representatives to the General Assembly—that for the Representative for the Manor, under the Manorial Charter, and that for the two Representatives for the County, under the Statute, already mentioned. Of course, the great body of the Tenantry, no matter how valuable its Leaseholds might be; those whose humble homes were not worth, in each instance, Forty Pounds; and those whose Freeholds, of every value, which were encumbered by debts, had not the right of voting at the Polls.

The practical effect of that limitation of the Right of Franchise may be seen in the Returns of Elections. In the Election for Representatives for the City of New York, held on the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth of February, 1761, only fourteen hundred and forty-seven votes, including those of the Freemen of the City who were not, also, Freeholders, were cast.—(The original Returns of the Inspectors, in manuscript, owned by us.) In the Election for Representatives for the City of New-York, held on the seventh, eighth, and ninth of March, 1768, when an intense excitement prevailed and all known means for increasing its strength were resorted to, by each of the antagonistic parties, nineteen hundred and twenty-seven votes, including those of eight hundred and twenty-three Freemen who were not, also, Freeholders, were cast.—(The original Returns of the Inspectors, in manuscript, owned by us.) In the Election for Representatives for the City of New-York, held on the twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, twenty-sixth, and twenty-seventh of January, 1769, when another very excited contest occurred, only fifteen hundred and twelve votes, including those of the Freemen who were not, also, Freeholders, were cast.—(The Returns of the Inspectors, original printed edition, owned by us.) In the Election for Deputies to the Provincial Convention by whom the Delegation from the City of New York to the second Continental Congress was to be elected, held on the fifteenth of March, 1775, nine hundred and eighty-eight votes, including those of the Freemen of the City who were not, also, Freeholders, were cast.—(Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1680, NEW YORK, Thursday, March 16, 1775; Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 100, NEW YORK, Thursday, March 16, 1775;* Gaine's New York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1223, NEW YORK, Monday, March 20, 1775.)

We have found only one Return of an Election in Westchester-county, during the period of which we write; but that very completely illustrates our subject. In the Election for the first Governor of the new-formed State, in 1777, the aggregate of the votes cast in Albany, Cumberland, Tryon, Duchess, Ulster, and Westchester-counties, including those of the Freemen of the City of Albany, was only twenty-six hundred and forty-two.—(Fragment of a General Return of Votes cast throughout the State—Miscellaneous Papers, Volume XXXVII., in the Office of the Secretary of State, at Albany.)

In 1783, when there was nothing to disturb the election, the entire vote of the State for Governor, less that of ten Precincts which was illegally cast, was only four thousand seven hundred and forty-seven.—(Hutchins's Civil List and Forms of Government of the Colony and State of New York, Edition of 1870, 75.)

From these facts, the reader will understand how completely the governmental power was concentrated in the hands of the wealthy and how little those who were not wealthy could control the Government under which they lived, during the Colonial era and that which succeeded it, until the second Constitution of the State, within our own recollection, broke the power of the aristocracy and made every white male adult, who was a permanent resident and a tax-payer, also a member of the State and a voter.

*Rivington said the aggregate vote was a thousand and seventy-two.

[1] "The dispute between Great Britain and America commenced in the "year 1764, with an attempt to prevent smuggling in America."—A Collection of Interesting, Authentic Papers relative to the Dispute between Great Britain and America. 1764 to 1775. London: 1777—commonly known as Almon's Prior Documents—3.

See, also, the following official announcement, which was published in Parker's New-York Gazette; or, the Weekly Post-boy, No. 932, NEW YORK, Thursday, November 13th, 1760, which tells the whole story:

"Custom-house, New-York, Nov. 11th, 1760.

"WHEREAS we are informed, that some of our Traders from Foreign "Ports, are now, and have been for some Time, hovering in the Sound "on the Coast, with the View, as it is supposed, clandestinely to discharge "their Cargoes; a Practice highly prejudicial to His Majesty's Interest, "to the Trade of Great-Britain, and inconsistent with that Duty, and "Gratitude we owe to our Mother Country, almost exhausted with "Taxes raised for our Support and Defence. And not less injurious to "the fair Trader; who having paid high Duties, cannot be supposed to "sell so cheap, as those that pay no Duties, and of Course must be great "Sufferers. That this has been the Case, and is like to be the Case "again, is notoriously known; and all for the sake of enriching a few "Smugglers; which together with that of supplying our Enemies with "Provisions,* will be an eternal Reproach to our Country. No good "Man therefore, nor good Citizen, it is to be hoped, will hesitate in "giving all the Discouragement in his Power, to such ignominious "Practices. Informations, openly, or privately will be thankfully re-"ceived, and gratefully, if required, rewarded, by

"THE OFFICERS OF HIS MAJESTY'S CUSTOMS."

* At that time, Great Britain was at War with France and Spain, to whose Colonies, in the West Indies especially, Provisions were taken, by the Colonial Merchants, in exchange for those Goods, of foreign growth and production, which they sought to smuggle into the British Colonies, on the Atlantic seaboard, as above stated.

ployed it, to resist the execution of the Stamp-Act, to prevent the landing of the East India Company's Tea, and to make other demonstrations of seeming popular approval or disapproval, on other subjects of public polity or of governmental policy, whenever the political or the pecuniary interests of those "Gentlemen in Trade" who had employed it, seemed to warrant the outlay of the means which had been required to produce a desired result: to our hand, meanwhile, can be assigned, of all the various important subjects comprising the political and military histories of the Colony or of the Continent, at all periods, only the description of those events, during the period of the American Revolution and that of the War which followed and established that political Revolution, which, in themselves or in the consequences arising from them, directly affected the peace, the happiness, or the interests of those who, during those eventful periods, were residents of the rural County of Westchester, in New York.

The urgent appeals with which the newspapers had been filled, year by year, and the inflammatory handbills which had been posted throughout the City, whenever the purposes of "the Merchants and "Traders" of the City of New York had required their powerful, but, sometimes, questionable, co operation in opposing the Colonial policy of the Home Government, had gradually taught "the Inhabitants" of that City—as, on such occasions only, the unfranchised Mechanics and Workingmen were delicately called, by those who had thus resorted to them—with more or less thoroughness, concerning the personal and political "Rights of Man and of Englishmen," as those Rights had been defined, from time to time, by those "Merchants and Traders" or by their well-paid Counsel, for the promotion of the particular purposes of those more aristocratic gentlemen; and these "In-"habitants" had also learned, from all those varied teachings and from their own well-trained reflections, that the particular Rights which had been so earnestly and learnedly claimed by their high-toned neighbors, were not less the Rights of the unfranchised masses, and equally the birthright of their children. Little by little, therefore, under the leadership of, probably, not more than half a dozen shrewd and able and ambitious men, generally of higher social and political standing than themselves, these "In-"habitants" began to grow uneasy and insubordinate, if not radically revolutionary; and the confederated "Merchants and Traders" and the more aristocratic portion of the citizens who were not in Trade were as quickly made sensible that a power had been created and fostered, by themselves, for their own lawless purposes, which, because of its tendency towards a radical Revolution in both the social and political relations of the Colony, they were no longer able to control—a power, indeed, which, if it were not speedily and effectually checked, would surely overwhelm them and, probably, involve the Colony and the Continent in revolution and disaster. At the same time, it was clearly seen by those careful observers of the signs of the times, that any attempt to abridge the existing power of the unfranchised "Inhabitants" of the City, and, especially, that of those who were less scrupulous in the selection of their means, by open and direct measures, would, probably, induce the latter to employ, in their own behalf, that system of violence which they had been taught to regard as commendable and praiseworthy, when they had employed it in behalf of others; and it was seen, also, by those who had become alarmed by the strength and the audacity of that new element in Colonial politics, strengthened, as it evidently was, by its affiliation with the radically revolutionary elements in New England, the machinery of the by-gone Committees of Correspondence being controlled by it, that, in order to check its growing power, or to secure any change whatever, in the control of it, or to retain the control of the politics of the Colony, great caution and great tact, if not great promptness and great boldness, at some auspicious moment, would be absolutely necessary. An evident danger silenced those who, under other circumstances, would, probably, have favored the employment of other and more direct means: wise counsels prevailed among those who were thus considering in what manner the evidently rising power and audacity of the unfranchised and revolutionary masses could be controlled, without disturbing the peace of the City and the Colony: and it was determined, with much shrewdness, to resort to "art," at the earliest favorable opportunity, for the accomplishment of their well-concealed purposes.[1] Such an opportunity as was desired for the purposes referred to, was very soon afforded.

The tea-laden Nancy, Captain Lockyer, had been turned back to Europe, without having been permitted to enter the harbor;[2] the cargo of the London, Captain Chambers, had been overhauled, in Whitehall-slip, in open day, by men wearing no disguises; and eighteen chests of Tea, which had been concealed in her hold, had been emptied into the East-river;[3] and the populace was quietly reposing on the revolution-

[1] Although there is abundant evidence to support this statement, it has been so completely and so graphically presented by Gouverneur Morris, in a letter addressed to Mr. Penn, which will be printed, in extenso, on page 12–32, post, that no other is regarded as necessary, in this place.

[2] Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1633, NEW-YORK, Thursday, April 21, and No. 1634, NEW-YORK, Thursday, April 28, 1774; Gaine's New-York Gazette and Mercury, No. 1174, NEW-YORK, Monday, April 25, 1774; Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK, 4th "May, 1774," and the enclosure therein; the same to Governor Tryon, "NEW "YORK, 4th May, 1774;" Dunlap's History of the New Netherlands, Province of New York, and State of New York, i., 452, 453; Leake's Memoir of the Life and Times of General John Lamb, 81–84; Dawson's The Park and its Vicinity, in the City of New York, 29–31; Graham's History of the United States, iv, 329; Hildreth's History of the United States, iii., 31; Gordon's History of the American Revolution, i., 332–334; etc.

[3] Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1634, NEW-YORK, Thursday, April 28, 1774; Gaine's New-York Gazette and Mercury, No. 1174, NEW-YORK, Monday, April 25, 1774; Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW-YORK, 4th May, 1774," and the enclosure therein; the same to Gov-

ary honors which, in the interest of the commercial classes, it had again secured.[1] The master-spirits of the confederated party of the Opposition—the Government and those who favored it having no part in that matter of division among those who were opposing its policy—were evidently sensible, however, as has been said, that that unseemly confederation of radically antagonistic elements, entirely for the promotion of the interests of one of those elements without securing a corresponding advantage to the other, was unnatural, and could not be lasting; and it was evident, also, to every one, that an open conflict between the conservative aristocratic and the revolutionary democratic elements of the population, without reference to matters of governmental policy, and only for the control of the political power, within the City and Colony, was likely to be commenced, at any moment.

Just at that critical period, in May, 1774, advices were received from Europe,[2] of the Government's proposal to close the Port of Boston, with a possibility that that of New York would shortly share the same fate; and it was also said that the Home Government also intended to remove the principal offenders against the Laws, within the Colonies, that they might be tried and punished in England.[3] With great tact and plausibility and a greater pretension to patriotism, the confederated "Merchants and Traders" and those who possessed their confidence promptly seized that much desired opportunity, for the accomplishment of their sinister purposes; and, with that end in view, they boldly and promptly occupied the place of leaders of the entire City and Colony, in protesting against those measures of the Home Government, and in providing for a systematic opposition to those measures, under their own particular direction, without, however, having recognized the existence or invited the co-operation of the respectable popular element, within the City, nor those of the very few who really represented and controlled that more unruly element of which mobs were composed, both of which omissions, the meaning of which was very evident, subsequently produced serious, if not unexpected and unwelcome, consequences.

For the purposes of the promoters of the proposed change in the leadership of the politicians of the City, to which reference has been made, "an Advertisement" was posted at the Coffee-house, in Wall-street, a noted place of resort for Shipmasters and Merchants, reciting "the late extraordinary and very alarming advices "from England;" and "inviting the Merchants to "meet at the house of Mr. Samuel Francis, on Mon-"day evening, May 16, in order to consult on meaernor Tryon. "NEW YORK, 4th May, 1774;" Dunlap's New York, i., 452, 453; Leake's Lamb, 82–84; Dawson's Park and its Vicinity, 30, 31; Hildreth's United States, iii., 31.

Notwithstanding the greater significance of the opposition of New York to the Tea-tax, which was seen in the resolute refusal to allow the storm-shattered Nancy to enter the harbor; in the examination of the cargo of the London, and the open destruction of her concealed Tea, in the light of day, by known men who saw no reason for disguising themselves; and in the return of the Nancy, to England, by the Committee who had taken possession of her, at Sandy Hook; it has been the custom of New England writers to withhold whatever of honor or dishonor there was in those doings of the party of the Opposition, in New York, while the less significant "tea-party" of Boston has been elaborately presented as a feat of great daring and of the highest grade of patriotism.

Thus, Mercy Warren (History of American Revolution;) "Paul Allen" (History of American Revolution;) Thacher (Military Journal;) Morse (Annals of the American Revolution;) Pitkin (History of the United States;) Frothingham (Rise of the Republic;) Lodge (Short History of English Colonies;) and a multitude of others, make no mention whatever of the subject of the opposition in New York; and Bancroft, in the octavo edition of his History of the United States, after alluding, in a dozen words, to the storm which had driven the New York tea-ship to the West Indies, very conveniently said no more on the subject—a suppression of the truth which he shabbily attempted to mitigate, in his centenary and "thoroughly revised" edition of that work, by an interpolation of five lines, nearly two of which have no relation whatever to the subject of New York's opposition to the tax; and nearly two others state, in connection with the Nancy, what every novice in the history of those times knows is entirely untrue, in one of its only two statements concerning her.

Strange to say, Lossing, a New York writer, with all the original material within his reach and perfectly accessible, in his Seventeen hundred and seventy-six (page 111,) stated that the Nancy was returned to Europe, only "because no one could be found that would venture to receive the "tea," without an allusion to her having been stopped at Sandy-hook, and returned, thence, to Europe; and, also, without the slightest allusion to the London and to what became of her tea. In his History of the United States, (page 221) all that appears, concerning either the Nancy or the London is that they "returned to England with their cargoes"; although the Nancy was the only one which thus returned, and then only because she was compelled to return. In his Field Book of the Revolution, after having devoted five pages to the Boston "Tea-party" (i., 497–502) he ventured to appropriate ten lines to the greatly more significant doings of New York, on the same subject.

[1] On the fifth of March, 1770, while the motion of Lord North for "leave to bring in a Bill to repeal the Tax Act, as far as related to the "tax on Paper, Glass, and Painters' Colours," was under consideration, before the House of Commons, Governor Pownall, than whom no one was, then, better informed on every subject connected with America and the Americans, replied to the Minister, and moved an amendment, to include Tea, also, in the proposed Bill.

In the course of his exceedingly important Speech, on introducing his motion to amend, the Governor said, "The drawback upon those "Teas, exported to America, of twenty-five per cent, does not amount, "as this argument supposes, to one shilling per pound—it amounts to "only sevenpence half-penny, or thereabouts—so that, did it operate as "a bounty, at all, it would amount to only fourpence half-penny. But "this is not material to the point; for it does not operate as a bounty, "at all, because whatever duty the East India Company pays, originally, "at the Custom-house, on the importing of Teas from Asia, that sum is "added to the price of their Tea, in their sales; so that, although the "exporter to America may be allowed a drawback, yet he draws back "that sum only which he hath already paid in the price of his purchase, "by which means, as this article of supply now stands, there is an advantage "in favour of the Dutch Teas imported into the Colonies, against the British "Teas, of twenty-five per cent. difference."—Debrett's History, Debates and Proceedings of both Houses of Parliament, 1743 to 1774, v., 264).

The reader will perceive, therefore, that the opposition to the importation of Tea, into America, with its parliamentary tax imposed on it, which the Merchants instigated and encouraged, in the seaports—the opposition was seen no where else than within the shadows of those ports—was composed less of "patriotism" than of love of pelf. The Dutch Teas afforded a much larger profit; and a disturbance of that line of trade was not, therefore, desirable.

[2] They were received on Thursday, May 12, by the Samson, Captain Couper, the latest ship from London.

[3] "Extracts from private letters from London, dated [illegible]," "persons in New York and Philadelphia," printed on the backs of copies of the Boston Port Bill, and circulated, in broadside form, in New York, May 14, 1774.

"sures proper to be pursued on the present critical "and important occasion."[1]

It will be seen that no others than "the Merchants" of the City were invited to attend the proposed Caucus, at Sam. Francis's Long-room;[2] and that the published purpose was only "to consult on measures proper to "be pursued on the present critical and important "occasion," in neither of which features of the "Advertisement," prima facie, can it be reasonably said that any stretch of authority had been attempted by those who had called the proposed Caucus—surely, it will not be said there might not be consultations, among Merchants as well as among other classes of the citizens, on any subject whatever, especially on subjects in which they were especially interested, without interference from any other class; and it will hardly be pretended by any one, that, in the instance now under consideration, the Merchants of the City were not peculiarly interested in the subjects of "the "late extraordinary and very alarming advices from "England;" that they might not properly "consult," among themselves, "on measures proper to be pur-"sued on the present critical and important occa-"sion;" that, for the purpose of such a "consulta-"tion," they might not invite whomsoever they pleased, to meet at a place and time designated, without consulting with any other persons or asking permission from any others; and that such a Caucus, thus invited, might not be had, without any interference from any one. There was no appearance of deception in the "Advertisement" through which the Caucus had been invited, in the instance under consideration; and, subsequently, when the Caucus assembled, no attempt appears to have been made to do anything more than the "Advertisement" had authorized, notwithstanding those who had been specifically invited and were present, so largely outnumbered those uninvited intruders who opposed them, that any change from the terms of the "Advertisement" which they were inclined to make, could have been made—indeed, it appears to have been intended, by the Merchants, only for consultation and for the orderly preparation of measures to be submitted to the body of the inhabitants of the City, at a Meeting to be called for that purpose, for their approval or disapproval, without losing sight, however, of what was the real, substantial purpose of the movement. But those who had hitherto assumed to be the leaders of the unfranchised masses—the leaders, in fact, however, of only the radically revolutionary portions of those masses, —saw, or assumed to have seen, in that proposed Caucus, a movement which promised to break the hold on the unfranchised element which, since the era of the Stamp Act, they had unceasingly claimed to have maintained;[3] and to transfer, to some extent, at least, some portion of the leadership of that uncertain and, sometimes, unruly element, in the political affairs of the Colony, to others; and Isaac Sears and his handful of kindred associates, with that audacious disregard of the unquestionable Rights of others which, subsequently, became so conspicuously notorious and oppressive, not only determined to thrust themselves into a Caucus to which they had not been invited, but to turn the action of that Caucus from the purposes of those who had called it, and to give to that action a character and direction which would be entirely foreign to the purposes for which the Caucus had been invited. The consequences of that proposed intrusion and the ill success of that scheme to oust those who had invited the Caucus and to turn into other channels than those which the latter had proposed, the action and influence of the Caucus itself, will be seen in the published narrative of the proceedings of that notable assemblage—meanwhile, it will be evident to every careful observer, that that separation of the radically antagonistic social and political elements which, united, formed, at that time, the

[1] Minutes of the New York Committee of Correspondence. Monday, May 19, 1774; Lieutenant-governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "SPRING HILL, "31st May, 1774;" the same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK, 1st "June, 1774;" Gouverneur Morris to Mr. Penn, "NEW YORK, May 20, "1774;" Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 34; etc.

[2] "Sam. Francis," at that time and during many years subsequently, was a noted restaurateur, known to and respected by every one, of every sect and party, in the City of New York, during the later Colonial period, during the entire War, and after the restoration of Peace.

"Francis's Tavern," where this Caucus was held, had been, at an earlier period, the residence of the De Lancey Family. It was built in 1701, by Etienne De Lancey, on a lot of ground which Stephanus Van Cortlandt had given to his daughter, Anne, when, in the preceding year, that lady was married to Mr. De Lancey; and it is still standing on the north-eastern corner of Broad and Pearl-streets, the oldest building in the City of New York.

"Francis's Long-room," in which this Caucus was held, subsequently became more famous than it had previously been, because it was the room in which the Officers of the Army of the Revolution assembled, on Thursday, the fourth of December, 1783, after the enemy had evacuated the City and the Peace had been entirely established, to take their final leave of their illustrious Chief; and from which, accompanied by his sorrowful friends—"a solemn, mute, and mournful procession, with "heads hanging down and dejected countenances"—he walked, directly, to Whitehall-slip, and was rowed, thence, to Powle's Hook, now Jersey City, on his way to Annapolis, to which place the Congress had adjourned, to resign the Command of the Army, with which he had been invested, in 1775.—(Gordon's History of the War of the Revolution, iv., 383, 384; Marshall's Life of Washington, (Phila. Edit.) iv., 619, 620; etc.)

It is proper to be said, in that connection, that Samuel Francis was "a man of dark complexion," probably a mulatto; that he was known, ordinarily, as "Black Sam;" and that, when General Washington entered the City, on the twenty-fifth of November, "he took up his head-"quarters at the Tavern" of that dusky landlord.—(Dunlap's History of New York, ii., 233, the author of which related these circumstances from his own personal knowledge of them.)

[3] The Meeting, at Burns's Coffee-house, on the evening of the thirty-first of October, 1765, for the adoption of measures to prevent the execution of the Stamp-Act, appointed a Committee of Correspondence, composed of Isaac Sears, John Lamb, Gershom Mott, William Wiley, and Thomas Robinson, to give better effect to its Resolutions, by securing harmonious action, thereon, throughout the entire Continent. The repeal of that obnoxious Statute, of course, rendered that appointment inoperative; but those who had constituted that Committee, with a half dozen associates, continued to exercise an authority and leadership, among the unorganized and marketable elements, in the City, until the opening of the War, in 1775, when several of those leaders secured offices, and ceased to be the "patriotic" leaders of those who, then, more than ever, needed intelligent leaders.

political conglomerate in which had been combined, for purely selfish purposes, the fragmentary opposition, in the Colony of New York, to the Home Government which was then in authority (each of those antagonistic elements being, in pretension, if not in fact, equally zealous in its loyalty to their common Sovereign) was produced by less of respect for righteousness in politics and of a genuine patriotism than of thirst for individual gain to be derived, as was then supposed, from the internal control of the party of the Opposition and of what should be gained through it—just such a factional contest, within a party composed of radically discordant elements, united for purposes which had served to combine those elements into one body, indeed, as have been seen, very frequently, and such as may be seen, now, not only in New York, but in every other community in which such ill-formed parties are permitted to exist, and to intrigue, and to deceive.[1]

At the appointed hour, on Monday, the sixteenth of May, the Long-room, in Sam. Francis's Tavern,[2] was crowded with anxious and determined men, evidently not entirely of one mind, and not indisposed, in some instances, at least, to enforce whatever differences of opinion and purpose might arise, with something more tangible than words, should such an enforcement, in their opinion, become necessary.

Those whom the "Advertisement" had invited were present, in large numbers, and evidently well-prepared for harmonious and decisive action, limited only by the terms of the invitation; and there were present, also, in much smaller numbers, including some who were not "Merchants" and who had not been invited,[3] those who assumed to be the leaders of the unfranchised masses, who had also secured harmonious action, among themselves, by previous factional consultation.[4] Isaac Low,[5] a prominent Merchant, was called to the Chair; and Resolutions were adopted, "by a great Majority," in each instance, First, that it was necessary, then, "to appoint a Com-"mittee to correspond with the neighbouring Colo-"nies on the present important Crisis;" Second, that "a Committee be nominated, on that Evening, for "the Approbation of the Public;" and, Third, that the Committee consist of fifty persons.[6]

As the matter in dispute, between the two antagonistic factions, related only to the designation of those who should control the local politics of the day and what should be realized from those politics, it is not probable that any material opposition was made to the first and second of the three Resolutions which were adopted by the Caucus—none has been mentioned by any contemporary writer—but when the third was proposed, those who assumed to represent the unfranchised masses made an attempt to reduce the number from fifty to twenty-five, by which means they hoped to be able to control the action of the Committee, notwithstanding they were so few in number; but their proposed amendment to the original Resolution was promptly rejected, "by a great Ma-"jority."[7]

With very great good judgment, the majority of the Caucus evidently treated the minority with respectful consideration, notwithstanding the former steadily

[1] The reader need only turn to the history of existing political parties, held together by "the cohesive power of public plunder," for an illustration of the structure, the aims, and the policy of that confederated party of the Opposition, in Colonial New York, and of the factional struggle, within itself, for the control of its united action and, most of all, for that of the distribution of such "spoils" as, in case of the party's success, should fall into the hands of the "victors."

[2] We are not insensible of the fact that the Caucus is generally stated to have been held at the Exchange, which occupied the middle of Broad-street, nearly opposite the Tavern; and that an entry in the Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence stated, specifically, that it was held in that building. But it was called, in the original "Advertisement," very definitely, "to meet at the house of Mr. Samuel Francis;" in none of the contemporary descriptions of the Caucus which we have seen, was it said or intimated that the assemblage left the Tavern, for any purpose, before the formal adjournment of the Caucus; and in the second "Ad-"vertisement," published on the day after the Caucus, by its officers and under its authority, inviting the body of the inhabitants of the City to meet at the Coffee-house, to confirm or amend the official acts of that Caucus, it was said, in its description of that preliminary meeting, after a recital of the fact that it was called "to meet at the House of Mr. Sam-"uel Francis," that "a very respectable and large number of the Mer-"chants and other Inhabitants did accordingly appear at the time and "place appointed, and then and there nominated for the approbation of "the public, a Committee of fifty persons," etc. With these as our authorities, we prefer to differ from those who have preceded us; and to insist, as we do insist, that the Caucus was held, without interruption or removal, in Sam. Francis's Long-room.

For the reasons stated, we prefer to differ, also, from our friend, Edward F. de Lancey, who has stated, in his carefully prepared Notes to Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War (i., 438, 439), that the Caucus was held in "the Exchange, to which place it adjourned "from Fraunces's Tavern, where it was called, on account of the great "attendance."

[3] Compare the terms of the "Advertisement" calling the Caucus, "in-"viting the Merchants to meet," etc., with the official description of those who had been present at that Caucus, which was contained in the published call for the meeting at the Coffee-house, to confirm or amend the doings of that Caucus—"a very respectable and large number of the "Merchants and other Inhabitants did accordingly appear."

[4] A small broadside, containing a list of twenty-five names of persons who were "nominated by a Number of respectable Merchants and the "Body of Mechanics of this City, to be a Committee of Correspondence "for it, with the Neighboring Colonies," may be seen in the Library of the New York Historical Society. It was evidently the result of a consultation of those who assumed to have been the leaders of the masses of the unfranchised inhabitants of the City.

It is a noticeable fact, however, that that list of nominees, with only three of the names stricken from it, was incorporated in the larger list which was nominated by the Caucus.

[5] "Low belonged to the Church of England, a person unbounded in "ambition, violent and turbulent in his disposition, remarkably obsti-"nate, with a good share of understanding, extremely opinionated, fond "of being the head of a party, and never so well pleased as when "Chairman of a Committee or principal spokesman at a mob meeting. "His principles of government inclined to the republican system."—(Jones's History of New York during the American Revolution, i., 35.)

Mr. Low, subsequently, became a Loyalist; was stripped of his property, by confiscation; was attainted; and retired to England, where he died in 1791.—(Sabine's Biographical Sketches of Loyalists of the American Revolution, original edition, 430;—the same, second edition, ii., 32, 33.)

[6] Proceedings of the Caucus, printed on a broadside, for general circulation, a copy of which is in the Library of the New York Historical Society.

[7] Proceedings of the Caucus, original edition; de Lancey's Notes to Jones's History of New York, i., 439; Leake's Memoir of General John Lamb, 87; Dawson's Park and its Vicinity, 33; Bancroft's United States, original edition, vii., 41, 42; the same, centenary edition, iv., 326, 327.

maintained its own ground and voted down every attempt to oust it, which was made by the latter; and in making the nomination of the fifty whom it proposed for the Committee of Correspondence, it did no more than to drop the names of three of those whom the minority had already selected, as its proposed Committee of Twenty-five, and to slip into the list of the twenty-two who were retained, without breaking the order in which they had been arranged on the original list, the names of twenty-eight other persons with whom the promoters of the Caucus were better pleased—as nearly the entire minority was included in the list of nominees, giving it a small share of the responsibilities and of the honors or dishonors of the proposed Committee, its opposition to the action of its aristocratic and conservative opponents appears to have ceased; and the establishment of the proposed Committee of Fifty, by the body of the inhabitants, was, thereby, assured.

It appears to have been a part of the plan of those who had called and controlled the Caucus, to submit the result of its deliberations to the body of the inhabitants of the City, for its consideration and approval; and nothing had occurred, within the Caucus, to make any change in that plan necessary. Accordingly, on the day after the meeting of the Caucus [Tuesday, May 17] they published a Card, addressed "To the Public," in which "the Inhabitants "of this City and County" were "requested to attend "at the Coffee-house, on Thursday, the 19th instant, "at 1 o'clock, to approve of the Committee nominated "as aforesaid, or to appoint such other persons as, in "their discretion and wisdom, they may seem meet."[1]

Notwithstanding the meeting at the Coffee-house was called at one o'clock, an hour when every Mechanic and Laborer would probably be employed in his daily labor, it is said that "a great concourse of "the Inhabitants" assembled at that place,[2] at the appointed time, [Thursday, May 19, 1774, at one o'clock;] and we are also told that the assemblage was addressed by Isaac Low, who was in the Chair; that some discussion arose, which resulted in the addition of Francis Lewis to the proposed Committee, increasing the number of that Committee to fifty-one; and that, the unfranchised masses having been placated by the addition of another of their leaders to the proposed Committee of Correspondence, the entire list of nominees was confirmed, without farther opposition.[3]

[1] Advertisement "To the Public," calling the Meeting at the Coffee-house, dated "NEW-YORK, Tuesday, May 17, 1774," copied into the Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence.

See, also, the same Advertisement and an editorial note thereon, in Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1637, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 19, 1774; and Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 57, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 19, 1774; Gaine's New York Gazette and Mercury, No. 1178, NEW-YORK, Monday, May 23, 1774; Lieutenant-governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "SPRING-HILL, 31st May, 1774;" the same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW-YORK 1st June 1774;" Leake's Memoir of General John Lamb, 87; Dawson's Park and its Vicinity, 33; etc.

[2] "The Coffee-house," that place which was so frequently mentioned in the commercial as well as in the political affairs of the City, stood on the southeastern corner of Wall and Water-streets, opposite the "Slip" which bore its name.

Mr. de Lancey, in his Notes on Jones's History (i, 439) says it was on the "southeast corner of Wall and Pearl Streets;" but he was certainly in error. Stevens, in his Progress of New York in a Century, 1776–1876, 25, correctly described the site of the old "Merchants' Coffee-house."

[3] Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence; Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1638, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 26, 1774; Gaine's New-York Gazette and Mercury, No. 1178, NEW-YORK, Monday, May 23, 1774; Lieutenant governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "SPRING-HILL, 31st May "1774;" the same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW-YORK, 1st June 1774;" History of the War in America, (Dublin: 1779) i., 22; Dunlap's New York, i., 453; Hildreth's United States, First Series, iii., 35; Bancroft's United States, original edition, vii., 42, 43; Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, 327; Bancroft's United States, centenary edition, iv., 327, 328; Sparks's Life of Gouverneur Morris, 22–26; Dawson's Park and its Vicinity, 33.

Notwithstanding the important results which the appointment of that Committee of Correspondence produced, it was not even alluded to by Stedman, (History of the American War;) Mercy Warren, (History of the American Revolution;) Morse, (Annals of the American Revolution;) Pitkin, (History of the United States;) Lossing, (Seventeen hundred and seventy-six; History of the United States, edition of 1857; and Field-book of the Revolution;) and many others.

Judge Jones, (History of New York, during the Revolutionary War, i., 34) supposed the "Committee was chosen," at the Caucus, at Sam. Francis's; and made no allusion to the Meeting at the Coffee-house, where it "was chosen." Doctor Gordon, (History of American Revolution, London: 1788, i., 361, 362,) said the Caucus was called by Sears, McDougal, and others of the popular party, so called; that "the Tories," or governmental party, opposed them, in the Caucus; that Sears secured the appointment of a fifty-second member of the Committee; and that the whole subject was disposed of by the Caucus. He made the minority of the Caucus, the victors; and did not allude to the Meeting at the Coffee-house. Doctor Ramsay, (History of the American Revolution, London: 1791, i., 114,) said "the Whigs and Tories were so nearly balanced "in New-York, that nothing more was agreed to at the first meeting of "the inhabitants," [after the receipt of the Boston Port-bill] "than a "recommendation to call a Congress," although, in truth, the subject of a Congress was not even alluded to, at either the Caucus or the Coffee-house. "Paul Allen," (History of the American Revolution, i., 186) said, "At New York, there was a considerable struggle between the friends "of Administration and the friends of Liberty; but the latter at length "prevailed, by the influence and management of two individuals, who "had, on several occasions, manifested great activity and zeal, in their "opposition to the obnoxious measures of the Ministry," although, in truth, the friends of the Government took no part whatever in the politics of that particular period; and the conflict was only between rival factions of the same party of the Opposition to the Government, each contending for the control of that particular party, while both professed to be equally opposed to the Government. It is also true that those to whom this author referred, as the prevailing faction, were the minority, were outvoted and in every other respect were entirely defeated. Grahame, (History of the United States, London: 1836, iv., 349,) said, "At New "York the members and activity of the Tory party restrained the As-"sembly and the people at large from publicly expressing their senti-"ments with regard to the treatment of Massachusetts;" although, in truth, the friends of the Home Government were, then, so greatly in the minority that they did nothing whatever to restrain the popular feelings; while the utterances of both the Committee of Correspondence and the General Assembly were as unequivocally antagonistic to the Home Government's Colonial policy, as anything which appeared elsewhere. He made no allusion whatever to either the Caucus or the Meeting at the Coffee-house. Hildreth (History of the United States, First Series, iii., 35) said that the old Committee of the "Sons of Liberty" "was dissolved and a new one elected," without alluding to either the Caucus or the Meeting at the Coffee-house; although, in fact, the Committee of Correspondence of an early date had ceased to exist when the Stamp-Act was repealed; and neither that nor any other Committee was alluded to, in the slightest degree, during the proceedings now under consideration; notwithstanding those who had composed the Committee, in their individual capacities, in many instances, are known to have participated in both the Caucus and the Meeting at the Coffee-house. Bancroft (History of the United States, original edition, vii., 41: the same, centenary edition, iv., 326) made "the old Committee" of "the Sons of

By the direct action of the body of the inhabitants of the City, thus duly called, and assembled at the Coffee-house, for that specific purpose, all the discordant elements of the party of the Opposition to the Home Government, in New York, were seemingly consolidated and placed under the leadership of the Committee of Fifty-one, which was, then and there, appointed for that ostensible purpose; and those who had taken alarm at the growing audacity of those who were assuming to be the leaders of the unfranchised masses, were gratified with ample evidence of the fact that the well-considered "art" which those who had planned the Caucus at Sam. Francis's and the Meeting at the Coffee-house had employed, in order to check the rising pretensions and power of the working, revolutionary multitude, in political affairs, had been crowned with an abundant success. There had been, indeed, a display of wise caution and great tact, as well as of well-concealed duplicity, in all which had been done by those aristocratic, conservative politicians; and, very evidently, they had fairly overcome their plebeian, revolutionary rivals, in an appeal to the body of the inhabitants. With a complete knowledge of the small number of those who had previously assumed to represent the masses of the unfranchised inhabitants, and with as complete a knowledge of the general harmlessness of those masses, in the absence of their self-constituted leaders, the high-toned promoters of the unpublished scheme of abridging the political power of the great body of the people had disarmed the former of their animosity, by rendering them harmless, as the helpless minority of the Committee of Fifty-one[1]—an empty honor with which, however, for the time being, they were evidently satisfied—while the latter were made contented, for a short time, also, by receiving a recognition of their political pretensions, in the privilege which was extended to them of confirming or rejecting the nominations made by the Caucus, among whom, with two or three exceptions, the names of their self-constituted leaders were conspicuously presented.[2]

"Liberty," "convoke the inhabitants of their City" to the Caucus at Sam. Francis's, although it was called by their aristocratic and conservative rivals in the party of the Opposition, and without any consultation with that Committee, if there was one, or with those who were in harmony with it. He said, also, "the Motion prevailed to supersede the "old Committee of Correspondence by a new one of fifty;" although neither of the three Resolutions of the Caucus contained the slightest allusion to any such supersedure, nor to any other Committee or body or person whatever than to the proposed Committee of fifty, which it nominated. He said of the Meeting at the Coffee-house, "and the nom-"ination of the Committee was accepted, even with the addition of Isaac "Low as its Chairman, who was more of a loyalist than a patriot;" although, in fact, Isaac Low's name was on the list which had been nominated at the Caucus, against which no opposition was made; and the only "addition" which was made by the Meeting was that of Francis Lewis, whose name had been included on the original list of the minority, and rejected by the Caucus. The Meeting at the Coffee-house made no attempt to supply the Committee of Fifty-one with a Chairman, in the person of Isaac Low, as Bancroft has stated: Isaac Low was called to that place by the Committee itself, at its first Meeting, on Monday, May 23, as its Minutes abundantly prove. Doctor Sparks, (Life of Gouverneur Morris, i., 22,) merged the doings of the Caucus and the Meeting at the Coffee-house, into one mass; made Isaac Sears the master spirit of all that was done; and said "the Committee consisted of "a nearly equal number of both parties, but with a preponderance on "the liberal side;" although the truth was, the friends the Home Government took no part whatever, in either of those meetings; that both were composed of only those who opposed the Home Government; that the struggle, in each of the two assemblages, was between conflicting factions of the latter party; that, in both, the faction of the aristocratic conservative element of the party outvoted and defeated the faction representing, or pretending to represent, the unfranchised masses; that the Committee contained a large proportion of those who belonged, at that time, to the aristocratic conservative faction of the party; and that it is not known, nor is it supposed, that a single person was named on the Committee, who was not, at that time, opposed to the Colonial policy of the Home Government. Indeed, as Judge Jones, whose opportunities for ascertaining the exact truth and whose integrity and fearlessness in uttering it no one will seriously question, has emphatically stated, "all parties, denominations, and religions, apprehended, at that time, "that the Colonies laboured under grievances which wanted redressing;" and no one, therefore, opposed any reasonable movement which tended, or appeared to tend, to a peaceful redress of those serious grievances.

It will be seen, from this comparison of the original authorities with the use which has been made of them by the several leading writers of history in our country, just how little or how much reliance can be placed on what is called "history," in what relates to less important subjects, while this, which was second to few others, in the history of the Revolution, has been treated with so little of respect and of fidelity to the truth.

[1] Lieutenant-governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "SPRING-HILL 31st "May, 1774;" the same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK June 1st "1774;" Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 34; Leake's Memoir of General John Lamb, 87; Dawson's History of the Park and its Vicinity, 33; Bancroft's United States, original edition, vii., 41, 42; the same, centenary edition, iv., 327; etc.

Of the fifty-one members of the Committee, a very great majority were of the aristocratic, conservative, anti revolutionary portions of the inhabitants. On the fourth of July, when a test question was before it, thirty-eight members being present, only thirteen votes were cast by those who assumed to represent the unfranchised inhabitants; and in the greater contest, three days afterwards, on Mr. Thurber's Resolution, disavowing the proceedings of the great popular "Meeting in the Fields," over which Alexander McDougal had presided, only nine votes were cast in opposition to the vote of disavowal.

It may also be stated, in this place, that, notwithstanding none of the fifty-one, at that time, were of the Governmental party, but, on the contrary, that every one was earnestly opposed to the Colonial policy of the Home Government, twenty-one of the number, at a subsequent period, became acknowledged Loyalists; that a considerable number took no active part in the proceedings of the Committee, but could have been relied on, by the aristocratic, conservative leaders, had their presence and their votes been, at any time, needed; and that a greater number than there were of the last-named class—a working majority of the Committee, indeed—included such as John Alsop, Gabriel H. Ludlow, John Jay, and James Duane, who invariably acted and voted with the aristocratic, anti-revolutionary portion of the Committee, and, until they became candidates for the Congress, always in opposition to the revolutionary leaders and the revolutionary purposes.

Well might the exiled Judge, Thomas Jones, writing of this Committee, in the light of subsequent events, say, within ten years of its creation, notwithstanding what he had said of the opposition to the Colonial policy of the Home Government, which all of them had presented, "The "majority were real friends to Government." —(History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 34.)

[2] For the purpose of providing an additional authority, concerning much that has been stated, in this work, concerning the relations which existed between the confederated "Merchants and Traders" and other high-toned citizens, and the more numerous, but unfranchised, "Inhabi-"tants of the City and County;" concerning the desire of the former to abridge the influence which had been secured by the latter, while they were subject to the frequent appeals of the former; and concerning the formation of the "Committee of Correspondence," since known as the "Committee of Fifty one," for the purpose of recovering, to the confederated, conservative "Merchants and Traders" and the Gentry, the control of the political affairs of the City, we invite attention to the following very important Letter, written by a Westchester-county gentleman, who, when he could no longer serve the party of the Home Government,

The Committee which was thus created by the aristocratic, anti-revolutionary portion of those who, at that time, were opposing the Colonial policy of the Home Government, was largely intended, as we have shown, to serve as a check on the rising power, in political affairs, of the unfranchised Mechanics and Workingmen of the City of New York, especially of the revolutionary faction of those Working-men, while it would tend, also, to concentrate in "the Merchants "and Traders" and Gentry of the City, thus confederated for the exercise of it, all of that political power, especially in matters of national concern, which that City and Province, at that time, could command, without the existence of a thought, among those who had promoted the scheme, if such a thought had any-a people, at such a time, and under such circumstances as then existed, and which would probably continue to exist, might, also, sensibly or insensibly, weaken if where existed, that such an organization, among such it should not destroy all those bonds of recognized dependence, and loyalty, and love, which, hitherto, had so firmly bound the Colony to the Mother Country. But, notwithstanding the evident intentions of those among whom the thought of creating such a Committee had originated; notwithstanding the purposes for which it had been created included no such purpose; and notwithstanding a separation of the Colonies from the Mother Country had not yet become one of the questions of the day, that Committee of Correspondence in the City of New York, created and was among the earliest to become its nominal opponent; and, subsequently, to pose as a distinguished "patriot" and as a not less distinguished republican statesman:

"NEW YORK, May 20, 1774.

"DEAR SIR:

"You have heard, and you will hear, a great deal about politics; "and in the heap of Chaff you may find some grains of good sense. Be-"lieve me, Sir, Freedom and Religion are only watchwords. We have "appointed a Committee, or, rather, we have nominated one. Let me "give you the history of it.

"It is needless to premise, that the lower orders of Mankind are more "easily led by specious appearances than those of a more exalted station. "This, and many similar propositions, you know better than your hum-"ble servant.

"The troubles in America, during Grenville's Administration, put our "Gentry upon this finesse. They stimulated some daring Coxcombs to "rouse the Mob into an attack upon the bounds of order and decency. "These fellows became the Jack Cades of the day, the Leaders in all the "Riots, the Bellwethers of the Flock. The reason of the manœuvre, in "those who wished to keep fair with the Government and, at the same "time, to receive the incense of popular applause, you will readily per-"ceive. On the whole, the Shepards were not much to blame, in a po-"litical point of view. The Bellwethers jingled merrily, and roared "out, 'Liberty,' and 'Property,' and 'Religion,' and a multitude of "cant terms, which every one thought he understood, and was egregi-"ously mistaken; for you must know the Shepherds kept the Dictionary "of the Day; and, like the Mysteries of the ancient Mythology, it was "not for profane eyes and ears. This answered many purposes: the "simple Flock put themselves entirely under the protection of these "most excellent Shepherds.

"By-and-bye, behold a great metamorphosis, without the help of Ovid "or his Divinities; but entirely effectuated by two modern Genii, the "God of Ambition and the Goddess of Faction. The first of these "prompted the Shepherds to shear some of their Flock; and, then, in "conjunction with the other, converted the Bellwethers into Shepherds. "That we have been in hot water with the British Parliament, ever "since, every body knows: consequently these new Shepherds have had "their hands full of employment. The old ones kept themselves least in "sight; and a want of confidence in each other was not the least evil "which followed. The Port of Boston has been shut up. These Sheep, "simple as they are, cannot be gulled, as heretofore. In short, there is "no ruling them; and, now, to leave the metaphor, the heads of the "Mobility grow dangerous to the Gentry; and how to keep them down "is the question.

"While they correspond with the other Colonies, call and dismiss "popular Assemblies, make Resolves to bind the Consciences of the rest "of Mankind, bully poor Printers, and exert with full force all their "other tribunitial powers, it is impossible to curb them. But Art some-"times goes farther than Force; and, therefore, to trick them hand-"somely, a Committee of Patricians was to be nominated; and into their "hands was to be committed the Majesty of the People; and the highest "trust was to be reposed in them by a mandate that they should take "care, quod respublica non capiat injuriam. The Tribunes, through the "want of good legerdemain in the senatorial order, perceived the finesse; "and, yesterday, I was present at a grand division of the City; and, "there, I beheld my fellow-citizens very accurately counting all their "Chickens, not only before any of them were hatched, but before above "one half of the Eggs were laid. In short, they fairly contended about "the future forms of our Government, whether it should be founded "upon aristocratic or democratic principles.

"I stood in the Balcony; and, on my right hand were ranged all the "people of property, with some few poor dependants; and, on the other, "all the Tradesmen, etc., who thought it worth their while to leave "their daily labour for the good of the Country. The spirit of the "English Constitution has yet a little influence left, and but a little. "The remains of it, however, will give the wealthy people a superiority, "this time; but, would they secure it, they must banish all Schoolmas-"ters and confine all Knowledge to themselves. This cannot be. The "Mob begin to think and to reason. Poor Reptiles! it is, with them, a "vernal Morning; they are struggling to cast off their Winter's Slough; "they bask in the Sunshine; and, ere Noon, they will bite, depend "upon it. The Gentry begin to fear this. Their Committee will be "appointed; they will deceive the People; and, again, they will forfeit "a share of their Confidence. And if these instances of what with one "side is Policy, with the other Perfidy, shall continue to increase, and "become more frequent, farewell, Aristocracy. I see, and I see it with "fear and trembling, that if the Disputes with Great Britain continue, "we shall be under the worst of all possible dominions; we shall be "under the domination of a riotous Mob.

"It is the interest of all men, therefore, to seek for re-union with the "parent State. A safe Compact seems, in my poor opinion, to be now "tendered. Internal taxation to be left with ourselves. The right of "regulating Trade to be vested in Britain, where alone is found the "power of protecting it. I trust you will agree with me, that this is "the only possible mode of union. * * * *

"I am, Sir,, etc,,

"MR. PENN. "GOUVERNEUR MORRIS."

It was never pretended, if our memory serves us correctly, that the writer of this letter was a democratic republican: our readers can easily determine, from his contemptuous words, while describing the unfranchised Mechanics and Working-men of this City, how little of a republican of any other class, how much of a believer of the political dogma of the unqualified equality of all men, he was, notwithstanding what some historians, so called, have written of him.

In the same spirit, was that note written by James Rivington, of New York, and received by Henry Knox, of Boston, subsequently a General in the Army of the Revolution and Secretary of War under President Washington, and (in his own estimation) never one of the people, which note was detected by the revolutionary leaders in Boston, and communicated to the "Sons of Liberty," in New York, by note, dated 19 June, 1774. The words used by Rivington were these: "You may rest as-"sured that no non-im-, nor non-ex-portation will be agreed upon "either here or at Philadelphia. The power over our crowd is no "longer in the hands of Sears, Lamb, and such unimportant persons, "who have for six years past, been the demagogues of a very turbulent "faction in this City; but their power and mischievous capacity ex-"pired instantly upon the election of the Committee of Fifty-one, in "which there is a majority of inflexibly honest, loyal, and prudent "citizens."—(MS. letter of Thomas Young to John Lamb, "BOSTON, 19th "June, 1774," in the "Lamb Papers," New York Historical Society's Library.)

fostered by the most aristocratic of her citizens, from the beginning of its existence, was one of the most powerful of those instrumentalities which, at that very time, were sapping the foundations of the Throne, in the Colonies; and it was through the proposition and the persistent effort of that particular Committee, that, very soon after it was organized, another and yet more influential body was created, composed of influential and able men, mainly from the higher classes of society, by whom, not long afterwards, the Home Government was arraigned before the bar of the entire world, on well-sustained charges of Usurpation and Oppression; by whom, also, the standard of a united Rebellion of all the Colonies was raised; and by whom a revolutionary power, united and energetic, extending throughout the entire seaboard, was raised for its support. In opposition to the purposes and the demands of the small revolutionary element, in New York—in opposition, also, to the leaders and the revolutionary populace, in Boston, with whom the revolutionary leaders in New York were in constant correspondence and in entire harmony—the Committee which the conservative, anti-revolutionary aristocracy of New York had thus created for the protection and the promotion of its own particular interests, the domestic as well as the foreign, originally proposed and persistently insisted on the organization of a Congress of Delegates from all the Colonies, for the united consideration of all the matters in difference between all the Colonies and the Home Government; and it was that Congress, thus called into existence by an anti-revolutionary body, by assuming authority which had not been delegated to it and by disregarding the expressed opinions and intentions of those who were represented therein—at the expense, also, of its own consistency, in excepting one of the Colonies from the provisions of its Association, in order to secure the vote of that Colony for the enforcement of that Association upon all the other Colonies—which not only closed the door of reconciliation with the Mother Country, which it was expected to have opened to its widest extent; but, practically, it organized a systematic and general Revolution, throughout the entire seaboard, which, ultimately, led to the overthrow of all monarchial power, within the entire territory of each and every one of its several constituent Colonies. Such a notable instance of the thing which had been created for a specific purpose, having been turned, in the progress of events, by the tact of a small proportion of its members, without violence and by some of those who had favored and assisted in the construction of it, against the greater number of those who had created it and for the overthrow of their purposes in having done so, as was seen in the instance of that Committee of Correspondence in New York and in its notable results, is worthy of notice and remembrance; and it may well serve, also, as a perpetual reminder, to those whose political conduct has not been altogether honest, and whose inclinations have, sometimes, been directed toward something else than that which has been indicated by their professions, that

> "There's a Divinity that shapes our ends,
> "Rough hew them how we will."

While the consolidated Opposition, in the City of New York, was thus actively employed in making preparations for a vigorous opposition to the latest measures of the Home Government and, in order to make that opposition more effective, in transferring the leadership of the confederated party of the Opposition from the few who had previously assumed to lead the revolutionary portion of the unfranchised masses, in the violent proceedings in which, from time to time, the latter had been engaged, to the greater number, of higher social and pecuniary and political standing, who formed the large majority of the Committee of Correspondence which it was creating, as its leader, in its opposition to the Ministry, the Town of Boston, also, was anxiously and carefully preparing for the coming catastrophe.

On the evening of Tuesday, the tenth of May,[1] Captain Shayler arrived in the latter place, bringing intelligence of the passage of the Act of Parliament closing that Port. On the following day, Wednesday, the eleventh of May, the Committees of Correspondence from eight of the adjacent Towns were invited to meet the Boston Committee, for consultation;[2] and on Thursday, the twelfth of May, those Committees assembled at Faneuil Hall, with Samuel Adams in the Chair and Joseph Warren acting as the leader, on the floor, and determined to send "Circular Letters" to the several Committees of Correspondence, where such Committees existed, in the other Colonies, urging, as the only proposed remedy for the threatened grievances, a renewal of that Non-Importation Association which, during the excitement which had followed the passage of the Stamp-Act, had been productive of so much success.[3] On Friday, the thirteenth of May, a Meeting of the Freeholders and other inhabitants of the Town, legally qualified and duly warned, was holden in Faneuil Hall, Samuel Adams being in the Chair, at which it was voted, "that it is the opinion of this Town, that, if the other "Colonies come into a joint Resolution to stop all "Importation from Great Britain and Exportation to "Great Britain and every part of the West Indies, till

[1] The Massachusetts Gazette of Thursday, May 12, 1774, printed the text of the Boston Port-bill, in full, with the following heading: "Tues- "day arrived here Captain Shayler, in a Brig from London, who brought "the most interesting and important Advices that ever was received at "the Port of Boston."

See, also, Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 34; the same, centenary edition, iv., 321; Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, 3.0, etc.

[2] Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 35; the same, centenary edition, iv., 321; Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, 3.1.

[3] Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 35–37; the same, centenary edition, iv., 321–323; Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, 321, etc.

"the Act for blocking up this Harbour be repealed, "the same will prove the Salvation of North America "and her Liberties. On the other hand, if they con- "tinue their Exports and Imports, there is high reason "to fear that Fraud, Power, and the most odious Op- "pression will rise, triumphant, over Right, Justice, "Social Happiness, and Freedom." It was also "Ordered, that this Vote be forthwith transmitted by "the Moderator to all our sister Colonies, in the "Name and Behalf of the Town."

It will be seen, in these faithful statements of the doings of the leaders of the revolutionary party and of the doings of the revolutionary party, itself, in Boston, in May, 1774, that Massachusetts-men, there and at that time, recognized the existence of no grievance whatever, in any of the Colonies, except that which had been inflicted on Boston, in the passage of the Boston Port-Bill; that they elevated that local grievance, which had been inflicted only as a penalty for local offences against existing Statutes, to the level of that general Stamp-Act, which had been inflicted on every Colonist, throughout the entire Continent, not as a penalty for wrong doing, but as a general Tax, levied only for the increase of the national Revenue; that they considered that a general determination, by all the Colonies, from Nova Scotia to Florida, to hold no commercial intercourse whatever with the Mother Country and with all the West Indian Colonies, foreign as well as British, was necessary for the protection of the delinquent Town from the threatened consequences of its persistent violation of the Laws of the Nation; that they arrogantly assumed that general action of all the Colonies must be taken, uniformly, in a distinct and clearly defined line, which those Massachusetts-men specifically and definitely laid down, and in no other line whatever, leaving nothing to the choice or the better judgment or the existing circumstances of any others, any where; that even their New England ingenuity contrived no other remedy for their merely local grievance than that specific suspension of the entire agricultural and manufacturing industries of all the Colonies, except to the extent of supplying the demand for the productions of their industries for home-consumption only, as well as the specific suspension of all the Commerce of all the Colonies, except that with the French Colonies of St. Pierre and Miquelon, on the coast of Newfoundland—with which, by the bye, so large a portion of the smuggling by Massachusetts-men was, then and subsequently, carried on[2]—all of which, without any possible abatement, they definitely proposed and positively insisted on; and that, in their complacency, they dared, also, to assert, if not to threaten, that the consequence of disobedience to their audacious proposition, in any of the Colonies, would be the triumphant rise of Fraud, Power, and the most odious Oppression, over Right, Justice, Social Happiness, and Freedom.[3] In short, the principles and "patriotic" impulses of those men of Boston began and ended in the proposed promotion of nothing else than their own individual and local interests, at the expense of the entire prostration of business, internal as well as external, except that of Smuggling, from one extremity to the other of the Atlantic seaboard—the warp, the woof, and the filling of their neatly woven web were, in fact, nothing else, whatever, than unadulterated, audacious selfishness; and that selfishness, in that particular connection, was seen, more distinctly than it had previously been seen, when, a few weeks afterwards, the alms of the Continent, which had been sent for the particular relief of the sick and suffering poor of Boston, whom, it was said, the Port-Bill had

[1] Proceedings of the Meeting, in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 331, and in Dawson's The Park and its Vicinity, 32.

See, also, Letter from Thomas Young to John Lamb, "BOSTON, May 13, "1774;" Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1637, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 19, 1774; Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 57, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 19, 1774; Gaine's New-York Gazette and Mercury, No. 1178, NEW-YORK, Monday, May 23, 1774; Lieutenant-governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "SPRING HILL 31st May, 1774;" the same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW-YORK 1st June, 1774;" Annual Register for 1775, 4; History of the War in America, Dublin: 1779, i., 19, 20; Andrews' History of the War with America, London: 1785, i., 134; Gordon's History of the American Revolution, London: 1788, i., 361; Ramsey's History of the American Revolution, London: 1791, i., 112; Stedman's History of the American War, London: 1794, i., 93; Adolphus's History of England, London: 1805, ii., 122, 123; "Paul Allen's" History of the American Revolution, Baltimore, 1822, i., 181; Morse's Annals of the American Revolution, Hartford: 1824, 179, 180; Pitkin's History of the United States, New Haven: 1828, i., 270; Grahame's History of the United States, London: 1836, iv., 347, 348; Hildreth's History of the United States, New York: 1856, First Series, iii., 34; Leake's Memoir of General John Lamb, Albany: 1857, 84–86; Lossing's Seventeen hundred and seventy-six, New York: 122; Lossing's Field-book of the Revolution, New York: 1851, i., 507; Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, Boston: 1858, vii., 37; the same, centenary edition, Boston: 1876, iv., 323; Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, Boston: 1872, 321, 322; Lodge's History of the English Colonies, New York: 1881, 489; etc.

Lendrum, (History of the United States;) Lossing, (History of the United States, 1854;) and Ridpath, (History of the United States;) made no allusion to this very important Meeting.

[2] "LORD SANDWICH.—Do not the New England Fishing-ships carry on "an illicit Trade with the French?

"COMMODORE SHULDHAM.—Certainly; their Ships meet at Sea; and "they supply them with Provisions, Rum, Stores, and the Ships them- "selves; and return loaded with French Manufactures."—(Examination of Commodore Shuldham, Governor of Newfoundland, before the House of Lords, March 15, 1775.)

[3] It will not be out of place, in this connection, to state the fact that Boston could have averted all the evils ascribed to the Boston Port-Bill, by paying for what some of her lawless inhabitants had destroyed—as property destroyed by mobs, in our day, must be paid for by the County in which it is destroyed, as Alleghany-county, Pennsylvania, sorrowfully knows, as one of the several results of the notable "Pittsburg Riots" of 1877. She was evidently inclined to do so, in the beginning; but she was counselled by the Caucus of Town Committees, prompted by Joseph Warren, not to do so; and the Committee of Correspondence at Philadelphia subsequently urged her to pay, without success. As will be seen, in another part of this Chapter, however, the infliction of the Boston Port-Bill was a pecuniary advantage to that Town; and it is not impossible that it was foreseen, at that time, that a payment for the Tea which had been destroyed by one of her mobs, would deprive the Town of all the pecuniary advantages to be derived from a refusal to do so.

What wonderful results, arising from that refusal to pay for what a mob had destroyed, have been seen, throughout the world, from that day to this.

deprived of their usual means of support, were diverted from the particular purposes for which they had been contributed, and employed, instead, for the particular benefit of Boston's tax-payers, in relieving them from the neces-ity of levying an unusual Poor-tax for the relief of the more than usually large number of those who were willing to live on charity; and in "cleaning Docks, making Dykes, new laying "of old Pavements in the public streets, etc."—all of them "public concerns, of no advantage to any in-"dividual, any further than as a member of the "community to which he or she belonged. Not a "single Wharf, Dock, Dyke, or Pavement, belonging "to any individual, was ordered to be made or "repaired," notwithstanding many of those who had been really thrown out of employment could have found renumerative occupation in such works of private concern; "but only such" were thus made or repaired "as, by the constant usage of the Town, had "always been supported at the expense of the pub-"lic"—in other words, at the expense of the tax-payers, the aristocracy of that peculiarly democratic and peculiarly revolutionary Town. One of "the "chief concerns of the principal inhabitants" was "for those Tradesmen, whose small funds, though "sufficient for the small purposes of life, yet would "soon be exhausted, if their resources were cut off"—in other words, for the payment of debts, due by those Tradesmen to those "principal Inhabitants," which, otherwise, would have been worthless—and Nails, and Ropes, and Baizes, and "Shirt-cloths," and Shoes, and other articles were manufactured, at the expense of the charitable, elsewhere, which were disposed of, by the "Gentlemen" who managed the speculation, to whom and at such prices as best answered the purposes of all concerned.[1] Need there be any surprise that, as one of their countrymen has since said, without a blush, "the people of Boston, "then the most flourishing commercial Town on the "Continent, never regretted their being the principal "object of ministerial vengeance;" telling us, at the same time, that the "thousands who depended on their "daily labor for bread said: 'We shall suffer in a "'good cause; the righteous Being who takes care of "'the Ravens that cry unto him, will provide for us "'and ours'"?[2] Need there be any surprise, also, that such principles and such purposes as were thus presented to the several Colonies, found little favor, anywhere, except among those of the assumed leaders of the unfranchised inhabitants of the City of New York, who favored revolutionary measures, and who had not been included in the recently appointed Committee of Correspondence, the Committee of Fifty-one, in that City?[3]

On Tuesday evening, the seventeenth of May, Paul Revere, bearing letters from the Committee of Correspondence, in Boston, in which were inclosed copies of the Vote of that Town, to which reference has been made, arrived in the City of New York[4]—there was, also, in his saddlebags, a very interesting letter from one of the master spirits in that Town, to his correspondent in New York, reciting more of the motives of the Massachusetts-men, in their construction of the Resolutions of the Town-meeting in Boston, than was told elsewhere;[5] but there is no evidence that Revere brought anything whatever from the Caucus which had been convened in Faneuil Hall, on the preceding Wednesday.[6] In accordance with his instructions, Revere immediately proceeded to Philadelphia, to deliver the letters which had been addressed to the Committee of Correspondence in that City;[7] and

[1] A paper, dated "Boston August 29, 1774," responsive to "a report "industriously propagated in New York"—but without any indication by whom written or where published—which was printed in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 743, 744.

See, also, a Letter from William Cooper—the well-known Town-Clerk of Boston—to a Gentleman in New York, dated "Boston: September 12, "1774," written in response to inquiries, and with the knowledge of "some of the Committee appointed to receive donations."

[2] Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 48; the same, centenary edition, iv., 332.

On the thirty-first of May, 1774, John Scollay wrote, from Boston, to Arthur Lee, in London, "Thousands that depend on their daily labour "for support, must be reduced to the greatest degree of distress and "want. However, they will suffer in a good Cause, and that righteous "Being who takes care of the Ravens who cry unto Him, will provide "for them and theirs."

How wonderfully similar thoughts, originated in different minds, will sometimes run in parallel grooves, far apart, as in this instance; and still more wonderful it is, when, as in this instance, the thoughts are uttered in words so wonderfully similar.

[3] Alexander McDougal and all those of the former revolutionary leaders who were included in that Committee, as will be seen in the course of this narrative, on the twenty-third of May, by a formal vote, concurred with their aristocratic, anti-revolutionary associates in condemning the proposition of the Town of Boston and in offering another, in its stead: it remained only for John Lamb and those who had not been favored with seats in that body, to continue their agreement, in political affairs, with the revolutionary leaders, in Boston.

It will be seen, also, in the course of this narrative, that Boston was not sustained, in her unreasonable demands, by any of the Committees of the larger Towns and Cities, in other Colonies.

[4] "On Tuesday Evening, arrived here Mr. Revere, who came Express "from Boston, which he left on Saturday, about 2 o'clock in the After-"noon."—(Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1637, New-York, Thursday, May 19, 1774.)

[5] Reference is made to a letter which was written by Thomas Young, immediately after the adjournment of the Town-Meeting, May 13, and addressed to John Lamb, in the City of New York. It may be seen among the "Lamb Papers," in the Library of the New York Historical Society; and every student of the history of that eventful period will be amply re-paid for whatever time he may spend in a careful perusal of it.

[6] The Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence, "New York, Monday, "May 23, 1774," contain a record of the reading of "Letters from the "Committee of Correspondence of Boston, with a Vote of the Town of "Boston, of the 13th instant, and a Letter from the Committee of Phil-"adelphia;" and, in the absence of any allusion to any other letter whatever, there is no reason for supposing that anything, in addition to those three letters, was received from any other organization or person, at Boston or elsewhere.

[7] Revere was at Philadelphia, on the twentieth of May, when the inhabitants of that City appointed its Committee of Correspondence; and, on the following day, he left that City, on his return, carrying with him, to New York and Boston, if not to other Towns and Cities on his route, copies of a Circular Letter, probably from the pen of John Dickinson, containing the response of Philadelphia to the Boston Resolutions, and, generally, surveying the political situation of the Colonies, from the Philadelphia standpoint.—Proceedings of the Meeting which appointed the Committee, May 20, 1774, and a copy of the Circular Letter, written by the

those who had been nominated to the Committee of Correspondence in New York, the Committee itself not having been formally established, evidently availed themselves of that opportunity to write to Philadelphia, in which, also, no Committee had been appointed, on the subject of the Boston Resolutions, and, unquestionably, in opposition to the propositions which they contained.[1]

Those who had been appointed to membership in the proposed Committee of Correspondence of the City of New York—in the "Committee of Fifty-"one," as it was popularly called—were duly assembled, at the Coffee-House, on Monday, the twenty-third of May, 1774, forty-three of the fifty-one being present; and the Committee was duly organized by the appointment of Isaac Low, as its permanent Chairman, and that of John Alsop, as its permanent Deputy-chairman[2]—at a subsequent Meeting, Joseph Allicocke was appointed Secretary, and Thomas Pettit, Messenger, of the Committee;[3] the first two, in whom some authority was vested, being high-toned, anti-revolutionary Merchants; while the last two, who were not members of the Committee, and to whom no authority was given, were among those unfranchised, revolutionary Workingmen, whom the former had previously looked on with so much disfavor.

Immediately after the organization of the Committee had been completed, a letter was received from "the body of the Mechanics, signed by Jonathan "Blake, their Chairman," informing the Committee of the concurrence of the Mechanics with the other inhabitants of the City, in their nomination of it; which clearly indicated the entire good faith of the great body of the unfranchised masses, in the transfer of the leadership of the confederated party of the Opposition, from those, with revolutionary tendencies, who had called themselves "Sons of Liberty," to the aristocratic, conservative elements of the party opposed to the Colonial policy of the Home Government, which had been made at the Coffee-house, on the preceding Thursday; and clearly indicating, also, that whatever the differences between the two factions, on social questions, might be, they were one in all which related to the great political questions of the day, concerning the obnoxious features of the Colonial policy of the Home Government, notwithstanding the disappointment of some of the assumed leaders of those masses, when they had failed to secure seats in the Committee[4]—the sinister purposes of those who had proposed the Caucus which had been assembled at Sam. Francis's had been established; the unfranchised masses and those who had assumed to be their leaders had been generally hoodwinked; and even the watchful "Sons of Liberty," with here and there an exception, were apparently contented.

At the same meeting of the Committee, the letters from the Committees of Correspondence in Boston and Philadelphia, to which reference has been made, were laid before it. The letter from Philadelphia being only a reflex of what had been written to that Committee by those who had subsequently been confirmed as members of this, it received no official attention, at that time; but those from Boston, which included the Vote of the Town of which mention has been made, were referred to a Sub-committee, composed of Alexander McDougal, Isaac Low, James Duane, and John Jay, with instructions to consider the subject to which those letters were devoted; to prepare a draft of an answer thereto; and to report the same, to the Committee, at eight o'clock on the same evening, to which hour the Committee then adjourned.[5]

The disposition of the majority of the Committee of Correspondence, as well as the line of action which those who controlled it[6] intended to take, as far as it related to the great body of the unfranchised inhabitants and their rapidly increasing influence in the control of the political affairs of the Colony, was clearly defined and boldly presented, at that first opportunity to do so, in the formation of that very important Sub-Committee, in which the well-known

Committee—both re-printed in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 340-342.)

[1] The Committee of Correspondence of Philadelphia to the Committee of Correspondence to Boston, "PHILADELPHIA, May 21*st*, 1774," copies of which "were transmitted to New-York and most of the Southern Colo-"nies."

[2] Minutes of the Committee, "NEW-YORK, Monday, May 23*d*, 1774."

[3] Minutes of the Committee, "NEW-YORK, May 30, 1774."

[4] Minutes of the Committee, "NEW-YORK, Monday, May 23d, 1774."

See, also Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1638, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 26, 1774, in which appears the following: "Since the Meeting at the Cof-"fee-House on Thursday last, the Merchants and Mechanicks, who were "opposed to the Committee of Correspondence consisting of Fifty-one "Persons, have, for the Salutary Purpose of Union among ourselves, "agreed to that Number; and that the Gentlemen whose Names were "published in Mr. Gaine's last Paper, be the Committee for this City."

The correspondence of Lieutenant-governor Colden with Governor Tryon and with the Earl of Dartmouth very clearly indicates that that remarkable old man was not deceived by the doings, in politics, of the "Merchants and Traders" and Gentry of New York; that their social and commercial and professional standing did not warrant what he regarded, very reasonably, their tendency toward rebellion; and that, while he hoped their influence would restrain the violence of those with whom they were associated, he never regarded them as, truly, friends of the Home Government nor of the Sovereign.

[5] Minutes of the Committee, "NEW-YORK, Monday, May 23, 1774."

[6] Bancroft, (History of the United States, original edition, vii., 41, 42; the same, centenary edition, iv., 327,) said "the control fell into the "hands of men who, like John Jay, still aimed at reconciling a contin-"ued dependence on England with the just freedom of the Colonies."

The principal purposes of the Committee, in all which related to national politics, were the protection of those who were constantly employed in Smuggling; the exemption of the Colonies from the payment of Import Duties and Direct Taxes levied by the Parliament; and the continued military protection of the Colonies, at the expense of the Mother Country, unless the unlikely contingency should arise of a voluntary taxation of themselves, for that purpose. Besides these, the chief purpose of the Committee was to relegate the unfranchised masses of the City of New York, of all classes, to the obscurity and dependence of vassals; and to place itself at the head of all the political elements of the Colony, as the autocratic, anti-revolutionary ruler of both the Colonists and the Government—in all of which, unquestionably, James Duane's and John Jay's were the master minds, within the Committee, and William Smith's that which was not within it.

ultra-democratic Chairman was made harmless, in the interest of the conservative aristocracy, by the addition of three of the most conservative members of the Committee, as his associates; and what was known to have been the decided preference of the revolutionary portion of the unfranchised Workingmen of the City, by whom the policy and the action of the Town of Boston were known to have been generally approved, was openly, if not defiantly, disregarded.

At eight o'clock, in the evening, the Committee assembled in an adjourned Meeting, thirty-eight of the fifty-one members being present; and the Sub-committee, which had been appointed at the forenoon session, reported the following draft of a letter, as suitable for a response to the letters received from Boston:

"NEW-YORK, May 23, 1774.

"GENTLEMEN:

"The alarming Measures of the British Parliament, "relative to your ancient and respectable Town, "which has so long been the Seat of Freedom, fill the "Inhabitants of this City with inexpressible Alarm.

"As a sister Colony, suffering in Defence of the "Rights of America, we consider your Injuries as a "common Cause, to the redress of which it is equally "our Duty and our Interest to contribute. But, what "ought to be done in a Situation so truly critical, "while it employs the anxious Thoughts of every "generous Mind, is very hard to be determined.

"Our Citizens have thought it necessary to appoint "a large Committee, consisting of fifty-one Persons, "to correspond with our sister Colonies, on this and "every other matter of public Moment; and, at ten "o'clock this forenoon, we were first assembled. Your "Letter, enclosing the Vote of the Town of Boston, "and the Letter of your Committee of Correspond-"ence, were immediately taken into consideration."

"While we think you justly entitled to the Thanks "of your sister Colonies, for asking their Advice on "a Case of such extensive Consequences, we lament "our Inability to relieve your Anxiety, by a decisive "Opinion. The Cause is general, and concerns a "whole Continent, who are equally interested with "you and us; and we foresee that no Remedy can "be of avail, unless it proceeds from the joint Act "and Approbation of all. From a virtuous and "spirited Union, much may be expected; while the "feeble Efforts of a Few will only be attended with "Mischief and Disappointments to themselves, and "Triumph to the Adversaries of our Liberty.

"Upon these Reasons, we conclude that a Congress "of Deputies from the Colonies, in general, is of the "utmost Moment; that it ought to be assembled, "without Delay; and some unanimous Resolution "formed, in this fatal Emergency, not only respect-"ing your deplorable Circumstances, but for the "Security of our common Rights. Such being our "Sentiments, it must be premature to pronounce any "Judgment on the Expedient which you have sug-"gested. We beg, however, that you will do us the "Justice to believe that we shall continue to Act "with a firm and becoming Regard to American "Freedom, and to co-operate with our sister Colonies, "in every Measure which shall be thought salutary "and conducive to the public Good.

"We have nothing to add, but that we sincerely "condole with you, in your unexampled Distresses, "and to request your speedy Opinion of the proposed "Congress, that, if it shall meet with your Approba-"tion, we may exert our utmost Endeavours to carry "it into execution.

"We are, Gentlemen," etc.

That evidently well-considered paper, probably the production of the mind and the pen of James Duane,[1] was so temperate in its tone and so judicious in its suggestions, that, after it had been presented as the Report of the Sub-Committee, it commended itself to the Committee with so much force, that it was approved without a dissenting voice;[2] and the Chairman was ordered to send copies of it, duly signed, to the Committees of Correspondence, in Boston and Philadelphia.[3]

It will be seen that the Committee regarded the dispute with the Home Government as something more than a merely local matter, in which the Town of Boston was the only sufferer; and that it was not inclined, therefore, to confine its action, as the Vote of that Town had sought to confine it, to the particular subject of the Boston Port-Bill, nor to direct all its efforts, as that Vote had solicited, entirely to the redress of the grievances of that particular Town. On the contrary, it recognized the equal importance of "every other matter of public moment;" it asserted that "the Cause was general and concerned a "whole Continent, who was equally interested" with themselves; and it insisted that "no remedy can be "of avail, unless it proceeded from the joint Act and "Approbation of all." It was not inclined, without

[1] We are not insensible of the fact that many suppose that the authorship of this notable letter belongs to John Jay; but, because the entire spirit of it is so unlike what he would have presented in such a letter, written under such circumstances; and because he is known to have been more inclined to resort to a Non-Importation Agreement than James Duane was, we prefer to favor the belief that the latter gentleman wrote it.

[2] Because it was so entirely antagonistic to the known principles of the Boston-men with whom the minority of the Committee, in their individual relations, had been previously so entirely in accord, this answer to the letters from Boston, approved by the unanimous vote of the Committee, affords additional evidence of the entire good faith of the great body of the unfranchised inhabitants of the City, in its concurrence in the appointment of the Committee of Fifty-one, and of the acquiescence in that appointment of, at least, those of the previously assumed leaders of those inhabitants who had been admitted to seats in that Committee.

[3] Minutes of the Committee, adjourned Meeting, "NEW YORK, May 23, "1774;" Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1538, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 26, 1774; Gaine's New-York Gazette and Mercury, No. 1178, NEW-YORK, Monday, May 23; No. 1179, NEW-YORK, Monday, May 30, and No. 1183, NEW-YORK, Monday, June 27, 1774; Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 57, NEW-YORK Thursday, May 19, and No. 58, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 26, 1774.

due consideration, to paralyze the industries and the commerce of the entire Continent, only for the particular benefit of one Town—it preferred to regard the particular grievance of that Town as only one among many grievances, endured by other Towns, as well as by that, and by the entire Continent; and it wisely made all those grievances a common cause, and proposed to remedy them, as far as a remedy could be found in America, by a concerted movement of all the parties who were suffering from them. It was the first, or among the first, to disregard the peculiar selfishness of the popular leaders in Boston, by whom the grievances of that particular Town had been thrust into an undue prominence, for the relief of which, especially, they insisted, the entire efforts of the entire Continent must be directed;[1] and it was the first to propose and to insist on the convention of a Congress of Deputies from all the Colonies, in which all the grievances which were sustained by each and every of those Colonies could be duly considered, and concerted action be secured from the entire Continent, for the relief of all who were aggrieved.[2] How much, in that well-considered and judicious action, the Committee of Correspondence, in New York, offended those of the revolutionary clique, in that City, who had not been invited to places and seats in that Committee, and how much the revolutionary leaders and the revolutionary popu-

[1] The Committee of Correspondence of Philadelphia, after it had received and publicly read the opinions of those who had been nominated as members of the similar Committee, in New York, not yet organized, had, to some extent, done so, at an earlier date; but the reply of the Committee in New York accompanied that of the Committee in Philadelphia, Paul Revere having taken both, at the same time, on his return to Boston.

[2] We are not insensible of the fact that the origin of the Congress of the Continent, which was assembled at Philadelphia, in 1774, has been variously stated, by many of those who have preceded us; and we are equally sensible of the other fact, that individuals, in different Colonies, without any connection with each other, had suggested, theoretically, that such a Congress would be useful for various limited and, generally, local purposes, previously to that more general and practical proposition which was made by the Committee of Correspondence in New York, on the occasion under consideration.

The Town of Providence, in Town-meeting, May 17, 1774, was, probably, the first organized body which recommended a Congress of the several Colonies, for general purposes; but it only requested the Deputies of the Town, in the approaching General Assembly, to "use their influence," in that body, not yet assembled, "for promoting a Congress, as soon "as may be, of the Representatives of the General Assemblies of the "several Colonies and Provinces in North America," for the general purposes of the whole number, (Proceedings of the Town-Meeting, reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 333;) and the Committee of Correspondence of Philadelphia, in its reply to the Committee of Correspondence of Boston, dated "PHILADELPHIA, May 21, 1774," compared the proposition of Boston, to enter into an Association of Non-Exportation and Non-Intercourse, with the proposition of New-York, to convene a Congress of the Colonies, without determining which of the two it would approve, (Letter, dated as above stated,) leaving the subject undecided, until the eighteenth of June, when the Congress was determined on, by a Meeting of the Citizens, without the intervention of the Committee, (Proceedings of the Meeting, reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 426, 427.)

Because the General Assemblies of the greater number of the Colonies, at that time, could not have elected Deputies to the proposed Congress, even if they had been willing to have done so—the Governor having, in each case, the power of proroguing or dissolving the Assembly, which, in the greater number of instances, he would have certainly done—the action of the Town of Providence, although well intended, could not result in the convention of a Congress; and what was done by the Committee of Correspondence in Philadelphia, was not entitled to the honorable mention of it, which Frothingham and others have made, since it amounted to nothing, either of approval or disapproval of the New-York proposition to convene a Congress. The honor, what there was of it, remains, therefore, with the Committee of Correspondence of New-York, as related in the text, of having originated the Congress, on the twenty-third of May, with the additional honor of having established the proposition for such a Congress, in the face of and notwithstanding the determined opposition of the Massachusetts-men, in Boston, led by Samuel Adams, Joseph Warren, and their well-eulogized associates.

The Committee of Correspondence of the Colony of Connecticut concurred in the recommendation which the Committee in New York had made, on the fourth of June, (The Committee of Correspondence of the General Assembly of New York to the Committee of Correspondence of the Colony of Connecticut, "NEW YORK, June 24, 1774;") the General Assembly of Rhode Island did so, on the fifteenth of June, (Journal of the General Assembly, June 15, 1774—Records of Rhode Island. vii., 246;) the General Court of Massachusetts did so on the seventeenth of June, (Journal of the House of Representatives, June, 1774;) and the City of Philadelphia, as above stated, did so on the eighteenth of June.

It has suited the purposes of some to bring forward the doings of eighty-nine members of the dissolved House of Burgesses of Virginia, assembled at the Raleigh Tavern, at Williamsburg, on the twenty-seventh of May, as a contestant for the honors of New York, in this matter; but that Meeting was held four days after the proposition had been made in New York; and what it did was only to "recommend to the Com-"mittee of Correspondence that they communicate with the several Cor-"responding Committees, on the expediency of appointing Deputies from "the several Colonies of British America, to meet in a General Con-"gress," etc., which was done on the following day, in which, however, nothing else was done than to solicit, from each Committee, its "senti-"ments on the subject." (Proceedings of the Meeting, reprinted in the Boston Gazette of June 13, 1774, quoted by Frothingham, in his Rise of the Republic, 333.)

The reliability of what is known as "history" may be seen in what has been published concerning this first proposition to convene a Congress of the Colonies. Frothingham, (Rise of the Republic, 322,) is the only one who has alluded to the really original, but impracticable, proposition by the Town of Providence. Without making the slightest allusion to what was done in New York, Burke's Annual Register for 1775, 6; History of the War in America, Dublin: 1779, i., 21; Andrews's History of the War with America, London: 1785, i., 135; Soule's Histoire des Troubles de l'Amérique Anglaise, Paris: 1787, i., 48; Chez et Lebrun's Histoire politique et philosophique de la Revolution, Paris: an 9, 109; Stedman's History of the American War, London: 1794, i., 94, 95; Adolphus's History of England, London: 1805, ii., 124; "Paul Allen's" History of the American Revolution, Baltimore: 1822, i., 184; Pitkin's History of the United States, New Haven: 1828, i., 271, 272; Wilson's History of the American Revolution, Baltimore: 1834, 100; Grahame's History of the United States, London: 1836, iv., 349; Lossing's Seventeen hundred and seventy-six, New York: 1847, 123; his Field-Book of the Revolution, New York: 1851, ii., 486; Ridpath's History of the United States, New York: 1880, 296; A. H. Stephens's History of the United States, New York: 1874, 166, 167; Holmes's History of the United States, New York: 1871, 105, and several others, assigned the proposition for a Congress to Virginia. Mercy Warren's History of the American Revolution, Boston: 1805, i., 135; Lendrum's History of the American Revolution, Exeter: 1836, i., 63; De Rochelle's États Unis d'Amérique, Paris: 1845, 173; Lossing's History of the United States, New York: 1857, 227; and the series of small Histories of the United States, by the same author, without alluding to what was done in New York, preferred to regard what was done by the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, on the seventeenth of June, as the origin of the Congress. Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, 322, 323, ostentatiously presented what was done in Massachusetts and "the "other New England Colonies," and then said with questionable integrity, as he was acquainted with the facts, "the sentiment and determination "of the patriots south of New England were represented in the pro-"ceedings of the Virginia meeting," which he described, at considerable length, without making the slightest allusion to the earlier proceedings of Pennsylvania and New York, where the Congress certainly originated. Gordon's History of the American Revolution, London: 1788, i, 362, correctly assigned the origination of the Congress to the Committee of Cor-

lace of Boston were also offended by it, are well known to the student of the history of that period [1]—how much, also, that action of the Committee, in New York, has been made the text of misrepresentation and abuse, whenever it has been referred to, in the historical literature of New England, from that day to this, is known to all who are acquainted with the peculiar peculiarities of that well-filled class of the productions of American home-industry.[2]

The Committee of Correspondence, in New York, as it was known to the world, at that time, was created only as a local organization, for only special purposes, and with only a very limited and a very clearly defined authority.[3] But it very soon became evident that some, at least, of those who had promoted the organization of that Committee, only for limited and well-defined purposes, and who had subsequently assumed the entire control of its action, were well-inclined, for the advancement of their individual and family and factional influence and interests, to use every opportunity for the increase of the authority of the Committee, which was or which might be, in any way, afforded; and that they were not ill-disposed, in the prosecution of their peculiar purposes, to assume and to exercise authority which had not been vested in that or in any other organization, and limited only by their own ill-sustained views of expediency and propriety, cannot be successfully disputed.[4] Notably among those instances of authority unduly assumed by the Committee, was its early attempt to place itself at the head of all those, in every other County in the Colony, who were inclined to be or who were likely to become disaffected and revolutionary; which may be regarded as the second successful movement of the rapidly advancing revolutionary elements in the Colony of New York, among those who assumed to regard a revolution, conducted by themselves, as commendable and praiseworthy, while such a revolution, controlled by others, would be regarded and resisted, by them, as worthy only of condemnation and to be extirpated, the latter regardless of every other consequence.

For the purpose of extending its authority and of increasing its power, in whatever might arise, in its evident intent to control not only the great body of the unfranchised masses of every class, in the City of New York,[5] but the Colonial and the Home Govern-respondence in New York; but, without the slightest shadow of truth, it stated that the Committee was controlled by Isaac Sears, who was one of the minority of that body; and that it was opposed by "the To-"ries," not one of which party was then a member of the Committee. Ramsay's History of the United States, London: 1791, i., 114, correctly assigned the origination of the Congress to New York; but it inaccurately stated that it was done "at the first meeting of the inhabitants," instead of at the first meeting of the Committee which the inhabitants had chosen, a few days previously, for their political leaders. Hildreth's History of the United States, New York: 1856, First Series, iii, 35, presented the facts as they really took place, giving to the Committee of Correspondence of New York the origination of the Congress; and Leake's Memoir of General John Lamb, Albany: 1857; Dawson's Park and its Vicinity, New York: 1855, 33; McDonald and Blackburn's Southern History of the United States, Baltimore: 1869, 170; and de Lancey's Notes on Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, New York: 1879, i., 443, 444, follow that excellent example. Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 40, correctly yields the honor of having originated the Congress, to New York; but, unaccountably, it assigns it, in New York, sometimes to an imaginary "old committee," which had ceased to exist when the Stamp-Act, which had called it into existence and to which its operations had been limited, was repealed, eight years previously, and sometimes to the eight or ten men who styled themselves and who were known as "the Sons of Lib-"erty," all of whom who were members of the Committee of Correspondence, appointed at the Coffee-house, were notoriously in accord with the men of Boston, who advocated an immediate suspension of the Commerce of the Continent and opposed the proposition to call a Congress for the general relief of all the Colonies. It is also well known, concerning those "Sons of Liberty" that, after 1766, they made no pretension that a permanent Committee existed; that their correspondence was conducted in their individual capacities, and not officially, as a Committee; that none of their correspondence, as far as it is now known, alluded to a Congress of the Colonies, for any purpose; and that their especially careful historian and eulogist, Isaac Q. Leake, not only made no such claim, in their behalf, but expressly and in unmistakable words, gave that honor to the Committee of Correspondence which had been appointed by the body of the inhabitants, at the Coffee-house. (Memoir of the Life and Times of General John Lamb, Albany: 1857, 88.) In the same author's centenary edition of that History of the United States, Boston: 1876, iv., 326, the same statement was made, without the slightest change; and Lodge's History of the English Colonies, New York: 1881, 489, without Bancroft's airy rhetoric, in a far more historical style than that historian employs, in some of his words, and without the slightest change in its substance, perpetuated the error.

Such are the guides which American scholarship, generally fettered with bonds of Roman and Grecian Literature, has given to the world, for the direction of those who shall aspire to the knowledge of a history of America. Such are some of the evidences of the entire untrustworthiness of the greater number of those who, satisfied with that "discipline" to which the Classics have subjected them and without having otherwise qualified themselves for the proper discharge of their honorable duties as historians of their own Country, have contented themselves, instead, by repeating what others, also fettered by similar obsolete prejudices and equally indolent, have written, and by willingly propagating the errors which local prejudices or indolence or a faulty education or ignorance have produced, while, with greater usefulness to the world and greater honor to themselves, they might rather have attempted to extirpate them.

[1] An evidence of that feeling may be seen in the letter from Thomas Young to John Lamb, dated "Boston, 19th June, 1774," in the "Lamb "Papers," New York Historical Society's Library.

[2] From the days of Doctor Gordon until the present time, as far as our knowledge extends, Hildreth is the only New Englander, among historical writers, who has inclined to tell the exact truth, on this subject; and what he said of it occupied less than two lines of an octavo page.

[3] The Caucus, at Sam. Francis's, at which the appointment of the Committee was determined on and its Members nominated, defined, in its first Resolution, the purposes for which that Committee was to be appointed and the authority which should be vested in it—"to corre-"spond with the neighboring Colonies on the present important Crisis," excluding all other subjects, (Proceedings of the Meeting, among the Broadsides, in the Library of the New-York Historical Society.)

[4] That James Duane and John Jay, to whom reference is here made, were not apt to recognize any fundamental obstruction to or requirement from whatever they should incline to do or not to do, is well known to every one who has closely studied the histories of the doings of those gentlemen, subsequently, in the various branches of official life to which they were respectively called.

[5] In all the political operations of that period, the several Counties of the Colonies were regarded as entirely independent bodies, each controlling itself to the extent, even, of sending independent Delegates to the Continental Congress—the centralization of authority, indeed, was the fundamental grievance against which all the Colonies were, then, raising their remonstrances and their opposition to the measures of the Home Government—and it must not be supposed that, in the instance referred to, in the text, the Committee sought the direct control of the masses, in any other County than in that of New York—it sought no more than to secure the control of those, within the several Counties, who did control those masses, within their several neighborhoods; and, therefore, it sought to ments, at the second meeting of the Committee, on the evening of Monday, the thirtieth of May, Peter Van Schaack, Francis Lewis, John Jay, Alexander McDougal, and Theophilact Bache, three rigid conservatives and two of the revolutionary faction, were appointed "a Committee to write a Circular Letter to "the Supervisors in the different Counties, acquainting them of the appointment of this Committee, and "submitting to the consideration of the Inhabitants "of the Counties whether it could not be expedient for "them to appoint persons to correspond with this "Committee upon matters relative to the purposes for "which they were appointed;" [1] and, at a Meeting especially called for the purpose, on the following evening, [Tuesday, May 31,] at which thirty-five members were present, that Sub-Committee reported a Draft of a Circular Letter, for the purpose named, which was duly approved by the Committee. Mr. Lewis was ordered to cause three hundred copies of that Circular Letter to be printed; and it was also ordered that those printed copies of the letter should be transmitted, with all convenient speed, to the Treasurers of the several Counties, with a "line" to each Treasurer, signed by the Chairman of the Committee, requesting his care in the proper transmission of the several letters to the persons to whom they should be respectively addressed; and that intimation should be given, through the various Newspapers, that such Circular Letters had been duly sent.[2]

Of those Circular Letters, inviting a correspondence with the Committee, in New York, it is recorded that thirty copies were sent to the Treasurer of Westchester-county, with a note from the Chairman of the Committee, requesting him "to direct and forward "them to the Supervisors of the several Districts," [3] the first attempt, which was made, by any one, to draw the farmers of that County into the unrest of discontent and disaffection; but we have failed to find, in any portion of the Minutes of the Committee, the slightest evidence that any one, within that County, paid the slightest attention to the Committee's insidious invitation, or that, at that time, any one to the northward of Kingsbridge, either within or without the limits of that County, seemed to possess the slightest interest in the Committee, or in the general purposes for which it had been appointed, or in those ill-concealed purposes for which it had covertly solicited the co-operation of the leaders, where there were any, throughout the Colony—certainly a very emphatic testimony to the accuracy of what has been stated, concerning the conservatism of the farmers in Westchester-county, as lately as in the Spring and early Summer of 1774.[4]

While the Committee of Correspondence, in New York, was thus engaged in an effort to extend its influence and its authority beyond the limits of its original jurisdiction, the Committee of Correspondence and the leaders of the revolutionary populace, in Boston, received and considered its letter responding to the Vote of that Town and to the letters which had accompanied it, to New York; and, as might have been reasonably expected, where the difference, on such a subject, was as radical in its character and as wide in its extent as it was in that instance, there appeared to be very little prospect of an agreement, or even of a compromise. Indeed, the Massachusettsmen did not appear to pay the slightest attention to the proposition which those of New York had made, to call a Congress of Deputies from all the Colonies, for the consideration of all the grievances, real or imaginary, of which all the Colonies were, then, respectively complaining, preferring, instead, and firmly insisting on, their own proposition to remove the particular case of Boston's recognized contumacy and its consequences from all other matters of disagreement with the Home Government, and to enforce a relief of that Town from the penalty inflicted on it, because of its recognized lawlessness, by establishing a Non-Importation and Non-Exportation Association, throughout the entire Continent, for that especial purpose, and for no other purpose whatever. That renewed preference of the Committee of Boston was conveyed to the Committee of New York, in a letter, dated on the thirtieth of May, which, in its terms, was not creditable to the professions of those who wrote it, for either candor, or honor, or genuine patricircumvent and secure the control of the entire Colony, under a mask of "patriotism," as it had already circumvented and secured the control, in political affairs, of the County of New York.

[1] Minutes of the Committee, "NEW-YORK, May 30, 1774;" Lieutenant-governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "NEW YORK, June 2, 1774."

[2] Minutes of the Committee, Special Meeting, "NEW-YORK, May 31, "1774;" Lieutenant-governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "NEW-YORK, "June 2, 1774."

[3] Memorandum, appended to the Minutes of the Committee, "NEW-"YORK, May 31, 1774."

[4] It appears that a similar temper prevailed in all the Counties of the Colony, except New York and Suffolk.

In a despatch from Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, dated "NEW YORK, 6th July 1774," it is stated, "The present "political zeal and Frenzy is almost entirely confined to the City of New "York. The People in the Counties are noways disposed to become ac-"tive or bear any part in what is proposed by the citizens. I am told "all the Counties but one have declined an Invitation sent them from "New York to appoint Committees of Correspondence. This Province "is everywhere, except in the City of New York, perfectly quiet and in "good order; and in New York a much greater freedom of Speech pre-"vails than has done heretofore."

In a letter written to Governor Tryon, dated "SPRING HILL, 6th July. "1774," the same careful observer said, further, "Except in the city of "New York, the People in the Province are quite Tranquile, and have "declin'd takeing any Part with the Citizens. An Opinion is spread very "generally in the Country that if a non-importation agreement is "form'd, Government will restrain our Exportation; a Measure which "the Farmers clearly see will be ruinous to them."

In a Despatch written to the Earl of Dartmouth, dated "NEW YORK, "2nd August, 1774," the venerable Lieutenant-governor stated, "Great "Pains has been taken in the several Counties of this Province to induce "the People to enter into Resolves, and to send Committees to join the "Committee in the city; but they have only prevailed in Suffolk County, "in the East End of Long Island which was settled from Connecticut, "and the Inhabitants still retain a great similarity of Manners and "Sentiments."

otism;[1] and, in a letter dated on the seventh of June, the latter replied, disclaiming the slightest approval of the proposed "suspension of Trade," to which, very singularly and without the slightest reason, the Boston Committee had attempted to commit it; and saying, concerning that proposition. "We apprehend you have "made a mistake, for on revising our letter to you, so "far from finding a word mentioned of a 'Suspension "'of Trade,' the idea is not even conceived. That, and "every other Resolution, we have thought it most pru- "dent to leave for the discussion of the proposed gene- "ral Congress."[2] It continued, in these very emphatic words: "Adhering, therefore, to that measure, as "most conducive to promote the grand system of "politics we all have in view, we have the pleasure "to acquaint you, that we shall be ready, on our part, "to meet, at any time and place that you shall think "fit to appoint, either of Deputies from the General "Assemblies or such other Deputies as shall be "chosen, not only to speak the Sentiments, but also to "pledge themselves for the Conduct of the People of "the respective Colonies they represent. We can "undertake to assure you, in behalf of the People of "this Colony, that they will readily agree to any "measure that shall be adopted by the general Con- "gress. It will be necessary that you give a sufficient "time for the Deputies of the Colonies, as far south- "ward as the Carolinas, to assemble, and acquaint "them, as soon as possible, with the proposed "measure of a Congress. Your letters to the south- "ward of us, we will forward, with great pleasure."[3]

Those of the revolutionary leaders, in Boston, who had assumed the role of a Committee of Correspondence, in that Town, could not long conceal from the world the reckless falsity of what they had written to the Committee in New York, when they stated to the latter that, "certainly all that can be depended upon "to yield any effectual relief" to the Town of Boston, "is, on all hands, acknowledged to be the Suspension "of Trade." The letters which were received by the Committee of that Town, in answer to the Circular Letters, which had been sent to the seaport Towns of Massachusetts[4] and to the Committees of Correspondence in the several Colonies,[5] since the reception of the Boston Port-Bill, were not, as is now well known, really as unanimous, in favor of a "Suspension of "Trade," as the Committee had unblushingly pretended—indeed, with a few unimportant exceptions, the proposal to make Boston the only subject of consideration, throughout the Continent, and to suspend all the internal industries and, with the exception of Smuggling, all the Commerce of all the Colonies, only for the special benefit of that one Town, regardless of the more direct and substantial grievances which were sustained by other Towns and other Colonies, and regardless, also, of the very serious consequences, throughout the entire Continent and elsewhere, of such a general and indiscriminate "Suspension of "Trade" as had been proposed, and that, too, at the expense of a Congress of the Continent, which the Committee in New York had proposed and insisted on, in which all the grievances of all the Towns and Colonies could be considered, and remedies therefor be duly provided, had met with no favor whatever; and the audacious leaders of the revolutionary populace, in Boston, as well as the Town itself, were not slow in receding, with more agility than candor, from that high and untenable position which they had occupied, in the proceedings of the Caucus held at Faneuil-Hall, on the twelfth of May, in the proceedings of the Town of Boston, at the same place, on the fol-

[1] The contents of that letter and the spirit of those who wrote it can be ascertained from the extracts from it which were copied into the letter, and evidently referred to in the action of those who wrote it, when, on the seventh of June, the Committee of New York replied to that second letter from Boston.

[2] The Resolution of the Committee in New York, on which that reply was based, is in these words: "ORDERED, That the Committee of Boston "be requested to give this Committee the Names of the Persons who "constitute the Committee of Correspondence at Boston; that they have "made a mistake in answering this Committee's letter, which mentioned "not a word of a Suspension of Trade, which they say we have so "wisely defined, as we leave that measure entirely to the Congress, and "we shall readily agree to any measure they shall adopt."

It is very evident that the suspicions of the Committee of New York were aroused by the evident trickery of the Committee of Boston, presented in its reply to the letter of the former, dated the twenty-third of May; and that, for that reason, it desired to learn the names of those with whom it was corresponding—their characters and standing could, then, be ascertained through other means.

[3] Copy of the letter, appended to the Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence of New York, "NEW-YORK, June 6, 1774."

[4] The Committees who had been sent to Salem and Marblehead, "to communicate the Sentiments of this Metropolis to the Gentlemen, "there; to consult with them; and to report at the adjournment," (Minutes of the Town-Meeting, of Boston, May 13, 1774,) did, indeed, go to those Towns, and report the results of their visits, to the Town, at its Adjourned Meeting, five days subsequently; but those results were so discouraging to the violently disposed leaders of Boston—including Samuel Adams, Joseph Warren, and their associates—that they contented themselves with ostentatiously "recommending to their fellow-citizens, "Patience, Fortitude, and a firm Trust in God," without making record of the formal Reports of the Committees, if any such formal Reports were really made, (Minutes of the Adjourned Meeting of the Town, May 18, 1774,) and with adjourning, a second time, until the thirty-first, "by which "time it is expected we shall have encouraging News from some of the "sister Colonies," to recompense them for the disappointment they had experienced from the results of their conferences with the Merchants of Newburyport and Salem.

The substance of the Reports from the Committees sent to the seaport Towns of the Province, all mention of which was thus suppressed by the Town-Clerk, was saved to the world, however, in a Despatch from Governor Gage to the Earl of Dartmouth, dated "BOSTON: May 19, 1774," and laid before the Parliament, on the nineteenth of January, 1775, in which it was said the Town-Meeting "appointed Persons to go to Marblehead "and Salem, to communicate their Sentiments to the People there, and "bring them into like Measures; which Persons were to make their "Report at the Adjournment, on the 18th, when the Meeting was again "held, and, I am told, received little encouragement from Salem and "Marblehead, and transacted nothing of consequence."—(Parliamentary Register, i., 36.)

[5] The first responses from other Colonies which the Committee received were those, carried by Paul Revere, from Philadelphia and New York, which were anything else than "encouraging" to such as composed that Committee; and there can be very little doubt, in the light of what was done, very soon afterwards, in Connecticut and Rhode Island, that Revere carried back, from Hartford and Providence, tokens of what might be expected from those Colonies, also, in opposition to the remarkable propositions of the Caucus of Town-Committees, in Faneuil-Hall, and of the Town of Boston, on the following day.

lowing day, and in the letters from the Committee of Correspondence, covering the proceedings of the Town, which were sent to the Committee in New York, on the following Saturday, as has been, herein, already stated.

The world of historical literature has been favored, in this connection, by one of the most painstaking and accurate of Massachusetts' historians, with a revelation of the trickery and double-dealing of at least one of those who, in the matter now under consideration, have been justly regarded as the leaders of the political elements, within that Colony, which were antagonistic to the Colonial and the Home Governments.

Samuel Adams was the Chairman and master-spirit of the Committee of Correspondence in Boston: he was the Chairman of the Caucus of the nine Town-Committees, assembled in Faneuil-Hall, which had confirmed the line of action, concerning the Boston Port-Bill, which he and the men of Boston, had already contrived: he was the Moderator of the Town-Meeting, at Faneuil-Hall, continued through three days, in which that line of action was adopted and pursued and insisted on: and he inspired, if he did not personally write, those letters, describing and insisting on that line of action, which were sent from Boston, to the Committee in New York, in the saddle-bag of Paul Revere, of which mention has been made herein—all of them, Committees, Caucuses, Town-Meetings, and Letters, being radically in favor of the Boston plan of a "Suspension of Trade," especially for Boston's benefit, and quite as radically resisting the proposal to call "a general Congress," for general purposes. He was the Chairman and master-spirit of that local Committee of the Town which, on the thirtieth of May, addressed that letter to the Committee of Correspondence in New York, adhering to the plan of a Non-Importation Association which Boston had previously proposed, instead of the convention of a federal Congress which New York had previously proposed; and attempting, by indirect means, to commit the Committee in New York to the support of the Boston plan of Non-Importation, at the expense of its own plan of calling a federal Congress, of which letter and insidious attempt to commit the New York Committee to the Boston scheme, mention has been made. Besides all these, he was the Chairman and the master spirit of that Committee, in Boston, which, as lately as the eighth of June, sent Circular Letters from that Town to every Town in the Commonwealth, in which it was stated that "there is "but one way that we can conceive of, to prevent "what is to be deprecated by all good men, and ought, "by all possible means, to be prevented, viz: The "horrours that must follow an open rupture between "Great Britain and her Colonies, or, on our part, a "subjugation to absolute Slavery; and that is by af-"fecting the Trade and Interest of Great Britain so "deeply as shall induce her to withdraw her oppres-"sive hand"[1]—which the Committee proposed to do by means of an Association providing "that, hence-"forth, we will suspend all commercial intercourse "with the said Island of Great Britain, until the said "Act for blocking up the said Harbour" [of Boston] "be repealed, and a full restoration of our Charter "Rights be obtained."[2] But we are told by that generally trustworthy historian,[3] that that same Samuel Adams, who was thus inspiring and leading and controlling the men of Boston, in their earnest opposition to a general Congress for a general consideration of the grievances of all who were aggrieved, and whose convictions were supposed to have been in harmony with his pretensions before the world, was really in favor of such a Congress and, consequently, really opposed to the principles which were presented and urged by the Committees, by the Caucus, and by the Town-Meeting, all of whom he had controlled, in the Resolutions, the Letters, and the Address and Association of which mention has been made, all of which he is known to have inspired and some of which he wrote; that, as early as the twenty-sixth of May, he "was about to introduce Resolves for such a Congress," into the House of Representatives, of which he was the Clerk; and that he was prevented from doing so, only by the prorogation of the House, by the Governor.

If this statement is well-founded, and the name of its author affords a reasonable guaranty that it is so, the world of historical literature will be taught by it, how much the personal character of Samuel Adams has been unduly eulogized; and every careful reader will also be taught by that new revelation, how much the Clerk of the House of Representatives, in Colonial Massachusetts, while he was only an employé of the House, presumed to dictate, in matters of legislation, during that critical period; with how much of insincerity the leader of the excited people, in that Colony, acted, in all that he said and did, before that people and in their behalf; and, in connection with the recognized "art" and duplicity with which the leaders in New York were, also, then conducting, or endeavoring to conduct, the political affairs of the Continent, how little of real personal integrity, of unqualified unselfishness, and of unalloyed patriotism, really controlled or even existed among those, in Massachusetts and New York, who, sensibly or insensibly, were, at that time, conducting the Continent in open insurrection, toward a successful rebellion.

The letters of disapproval and discouragement,

[1] Address sent by the Boston Committee to every Town in the Province, dated "BOSTON, June 8, 1774," re-printed in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 397.

[2] Form of a Covenant, sent to every Town in Massachusetts, by the Committee in Boston, with the above-mentioned Address, Section 1st.

[3] Richard Frothingham of Charlestown, in his Rise of the Republic of the United States, Boston: 1872, 323, whose words are as follows:

"The Massachusetts Assembly convened on the twenty-fifth of May. "Samuel Adams was about to introduce Resolves for a Congress when "the Assembly (26th) was adjourned by the Governor to meet in Salem "on the seventh of June."

against the line of action proposed and solicited by the Town of Boston, in its formal Vote, on the thirteenth of May, of which Samuel Adams was the originator and by whom, as the Moderator of the Town-Meeting, its passage had been secured, continued to flow into that Town, from all directions,[1] carrying with them an influence, with that shrewd politician, which was more potential than all the enactments of the Parliament and all the power of the Home and the Colonial Governments had produced; and he was not slow in accepting the alternative which those letters and the evident danger of a more complete isolation of the Town of Boston than he had supposed to have been possible, had sternly thrust upon him. Accordingly, on the seventeenth of June, the House of Representatives, assembled at Salem, more or less under the guidance of its Clerk, adopted a Resolution declaring that "a Meeting of "Committees from the several Colonies on this Con- "tinent is highly expedient and necessary, to con- "sult upon the present State of the Colonies and "the Miseries to which they are and must be reduced "by the operation of certain Acts of Parliament re- "specting America; and to deliberate and determine "upon wise and proper Measures to be by them "recommended to all the Colonies, for the recovery "and establishment of their just Rights and Liber- "ties, civil and religious, and the restoration "of Union and Harmony between Great Britain "and the Colonies, most ardently desired by all "good Men." At the same time, five persons, of whom Samuel Adams was one, "were ap- "pointed a Committee, on the part of this Province, "for the Purposes aforesaid, any three of whom to be "a Quorum, to meet such Committees or Delegates "from the other Colonies as have been or may be ap- "pointed either by their respective Houses of Bur- "gesses or Representatives, or by Conventions, or by "the Committees of Correspondence appointed by "the respective Houses of Assembly, to meet in the "City of Philadelphia, or any other Place that shall "be judged most suitable by the Committee, on the "first Day of September next; and that the Speaker "of the House be directed, in a Letter to the Speakers "of the Houses of Burgesses or Representatives in "the several Colonies, to inform them of the sub- "stance of these Resolves."[2]

At the same time that the House of Representatives, at Salem, was thus adding the weight of its official judgment against the line of action proposed and solicited by the Town of Boston and in support of that proposed and insisted on by the Committee in New York, the former, also, in a duly assembled Town-Meeting, John Adams occupying the Chair, in seeming forgetfulness of its Vote, on the thirteenth of the preceding month, willingly or unwillingly, formally wheeled into the line of the general opposition to the Home Government, under the guidance of that foreign Committee; and, without making the slightest allusion to her ill-conceived and injudicious action, in her adoption of that Vote, the Town "en- "joined" the Committee of Correspondence, "forth- "with, to write to all the other Colonies, acquainting "them that we are waiting with anxious expectation "for the Result of a Continental Congress, whose "Meeting we impatiently desire, in whose Wisdom "and Firmness we can confide, and in whose Deter- "mination we shall cheerfully acquiesce"[3]—a change of policy which was, in the highest degree, remarkable, and which would be entirely unaccountable were the capabilities of Massachusetts-men, of every period, for making remarkable changes of policy and of action, whenever their material interests have seemed to call for such changes, less known to the great world in which we live.

The Committee of Correspondence in New York having, meanwhile, received assurances of their approval of its proposition to invite a meeting of Deputies from the several Colonies, in a Continental Congress, from the Committee of Correspondence of Connecticut[4] and, from that in Philadelphia[5]—with the knowledge, also, that the "Standing Committee of "Correspondence," which the General Assembly of the Colony of New York had appointed, on the twentieth of January, 1774, had also approved and concurred in that proposition,[6] and, undoubtedly, although informally,[7] with information of the action of the Town of Boston and of that of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, on the same subject,—on the twenty-seventh of June, it entertained and "debated"

[1] Despatch from Governor Gage to the Earl of Dartmouth, "BOSTON, 31*st* "May, 1774," laid before Parliament, on the nineteenth of January, 1775 —(Parliamentary Register, i., 30).

[2] Journal of the House of Representatives, June 17, 1774.

[3] Proceedings of the Adjourned Town-Meeting, June 17, 1774, reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 423.

[4] The Committee of Correspondence for Connecticut to the Committee in New York, "HARTFORD, June 4, 1774," enclosing a letter, to the same effect, which had been sent by the Committee in Hartford to the Committee in Boston, on the preceding day.

[5] Proceedings of a Meeting of the Freeholders and Freemen of the City and County of Philadelphia, Saturday, June 18, 1774, enclosed in a letter from the Committee of Correspondence in Philadelphia to the Committee in New York, "PHILADELPHIA, 21st June, 1774."

[6] That Committee of the Assembly was composed of John Cruger Frederick Philipse, Isaac Wilkins, Benjamin Seaman, James Jauncey James De Lancey, Jacob Walton, Simeon Boerum, John De Noyelles, George Clinton, Daniel Kissam, Zebulon Williams, and John Rapalje, the names of ten of whom, including that of Frederick Philipse of Westchester-county, are appended to a letter, addressed to the Committee of Correspondence of Connecticut, dated "NEW YORK, June 24, 1774," in which it "agrees with you, that, at this alarming juncture, a general "Congress of Deputies from the several Colonies would be a very expe- "dient and salutary measure," regretting, however, that it was "not "sufficiently empowered to take any steps in relation to so salutary a "measure."

[7] The Minutes of the Committee in New York, notwithstanding the carefully made record of the letters which were received by it, make no mention whatever of its receipt of letters from either the Town of Boston or the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, on any subject, after its receipt of that, from the former, dated the thirtieth of May; and it may, therefore, be reasonably supposed that whatever knowledge the Committee then possessed, concerning the political some sault of the Massachusetts-men, was unofficial and interested.

a Resolution, offered by Alexander McDougal, concerning "which was the most eligible mode of ap-"pointing Deputies to attend the ensuing General "Congress."[1]

In submitting that Resolution, which had not received the imprimatur of those who represented the majority of the Committee, and, for that reason, was not received with any favor by that majority, it is evident that Alexander McDougal acted in behalf of the minority of that body—of those of its members who had been selected from the revolutionary faction of the Tradesmen, Mechanics, and Workingmen of the City—and it is evident, also, that the purpose of that minority was to secure to "the Committee of Mechanics," which, notwithstanding its formal acquiescence in the appointment of the Committee of Correspondence, continued to assume authority to represent the unfranchised portion of the people, in all which related to their political action, a right to concur in or to reject any nomination of Delegates to the proposed Congress, which the Committee of Correspondence should determine to make. The struggle between the two factions, within the Committee, was continued to an Adjourned Meeting of that body, on the evening of the twenty-ninth of June, when Alexander McDougal moved "that this Committee proceed, im-"mediately, to nominate five Deputies for the City "and County of New York, to represent them in a "Convention of this Colony,[2] or in the general Con-"gress, to be held at Philadelphia, on the first of "September next, if the other Counties of this Col-"ony approve of them as Deputies for the Colony; "and that their names be sent to the Committee of "Mechanics, for their concurrence; to be proposed on "Tuesday next, to the Freeholders and Freemen of "this City and County, for their approbation." Without having reached a vote on that Resolution, however, the Committee adjourned to the following Monday evening, the fourth of July;[3] at which time, after another severe struggle, the Resolution was rejected, by a formal vote of thirteen in support of it and twenty-four in opposition thereto. Immediately afterwards, without a division, on the motion of Theophilact Bache, seconded by John De Lancey, the Committee resolved "to nominate five persons, to "meet in a general Congress, at the time and place "which shall be agreed on by the other Colonies; and "that the Freeholders and Freemen of the City and "County of New York be summoned to appear at a "convenient place, to approve or disapprove of such "persons, for this salutary purpose; also, that this "Committee write Circular Letters to the Super-"visors of the several Counties, informing them what "we have done, and to request of them to send such "Delegates as they may choose, to represent them in "Congress"—a Resolution which was so general in its terms, that, in a body which was composed, exclusively, of those who, politically, were in opposition to the Home Government, there was no room for opposition to it, notwithstanding its silence concerning the Committee of Mechanics and the claim which had been made in its behalf;[4] but it was, also, one which laid the foundation for further and very important action, in which the bitterness of feeling, concerning the distribution of the proposed offices, which continued to exist between the rival factions of the con-

[1] Minutes of the Committee, "New-York, June 27, 1774."

It has been said, (de Lancey's Notes to Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 449,) that "the Committee met to con-"sider" that Resolution; but that would indicate that the Resolution was submitted to the previous Meeting, which is contradicted by the Minutes. It is clear, as we understand the record, that Alexander McDougal offered it, for consideration, only at the Meeting on the twenty-seventh of June.

[2] This portion of the Resolution evidently looked for the establishment of a Provincial Congress or Convention, in which should be vested supreme and arbitrary power, without limitation, over the persons and properties and actions and thoughts and convictions of every one within the Colony; overthrowing all Government; cancelling all Rights of Persons and Properties; and establishing, in their stead, an active scourging Despotism. Such an one was, soon afterwards, established; but, just at the time under consideration, the master spirits of the majority of the Committee had not secured the places to which they were aspiring; and, for that reason, they were not, then, ready to concur in that revolutionary, ultra revolutionary, measure.

[3] Minutes of the Adjourned Meeting of the Committee, "New-York, June "29, 1774."

[4] It is proper to remind the reader, in this place, of two well-known facts, each of which had an important bearing on the political events of the period now under consideration.

The first of these facts is, the "friends of the Government" took no part whatever, in the formation of the Committee of Correspondence nor in its doings. That body was denounced by the Colonial Government, from the beginning, as "illegal"—"it is allowed by the Intelli-"gent among them, that these assemblies of the People without au-"thority of Government are illegal and may be dangerous," (Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "New York 1st June 1774.") "These transactions" [the nomination of Deputies to the Congress and the proposed ratification of the ticket by the body of the people] "are dangerous, "my Lord, and illegal, but by what means shall Government prevent "them? An attempt by the power of the Civil Magistrate would only "show their weakness, and it is not easy to say upon what foundation a "military aid should be called in. Such a Measure would involve us in "Troubles which it is thought much more prudent to avoid; and to shun "all Extreams while it is yet possible Things may take a favourable "turn."—(The same to the same, "New York, 6th July, 1774.")

The party of the Government—subsequently called "Tories"—included only the members of the Colonial Government, in its various departments, and its dependents; it was, unwillingly, only a passive spectator of what, then, took place, in the political doings of that period; and it was wholly powerless to suppress the rising spirit of Revolution, which it would have gladly done. The party of the Opposition to the Government—subsequently called "Whigs"—included the great body of the inhabitants, aristocratic as well as democratic, the patricians as well as the plebeians. It was cut up into factions, based on social and financial standings; but, in its opposition to the Government, it was united and determined.

The second of the facts referred to is, at the time under consideration and during the succeeding half century, as we have already stated (vide pages 4, 5, ante,) those who were not Freeholders or Freemen of a Municipality, were not vested with the right of suffrage, in any of the Colonies; and it need not be a matter of surprise that, at that early day, the great body of the Freeholders and Freemen, in New York, was not inclined to permit any interference, in political affairs, by those who were not, legally, entitled to take part in them. Indeed, the rule of universal suffrage is not, to-day, generally recognized; and one State, in New England, if no more, continues to make a division of her citizens, at the Polls.

federated party of the Opposition, notwithstanding their apparent harmony on other questions, was promptly and very energetically displayed.

The Resolution offered by Theophilact Bache had no sooner been declared to have been carried, than Isaac Sears, seconded by Peter Van Brugh Livingston, representing the minority of the Committee, offered another Resolution, providing "that Messrs. "Isaac Low, James Duane, Philip Livingston, John "Morin Scott, and Alexander McDougal be nomi- "nated, agreeable to the question now carried;" but it was not the intention of the aristocratic, conservative majority of the Committee that the plebeian, revolutionary minority of that body should have the slightest representation in the proposed Delegation; and, notwithstanding its seeming fairness, the Resolution was promptly rejected, by a vote of twelve to twenty-five. The subject was subsequently disposed of, as it then appeared, by a Resolution, offered by John De Lancey and seconded by Benjamin Booth, providing for the nomination of the Delegates by the body of the Committee, of which the conservative aristocrats held the entire control, which resulted in the nomination of Philip Livingston, John Alsop, Isaac Low, James Duane, and John Jay, of whom John Alsop and John Jay, who had been substituted for the two candidates of the minority, John Morin Scott and Alexander McDougal, by reason of their known peculiarly conservative tendencies, were especially obnoxious to that revolutionary minority, as well as to the revolutionary portion of the unfranchised masses whom that minority indirectly represented. Another Resolution, requesting "the Inhab- "itants of this City and County to meet at the City- "Hall on Thursday, the seventh of July, at twelve "o'clock, to concur in the Nomination of the fore- "going five Persons, or to choose such others in their "stead as in their wisdom shall seem meet," was then adopted; and, the majority, probably, being well-contented with its apparent success, the Committee then adjourned.[1]

The minority of the Committee and those with whom it sympathized and acted, in political affairs—the "Bellwethers" and the "Sheep" of Gouverneur Morris's metaphor—were not inclined, however, to submit, tamely, to the arbitrary dictation of their "Shepherds," composing the majority of that body; and they promptly determined to carry the contest into a new field, and with heavy reinforcements. For that purpose, anonymous handbills were posted throughout the City,[2] on the day after the Committee's Meeting, calling a Meeting of "the good People "of this Metropolis,"[1] to be held in the Fields,[3] on the following day, [Wednesday, July 6] at six o'clock, "when Matters of the utmost Importance to their "Reputation and Security, as Freemen, will be com- "municated." At the appointed hour, it is said, "a "numerous meeting" was collected, with Alexander McDougal in the Chair, forming what continues to be known, in history, as "the great Meeting in the "Fields," at which several Speeches were made,[4] and nine Resolutions adopted, expressing the popular will.

One of the Resolutions adopted by that notable assemblage of the inhabitants of the City of New York, was almost identical, in words and sentiments, with that voted by the Town of Boston, on the thirteenth of May, of which mention has been made herein; another "instructed, empowered, and directed" the Deputies from New York, in the proposed Congress, "to engage with a majority of the principal "Colonies, to agree, for this City, upon a non-impor- "tation, from Great Britain, of all Goods, Wares, and "Merchandises, until the Act for blocking up the "Harbour of Boston be repealed, and American "Grievances be redressed; and, also, to agree to all "such other measures as the Congress shall, in their "Wisdom, judge advancive of these great Objects, "and a general Security of the Rights and Privileges "of America;" and another pledged the Meeting to abide by all that the proposed Congress should "come into, and direct or recommend to be done, "for obtaining and securing the important ends men- "tioned in the foregoing Resolutions." It also resolved "that it is the opinion of this Meeting that "it would be proper for every County in the Colony, "without delay, to send two Deputies, chosen by the "People or from the Committees chosen by them, in "each County, to hold, in conjunction with Deputies "for this City and County, a Convention for the "Colony, on a day to be appointed, in order to elect "a proper Number of Deputies to represent the Col-

[1] Minutes of the Committee, Adjourned Meeting. "New York, July 4, "1774."

See, also, Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "New "York, July 6, 1774;" the same to Governor Tryon, "Spring Hill 6th "July, 1774."

[2] One of those handbills has been preserved and may be seen, among other broadsides of that period, in the Library of the New York Historical Society.

[3] What were then called, sometimes, "The Fields," and, at other times, "The Common," on which has occurred so much of public interest, in later as well as in earlier days, have been called, during more than half a century past, "The Park;" and by that name it is still known, notwithstanding the greater attractions which, for some years past, have been presented to merely pleasure seekers, in the new pleasure-grounds known as "The Central Park."

[4] Among the speakers at that Meeting, it has been usual, for some years past, to give a prominent place to Alexander Hamilton, then a mere lad, who had been thrown into this City, a few years previously, by those, in the West Indies, who, for domestic if not for social reasons, had desired his removal from the place of his nativity. As there is no contemporary authority for such a favor to the previously questionable reputation of that "young West Indian," however, and because the only modern authority for the statement is the young man's son, John C. Hamilton, (Life of Alexander Hamilton, by his son, New York: 1840, i. 22, 23,) in whose unsupported testimony, in historical subjects, we have no confidence whatever, we prefer to leave that portion of the history of "the "great Meeting," if it is truly such a portion of it, where those who were present and who recorded the doings of the great assemblage then left it, entirely untold.

"ony in the general Congress. But that, if the "Counties shall conceive this mode impracticable or "inexpedient, they be requested to give their appro- "bation to the Deputies who shall be chosen for this "City and County, to represent the Colony in Con- "gress;" and it "instructed" "the City Committee of "Correspondence" "to use their utmost Endeavours "to carry these Resolutions into execution." After ordering the Resolutions to be printed in the public Newspapers of the City, and to be transmitted to the different Counties in the Colony and to the Committees of Correspondence for the neighboring Colonies, the Meeting then adjourned;[1] but its great influence was continued to be felt, long after the circumstances which had caused it to be assembled had passed from the memories of those who were present and who participated in its doings.

Inspired by the strength and the spirit of the Meeting in the Fields, and led in their opposition to the majority of the Committee, by all the old-time experienced popular leaders, the "Inhabitants of the City "and County," of every class, met, agreeably to the published request of the Committee of Correspondence, at the City Hall, at noon, on the day after those Inhabitants had assembled in the Fields; but they did not confirm the Committee's Nominations, for Deputies to the proposed Congress; and the utmost bad feeling, between the aristocratic majority of the Committee and the great body of the plebeian Tradesmen, Artisans, and Workingmèn, whom it had betrayed, prevailed throughout the city.[2]

It is not within the purposes of this work, however, to present a narrative of the various movements and counter-movements of the rival factions of the confederated party of the Opposition, again disunited, in their determined struggle for supremacy—nominally, for the establishment of their respective principles, in opposition to or in support of a general "Suspen- "sion of Trade," but, really, for places on the ticket for Delegates to the proposed Congress of the Continent—which was continued, without ceasing, from the seventh until the twenty-seventh of July;[3] and which was terminated, on the last-mentioned day, only after Philip Livingston, Isaac Low, John Alsop, and John Jay, four of the nominees of the aristocratic and conservative Committee of Correspondence, had inconsistently and venally declared, in direct contradiction of the constantly declared policy of that Committee, previously concurred in by themselves, that "a general Non-Importation Agreement, faith- "fully observed, would prove the most efficacious "Measure to procure a Redress of our Grievances,"[4] which had been the peculiarly distinguishing feature in the declared policy of the revolutionary faction, in the City of New York, as well as in that of the similar faction, in Boston; and after those four of the nominees of the Committee had thus practically abandoned their aristocratic and anti-revolutionary associates; withdrawn from the Committee which they had largely assisted in organizing and by whom they had been nominated; and united with those whom they personally despised and by whom they were quite as earnestly distrusted and despised—when, after the fashion of such corrupt political alliances, then and since—the way was prepared for a peaceful Election of the nominees of the Committee,[5] four of whom no longer represented the declared policy of the Committee; and one, if not more of the number was more of a Spy, in the service of the Colonial Government, than anything else.

It will be seen that James Duane did not disgrace himself or his name by placing the latter, with those of his four aristocratic associates on the ticket for Delegates to the proposed Congress, on the letter through which those four bartered the little of political and personal integrity and the modicum of unselfish principles which they respectively possessed, for a small mess of very thin official pottage; and, in that instance, his backwardness was honorable and timely, since there is every reason for the belief that, at that time, he was not master of himself; that he had, already, been purchased by another; and that, then, he was, in fact, only the servant of his master.

History has revealed[6] what, otherwise, would have remained, concealed, in the files of the Colonial Land Papers, in the Secretary's Office, in Albany,[7] concern-

---

[1] Proceedings of the Meeting, appended to the Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence, "New York, July 7, 1774."

See, also, Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1644, New-York, Thursday, July 7, 1774; Gaine's New-York Gazette and Mercury, No. 1185, New-York, Monday, July 11, 1774; Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 65, New-York, Thursday, July 14, 1774; Lieutenant-governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "Spring Hill, 2nd August, 1774;" Hamilton's Life of Alexander Hamilton, i., 21–23; Dawson's Park and its Vicinity, 34–37; Dunlap's History of New-York, i., 453; Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 79, 80; the same, centenary edition, iv., 355, 356; de Lancey's Notes to Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 451.

[2] Minutes of the Committee. July 7, 13, 19, 25, and 27, 1774; Dunlap's History of New York, i., 453; Hildreth's History of the United States, First Series, iii., 39; Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 80, 81; the same, centenary edition, iv., 356, 357; Leake's Memoir of General Lamb, 93; de Lancey's Notes on Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 451–466.

[3] Decidedly the most complete narrative of that notable factional struggle may be seen in de Lancey's Note xiv. on Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, (i., 449–467,) which has been prepared with great labor, and which contains carefully-made copies of many of the original handbills and placards which were, then, scattered throughout the city.

[4] Philip Livingston, John Alsop, Isaac Low, and John Jay to Abraham Brasher, Theophilus Anthony, Francis Van Dyck, Jeremiah Platt, and Christopher Duyckinck, "New York, July 26, 1774."

[5] Proceedings of "a Meeting of a number of Citizens convened at the "House of Mr. Marriner," at which the nominations by the Committee of Correspondence were acquiesced in, by those who assumed to represent the unfranchised inhabitants of the City, "New York, 27 July, "1774."

[6] "Duane, justly eminent as a lawyer, was embarrassed by large spec- "ulations in Vermont lands, from which he could derive no profit, but "through the power of the Crown."—(Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 79; the same, centenary edition, iv., 355.)

[7] New York Colonial Manuscripts indorsed "Land Papers," in the office of the Secretary of State, at Albany, xviii., 100; xix., 68; xx., 168, 169;

ing his speculations in the Crown lands, in New York and Vermont, to secure entire success in which the countenance of the Colonial Government was needed and had been secured; and the intimacy of his personal relations with the head of that Government, the venerable Cadwallader Colden,[1] and the remarkable similiarity of his views concerning the leading political questions of the day, among which the demand for a suspension of the trade of the Colonies with the Mother Country was one of the most prominent, and those, on the same questions, which were maintained by that unusually zealous servant of the King, are also well known to every careful reader of that portion of the political history of the Colony. Indeed, in the latter connection, it is known that, subsequently to his election as a Delegate to the Congress, and before he left New York, to take his seat in that body, as the trusted Envoy of all the inhabitants of that City, nominally charged with the great and honorable duty of seeking, in their behalf, a redress of the political grievances which had been imposed upon them by the Home Government, he visited and confidentially compared notes, on political subjects, with, if he did not also communicate information to, the official representative of that Government, in New York;[2] and, with that fact established, even in the absence of direct and positive testimony thereon, it would not be unreasonable to suppose or to say that specific lines of action, in the interest of the Crown, which were subsequently followed, within that Congress, individually and in concert with other Delegates, were, also, considered, and canvassed, and determined on, during that interview. In harmony, also, with that evident connection of James Duane with the Colonial Government,—in support, also, of the suspicion that particular lines of action, in the interest of the Crown, to be taken in the Congress, were considered and determined on, in advance of the meeting of the Congress, by that particular Delegate and the venerable Lieutenant-governor of the Colony—reference need be made only to that other patent fact, that the Congress had no sooner closed its sessions, at Philadelphia, than he hastened to his master, in New York, and reported to that anxious listener, for the use of the Ministry, in England, not only the doings of particular Delegations, in the Congress, and those of the Congress itself, but his own general dissent from the proceedings, his request that that dissent should be entered on the Journal, and the absolute refusal of permission to have that privilege given to him, all of which were thus communicated in open violation of his promise "to keep the Proceedings secret, until "the Majority shall direct them to be made Publick."[3] Indeed, he and Joseph Galloway, of Philadelphia, the latter of whom, also, had been a Delegate in the Congress, visited Lieutenant-governor Colden, soon after the adjournment of that body, and communicated to that distinguished member of the Government, all that he desired to know of the entire subject, not sparing even those portions of the proceedings of the Congress which it regarded as too delicate to be submitted to the light of day, in its subsequently published Journal;[4] and that, too, in the face of the notorious fact that each had already assented to and signed the Association of Non-Importation which the Congress had adopted,[5] which, prima-facie, carried with it, in each instance, to his constituents and to the world, a guaranty of his faithful discharge of the duties connected with the great trust which had been laid upon him; but, when regarded as only one of the links of a chain of evidence, concerning his entire conduct, in the political events of that period, it is one which, until the end of time, will establish the stern fact that James Duane, among others, was insincere, untrustworthy, and dishonest, as a man and as a politician.

The Colonial Government was decidedly and peculiarly opposed to the adoption of any measure, either by the people or the Congress, which would possibly disturb the Trade and Commerce of Great Britain; and James Duane, a dependent on that Government, was not at liberty to sign such a letter, approving the establishment of a Non-Importation Agreement, as that which his four associates on the aristocratic ticket, thus smeared with corruption, had signed, even if the consequence had been a sacrifice xxi., 10, 95; xxii., 15; xxxiii., 19, 41; xxvii., 17; and the many papers, concerning Duanesburg, of which he was a principal Proprietor.

[1] He was the Clerk of the Colonial Court of Chancery; he was, often, the retained Counsel of the Colonial Government (Opinions of Counsel in the Matter of Cunningham, Appellant, against Forsey, and in the Matter of Charges against Judge Wells;) he was the Counsel of the Lieutenant-governor, in the celebrated Suit, in Chancery, concerning a division of the Fees of his office, with the Earl of Dunmore, (Letters, etc., in the Matter of the Attorney-general pro Rege against Colden;) and the tone and the terms of the letters which passed between them, as they have been preserved in "the Colden Papers," in the Library of the New York Historical Society, leave no room for doubt on the subject.

[2] "By my Letter of the 7th of September your Lordship would find I "entertained Hopes that the People of this Province would adopt moderate Measures and avoid giving any new offence to the Parliament. I "know such were the sentiments of Farmers and Country People in "general who make a great Majority of the Inhabitants. I had a confidential conference with one of the Delegates sent from this city to the "Congress now met at Philadelphia who I thought had as much influence as any from this place, and he gave me assurances of his disposition "being similar."—(Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 7., "New York 5th October 1774.")

[3] The fourth Resolution or "Rule of Conduct to be observed," etc., is in these words: "Resolved: That the Doors be kept shut during the Time "of Business; and that the Members consider themselves under the "strongest Obligations of Honour to keep the Proceedings secret, until "the Majority shall direct them to be made Publick."—(Journal of the Congress, "Tuesday, September 6th, 1774, ten o'clock, A M.")

[4] The Despatch of Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth dated, "New York, December 7th, 1774," in which the Home Government was informed of these dishonorable revelations of the action of the Congress, is too extended to be copied into this Note. The reader is consequently referred to it.

[5] A carefully prepared fac-simile of the last sheet of that Association, which contained the signatures of the several Delegations—those of James Duane and Joseph Galloway being among them—may be seen in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., opposite folios 915, 916.

of that opportunity to obtain, for himself, a seat in that Congress, a contingency which the Colonial Government was, probably, quite as anxious to avoid, and one which was evidently guarded against by means which were entirely effective. James Duane was not among those who were suddenly converted, in order to ensure their success at the Polls; but, nevertheless, on the day after the disgraceful political somersault of Philip Livingston, Isaac Low, John Alsop, and John Jay had been declared satisfactory by their plebeian and revolutionary auditory, that eminent adherent to the original policy of the Committee of Correspondence, as well as those who had so ignominiously abandoned it, was elected, at the Polls, by the unanimous vote of "the Inhabitants,"[1] affording an example, in political engineering, which has been too often followed, at the expense of individual integrity and of the good of the country, from that time until the present.

Perhaps the preceding detail belongs more properly to the political history of the commercial City of New York than to that of the purely agricultural County of Westchester; yet it would be impossible to present any narrative of the events of the Revolution which occurred within that portion of the Colony, which should pretend to completeness, or precision, or accuracy, without having previously explained the precise nature of those influences which were brought, from beyond the limits of the County, to undermine the fundamental and rigid conservatism of those staid, well-to-do, and contented farmers who occupied that County, and to draw any portion of them from the quiet of their rural homes into the seething vortex of partisan excitement, concerning measures of the Home Government which did not affect them nor their interests, in the slightest degree —a departure from the ways of their fathers, which, before many months had elapsed, transformed that quiet, and neighborly, and law-abiding community into one of entire unrest and disorder, of the most intense partisan bitterness, and of the most complete disregard of all law, human and divine; converting what had been a quiet, and well-cultivated, and productive agricultural region into one over which were spread the evidences of partisan lawlessness, of vigilant suspicion and distrust, of sullen neglect, and, too often, of hopeless and lamentable ruin. The purposes, apparent or concealed, of those who created the Committee of Correspondence in the City of New York; the purposes, published or withheld, of the Committee itself; and the purposes, generally well-concealed, of some of those who wielded the influence of that Committee, sometimes for the promotion of their individual and not always righteous interests and sometimes for the suppression of the aspirations of others which were quite as praiseworthy as their own, are, therefore, subjects which cannot be disregarded, in whatever relates to revolutionary Westchester-county, since it was that Committee, as has been already stated, who made the first assault on the long-established conservatism of the farmers of that ancient County—an assault which was made entirely unsuccessful by their sturdy disregard; since it was that Committee, returning to the assault and offering the tempting allurements of place and official authority to those who should break from the ranks of their conservative countrymen—who, as will hereinafter appear, by means of such corrupt allurements, first broke the line of those rural home-guards which had previously thrown back the power of the insidious invader; and because it was that Committee who called into existence, successively, the revolutionary Congress of the Continent and the yet more revolutionary Provincial Congress, whence, subsequently, flowed that torrent of disorders and disasters over which Westchester-county has not ceased to mourn, from that period until the present. These have been consequently presented, as briefly, however, as was consistent with perspicuity; and a more complete, and precise, and accurate understanding of the details of the revolution of sentiments within Westchester-county, as portions of that more extended revolution, throughout the Colony and the Continent, "in the "minds and hearts of the people,"[2] it is believed, will, therefrom, be more readily and more certainly, if not more permanently, assured to the greater number of readers who shall resort to these pages.

Without the slightest indication of any concern because of the humiliating defeat to which it had been subjected, in the abandonment of one of the principal of its peculiar and emphatically declared principles, and in the acceptance, in the place of that abandoned principle, by its own nominees, of one of the peculiarly antagonistic principles of those whom it had persistently endeavored to silence and suppress, on the day after the election of the Delegates to the proposed Congress, [July 29,] the Committee of Correspondence in New York addressed a second Circular Letter to the County Committee, where there was one, or to the Treasurer, where there was no Com-

[1] Letter of the Committee of Correspondence of New York to the Committee in Charleston, "NEW YORK, July 26th, 1774," Postscript, dated "July "28th;" the same to the Committee in Philadelphia, "NEW YORK, July 28th, "1774;" the same to Matthew Tilghman, Chairman of the Maryland Committee, "NEW YORK, July 28th, 1774;" Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK 2 August 1774;" the same to Governor Tryon, "SPRING HILL 2 August 1774;" the same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK 7th Septr 1774;" the same to Governor Tryon, "Septr 7th "1774;" Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i, 34, 35; Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii, 83; the same, centenary edition, iv., 358.

[2] "An History of Military Operations, from April 19, 1775, to Septem- "ber 3, 1783, is not an History of the American Revolution, any more "than the Marquis of Quincy's Military History of Louis XIV, though "much esteemed, is a History of the Reign of that Monarch. The "Revolution was in the minds and hearts of the people, and in the "Union of the Colonies, both of which were substantially effected before "hostilities commenced."—(Letter from John Adams to Jedidiah Morse, "QUINCY, November 29, 1815.")

mittee, in each of the several Counties in the Colony, in which, after it had stated the election of Delegates to represent the City of New York, in the proposed Congress, to be assembled on the first of September ensuing, at Philadelphia, it presumptuously and with an assumed air of leadership, continued, in these words: "It therefore becomes necessary that the "Delegates to represent the other Counties in this "Province be speedily appointed. The Counties will "judge of the propriety of confiding in the same per- "sons only which we have chosen, or to appoint such "others to go, with them, to the Congress, as they "may think fit to depute, for that purpose. Permit "us to observe that the number of Delegates is imma- "terial, since those of each Province, whether more "or less, will conjointly have only one vote at the "Congress. In order, however, that the representa- "tion of the different Counties may be quite com- "plete, it is absolutely necessary that your County "appoint, with all possible speed, one or more Dele- "gates to join and go with ours to the Congress, or, if "you choose to repose your confidence in our Dele- "gates, that you signify such your determination, in "the most clear and explicit terms, by the first op- "portunity, after the sense of your County can be "known, on so interesting a subject." [1]

To this Circular Letter which was thus sent to the several rural Counties throughout the Colony, only six of those Counties are known to have paid the slightest attention, those of Westchester, Duchess, and Albany having respectively authorized the Delegates whom the City of New York had elected, to represent them, also, in the Congress; [2] while those of Kings, [3] Suffolk, [4] and Orange, [5] respectively, sent Delegates of their own appointment; and Richmond, Queens, Ulster, Cumberland, Gloucester, Charlotte, and Tryon, respectively, did not manifest the slightest interest in the subject. [6] For the purposes of this work, only the action of the County of Westchester, on that Circular Letter, can be noticed in this place.

As the Committee of Correspondence evidently intended that only the united action of the entire County, in every instance, should be invited, on the subject of appointing Delegates to the proposed Congress, it is not probable that the sentiments of the individual Towns, on any other subjects, were considered desirable, or were expected to be ascertained, or, if ascertained, were desired to be given to the public. Be that as it may, for some reason, if more than four Towns in Westchester-county took any action whatever, in response to the Circular Letter of the Committee, concerning the political questions of that period, or for the appointment of Deputies to represent the County in the proposed Congress, or for any other purpose, the record of that action has escaped the notice of working historical students—the proceedings of Mamaroneck were communicated directly to the Committee, at New York, in a letter dated on the seventh of August; and those of Bedford were also communicated, directly to the same Committee, in a letter dated on the ninth of that month: [7] the proceedings of Rye and those of the Borough Town of Westchester, because of the respective opinions of those Towns, on other subjects, which were more fully and formally expressed, require more particular notice.

On the tenth of August, responsive to the Circular Letter from the Committee in New York, the Freeholders and Inhabitants of Rye, who sympathized with that Committee in its proposal that Westchester-county should appoint Delegates to represent it in the proposed Congress, met and appointed John Thomas, Junior, Esq., James Horton, Junior, Esq., Robert Bloomer, Zeno Carpenter, and Ebenezer Haviland, for "a Committee to consult and determine, with the "Committees of the other Towns and Districts within "the County," in County Convention, to be assembled at the Court-house, at the White Plains, on Monday, the twenty-second of August, "upon the ex- "pediency of sending one or more Delegates to the "Congress, to be held in Philadelphia, on the first "day of September next."

The Meeting appears to have patiently waited, without adjourning, while the Committee which it had appointed, organized, by the appointment of Ebenezer Haviland, as its Chairman; and considered the great political questions of the day; and expressed its conclusions on those questions, in a series of Resolutions, in the following words:

"THIS MEETING being greatly alarmed at the late "Proceedings of the British Parliament, in order to "raise a Revenue in America; and considering their late "most cruel, unjust, and unwarrantable Act for block- "ing up the Port of Boston, having a direct tendency to "deprive a free People of their most valuable Rights "and Privileges, an introduction to subjugate the In- "habitants of the English Colonies and to render "them Vassals to the British House of Commons:

"RESOLVE, FIRST, That they think it their greatest "Happiness to live under the illustrious House of "Hanover; and that they will steadfastly and uni- "formly bear true and faithful Allegiance to His

---

[1] Draft of the Circular Letter sent to the Committee or Treasurer of the different Counties, "NEW YORK, July 29, 1774," appended to the Minutes of the Committee, "NEW YORK, July 28, 1774."

See, also, Lieutenant-governor Colden to Governor Tryon, "SPRING "HILL 2 August 1774."

[2] Credentials of those Delegates—Journal of the Congress, "Monday, "September 5, 1774."

[3] Credential of Simon Boerum—Journal of the Congress, "Saturday, "October 1, 1774."

[4] Credential of William Floyd—Journal of the Congress, "Monday, "September 5, 1774."

[5] Credential of Henry Wisner—Journal of the Congress, "Wednesday, "September 14, 1774, A.M." and that of John Herring—Journal of the "Congress, "Monday, September 26, 1774, A.M."

[6] Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK, "7th September, 1774."

[7] Minutes of the Committee, "NEW YORK, August 29, 1774."

"Majesty, King George the Third, under the enjoy-
"ment of their constitutional Rights and Privileges,
"as fellow-subjects, with those of England.

"SECOND, That we conceive it a fundamental part "of the British Constitution, that no Man shall be "taxed but by his own Consent, or that of his Repre"sentative, in Parliament; and as we are by no means
"represented, we consider all Acts of Parliament
"imposing Taxes on the Colonies, an undue ex-
"ertion of Power, and subversive of one of the most "valuable Privileges of the English Constitution.

"THIRD, That it is the Opinion of this Meeting
"that the Act of Parliament for shutting up the Port
"of Boston, and divesting some of the Inhabitants of "private Property, is a most unparalleled, rigorous,
"and unjust piece of Cruelty and Despotism.

"FOURTH, That unanimity and firmness of "Measures in the Colonies are the most effectual
"Means to secure the invaded Rights and Privileges
"of America, and to avoid the impending Ruin which "now threatens this once happy Country.

"FIFTH, That the most effectual mode of redress-
"ing our Grievances will be by a general Congress of "Delegates from the different Colonies; and that we "are willing to abide by such Measures as they, in "their Wisdom, shall think most conducive upon
"such an important Occasion."

These Resolutions were duly submitted to the Meeting; and, as the official record says, they "were "unanimously approved of;" when the assemblage quietly dispersed.[1]

Those who are acquainted with the questionable practices of ambitious, and, not unfrequently, unscrupulous politicians, will be prepared, without warning, for the reception of any modification of the recorded features of that Meeting, at Rye, of which mention has been made—the first demonstration, in Westchester-county, concerning the great political questions of the day, of which there is, now, any existing record.

It does not appear, nor is it pretended, that the Meeting of "the Freeholders and Inhabitants of the "Township of Rye," now under consideration, was numerously attended; and, as it was held during the busiest season of the agricultural year, there is no reason for supposing that many were present. In the same connection, it will be seen that the place of meeting is, also, unnoticed on the record. The master-spirit of the assembled farmers, whether many or few in number, was John Thomas, Junior, one of a family of officeholders under the Home and the Colonial Governments,[2] and, himself, an anxious office-seeker, from the revolutionary party;[3] and the well-considered and well-worded Resolutions, as well-adapted for the protection of the father's official positions as for the construction of others for the son's advancement, and evidently the work of a master-hand which was not seen in the Committee nor in the Meeting, promote a suspicion that that Meeting of "the Free-"holders and Inhabitants of the Township of Rye," the first indication of Westchester-county's inclination to enter the area of political strife, was nothing more nor less than a movement in the Thomas family, and for its particular benefit. Subsequent events, in connection with the doings of those who were present, at that particular Meeting, serve to strengthen that suspicion, if not to confirm it.[4]

While the politicians, in Rye, were discussing, with more or less satisfaction, the result of their doings, to which reference has been made, those in the Bor-

[1] Official report of the proceedings of the Meeting—Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1650, NEW-YORK, Thursday, August 18, 1774.

See, also, Gaine's New-York Gazette, and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1192, NEW-YORK, Monday, August 15, 1774, and Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 70, NEW-YORK, Thursday, August 18, 1774.

[2] The Grandfather of John Thomas, Junior, was the Rev. John Thomas, Rector of St. George's Church, Hempstead, Long Island, who, from his Ordination, in 1704, until his death, in 1727, was a Missionary in the employ of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, in London. The father of John Thomas, Junior, was Hon. John Thomas, who, from 1743 until the dissolution of the Colonial Government, in 1776, was a Member of the General Assembly of the Colony, representing the County of Westchester; and, from May, 1755, until the dissolution of the Colonial Government, in 1776, he was the First Judge of the Colonial Court of Common Pleas for the County of Westchester—both of which offices could have been held by no one who was not well-disposed to the Colonial and Home Governments; and neither of which was surrendered by him, while he lived.

The following extract from a letter from Timothy Wetmore, the Venerable Society's Schoolmaster at Rye, to the Secretary of that body, at London, dated "RYE, May 6, 1761," affords additional evidence of the political tendencies of the Thomas family, and of its hankerings after the power to manipulate the "patronage" of those in authority, throughout Westchester-county: "Mr. Thomas, who is one of the Representa-"tives in this County, and who, in Governour De Lancey's time, being "favoured with all the Administration of all Offices in the Country, civil "and military, by the help of which he has procured himself a large in-"terest in the County, especially in the distant and new Settlements, "which abound with a Set of People governed more by venality than "any thing else. This Gentleman, although one of the Society's "Missionaries' Sons, is so negligent and indifferent toward Religion "(in imitation of some of our great Men) that it has been a steady "Method with him, for years, not to attend Publick Worship, perhaps "more than once or twice in a year, whose example has been mis-"chievous. This man is not only one of our Vestry (though very "little esteemed by the true friends of the Church), but has procured "that the Majority of the Vestry are Men that will be governed by "him; several of the Vestry are not of the Church; and not one of "them a communicant in the Church; accordingly, the Church are "not at all consulted with regard to a successor," to the former Rector, who had died in the preceding May.

With the father, on the Bench, and in the Legislature, and in the interest of the Crown, and the son in the front rank, if not the actual head, of the revolutionary element, what there was of it, within the County, it mattered very little to the Thomas family, which of the two, the Crown or the Colonists, should become the victors.

[3] John Thomas, Junior, by this early movement in behalf of the revolutionary element, placed himself in the front rank of successful politicians in Westchester-county—he was a member of the Committee of the County, and its Chairman; a Member of the Provincial Convention, representing Westchester-county, in 1775; a Member of the First and Second Provincial Congresses, representing Westchester-county, in 1775, 1776; Quartermaster of the Second Westchester-county Regiment, of which his brother, Thomas, was Colonel; and Sheriff of Westchester-county, from 1778 to 1781—his brothers, also, having been well provided for, in the public service.

[4] See the Disclaimer of Isaac Gidney and eighty-three other "Freeholders "and Inhabitants of Rye," "RYE, New York, September 24, 1774," pages 32, 33, post.

ough Town of Westchester, within which the political family of Morris was seated,[1] prepared to follow their example. For that purpose, on Saturday, the twentieth of August, also in response to the Circular Letter received from the Committee of Correspondence in the City of New York, those of "the Freeholders "and Inhabitants" of that Borough Town who sympathized with that Committee in its request that Westchester-county should appoint Delegates to represent it in the proposed Congress, met, and appointed James Ferris, Esq., Colonel Lewis Morris, and Captain Thomas Hunt, "a Committee to meet the Com- "mittees of the different Towns and Precincts, within "this County, at the White Plains, on Monday, the "twenty-second instant, to consult on the expediency "of appointing one or more Delegates to represent "this County, at the general Congress, to be held at "Philadelphia, the first day of September next."

Like the similar Meeting, at Rye, this Meeting also waited, apparently without adjourning, until its Committee was formally organized, by the appointment of James Ferris, Esq., as its Chairman, and while that Committee considered the various political questions of the period—"the very alarming Situa- "tion of their suffering Brethren, at Boston, occa- "sioned by the late unconstitutional, arbitrary, and "oppressive Act of the British Parliament, for "blocking up their Port, as well as the several Acts "imposing Taxes on the Colonies, in order to raise a "Revenue in America"—and had prepared the following Resolutions expressive of the result of its deliberations on those very grave questions:

"First, Resolved, That we do and will bear true "Allegiance to His Majesty, George the Third, King "of Great Britain, &c., according to the British "Constitution.

"Second, That we coincide in opinion with our "friends of New York and of every other Colony, "that all Acts of the British Parliament, imposing "Taxes on the Colonies, without their Consent, or by "their Representative, are arbitrary and oppressive, "and should meet the abhorrence and detesta- "tion of all good men; That they are replete with "the purpose of creating Animosities and Dissensions "between the Mother Country and the Colonies; "and thereby tend to destroy that Harmony and "mutual Agreement which it is so much the Interest "of both, to Cherish and Maintain.

"Third, That we esteem it our Duty, and think it "incumbent on all the Colonies in America, to con- "tribute towards the Relief of the poor and distressed "People of Boston; and that a Person of this Bor- "ough be appointed to collect such charitable Dona- "tions, within the same, as may be offered for their "Support.

"Fourth, That as a Division in the Colonies "would be a sure means to counteract the present "Intention of the Americans, in their Endeavours to "preserve their Rights and Liberties from the Inva- "sion that is threatened, we do most heartily recom- "mend a Steadiness and Unanimity in their Meas- "ures, as they will have the happy Effects of averting "the Calamity that the late tyrannical Acts of the "British Parliament would otherwise most assuredly "involve us in.

"Fifth, That to obtain a Redress of our Griev- "ances, it has been thought most advisable, in the "Colonies, to appoint a general Congress, we will take "Shelter under the Wisdom of those Gentlemen who "may be chosen to represent us, and cheerfully ac- "quiesce in any Measures they may judge shall be "proper, on this very alarming and critical Occasion."

These Resolutions were duly presented to the Meeting; and the official record of the proceedings of that Meeting tells, to all comers, they "were unani- "mously agreed to;" after which the Meeting was dissolved.[2]

Because the numerous tenants and other dependents on the Morris family were residents of Westchester, and not distant, there is reason for the supposition that the Meeting was well-attended; and there can be no reasonable doubt that the proceedings were conducted with entire propriety and good order. But, like the Meeting at Rye, of which mention has been made, that at Westchester was evidently controlled by a single master-spirit; and, like the former, the latter was, also, unquestionably convened and conducted, not as much for the clear expression of the uncontrolled and intelligent opinions of "the Free- "holders and Inhabitants" of the Town, on the grave questions which were submitted to them, or for the honest promotion of the best interests of the Colony, as for a preparation of the way for the return of the Morris family to place, and authority, and influence in the political affairs of the Colony, from which, through the controlling power of the De Lanceys, it had been, for many years, entirely excluded.

It is probable that the other Towns throughout the County, if any such Towns, really or apparently, responded to the invitation of the Committee of Correspondence in New York, either contented themselves, like those of Bedford and Mamaroneck, with only the elections of Delegates to the proposed Convention of the County, without any further expression of their sentiments, or, if they expressed such sentiments or any others, that, in the absence of all other than merely local agitators, they did not crowd those sentiments before a people who were already surcharged with such wordy manifestations; and it remains only for us to record the additional [1] Until 1846, the Borough Town of Westchester included, within its boundaries, the more modern towns of Westchester, West Farms, and Morrisania.

[2] Official record of the proceedings of the Meeting, in Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1194, New-York, Monday, August 29, 1774, and in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 72, New-York, Thursday, September 2, 1774.

facts that, on Monday, the twenty-second of August, 1774, a Convention of Delegates from the several Towns and Districts of Westchester-county, or from a number of them, was assembled in the Court-house, at the White Plains; that Colonel Frederic Philipse, Lord of the Manor of Philipseborough and a Member of the General Assembly of the Province, representing the County of Westchester in that body, was in the Chair of that Convention;[1] that it was determined to authorize a Delegation to represent the County, in the proposed Congress of the Continent, at Philadelphia; and that Isaac Low, Philip Livingston, James Duane, John Alsop, and John Jay, who had been elected to represent the City and County of New York, in that Congress, should be duly authorized, also, to represent the County of Westchester, therein.[2]

By that determination and action of its nominally authorized Convention, the County of Westchester, in history, if not in fact,[3] placed itself abreast of the most advanced advocates for the autonomy of the British Colonies in America; and no one can successfully dispute the fact that the Delegates whom, the records say, the County authorized to represent it, in the consultations and discussions and votes of the proposed Congress, no matter what, in the Congress or elsewhere, the doings of those who composed that Delegation may have been, were gentlemen of the highest social standing; that some of them were gentlemen of the highest intellectual powers; and that all possessed what, at that time, either consistently or inconsistently, honestly or dishonestly, they publicly assumed to have been the highest regard for the welfare of the Colony and of the Continent. It appears, however, notwithstanding that apparently general movement, in favor of the proposed Congress, among the farmers of Westchester-county, or, at least, a general acquiescence therein, that there was a very important portion of them, individually respectable and respectable in numbers, who had not been thus influenced; who, therefore, had not joined in the reported election of Delegates to the Convention; and who were without any sympathy with those who were promoting the call for a Congress of the Continent, even for consultation and mutual advice. There is reason, also, for supposing that there were many such cautious or timid conservatives, in each of the Towns, if, indeed, the great body of the inhabitants of each was not thus disposed to maintain the conservatism of the past; that they were not confined to any particular class of the inhabitants of those Towns; and that they included holders of freehold properties and of the right of suffrage at the Polls as well as holders of leasehold properties, Tenants on the Manors, who held no such political right—all of them men of intelligence and respectability. A specimen of the dissent referred to, may be seen in the following disclaimer, which was published in the newspapers of the day:[4]

"RYE, NEW YORK; September 24, 1774.

"We, the Subscribers, Freeholders and Inhabitants "of the Town of Rye, in the County of Westchester, "being much concerned with the unhappy Situation "of public Affairs, think it our Duty to our King and "Country, to Declare that we have not been con- "cerned in any Resolutions entered into or Measures "taken, with regard to the Disputes at present sub- "sisting with the Mother Country; we also testify "our dislike to many hot and furious Proceedings, in "consequence of said Disputes, which we think are "more likely to ruin this once happy Country, than "remove Grievances, if any there are.

"We also declare our great Desire and full Reso- "lution to live and die peaceable Subjects to our "Gracious Sovereign, King George the Third, and his "Laws.

"Isaac Gidney,	William Armstrong,
"Abraham Wetmore,	James Hains,
"John Collum,	Thomas Thaell,
"Henry Bird,	Dennis Lary,

---

[1] "Card to the Public," reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1188, 1189.

[2] Credentials of the Delegates from New-York, Journal of the Congress, "Monday, September 5, 1774."

[3] The subsequently published disclaimer of inhabitants of Rye and other circumstances of the same tendency, incline us to the belief of what Lieutenant-governor Colden informed the Earl of Dartmouth, on that general subject, in his Despatch of October 5, 1774, that "a great deal of 'Pains has been taken to perswade the Counties to chuse Delegates for "the Congress or to adopt those sent by this City. Several of the Coun- "ties have refused to be concerned in the Measures. In Queens County "where I have a House & reside the summer Season six Persons have not "been got together for the Purpose and the Inhabitants remain firm in "their Resolution not to join in the Congress. In the Counties that have "joined in the Measures of the City, I am inform'd the Business has "been done by a very few Persons who took upon themselves to act for "the Freeholders. A Gentleman who was present when the Delegates "were chosen in Orange County says, there were not twenty Persons "present at that Meeting tho' there are above 1000 Freeholders in that "County: and I am told the case was similar in other Counties that it "is said have joined in the Congress."

In the same connection, Joseph Galloway, when he was examined before the House of Commons, testified, that "I don't think that one-fifth "part have, from principle and choice, supported the present Rebellion." * * * "The last Delegation to Congress, made by the Province of "Pennsylvania, and the appointment of all the Officers of that State, was "made by less than two hundred Voters, although there are at least "thirty thousand men intitled to Vote, by the Laws of the Province. "One instance more I beg leave to give. One of the Delegates from the "Province of New York, (with whom I sat in Congress in 1774) repre- "senting a considerable District in that Province, was chosen by himself "and his clerk only, and that clerk certified to the Congress that he was "unanimously appointed!" In a foot-note to this portion of that testimony, Galloway added: "The people of Kings County so much disap- "proved of the sending any Members to the Congress, that, although "due notice was given of the time and place of Election, only two of "them met: Mr. Simon Boerum appointed his friend Clerk, and the "Clerk appointed Mr. Boerum a Delegate in Congress, who was the only "Representative for that large County."—(Examination, 16 June, 1779—The Examination of Joseph Galloway, Esq., before the House of Commons. London: 1779, 10, 11.)

See, also, Galloway's Letters to a Nobleman, Second Edition, London: 1779, 21.

[4] Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 78, NEW-YORK, Thursday, October 13, 1774.

"Robert Merrit,	Roger Purdy,
"Roger Merrit,	Gilbert Brundige,
"Isaac Anderson,	Joseph Clark,
"John Willis,	James Gedney,
"Nehemiah Sherwood,	James Purdy,
"William Crooker,	John Adee,
"Andrew Carhart,	Nathaniel Purdy,
"Seth Purdy,	Joseph Wilson,
"Disbury Park,	Benjamin Willson,
"Major James Horton,	James Hart,
"Nathaniel Sniffen,	Silemon Halsted,
"Sol. Gidney,	James Budd,
"Bartholomew Hains,	Thomas Kniffen,
"Gilbert Hains,	Gilbert Merrit, Esq.
"Joshua Purdy,	John Carhart,
"James Wetmore,	Israel Seaman,
"William Brown,	William Hall,
"Joseph Purdy,	Capt. Abraham Bush,
"Jonathan Budd,	Andrew Lion,
"Ebenezer Brown, Jun.,	James Jamisson,
"Henry Slater,	Thomas Brown,
"Andrew Kniffen,	Gilbert Thaell, Jun.,
"Thomas Wilson,	Joseph Merrit, Jun.,
"Timothy Wetmore, Esq.,	Jonathan Gedney,
"Daniel Erwin,	John Guion,
"Roger Park,	Elijah Hains,
"Roger Kniffen,	John Affrey,
"John Hawkins,	Hack. Purdy,
"Andrew Merrit,	Charles Thaell, Esq.,
"Archibald Tilford,	John Kniffen,
"Adam Seaman,	John Park,
"Rievers Morrel,	Joshua Gedney,
"Abraham Miller,	Ebenezer Brown,
"Jonathan Kniffen,	John Slater,
"John Buvelot,	Benjamin Kniffen,
"Gilbert Thaell,	Nehemiah Wilson,
"Isaac Brown,	Gilbert Morris, Jr.,
"Peter Florence."

Those who are acquainted with the methods which are very often employed by audacious partisans or by those more insidious supporters of a questionable proposition, for the instruction of an opponent in what way to do or to say what, if left to himself, he would not think of either saying or doing, in any manner, will be very likely to concur in the suspicion which prevails, that the following papers, each of them supplementary to the above-recited disclaimer and declaration, were the reasonable results of such, not always gentle, social or political or ecclesiastical or financial pressure as is, very generally, seen among the methods to which reference has been made.

"Rye, October 17th, 1774.

"We, the Subscribers, having been suddenly and "unwarily drawn in, to sign a certain Paper pub-"lished in Mr. Rivington's Gazetteer, of the 13th "instant; and being now, after mature deliberation, "fully convinced that we acted preposterously, and "without adverting properly to the Matter in dispute "between the Mother Country and her Colonies, are, "therefore, sorry that we ever had any concern in "said Paper; and we do by these Presents utterly "disclaim every part thereof, except our expressions "of Loyalty to the King and Obedience to the con-"stitutional Laws of the Realm.

"Abraham Miller,	William Brown,
"Adam Seaman,	Isaac Anderson,
"Andrew Carehart,	William Crooker,
"John Carehart,	Andrew Lyon,
"Gilbert Brundige,	John Buflot,
"John Willis,	John Slater,
"James Jameson,	Israel Seaman,
"Gilbert Merrit." [1]

The following very cautiously worded Card, appended to a full copy of the disclaimer and declaration, dated on the twenty-fourth of September, which bore the signature of Timothy Wetmore, Esquire, was published, forty days afterwards:

"The above Paper, like many others, being liable "to misconstruction, and having been understood, by "many, to import a Recognition of a Right in the "Parliament of Great Britain, to bind America, in all "cases whatsoever, and to signify that the Colonies "labour under no Grievances, which is not the Sense "I meant to convey, I think it my Duty to explain "my Sentiments upon the Subject, and thereby pre-"vent future Mistakes

"It is my Opinion that the Parliament have no "Right to Tax America, tho' they have a Right to "regulate the Trade of the Empire. I am further of "Opinion that several Acts of Parliament are Griev-"ances; and that the execution of them ought to be "Opposed, in such Manner as may be Consistent with "the Duty of a Subject to our Sovereign; tho' I can-"not help expressing my Disapprobation of many "violent Proceedings, in some of the Colonies.

"Dated the 3d of November, 1774.

"Timothy Wetmore." [2]

The organization of the Congress of the Continent, and its Proceedings, as far as it permitted those Proceedings to be made public, and the series of papers which it sent forth, in behalf of the complaining Colonies, form important portions of the world's history which need not be repeated, in this place. It will not be improper, however, to notice, in this connection, the fact that two, if no more, of the Delegates who represented the revolutionary portion of the inhabitants of Westchester-county, in that Congress, were actively associated with Joseph Galloway, whom history has regarded as a "volunteer spy for the "British Government," [3] in a measure, proposed in the interest of the Crown, which the Congress not only rejected, with contempt, but would not permit to be laid on its table nor to be recorded on its published Journal;[1] that one of those two Delegates was subsequently discovered to have been quite as deeply implicated in a perfidious communication of the secret proceedings of the Congress, with quite as earnest a sympathy for the King and the Government, as Joseph Galloway is known to have been;[2] and that the other Delegate referred to signalized himself, throughout the entire period occupied by the Congress, not only by his earnest advocacy of "the insidious proposi-"tion" of Joseph Galloway, offered and supported in the interest of the Crown, but by his unceasing opposition to every assertion of republican principles and by his equally untiring support of whatever sustained the existing power of the aristocracy and the time-hallowed prerogatives of the Crown and the Parliament[3]—he has not, indeed, been found to have been, directly, in the service of the Colonial Government; but he is known to have been the willing associate and confidential friend of those who were actively employed in that service; and in their loyal labors, in behalf of their recognized Sovereign, he is known, also, to have been their open and untiring and most distinguished co-worker,[4] concealed from the light of open day, however, by the vote of secrecy which his friends and associates did not hesitate to disregard, in the presence of the official representative of the Crown, who was, also, their political master. It has been usual to screen the latter of the two Delegates from the censures of history and to regard him as peculiarly pure and virtuous, as a man and as a politician; but, as has been well-said by another, "there "are no tricks in plain and simple faith."

[1] Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 79, New-York, Thursday, October 20, 1774.

[2] Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 82, New-York, Thursday, November 10, 1774.

[3] Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 126; the same, centenary edition, iv., 392.

It will not be improper to notice, also, in this connection, that the proceedings and the recommendations of the Congress were not, by any means, unanimously accepted and approved, either by the several Colonial Assemblies, or by the several Towns throughout the Colonies, or by the Inhabitants of the Towns, individually; and that, in many instances, that dissent was made known to the world, in terms which could not be mistaken. Indeed, no intelligent person can arise from a careful and dispassionate examination of the unquestionable authorities which have come down to us, concerning the origin of that Congress, the expressed purposes for which it was called, its organization, the extent of authority which was delegated to the several Delegations of which it was composed, and the action of those Delegations, within the Congress, without having been entirely convinced that the Congress was not a legally constituted body, created in pursuance of Law, and entitled to recognition, in law or in fact, by any individual Colonist or by any legally organized body, of any class;[5] that, on the contrary, it was nothing else than a voluntary association, in which, every member acted entirely on his individual responsibility, without possessing or acquiring the slightest right, in law, to exact obedience from any, beyond what each, for himself, had already specifically consented to yield; that it was proposed and organized only for consultation and advice and united action, within the well-defined limits of the Law of the Land; that no authority was vested in it, by its several constituencies, to assume and exercise any legislative functions whatever, to publish decrees equivalent to Statutes, to require obedience to such decrees, nor to order the infliction of penalties where there should be any disobedience to its enactments; that, to the extent of its action beyond the letter of the authority which had been delegated to it and as far as that action was in violation of existing Statutes, it acted in open violation of the clearly expressed loyalty of its several constituencies, of its own ostentatious pretensions of fealty to the Sovereign, and of that obedience to the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, an alleged violation of which fundamental Laws, by the Parliament and the Ministry, constituted the gravamen of its denunciations of the Government, and the spirit of its own existence; that, to that extent, also, it was revolutionary; and, to that extent, therefore, it gave reasonable cause for discontent, and dis-

[1] "With a heart full of loyalty to my Sovereign, I went into Congress—'and from that loyalty I never deviated, in the least. I proposed a Plan "of Accommodation in the Congress, agreeable to my Instructions;—some "of the best men, and men of the best fortunes, espoused the Plan, and "drew with me."—(Examination of Joseph Galloway before the House of Commons, 18 June, 1779, London: 1779, 47–54.)

"His scheme" framed "in secret concert with the Governor of New "Jersey and with Colden of New York," "held out a hope of Continental "Union, which was the long cherished policy of New York; it was sec-"onded by Duane and advocated by Jay, but opposed by Lee of Vir-"ginia."—(Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 140, 141; the same, centenary edition, iv., 402.)

"The scheme was intended to perpetuate the dependence of the Colo-"nies on England: and was proposed with the approbation of the loy-"alist Governors, Franklin of New Jersey, and Colden of New York. "Galloway urged it in an elaborate speech; and it was supported by "Duane, Jay, and Edward Rutledge. It was not only rejected, however, "but the members came at last to view it with so much odium that the "Motions in relation to it were ordered to be expunged from the Jour-"nals. This result was an end to the loyalist influence in Congress."—(Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, Boston: 1872, 367, 368.)

See, also, Hildreth's History of the United States, First Series iii., 46; Pitkin's History of the United States, i., 299, 300; Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, ii., 109; etc.

[2] Vide pages 26, 27, ante.

[3] John Jay opposed some of the extremely democratic utterances of Patrick Henry, very properly; but he opposed, also, the utterance of Roger Sherman, when that plain man "deduced allegiance from consent," as he continued to oppose that democratic dogma, throughout his entire life. The aristocratic Richard Henry Lee was in harmony with him; but the democratic element of the Congress was widely opposed to him, in all his fundamental propositions.

[4] Vide the extracts from Galloway's Examination, Bancroft's History of the United States, and Frothingham's Rise of the Republic, in Note 1, page 34, above.

[5] Although this is not likely to be disputed, by any one, it may be proper to state that it was not claimed to have been so, by those who promoted the call for it—"it is allowed by the most Intelligent among "them, that these assemblies of the People are illegal and may be danger-"ous, but they deny that they are unconstitutional when a national "grievance cannot otherwise be removed."—(Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK 1st June, 1774.") sent, and alarm, among those who had not been promised such a result; among those who were not inclined to be crowded into insurrection, without their consent; and among those whose best interests and whose families' best interests rested on a continued peace throughout the Colonies and on a due attention to their own affairs.

The purposes of this work afford no warrant for a more extended narrative than we have given of the really varied designs of those, in other Colonies than in that of New York, who promoted the assembling of a Congress of the Colonies; nor of the intrigues of those who, some for one purpose and some for another, desired to become members of that body; nor of the objects for which it was specially invited and convened; nor of the influences which controlled it, after it was convened, and which transformed it from that instrument for securing a peaceful redress of those grievances of which the Colonists had complained, that Reconciliation with the Mother Country which was "most ardently desired by all good men," that Harmony and good Will between Great Britain and her Colonists which only a very few revolutionists, in some of the Colonies, did not anxiously hope for, and that general Peace which would have restored prosperity and happiness to both the Colonists and the inhabitants of Great Britain, for securing all of which and for no other purpose whatever it had been specifically invited and convened, into an instrument for the violation of the rights of individuals and of property, previously regarded as sacred, and for the promotion of Insurrection and of Revolution and of Rebellion, of War and of Devastation and of Ruin, and these for nothing else than for the advancement of individual and sectional interests, for none of which latter purposes was there more than a handful of reckless advocates, in any of the Colonies, and against which, with the exception of the handful of "fire-eaters" of that period, to whom we have referred, there was, in each of the Colonies, nothing else than a firm and undivided opposition, in which every sect and every faction and every party were sincerely united. All these must be left for elucidation by other hands, in other works; but we may be permitted to say, here, in brief, that, since what were regarded as grievances, of which complaints had been made and which were sought to be redressed, were peculiarly of a commercial or mercantile character, the disaffection of the Colonists, in New York, because of those alleged grievances, was confined to the commercial and mercantile centres, the two Cities of New York and Albany, without affecting or disturbing the peace of or, indeed, exciting any particular interest within, the rural Counties, within the Colony; that, in consequence, whatever means were resorted to, by those of the commercial and mercantile classes, within those business centres and among those who were or who supposed they were aggrieved, for the purpose of obtaining a redress of their alleged grievances—of which means the proposed Congress of the Colonies, honestly or dishonestly, was said to have been one—were sustained and advanced, within those business centres, with an almost entire unanimity among their inhabitants and with all the energy and determination which self-interest, largely developed, can arouse among active, ambitious, unscrupulous, and wealthy men; while, among the agriculturists and small country traders, none of whom had been or were, in the slightest degree, aggrieved by the Colonial policy of the Home Government,—among whom, therefore, there was no disaffection, because of that policy; and whose individual interests would be more advanced and better secured by continued quiet, throughout the Colony, than by unrest and political excitement—there was an entire and generally prevailing indifference to the well-told complaints of the commercial and mercantile classes, within the Cities, as well as to the means for obtaining a redress of their particular grievances, to which those metropolitan Merchants and Traders had resorted, of all of which, the complaints as well as the means employed, these hard-handed rustics, with few exceptions, know almost nothing, and in none of which, the grievances or the means employed for the redress of those grievances, did they possess even the slightest personal interest. Each of these two classes of Colonists, in New York, the commercial and mercantile classes, within the two Cities, and the agricultural and dependent classes, throughout the country—the former assuming to have been aggrieved by the Home Government and originating means for the redress of those alleged grievances, on the one hand; the latter wholly indifferent to the complaints of the metropolitan Merchants and Traders and to the various means resorted to, by them, in their efforts to effect a removal of those grievances, on the other hand—was sincere, in maintaining what it did maintain, since each was prompted and controlled by nothing else than by its own personal interests; and what was really "patriotism," the interests of the aggregate body of the Colonists regardless of the interests of any individual or class of those Colonists, in either of those classes, if they were patriotic on any other subject, had no part nor lot in this matter.

The Congress of the Colonies, as the reader will remember and as we have stated, was one of those means which were resorted to, by the aristocratic, anti-revolutionary commercial and mercantile classes, within the City of New York and by those Traders whose seat was at Albany, for the purpose, it was alleged, of securing a peaceful redress of what those Merchants and Traders were pleased to consider as grievances—in other words, for the removal of those restraints on that "illicit trade" in which they had been so long, so corruptly, and so successfully engaged, which the Home Government had recently interposed, with more than usual efficiency; and for the exoneration of that lawlessness and reckless destruction of property, by mobs who had been inspired and directed by controlling members of those commercial and mercantile classes,for which property the local authorities had neglected or declined to compensate the owners—and, besides the indifference of the farmers, who constituted a vastly great majority of the adult males who were permanent residents of the Colony, which we have described, it encountered, from its inception, the earnest and active and unscrupulous handful of "fire-eaters," within the City of New York, because of the moderate temper in which it had been proposed; because of the disregard of the pretensions of the Town of Boston, with which they were in harmonious correspondence; and because the authors and promoters of the project of convening such a Congress had disregarded the aspirations of some of those "fire-eaters" for places in the Delegation who would be sent to that Congress, as representatives of the Colony of New York; and, reasonably enough, it encountered, also, the opposition, direct and decided, of that very small number who personally constituted the Colonial Government, and by some of those who occupied places of honor and emolument under its authority, and, most zealously of all these, by those hungry sycophants of authority —hangers on of that Colonial Government who never failed to "sneeze, whenever it took snuff"—the aggregate of whom was powerless in its legitimate opposition because of the smallness of its numbers.

Notwithstanding the direct opposition of the little clique of fire-eating revolutionists and that of the larger and more influential circle of the Colonial Government and its adherents—"friends of Govern- "ment," as they called themselves—and the chilly indifference of the great body of the farmers, constituting the vast majority of the inhabitants of the Colony, that Congress of the Colonies was convened under the auspices of those among whom it was originated; was turned from the pacific purposes for which it had been called, into others which were revolutionary in their character; and was dissolved, to take its place in the history of that very eventful period. The "fire-eating" few who had succeeded in effecting that radical change in its character and in securing from it an acquiescence in their revolutionary purposes, were, of course, well pleased with the results of the movement. The Colonial Government and its adherents were, of course, none the less antagonistic to it, because they were powerless to suppress the growing revolt or to protect the Colonists from the effects of the revolutionary action of the Congress. The farmers throughout the Colony continued their agricultural labors in continued indifference, unmindful of that approaching catastrophe which was, so very soon afterwards, to overwhelm themselves as well as others and to involve all, alike, in one common ruin of every thing which was or which could be dear to them. Of those commercial and mercantile classes among whom the Congress had originated and by whom it had been fostered, very many disapproved the violence of its declared policy—of that policy which had closed the doors to all hopes for Reconciliation and Peace, and which had opened the doors, invitingly, to Revolution and Rebellion, to War and Ruin—and drew back from those who continued to sustain the Congress and who, then, were preparing to enforce its decrees; while the latter portion of those classes, allied with the revolutionary faction whom those commercial and mercantile classes had previously declined to recognize and for whom, individually and collectively, only that superficial respect which practical politicians have always entertained for those, of lower ranks of society, whom they have sought to employ as the means of their own advancement to place and influence and wealth, was entertained, proceeded to enforce, by fair means or by foul, the various decrees, thinly disguised as "recommendations," which the Congress had enacted.

The memory of those readers whose hairs of gray reveal the advent or the presence of old age, will be very likely to compare all these circumstances with similar circumstances which have occurred, within our own country and within the period of their own personal recollections; and to the practical, personal knowledge of that hoary headed tribunal we may safely refer all these movements and counter-movements for the advancement or the obstruction of predetermined and unholy revolt, for its intelligent judgment. The glamour of success may have made all these transactions, before the Congress was convened and while it was in session and after its dissolution, appear to have been possessed of different characters from those which they really possessed; the diligence of personal descendants, whose best claim to distinction among men rests only on the apocryphal fame of their ancestors, actors in those events, may have transformed the pigmies and the political tricksters and those who were without honor or honesty or manliness, of that period, into great men and pâtriots and men of virtue, of integrity, and of personal uprightness; but, notwithstanding all these fictitious interpositions, the Truth remains, unchanged and unchangeable.

Among the conservative farmers of Westchester-county, generally, it is believed that the result of the Congress was not satisfactory—as will be seen, hereafter, some of the most influential of them, who had heartily approved the popular movement for the redress of the Colony's grievances, and who had earnestly united with their countrymen in calling the Congress, were forced to the seeming inconsistency of open dissent; and there was significance in that dissent, while such other communities as the Towns of Hollis, in New Hampshire;[1] Marshfield, in Massachusetts;[1] Ridgefield,[2] Newtown,[3] Stratfield, (now Bridgeport,)[4] Greenwich,[5] Danbury and its vicinity,[6] Darien,[7] Norwalk,[8] Redding,[9] Stamford,[10] New Milford,[11] Morris,[12] Plymouth,[13] Salisbury,[14] etc., indeed the entire western portion of the Colony,[15] in Connecticut; Oyster Bay,[16] Jamaica,[17] Shawangunk,[18] all those in Richmond-county,[19] in New York, and many others,[20] some of them by formal Votes, in legal Town-meetings, and all of them, in practise, also declared their disapproval of the revolutionary measures adopted by the Congress and recommended by it, to be enforced in the several Colonies.

[1] Proceedings of the Town, in legal Town-Meeting, November 7, 1774, reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1229.

While the more conservative portions of the Colonists, in opposition to the Home Government, were earnestly laboring to maintain themselves in the leadership of the political elements of the Colony, and, at the same time, to secure a redress of the grievances to which the Colony had been subjected and to effect an honorable reconciliation between the Colonies and the Mother Country, the revolutionary portion of the same body of Colonists, strengthened by the accession to their number, of those, recently of the opposite portion, who were endeavoring to pose, for office-sake, both as aristocrats and as democrats, as might best suit successive audiences, nominally intent on the accomplishment of the same ends, was really employed in zealously promoting measures which were better adapted to the defeat of itself, in whatever it should really seek to accomplish, in the interests of peace.

On the seventh of November, James Duane, who had already distinguished himself, in connection with John Jay and Joseph Galloway, as everything else than an honest promoter of anything which was revolutionary in its tendencies, pandered to the revolutionary spirit which pervaded the revolutionary portion of the unfranchised inhabitants of the City, through whose influence he had once been elevated to a seat in the Congress and through whose continued influence, only, a similar favor might be secured, in the near future—that James Duane submitted a Resolution to the Committee of Correspondence, in the City of New York, for the election, by the Freeholders and the Freemen of the City, of eight persons in each Ward, for the purpose "of observing the conduct of all Persons touching the Association" [of Non-Importation, and Non-Exportation, and Non-Consumption] "entered into, by the Congress," against Great Britain and her Colonies, and for the purpose, also, of publishing the names of all those whom that Com-

[1] Letter from Marshfield to a Gentleman in Boston, January 24, 1775, published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 95, New-York, Thursday, February 9, 1775, reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1177, 1178; Extract of a letter from Boston to a Gentleman in New-York, January 26, 1775, reprinted in the same work, i., 1178; Proceedings of the Town, in legal Town-Meeting, 20th February, 1775, reprinted in the same work, i., 1249; Protest of sixty four of the Inhabitants of the Town, 20th February, 1775, re-printed in the same work, i., 1249, 1250.

[2] Proceedings of the Town, in Special Town-Meeting, 30th January, 1775, published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 94, New-York, Thursday, February 2, 1775, and reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1202, 1203; Card signed by twenty-nine of the Inhabitants, "Ridgefield, Connecticut, February 2, 1775," reprinted in the same work, i., 1210; Proceedings of Adjourned Town-Meeting, April 10, 1775, reprinted in Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, Connecticut, 339; the same work, 650, 653; Teller's History of Ridgefield, Conn., 45, 46.

[3] Proceedings of the Town, in Town-Meeting, "Newtown, Connecticut, February 6, 1775," published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 97, New-York, Thursday, February 23, 1775, re-printed in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1215; Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, 405.

[4] Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, 78, 79, and the Petition for Harbor Guard, dated January 14, 1777, which is therein reprinted.

[5] Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, 373, 374, and the Charges made against Rev. Jonathan Murdock, Pastor of the West Society, dated July 12, 1784, printed therein; Mead's History of Greenwich, 153, 154.

[6] Proceedings of the Town, in legal Town-Meeting, February 6, 1775, in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 97, New-York, Thursday, February 23, 1775, reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1216; Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, 184.

[7] Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, 268.

[8] Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, 502–504; Childs's Burning of Norwalk, in Hurd's History, 513, 514.

[9] Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 97, New-York, Thursday, February 23, 1775; Rev. Mr. Beach's Reports to the Secretary of the Venerable Society, 1765–1781; Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, 583.

[10] Huntington's History of Stamford, 205; Hurd's History of Fairfield-county, 706.

[11] Protest of one hundred and twenty Freeholders and Inhabitants of the Town of New Milford, February 27, 1775, reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1270; History of Litchfield-county, Connecticut, Phila.: 1881, 451.

[12] Dwight's Travels, ii., 369.

[13] History of Litchfield-county, 495, 496.

[14] History of Litchfield-county, 530.

[15] Hinman's Historical Collections of the part sustained by Connecticut, during the War of the Revolution, 18, 84, 570.

[16] Letter from Oyster-bay to James Rivington, from "A Spectator," describing a Meeting of ninety Freeholders of that Town, on the thirtieth of December, 1774. (Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 90, New York, Thursday, January 5, 1775.)

[17] Declaration of ninety-one Freeholders and forty-five other principal Inhabitants of Jamaica, "Jamaica, January 27, 1775," in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 94, New-York, Thursday, February 2, 1775.

[18] Card, dated "Ulster-county, New York, February 11, 1775," published in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1230.

[19] Proceedings of the Committee of Observation of Elizabethtown, New Jersey, February 13, 1775, published in Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1676, New-York, Thursday, February 16, 1775; and those of the Committee for Observation for the Township of Woodbridge, New Jersey, "Woodbridge, February 20, 1775," published in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1249, each providing for "boycotting" the Staten Islanders.

[20] Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "New York. "2 Nov. 1774;" the same to the same, "New York, December 7, 1774;" the same to Governor Tryon, "New York, Dec. 7, 1774;" Governor Gage to the same, "Boston, December 15, 1774;" Joseph Reed to Josiah Quincy, Junior, "Philadelphia, November 6, 1774;" Proceedings of a Meeting of Freeholders of Middlesex-county, New Jersey, "according to a "Notice," January 3, 1775, reprinted in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1083; Proceedings of Town of Barnstable, Massachusetts, in Town-Meeting, January 4, 1775, reprinted in the same work, i., 1092; Letter from Georgia to a Gentleman in New York, dated February 18, 1775; reprinted in the same, i., 1160; Proceedings of the General Committee, [establishing non-intercourse with Georgia] "Charlestown, "South Carolina, February 8, 1775;" Duchess-county [New York] Association, January 18, 1775; Letter to James Rivington, dated "Flush-"ing, in Queen's County, Long-Island, Jan. 14," published in Rivington's New York Gazetteer, No. 92, New-York, Thursday, January 19, 1775; Letter to the same, dated, "Newtown on Long Island, Jan. 12, "1775," published in the same issue of that paper; Letter to the same from Ulster-county, New-York, published in the same paper, No. 93, New-York, Thursday, January 26, 1775; Letter to the same, from Duchess-county, published in the same paper, No. 95, New York, Thursday, February 9, 1775; etc.

mittee should condemn, for having violated that Association, in order "that, thenceforth, the parties to the "said Association should respectively break off all deal-"ings with him or her"—in more modern phraseology, in order that the alleged offender, whether guilty or innocent of any violation of law, on the mere condemnation of a local Committee, on whom individual animosity or local prejudice might exercise a greater power than either justice or equity could control, might be promptly boycotted, in all his or her business relations, and, thereby, be involved in disaster and ruin. At the same time, John Jay, Peter T. Curtenius, Isaac Low, and James Duane were appointed to prepare a Circular Letter to the different Counties, recommending them, also, to appoint similar "Com-"mittees of Inspection," "agreeably to the provisions "of the eleventh resolve of the Congress."[1]

"Some difficulties having arisen relative to the Ad-"vertisement published by the Committee, for choos-"ing a Committee of Inspection"—in other words, the handful of professional politicians who assumed to represent the unfranchised Mechanics and Working-men of the City, having repudiated the limitations imposed by the Congress, and insisted that the votes of the great body of the inhabitants, as well as those of the Freeholders and Freemen, of the City, should be received, in the election of the proposed Committee of Inspection—an interview, between the leaders of those plebeian and revolutionary claimants of political authority and their aristocratic and conservative neighbors of the Committee of Correspondence, was invited by the latter;[2] and, on the following day [November 15, 1774,] such an interview was had; but not until the Committee of Correspondence, meeting separately, had ordered "that, when "a Committee for carrying the Association of the Con-"gress into execution shall be elected, this Committee "do consider themselves as dissolved; and that this "Resolution be immediately made public."[3]

It was thus acknowledged by that Committee which had been originated in the memorable Caucus, at Sam. Francis's, six months previously, and which had been subsequently organized, with so much ostentation, at the Coffee-house, nominally, for the promotion of "the common cause" of the Colonies, in their reasonable dispute with the Home Government; but, more surely, for the protection of the conservative and aristocratic elements of the City's population from the already unwelcome and yet more threatened aggressions of those which were more democratic and revolutionary in their inclinations; and, less prominently, but most surely, for the advancement of the individual purposes of those who were its originators and master-spirits—by that hitherto respectable Committee of Fifty-one which no longer represented, without wavering, those political principles on which it had been originally founded and for which it had resolutely contended, not always unsuccessfully; which was no longer controlled by those who even appeared to be actuated simply by an unselfish de-

[1] Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence, "NEW-YORK, November 7, 1774."

The eleventh Resolution of the Congress, referred to in the text, provided "that a Committee be chosen in every County, City, and "Town, by those who are qualified to vote for Representatives in the "Legislature, whose business it shall be attentively to observe the con-"duct of all persons, touching this Association" [of Non-Importation, Non-Consumption, and Non-Exportation,]; "and when it shall be made "to appear to the satisfaction of a majority of any such Committee, that "any person within the limits of their appointment has violated "this Association" [whether he may have consented to it, or not] "that "such majority do forthwith cause the truth of the case to be published "in the Gazette, to the end that all such foes to the Rights of British "America may be publicly known and universally contemned, as the "enemies of American Liberty; and, thenceforth, we respectively will "break off all dealings, with him or her."

The reader will judge how ill-adapted such a "smelling Committee" as was thus ordered, in every Town, must have been, to promote harmony among the Colonists, or to give support to those who were seeking a redress of the grievances of the Colonies and a restoration of harmony between the Colonies and the Mother Country.

[2] Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence, "NEW YORK, November "14, 1774;" Letter from the Committee of Correspondence to the Committee of Mechanics, "COMMITTEE CHAMBER, November 14, 1774."

The uncertainties, if nothing else, of political office-seeking, and the tricks, if nothing else, of office-seekers, during that eventful period, may be seen, although they may not be entirely understood, in a comparison of the contemptuous manner in which the aristocratic Committee had spurned the democratic Committee, when it was proposed that the latter should be consulted, in the nomination of the ticket for Members of the proposed Congress, (Minutes of the former, June 29 and July 4, 1774,) with the eagerness with which the aristocratic nominees on that ticket, very soon afterwards, repudiated the fundamental principle maintained by their own organization, and accepted that of their plebeian neighbors' organization, in order to secure the support of that body, at the Polls, and to assure their election, (Correspondence between Abraham Brasher and others, a Committee, and Philip Livingston and others, nominees for the office, July 26 and 27, 1774); and with the voluntary invitation, from the aristocratic to the democratic Committee, to meet in conference, in the instance mentioned in the text, when the primary movement was to be made, toward the election of another Delegation, to meet in another Congress, in the ensuing May. If the reader will closely watch the successive events, in that connection, and notice the final result, he will see, also, how well the consolidation of aristocracy and democracy, into one mass of political conglomerate, for the advancement in authority of particular men, accomplished that purpose, the interests of the Colonies and those of political honesty, in the meanwhile, having been entirely disregarded.

[3] Minutes of the Committee, "NEW YORK, November 15, 1774."

Judge Jones, in his History of New York during the Revolutionary War, (i., 24,) said, "This Committee met frequently, and violent Resolutions "were proposed, but ever rejected. Mr. Low and the republicans of the "Committee finding it not to answer their purposes, actually dissolved "it, and nominated one of their own, without an election or the least "notice to the Citizens. Mr. Low continued Chairman. They acted as "a legal body, legally chosen, and fined, imprisoned, robbed, and ban-"ished His Majesty's loyal subjects with a vengeance." As will be seen, hereafter, the Judge was in error, when he supposed and stated that the second Committee, that of "Inspection," was not elected, and was created secretly, without notice to the Citizens. On the contrary, the two factions of the Opposition, in the City, having been consolidated in order to secure such a result, that "Committee of Inspection" was elected by "a respectable number of the Freeholders and Freemen "of this City, assembled at the City Hall, where the Election was con-"ducted under the inspection of several of the Vestrymen" of the City.

The unquestionable records of the doings of both Committees, as well as all known authorities brought down from that period and relating thereto, abundantly prove that there is nothing which was inaccurately stated, in any other portion of the statement, notwithstanding the learned Editor of the Judge's work, singularly enough, appears to entertain a different opinion on that subject.—(Notes to the History, i., 438.)

sire to promote the common weal; and which had been invaded, if it was not, then, controlled, by those, of the opposite and less comely faction of the party of the Opposition, with whom the majority of its members, by a formal vote, had already declined to affiliate—that its mission was completed, and that its original authority and power, through corrupt influences with which it was not unacquainted, had passed into other hands. It had, indeed, asserted and successfully maintained those conservative political principles, directly antagonistic to the more revolutionary political principles which the men of Boston had asserted and insisted on, which it believed to have been better adapted for the promotion of "the "common cause" and for that of the best interests of the Colonies; and, for the further promotion of "that "common cause," consciously or unconsciously, it had unselfishly prepared a way for the advancement of those, within itself, who coveted place and its prerogatives, by nominating them for seats in the Congress of which it had been the originator and the unyielding promoter. It had seen, however, the nominees of its selection, with one exception, barter that fundamental principle which it had especially cherished, for the votes, at the Polls, of those whom it had previously declined to recognize as parties in the struggle; it had subsequently seen those nominees, after their election, as members of the Delegation from New York, concur in the adoption of measures which it had already declined to approve and which were nothing if they were not aggressive and revolutionary; and, at last, it had seen the party of the Opposition crowded toward Rebellion, by the Congress of its own creation; and its own whilom master-spirits in conservative exclusiveness, anxious for a further advancement in place-holding and for the promotion of that particular purpose, joining hands with the principal supporters of what was, very clearly, only democratic and revolutionary. There was a fitness, therefore, that those of the Committee who had honestly and unselfishly opposed the aggressions of the Home Government, should cease to allow their names and whatever influence those names might possess, to be used by those who had betrayed the confidence which had been reposed in them, directly, for the advancement of their own personal ends, and, indirectly, for the promotion of Revolution, if not for that of Rebellion; and there was a peculiar fitness, also, that, whatever those conservative members of the Committee of Fifty-one should do or decline to do, in the interests of the Colonists and of the Colony, they should not remain, associated with, if not controlled by, those of the opposite faction of the confederated party of the Opposition, whose ultimate object, very clearly, was nothing else than the advancement to place and political authority of those who were its leaders, even if that advancement should be made at the cost of a Revolution and of a Civil War. The Committee of Correspondence did well, therefore, in thus providing for its own dissolution, without permitting itself to be crowded out of its existence by that faction of its own political party for whom it had, generally, no respect—by that faction of that party of the Opposition, hitherto its only political antagonist, which, then, appeared with John Jay and James Duane, lately two of the Committee, among its nominal leaders.

The result of the interview which the Committee of Correspondence had thus invited—one of the high contracting parties rapidly approaching its own dissolution, with only twenty-three of its fifty-one members present, and with eight of the twenty-three predestinated by their associates to an early retirement: the other of the two parties to the conference flushed with that most recent and most important of its victories over the aristocracy of the City—was a determination to nominate sixty persons who should be agreeable to both the Committee of Correspondence and the Committee of the Mechanics, all of whose names should be submitted to the Freeholders and Freemen of the City, at a Meeting to be called for that purpose, at the City Hall, for their approval and election;[1] all of which was evidently done and completed, on the twenty-second of November, exactly in conformity with the programme which the two political "rings" of that period, consolidated for the purpose of promoting their mutual political interests, had already prepared and promulgated.[2]

There is abundant evidence concerning the peculiar zeal of that new-formed Committee of Inspection—sometimes styled "THE COMMITTEE OF SIXTY," and at others, "THE COMMITTEE OF OBSERVATION"—in the discharge of its self-imposed duties;[3] but, generally, the purposes to which this work is specially devoted do not require a more extended notice of them, in this place. Those purposes require, however, that mention shall be made of the fact, in this connection, that whatever the Circular Letters which were sent to Westchester-county, by the Committee of Correspondence or by any other body, for the purpose of

[1] Proceedings of the Conference with the Committee of Mechanics, in the Minutes of the Committee of Correspondence, "NEW YORK, November 15, "1774."

[2] Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1664, NEW-YORK, Thursday, November 24, 1774; and Rivington's New York Gazetter, No. 84, NEW-YORK, Thursday, November 24, 1775.

"The first Thing done by the People of this place in consequence of "the Resolutions of the Congress, was the Dissolution of the Committee "of 51, in order to choose a new Committee of Inspection, to carry the "Measures of the Congress into effect. A Day was appointed by Adver-"tisement for choosing sixty Persons to form this Committee. About 30 "or 40 Citizens only appeared at the Election, & chose the 60 who had "been previously named by the former Committee. I can no otherwise "my Lord account for the very small number of People who appeared on "this occasion, than by supposeing that the Measures of the Congress "are generally Disrelished."—(Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 9, "NEW YORK, December 7th, 1774.")

[3] Lieutenant-governor Colden to Captain Montague, "NEW-YORK, [illegible], "1775;" the same to General Gage, "NEW-YORK, 20th Febry, 1775;" the "same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK, 1st March, 1775;" Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 34; Leake's Memoir of General John Lamb, 97; etc.

enlisting her farmers in the support and execution of the Association or of any other of the measures or recommendations of the recent Congress, may have been or may have proposed, they were evidently entirely disregarded; and that, at least as recently as the early Winter of 1774–75, there was not sufficient interest, friendly to the revolutionary movements which were so deeply exciting the inhabitants of the neighboring City, within any portion of that rural County, to do even the paltry service of circulating those Circular Letters throughout the Towns; although there were a few, a very few, who were beginning to look favorably on those movements, and to talk and write, in the support of them. We shall notice all of these earlier demonstrations of which we possess any information, since they were the small beginnings of that Revolution, within the County of Westchester, of which so much has been said and written.

The first of these was a Letter, in support of the revolutionary movements and in answer to the tracts of "A. W. Farmer," which had made so much excitement, throughout the Colonies. It was written by a Weaver and published in Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1668, NEW-YORK, Thursday, December 22, 1774. The Editor assured his readers that it was actually written by a working Weaver, who lived in Harrison's Purchase;[1] and it was in these words:

"To the city and country inhabitants, of the province of New York.

"Friends, and fellow mortals,

"THE division between Britain, and her Colonies, is very alarming; but what I think "would be more alarming, is a division between the in- "habitants of the colonies; the effect of which we have "from holy writ, that a house divided against itself, "cannot stand. I have seen a pamphlet printed by "Mr. Rivington, entitled the Country Farmer, which "seems to be calculated to throw all into confusion, "& to no other end; and artfully to gain his point, "as a Farmer, he addresses himself to the Farmers, "and their wives; he tells the latter, they cannot "treat a neighbour with a dish of tea; and that will "be a dreadful thing indeed; to the former, he saith, "their produce will rot on their hands, and they can- "not pay their weaver, &c. Being a Weaver myself, "and tho' they be generally poor, still they are as "useful a set of men, as any in the world, and so will "remain, as long as, from the King to the peasant, "all are born naked. I therefore, would beg leave "to say a word in answer to our pretended Farmer, "and make no doubt but the lowness of stile I shall "speak in, will be excused, when it is considered that "a man may be a profound Weaver, and no gram- "marian; and being a useful branch of mankind as "above, ought to have the privilege of speaking in "his own stile. If so, then my first answer to our "Farmer is, that we Weavers, and I believe I may "say most of other trades too, cannot live without "meat, bread and clothing, all which I shall gladly "take in exchange for my labour; and If I could "earn more at the year's end, than a supply for my "family, I would be content, (at this troublesome "period, which our Farmer sets up for such a terror) "to have my employer say to my creditor. I owe "the Weaver so much, which I will engage to pay to you, "when I can sell my produce. It may be my creditor "may answer, the produce will suit me, and then all "will be well; but if not, the promise will answer at "this time, with every creditor that hath any spirit of "patriotism. Now to the wives, I would address my- "self as follows, viz. to remember when their parents "were first placed in the garden, that it was said to "the woman, yea, hath God said ye shall not eat of "every tree of the garden? but the woman was pre- "vailed on by a deceiver, to disobey the command, "and to eat. But O! the consequence! and so like- "wise, a deceiver now says to you what! are you de- "nied the pleasure of drinking tea? But I beg of you "not to be now deceived, nor prevailed on to bring "ruin and slavery on your country and posterity, by "tasting of that detestable herb, which hath already "been the cause of so much confusion. But if you "will not be entreated, but will persist in using it, "you will find your case similar to that of Eve, she "lost her innocence, and plunged all her descendants "into everlasting misery; you will lose liberty, and "plunge your descendants into everlasting slavery.

"The Farmer too, complains bitterly about not "transporting sheep. I wish to God, the congress "had let us send away our black sheep; for then per- "haps this pretended Farmer, might have been trans- "ported before he could have made such a bleating.

"Now I would beg leave to say a few words on his "clamour against our delegates. He calls them trait- "ors, which name, he had much better have taken "on himself, where it might have been applied "with propriety. I cannot see any room for this vil- "est of mankind, to insinuate, that those men would "attempt to betray their country. Besides their un- "spotted characters, are they not men of extensive "interests in America? have they estate in any other "country? No, what then should induce them to "betray America, seeing that if America falls, they "must fall with it? This consideration alone, is suf- "ficient to clear them from our Farmer's aspersion. "But in my opinion, a still stronger security for their "integrity and faithful discharge of the trust reposed "in them, is, the unblemished character they have

[1] "The public may be assured, that the following letter is the produc- "tion of a real, and not a fictitious weaver in West Chester. It is the "offspring of an honest warmth in the cause of his country; and tho' "his sentiments, and remarks, appear in a homespun dress, they never- "theless are not without force, and we presume, will contribute to the "entertainment of our readers."—(Editorial, introductory to the letter of the Weaver.)

" ever supported; nor in this do I trust alone to " common fame, having known Mr. Jay, from his " early youth, and had some acquaintance with Mr. " Duane, from which I have had so much reason to " confide in them, that I could contentedly trust them " to contend for my liberty, or my life. And on the " whole, I think that it would be well for us farmers, " and mechanicks to consider whether it is not likely " that each colony took as much care in choosing " their delegates, as we did. That is, to send men of " knowledge, men of interest, and men of honour. If " so, we must look on our farmer to be a man wholly " given to ridicule, misrepresentation, and malevo- " lence; for he hath declared that most honourable " and never to be forgotten congress, to be either a " set of ignorant men, or else to be traitors!

" I would now recommend to the notice of every " reader of Rivington's Farmer, that it is the usual " practice of evil minded persons, when they would " disturb the quiet of any man, or body of men, " against whom they can find no just cause of com- " plaint, to raise against them, without any evidence, " the highest clamours, suggest the most criminal de- " signs, and if possible, represent even their most " laudable actions in an odious light: The best char- " acters and most commendable actions, are no secur- " ities against attacks like these of the Farmer, to " which the best of men are most exposed; but it is " a proof against them, that they are unsupported by " reason, or by credible evidence; when, if either had " existed, they would certainly have been produced " by the same malevolence that raised the clamour " without them. I would only desire the reader to " consider the Farmer's clamour, invectives and " abuse, calmly and dispassionately, give them their " due weight and no more. I would not even desire to " turn them upon his own head, and cause him, like " Haman, to be hanged on his own gallows—I only " desire that, unjust and unreasonable as they are, " they may have no weight with the reader, or raise " any prejudice in his mind against the cause of truth " & his country, or against any man or body of men, " especially those worthy men who have nobly stood " forth and exerted themselves to save their country " from slavery and destruction.

" I come now to consider his clamour against the " citizens, in which he declares, at a certain time, " there was no magistrate with virtue enough to do " his duty; and that there is no merchant he would " trust. I don't recollect any thing said of the law- " yers, but he hath been severe upon the mayor and " commonalty, on account of the snipe act, with " which act, if he had gone a little further, he would " amply have justified our struggle, with the mother " country.

" I would ask, why does not that act continue in " force to this day?

" The answer is, because the country people were " very unanimous in opposition to it; though it was " to the loss of individuals, myself for one, still they " stood out; which caused the framers of that act to " consider closely the consequences which would at- " tend its continuance—and so it was thought best to " make it void. Here we may see the effect of a " steady opposition to an odious law; and similar " causes will produce similar effects. We may assure " ourselves that a steady and firm opposition to the " late acts of Parliament, will cause our sovereign to " examine into the state of the case with great atten- " tion; and when he finds he has been led into un- " warrantable acts by diabolical counsellors, he will " dismiss them from their offices, by which they have " wickedly devised to throw the nation all into con- " fusion, and thereby to dethrone the King.

" Therefore my fellow mortals, let me beseech you, " as you value your liberty, and the liberty of your " posterity, take the advice of the ever to be admired " and revered Congress, stick close to the non-con- " sumption agreement, and lay aside those unneces- " sary diversions, which but too often end in the de- " struction of both soul and body. If it should seem " grievous for the present, we have this for our con- " solation, that as good men as you and I, have been " afflicted: The devil was permitted to afflict Job " worse than wicked Ministers, or Counsellors of " state can you and me; and let us take patern by " his stability, when his friends came and clamoured " against him, as bad as our Farmer doth in this day, " against the best men we have among us; and when " his wife advised him to curse God and die, what was " the effect? why nothing at all, for it was full conso- " lation for him to say, I know that my redeemer liv- " eth; and in another place, all the days of my ap- " pointed time will I wait, till my change come.

" This is an amiable example of stability, which, " may Americans imitate. May they join corre- " sponding actions to fervent prayers, that they may be " enabled to maintain their rights and liberties! That " the British arms may never be employed but in a " just cause,—to protect the weak and innocent from " wrong, and to be the terror of oppressors and evil " doers. That the illustrious house of Hanover may " continue to be the defenders of true religion and " virtue, the faithful guardians of our freedom and " property! That our sovereign, George the third, " may discover every wicked design, that any of his " Ministers, or others, have conceived against him, or " any of his people! That he may be endowed with " wisdom and virtue to become a blessing to his peo- " ple, and a terror only to his enemies! That his " days may be prosperous and many, and his end " peaceful and happy! And may all the subjects of " him and his successors, be ever watchful and reso- " lute to prevent the least encroachment upon their " rights and liberties, on the preservation of which, " the happiness of both King and people depends!

" And as a powerful means of preserving the bless- " ings of freedom, may we be all duly sensible of the "importance of choosing proper persons to represent "us in our legislative assembly, and of being ex- "tremely careful in our choice.—All which are the "fervent wishes of A WEAVER, in Harrison's Pur- "chase, West Chester County."

About the same time that this letter appeared, there was a movement, in the vicinity of the White Plains, to obtain a nominal approval, if no more, of the action, the revolutionary action, of the Committee of the City of New York; but if what was said of the result of the effort by those who were opposed to the movement, without contradiction, may be believed, only "three or four persons in the White Plains" participated in it; and, practically, it was a failure.

Very soon after the end of the movement referred to, however, there was a counter-movement, in the same vicinity, in which a Declaration was circulated and signed by the Freeholders and principal Inhabitants, in which the conservatism of those who signed it was distinctly asserted. As a part of the earlier literature of the Revolution, in Westchester-county, we have thought that Declaration possesses sufficient of interest to entitle it to a place in this narrative. It was in these words, very carefully copied from the original publication, in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 91, NEW-YORK, Thursday, January 12, 1775:

"To the PRINTER.

"Sir,

"WE the subscribers, freeholders and inhabit- "ants in the White Plains, in the county "of Westchester, think it our duty to our King and "country, to declare, that we have never given our "consent to any Resolves touching the disputes with "the mother country, nor are we any ways concerned "in any measures entered into relative to them. We "are rather induced to do this, because we under- "stand, that three or four persons in the White "Plains, have taken upon them to declare to the "Committee at New-York, the consent of the "inhabitants of the White Plains to the resolutions "entered into, in New-York, and their acquiescence "with the measures taken there; when the major "part of the few people who attended the meeting, "did not choose to be concerned in the matter. We "also testify our disapprobation of many hot and "furious proceedings against the measures taken by "the mother country, as, in our opinion, they will "rather tend to ruin this once happy continent, than "remove grievances. We also declare that we desire "to live and die peaceable subjects to our gracious "Sovereign King GEORGE the Third and his laws. "This is to inform the public, that the above declara- "tion was signed by forty-five freeholders and in- "habitants, in the small precinct of the White "Plains, against the proceedings of the New-York "Committee, besides Miles Oakley."

A few weeks afterwards, Miles Oakley, one of those who had signed it, undoubtedly, for good and sufficient reasons,[1] retracted what he had uttered in the above-recited Declaration; and we have carefully copied from Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1681, NEW-YORK, Thursday, March 23, 1775, what he said on that latter occasion. It was in these words:

"Westchester County, White Plains.

"WHEREAS, there was a petition published in "Rivington's paper, some time past, that "forty five of the freeholders and inhabitants, be- "sides Miles Oakley, did sign a petition—I did sign "a petition, something like it, by being misled; and "afterwards being informed into the right state of "the matter, I got the petition, and struck my name "out, and forwarned the Esq. A. H—not to return "my name and he swore by God he would; and "many others that signed it, has told me, they was "sorry they had any concern in signing the petition.

"MILES OAKLEY, and
"DANIEL HORTON."

There was no portion of the County of Westchester, in which the conservatism of the inhabitants was so general and so decided in its character, as in the Manor of Cortlandt;[2] and, during the Winter

[1] On the 8th of May, 1775, Miles Oakley was appointed a member of the County Committee, (vide page —, post;) soon afterwards, he received a Warrant for Second Lieutenant in Captain Mills's Company; (vide page —, post;) and he served in that office, under Colonel Holmes, in the bloodless Campaign of 1775; leaving the service, when the Campaign closed.—(Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Committee, XXV., 94.)

Daniel Horton, whose name accompanied that of Miles Oakley, on the disclaimer now under notice, was a resident of Rye; and in the re-organization of the Militia of the County, he was made Second Lieutenant of the Rye and Mamaroneck Company, commanded by Captain Robert Bloomer.

[2] Illustrative of the statement made in the text, is the following, taken from the Upcott Clippings, iv., 297, in the Library of the New York Historical Society: "It is said that at least three-fourths of the people "in Cortlandt's Manor, New York, have declared their unwillingness to "enter into the Congressional measures: that a great number of the "people in general in Westchester County are preparing to do the like; "and that the Association against the Continental Congress has been "signed by three hundred persons in the neighborhood of Poughkeepsie "only. Many lists are sent about Dutchess County, on which also "many hundreds have subscribed."

As far as it related to Westchester-county, the above was copied from Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1220, NEW-YORK, Monday, February 27, 1775.

It must not be supposed, however, that the farmers in Westchester-county supported the Home Government, in its Colonial policy: on the contrary, neither in the well-known Declaration and Protest, nor elsewhere, as far as we have knowledge, was there the slightest leaning in that direction—they did no more, at any time, than to prefer and accept that opposition to the Home Government which had been made by the General Assembly of the Colony of New York, instead of that which was made by the Continental Congress of 1774; and, at no time, as the reader will hereafter learn, was the great body of them inclined to support the Royal Cause, with their persons and their properties. There were some who were smarting under the outrages which had been inflicted on them or on their friends, by local and other despots, of high or low degree; and these were, sometimes, compelled to find refuge and protection within the lines of the Royal Army; and there was a floating, vicious class, within the County, which the lawlessness of the revolutionary faction and the succeeding War had produced—ready to enlist on that side which offered the greater inducements—but the great body of the farmers was patient, law-abiding, peacefully inclined, stayers at home, industrious, and severely conservative.

of 1774–75 and early in the Spring of the latter year, there was considerable activity, among the farmers on that particular Manor, in opposition to the revolutionary spirit which was seeking to force itself on them. An Association, referred to in the Note 2, on page 42, ante, had been prepared and numerously signed in Duchess-county; and copies of it had been also circulated and signed within Westchester-county, especially within the Manor of Cortlandt, which adjoined the Duchess-county of that period;[1] and, about the same time, an Address, accompanied with an Association adapted to that particular locality, was prepared and widely circulated; and the Association was numerously signed. That very interesting and very important Address and the Association which accompanied it,—the latter, generally known, among those who favored the revolutionary faction, as "The Loyalist's Test"—because they form very important specimens of the literature of revolutionary Westchester-county, and because of their importance as reliable authorities for the guidance of the student of the history of that County, during that eventful period, may properly find a place in this narrative; and we have carefully copied them from Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 96, NEW-YORK, Thursday, February 16, 1775. They were in the following words:

[1] The following is a copy of those notable "RESOLVES," as that Association was frequently called, carefully made from Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1218, NEW-YORK, Monday February 13, 1775, where they were printed among the current news of the day:

"WE the subscribers being desirous to convince mankind that "we are firmly attached to our most happy constitution, "and are disposed to support and maintain peace and good order under "his Majesty's government, do therefore declare, that our sovereign lord "king George the third, is the only sovereign to whom British America "may, can, or ought to owe and bear true and faithful allegiance, and "that there is no legal power or authority therein but what is duly "derived from him; that our representatives in General Assembly con-"vened, are the only guardians of our rights and liberties; that without "them no laws can here be made to bind us, and that they only are the "channel through which our grievances can properly be represented for "redress, and that to support their right and authority, we do hereby "associate and mutually covenant and engage to and with each other "as follows, namely:

"First. That we will upon all occasions stand by and assist each other "in the defence of his life, liberty and property, when ever the same "shall be attacked or endangered by any bodies of men riotously assem-"bled, upon any pretence or any authority whatsoever, not warranted "by the laws of the land.

"Second. That we will upon all occasions mutually support each "other in the free exercise and enjoyment of our undoubted right to "liberty, in eating, drinking, buying, selling, communing and acting "what, with whom, and as we please, consistent with the laws of God, "and the laws of the land, notwithstanding the association entered into "by the Continental Congress to the contrary.

"Lastly. That we will endeavour to promote, encourage, and when "called to, enforce obediance to the rightful authority of our most gra-"cious sovereign king George the third, and the laws which can, do, or "may constitutionally extend to, or in the British colonies in America.

"In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands, this eighteenth "day of January, in the fifteenth year of the reign of our sovereign "lord George the third, by the grace of God of Great-Britain, France, "and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c., and in the year of our "lord Christ, 1775."

"An Address to the Inhabitants of Cort-"landt's Manor.

"I am one amongst you, tho' yet a "stranger, an inhabitant of Cort-"landt's manor; I have nothing to dread or fear "from the resentment of any person or persons, as "I mean to give no offence to any individual; "only wishing, that reason and common prudence "may take place of present bickerings, and the "detestable poison of party faction. It is a matter no "longer to be hid under a cloud, whether we are in "reality, his Majesty's loyal subjects or not; I have "all the reason in the world to believe, that the "worthy people of this Manor are so to all intents "and purposes; I mean as to their private sentiments; "but alas! my friends, the time is at hand, when "those sentiments alone will not be of sufficient va-"lidity to justify the loyalty of your hearts. It re-"quires no great penetration to assign reasons for your "silence in matters of so great importance; your con-"duct, my friends in this last point, is not to be "blamed; it rather redounds to your credit in the "eyes of every one that knows the life of a farmer. "The farmer is brought up to peace and tranquility; "politics, and the designs of crafty men are strangers "to his honest minds; his care and toil, with the "sweat of his brow, is to turn the furrows which give "us subsistence: It is from industry, that worthy "merchants are enabled to extend their commerce,— "commerce! the vitals of a nation, every country has "its share in different commodities, designed by the "will of an omnipotent Being to depend on each other, "linked in a chain of civil society. I presume it will "not be improper to see what part of this advantage "providence has allotted us; the question may be "easily solved; we are placed in a fertile land, teem-"ing forth, in abundance, the necessaries of life for "ourselves, and a superfluity, which brings the wealth "of other nations to our own coffers.—Every individ-"ual enjoys his share according to his industry and "situation in life; he is protected in his possessions, "by what? 'Tis by the paternal care, the penetrating "eye, and the mighty arm of his mother country; who "like a hen, when the hawk is near, hovers round her "chickens, takes them under her wings, and preserves "them from the enemy. I think I have accounted "for your inattention to political matters, as not being "within the sphere of your occupations, but confined "to the laudable pursuit of your own business; and, "I sincerely wish it to continue without interruption; "to effect which, there is only one method left.—I "have already observed, that our good intentions, "kept in silence, are not sufficient to distinguish our "loyalty; It may do amongst ourselves; but let us "consider facts which we know to be true; they are "recent in our memories, and need not recapitula-"tion; it is sufficient that we are informed of the con"sequences in England, where they are considered as "actions founded on rebellious principles, subversive "of all law and government, and abusive, in the high- "est degree, to his Majesty's crown and dignity. I "have said, I am one amongst you, my situation has "given me opportunity to form ideas of your behav- "iour and sentiments, I believe you, in a general "sense, firmly attached to loyalty and our admirable "constitution; that you wish to live and die subjects "only to the British empire; but how is this to be "manifested, and that it should be declared, there is "an absolute necessity, without delay, for the follow- "ing reasons: That the colonists of New-York are "under the same dilemma with the other provinces "and the continent throughout, considered as com- "binants in a general plan, which gives so much "offence to the supreme authority, whose dignity "cannot, nor will not, be insulted. Let us of Cort- "landt's manor, clear ourselves of the general impu- "tation; we do not deserve it, then, why should we "suffer it? We never consented to congresses nor "committees, we detest the destruction of private "property, we abhor the proceedings of riotous and "disorderly people, and finally, we wish to live and "die the same loyal subjects we have ever been, to his "most sacred Majesty GEORGE the THIRD. Let us "my friends, declare, and acknowledge this, our in- "dispensible duty, by signing our names to the paper "now circulating in this manor, wrote and adapted "for the subscription of none but ROYALISTS.—It is "not enough for a man to say, that I am a loyal sub- "ject, no more than to say I am a pious and true "christian; it must be his work, his dependance on, "his energy, his indefatigable effort; to promote honor "and glory to the true system of his preservation. As "charity, my friends, is a characteristic of a good man "and a christian, I wish by no means it should be im- "paired, in this our manor of Cortlandt; permit me, "my neighbours, to instance one point in particular "to which I hope you will pay strict adherence, viz. "If you should disagreeably find any one, or more "amongst you who are blind to their own happiness, "let me intreat you to take no advantage of their "weakness, rather use lenient and mild persuasions; "tell them their true interest; use all your endeav- "ours that if possible they may return to their right "senses:—In this you will shine in triple capacity, "you recover the lost man, you draw together the "bands of unity, and are an honor to your King and "country."

Form of an Association in Cortlandt's Manor.

"WHEN the minds of people "are agitated, some with "just, and some with false ideas of their rights "and privileges, when anarchy and confusion are "spreading their baneful wings over this once "happy and flourishing Continent: At this most "interesting period, it is the duty of every indi- "vidual, for the good of himself and posterity, to "pursue that course which conscience dictates to be "right. No one, if impartial, can be at a loss for the "clue of direction, the object is plain to every honest, "tho' ever so illiterate capacity: The loyalty we owe "to the best of Kings is the grand magnetic point, "that will infallibly fix us on a solid basis. There are "none amongst us (if we cooly reflect) but what will "find themselves bound by the strongest ties of grati- "tude, to acknowledge that we have been, and still "may be, the happiest people on earth, under the "glorious and unparalelled constitution of Great "Britain! And if prejudice, popular declamations, "and the hateful current of party faction, are not too "strong for truth and matters of fact; we must allow "that the grand pitch of commerce we have arrived "at, the progress we have made in arts and sciences; "the amazing repadity in extending, settling and im- "proving our land estates; the magnificent appear- "ance and flourishing condition of our towering cit- "ies; the opulence of the inhabitants, and every other "blessing under God which we do, and still may en- "joy, derived their origin from, and have their exis- "tence in the laws, the lenity, and the unlimited "indulgence of our parent state; which has hitherto "protected us, is ever able, and would be ready, if we "deserve it, to defend us against all invaders of our "peace and tranquility, by sending to our support the "terror of the universe, the BRITISH ARMS!—For a "proof of this let us revert to the late war, when the "French and Savages with fire and sword, were rav- "aging the country; when the cries of murder and "scalping were echoed from every quarter of the "woods; the infants brains dashed out before the eyes "of its afflicted parents; the parents tortured to death "by the horrid and shocking barbarities of the Indi- "ans; and numbers flying from their habitations, ex- "posed to famine, and every species of distress. Let "us reflect on those direful calamities; Let us be "grateful to the power which preserved us, which sent "forth her INVINCIBLE VETERANS, vanquished our "enemies, and finally reinstated us in quiet posses- "sion of our own.—If we have a right to complain of "the British acts of parliament, we have a Governor, "Council and Assembly, to represent our grievances "to the KING, LORDS and COMMONS; we are assured "that we shall be heard: We have no business with "Congresses and Committees. Such methods only serve "to irritate our best friends. Let us proceed in the "direct line of our duty: We are contending with a "mighty nation, of great mercy and long forbearance, "ever sparing of the effusion of blood; but when "rouzed to resentment, we may feel the weight of her "indignation.—Therefore we, the subscribers, free- "holders, and inhabitants of Cortlandt's Manor, in "the county of Westchester, being actuated by no "other motives than the dictates of conscience and

"common sense, are led to declare our firm and indis-
"soluble attachment to our most gracious Sovereign
"GEORGE the THIRD, his crown and dignity; and "with grateful hearts to acknowledge, that we are in"debted to his paternal care, for the preservation of "our lives and fortunes: And as we have ever been a "happy and free people, subject only to the laws and "government of Great-Britain, we will pay no regard
"to any resolves, or restrictions, but such as are en-
"joined us by our CONSTITUTIONAL DELEGATES.
"Everything to the contrary, we deem ILLEGAL."

An answer to this Address and this Association was published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 99, NEW-YORK, Thursday, March 9, 1775, in these words, which we have carefully copied from the original publication:

"To every American to whom it is applicable;

"But chiefly to

"The ASSOCIATORS of Cortlandt's Manor.

"O ye Tame Pigeons!

"EXCUSE, my friends, the manner of addressing
"you, for if we advert to a passage in Holy
"Writ, we are told, that the professors of our excel"lent religion, should be as wise as serpents, and
"harmless as doves; I must, in some measure, think
"you a Christian people, as both the above properties
"are discovered in Cortlandt's Manor, tho' they "seem not to be properly blended together.—The "framer of the Association, and the elaborate piece
"that attended it, in Mr. Rivington's paper of Feb"ruary 16, has certainly all the subtilty of the ser-
"pent; and has as dexterously wormed himself
"round your estates, with as much address, and will "probably have the same success, as the first serpent
"had, when he attacked our old grandmother.—And
"you, my friends, resemble the simple dove, for you
"seem to be innocent and secure, although the de-
"luder has already catched you in the snare: Then
"be not offended at my calling you pigeons; for "naturalists assure us, it is the very nature of this bird,
"that she seems always calm and secure, and has no
"inclination to defend herself, or her young ones,
"from the attacks of men, beasts, or vermin, but al-
"ways returns to the same hole to make her nest,
"notwithstanding the experience she has had, of its "being utter destruction to her family.—Just so it is
"with you, ye people of Cortlandt, ye have eyes, but
"see not, and ears, but hear not. The Spectator, in "some of his beautiful lucubrations, mentions a young
"Eastern Prince, who being severely reprimanded for
"some unguarded folly of youth, immediately fell "down at the feet of his preceptor, and expressed "himself to this effect:—O father, I now perceive,
"that I have two souls, a good soul and a bad, in
"your absence the bad soul predominates; passion
"and pleasure, with their attendant train of delusions,
"absorbe my frame; reason and virtue are forced to
"quit their seats!—But in your presence, the good
"soul assumes the throne; reason, truth, and virtue
"appear in all their native forms, and every vicious
"passion is banished from my heart.

"However this may be with an individual, it is "clearly evident, that the inhabitants of the British "dominions are actuated by two sorts of souls, and "these are of very different kinds: But let us exam"ine them; the soul of the virtuous son of Freedom,
"is the soul of God! the soul of nature, and the soul
"of the British Constitution; it is a soul that dares
"to think, that dares to speak, that dares to die!
"This soul has animated every kingdom on the face
"of the earth, till by their own crimes and their own
"folly, they have voluntarily banished it
"their soil: This is the soul that has sup"ported the British state through various revolu-
"tions, and will maintain its empire, either in that,
"or some other part of the globe, till Heaven, in its
"vengeance, shall extirpate the human race.—Now,
"the souls of the other cast, may be divided into two "classes; and first, those in the island of Britain,
"who erroneously call themselves friends to govern"ment; and are generally distinguished by the name
"of Tories: and these should be called despotic
"souls, as they well deserve the appellation; for, by "their alert address, they have had influence enough
"to buy all the votes in the Kingdom; and the min"istry has had foresight enough to buy all them; so
"that, all the laws of that once great nation, are now
"framed, passed, and executed by one branch of the "legislature: And the consequences have been cor"respondent; equity, justice, and reason, with all
"the antient props of the state, are banished the sen"ate: tyranny mounts her throne, and says,—I "WILL! The other class of souls reside in America,
"and must be called souls of the basest mould; these
"wretches, by the God of nature, have been suffered
"to receive their being in a land of happiness, and "have been nursed up in a land of liberty and "plenty; but O monstrous ingratitude! Without "the least remorse, without any spur to real ambi"tion, they forsake their country! in short they are
"divested of every trace of human perfection, except
"one trifling gleam of hope, which the devil has ever "made use of to delude his votaries; and this, will "eventually end in despair. Yet these mens souls,
"dare attempt with their Syren songs, to lull even
"virtue itself to sleep, in the hopes that she may yet
"split on the rocks.—One day we are charmed with "peace, clemency, and pardon; riches and plenty
"are to be powered into our dwellings; tyrants and "heroes are to drop their crowns and their laurels at "our feet, that we may partake of the banquet, if we "will only bow the knee to satan. But, if we are
"stern enough to deny passive obedience, then ter-

" ror and dismay are to assault us, all the British " navy shall knock down our pompous cities; thou- " sands and tens of thousands of forces are to crimson " o'er the spacious plains with blood; Canadian big- " otry and persecution is to pour in upon us from " the North; the Indians, with horrid barbarity, are " to torment us from the West; and perhaps pesti- " lence and Spaniards from the South.—This, ye sor- " did mortals, is the true picture of your base hearts; " this is the scene, on which you could feast your " eyes with rapture, provided the rocks and the " mountains might cover you.—But now let me tell " you, that were all this possible, there are fifteen out " of twenty, throughout this vast continent, all Free- " dom's sons, whose blood is neither contaminated " with paltry bribe, or coward fear; who would face " all this terror, rather than sell their birthright for a " mess of pottage, or be a means of transmitting mis- " ery and infamy to their posterity.

" But, O ye men of Cortlandt, let us for a moment " view the windings of that arch serpent which hath " beguiled you; with what pleasing sensations, he " surveys your fine fields, your harvests, and your " herds; and how he commends and admires the " trickling drops that pour down your brows; no " doubt these are delicious charms to him; yet, one " thing on your part, is absolutely necessary; and " that is, your loyalty, only establish that, and he can " easily take care of the rest of your business.—With " what elegance of stile he describes your fertile " plains, your splendid cities, your noble towers, and " the oppulence of your marts, which has poured all " the riches of the globe into your laps! and all this, " thro' the paternal indulgence of a tender mother. " But he has neglected to inform you, that, for these " 12 years past, this kind mother has become a " monster! Like the cruel ostrich, she has forsaken " her young ones; with the fierceness of a tyger, she " lays waste our own fair inheritence, and dashes " her sons against the stones!—Shakspeare makes " Hamlet express himself thus; 'But, I am pigeon " 'livered, and lack gall to make oppression bitter.' " Whether it is the lack of gall, or the lack of sensi- " bility, that makes you callous to that bitter oppres- " sion that now surrounds you, I will not determine; " but for creatures, that are said to wear the image of " the Deity, to be so lost to every noble sentiment " that ornaments the man; must bespeak the most " amazing apathy.—Then let me conjure you, to rise " from your lethargy, assume the dignity of freemen; " smite the serpents that have spread their poisons " round you; burn your associations; and with " dauntless intrepity, join the sons of freedom, who " are the only temporal guardians of the human race.

" B. E."

No further attempt to answer this Address nor to counteract the effects of the Association appears to have been made until late in the Spring, a long time after the farmers throughout the Manor had commenced their work of ploughing and sowing and planting, when the following letter, signed by "An "Inhabitant," was published in Gaine's New-York Gazette: or the Weekly Mercury, No. 1236, New-York, Monday, June 19, 1775.

" To the inhabitants of the Manor of Cort- " landt, New-York.

" Manor of Cortlandt, May 19, 1775.

" Gentlemen:

" The dangerous innovations and in- " fringements attempted by certain mercenary Min- " isterial tools and infamous traitors (in this Manor) " to their Country, who assume to themselves the " name of Loyalists, on the liberties of their fellow- " subjects, have greatly alarmed the impartial friends " of Liberty herein. A fool, says an author, has " great need of title; it teaches men to call him " Count and Duke, and to forget his proper name of " Fool.

" In a day when American pulse beats high for " Liberty; when it is the subject of almost every " public paper, as well as topic of discourse, it might " justly have been expected that no American would " be so hardy as to violate the rights of his fellow- " subjects; and if any such monster should appear " in this land of Liberty, that there would not be " wanting advocates for so glorious and important a " cause, as to expose those of its members who are " trampling on the sacred rights of the people.

" I have waited with great impatience, expecting " that some able hand would have undertaken the " benevolent task to warn you to beware of the con- " duct of some of the basest villains that ever dis- " graced any society, and draw the attention of the " inhabitants to its danger; but finding that although " now some months are elapsed since the commence- " ment of the measures of these traitors, &c., yet none " has appeared to sound the friendly alarm to the " very indolent inhabitants, I have attempted what " I so ardently wished might have been done by some " more able hand. While we are straining every " nerve to baffle foreign attempts to enslave us, surely " it must be very criminal in the descendants of " Britons, who ought to love life and liberty alike, to " be so assiduous in exerting themselves to enslave " their fellow-subjects.

" It may not be improper to inform you, Gentle- " men, of the springs and motives which induce these " principal movers to forget their duty to God, their " fellow-countrymen, and their posterity.

" They, anxious to secure to themselves and their " posterity power and authority, and to engross some " offices or pensions from or under the Crown, have " made a sacrifice of all public virtue on the altar of " self-interest. This desperate spirit it was that in- " duced these traitors or mercenary hirelings to exert " their influence to bring about the detestable meas- " ures proposed by a certain paper handed about here

"last Winter, entitled 'The Loyalist's Test.'[1] But, "happily for this Manor, this very dangerous scheme "was disconcerted by some lovers of Loyalty and "Liberty. For the men who would make such in- "roads on the liberties of the people, as they were "aiming at, to gratify their thirst for power, and give "Administration a high idea of their influence in this "Manor, would, from the same principle, exert every "nerve of influence to carry any ministerial mandate "into execution, at the expense of the liberties of "their fellow-countrymen.

"Can any judicious American son of liberty behold "these traitors of their Country without the utmost "abhorrence, by whose influence the more illiterate "and those who are unacquainted with the principles "of the present dispute, are so besotted as to resign "their liberties into the hands of the most ambitious "and designing fellows, who are aiming to make a "merit with the Ministry by enslaving their fellow- "countrymen, and to aggrandise themselves and "their posterity? Surely he cannot. If Charles the "First deserved the axe, and James the Second the "loss of his Kingdom, for changing the Constitution, "and thereby trampling on the rights of their sub- "jects, I leave you, my Countrymen, to judge what "punishment would be adequate to the crimes of "these loyalists and their tools, who are aiming at "the same by a sacrifice of all public virtue and the "liberty of their Country.

"An Inhabitant."

With the publication of this letter, the Manor of Cortlandt probably closed its literary labors, in the cause of either party, since the work of the successive seasons occupied the entire attention of the Tenantry, and the Proprietors, also, found other subjects which commanded their attention; but the great body of the farmers, on the Manor, like those in the neighboring County of Duchess, continued to be conservative and without sympathy with those who were in rebellion, to the end of the War.

During the greater portion of the period in which had occurred the various transactions of which mention has been made, herein, the General Assembly of the Colony of New York had not been permitted, by the Colonial Government, to meet for the consideration of the public affairs and for the transaction of the public business of the Colony; but a large proportion, if not a majority, of the Members of the House, in their individual characters, were known to have sympathized, to a greater or lesser extent, with the less radical portion of the party of the Opposition, in the Colony, while the Committee of Correspondence of the House, in which was vested, ad interim, much of the authority of the House, was also known to have united with the local Committees of Correspondence, in New York and elsewhere, in proposing the convention of a Congress of all the Colonies, for consultation and advice, in the matter of the great grievances to which the Colonies were said to have been subjected, unconstitutionally, by the Parliament and the Ministry of Great Britain. It was a matter of deep concern, therefore, both in the Colonial Government and among the Colonists, generally, when, on the tenth of January, 1775, that body was permitted to assemble, in an Adjourned Session;[2] and, in the absence of more exciting occurrences and in view of many anxious hopes that that Assembly, which had not been concerned in any of the extraordinary occurrences of the preceding twelve months, might, possibly, become instrumental in restoring harmony between the Mother Country and the Colonies—"most ardently "desired by all good men"[3]—the eyes of all careful observers, in Europe and America, were directed, wistfully, toward the little chamber, in the old City-Hall, in Wall-street, in the City of New York, in which that General Assembly was assembled.

The members of that Assembly, as was well-known, like the body of the Colonists whom they respectively represented, were of the confederated party of the Opposition, and, to a man, antagonistic to the Colonial policy of the Home Government; but, also like their constituents, they were divided—in some instances, they were radically divided—in their views and in their inclinations, concerning the manner in which that opposition should be presented and through what instrumentality it should be exercised. A portion of those members, respectable in character and ability, but a minority in numbers, led by George Clinton, Philip Schuyler, and Peter R. Livingston, asserting its continued loyalty to the Sovereign, its desire to effect a redress of the grievances under which the Colonies were laboring, and its hope that a reconciliation between the Colonies and the Mother Country might be secured, nevertheless, fell back on the Congress and on the line of action on which the Congress had determined, notwithstanding the well-known tendency toward Revolution of all which that Congress had done, and notwithstanding, also, the equally well-known effects of that action, because of its ill-concealed encouragement of Insurrection if not of Rebellion, on a large portion of the Colonists, throughout the Continent, and on the Home Government. Another portion of those members, equally respectable in character and ability, constituting a large majority of the House, and led by Isaac Wilkins, James De Lancey, and Crean Brush, was not less opposed to the Colonial policy of the Home Government, nor less decided and sincere in its opposition to that policy, nor less desirous of effecting a redress of the grievances under which the Colonies were said to have been suffering, nor more hopeful that a recon-

[1] Vide pages 43, 44, 45, ante.

[2] Journal of the Assembly, Du Martis, 10 hor. A.M., the 10th January, 1775.

[3] Resolution of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, in favor of a Meeting of Deputies, in a Congress of the Continent, June 17, 1774.

ciliation between the Colonies and the Mother Country might be effected; but it also maintained, in opposition to the minority of the House and more consistently with the uniform profession of loyalty to the Sovereign and of respect for the fundamental principles of the Constitution, in both of which all, the minority as well as the majority, professed to be in harmony, that a removal of the causes of the disaffection and a restoration of harmony between the excited disputants could not be secured by the use of such means as the Congress had recommended and authorized, no matter by whom organized and controlled; and that, for those well-defined purposes, it would be preferable to adopt and employ only those means which would give offence to no one, and only those instrumentalities concerning which there could not be raised any question of their legitimacy nor of their entire fitness, within the law, for the due promotion of the great ends for which, alone, all professed to be contending. The first-named portion of the members, was, evidently, determined to force the Assembly into the line of the radical portion of the party of the Opposition, for no other purpose, however, than that of increasing the moral weight of that particular faction of the party, in its desperate struggle for the possession of the controlling power, in political affairs, within the Colony; and this, too, notwithstanding that success in such determined effort could only result in destroying the one remaining body, legally constituted and entirely unsmirched by any association with any less legally constituted body, through which the Home Government could be reached, officially, in whatever action should be taken in behalf of "the common cause;"[1] and notwithstanding, also, that the supporters of the Congress, in the event of their success, would, thereby, destroy a most powerful instrumentality, then preparing to labor, independently, in a line which whilst parallel to that already occupied by the Congress itself, was, nevertheless, for the accomplishment of the great purposes for securing which that Congress had been originally proposed and was subsequently organized, and was, then, among other less desirable purposes, through its own appointed instrumentalities, apparently laboring. The last-named portion of the members, not less determined than the other, resolutely maintained that the Assembly should remain entirely independent from all those popular Committees and Congresses which had been moving and laboring, during the preceding year, in lines of action which they had respectively approved, each for itself, for the common purposes; and, with equal resolution and consistency, it evidently determined, also, that the Assembly should take no official action on any of the occurrences of the preceding year, except such as should be brought before it, officially, or such as might have arisen from some prior action of the Assembly itself; and, more important than all else, it determined that, with all the weight of its legitimate and official authority and influence and with all the personal influence of its individual members, but after a fashion and in terms of its own selection, and without any violation of official or individual propriety or of the Laws of the Land--especially without officially recognizing the existence of any other opposition to the Ministry or the existence of any other organized body which had been, which was, or which might become, similarly employed—it would vigorously oppose the obnoxious Colonial policy of the Home Government, earnestly seek a redress of the serious grievances under which the Colonies were then laboring, and honestly endeavor to effect that honorable and permanent reconciliation of the Colonies and the Mother Country, which all factions, and all parties, and all sects, and all classes of society, throughout the Colony, professed to consider necessary and desirable; and which, some in one manner and some in others, each faction for itself, they were endeavoring to secure, for the common weal.[2]

The County of Westchester was ably represented on the floor of the Assembly, in the persons of Colonel Frederic Philipse and Judge John Thomas, who represented the body of the County; Pierre Van Cortlandt, who represented the Manor of Cortlandt; and Isaac Wilkins, who represented the Borough of Westchester. Of these, Thomas and Van Cortlandt were of the minority of the Assembly, of which mention has been made; and Philipse and Wilkins

[1] "The Ministry alledged that the Congress was no legal body, and "none could be heard in reference to their proceedings, without giving "that illegal body some degree of countenance; that they could only "hear the Colonies through their legal Assemblies and their Agents prop-"erly authorized by them, and properly admitted here; that to do "otherwise would lead to inextricable confusion and destroy the whole "order of Colony Government."—(Annual Register for the year 1775, 56.) See, also, Parliamentary Register (Almon's) i., 115, 116, 124.

[2] There is no subject connected with the history of the United States which, from the beginning until now, has been more systematically and recklessly falsified than the political character of the members of that Assembly, the influences which controlled that body, and the action which it took, on the great political questions of the day.

Notwithstanding there was not a member of the party of the Government in the Assembly, Murray (Impartial History, i., 434) Lossing (Field Book, ii., 793) and, with his characteristic indirectness and malignity Bancroft (History of the United States, original edition, iv., 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, etc.; the same, centenary edition, iv., 455, 456, 457, etc.) stated or insinuated that the "friends of the Government," or "the Tories," were in the ascendency and controlled it.

Notwithstanding the Despatches of Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Home Government, which are (and have been, since 1775) accessible to everybody, abundantly prove that the Colonial Government possessed no more influence, which it could exercise over the Assembly, than was possessed by any other political opponent,—that, in fact, that body was not in harmony with the Government, and acted adversely to the hopes of the, Government—Murray, (Impartial History, i., 434) History of Civil War in America, Dublin: 1779, i., 68; Soule, (Histoire des Troubles, i., 129;) etc., assert that whatever action was taken by the House, was under the influence of the Lieutenant-governor of the Colony.

The action, on the great questions of the day, which the Assembly took, from day to day, tells its own story, wherever it is known, and stamps the brand of infidelity to their duties, as historians, on by far the greater number of those who have undertaken to discharge those duties, on these particular subjects.

were of the majority of that body, which has been already described; and because of the prominent parts which those Representatives of that County respectively took, in the debates concerning the momentous questions which were considered and determined in that Assembly, and because of the ills which befell three of those Representatives, because of what they had respectively said and done in that Assembly, there is no portion of the history of revolutionary New York which possesses a deeper interest to those who are of the Westchester-county of more recent days, than that which relates to the action taken by that General Assembly of the Colony of New York, on the political grievances under which the Colony was then said to have been laboring, on the Colonial policy of the Home Government through which those alleged grievances had been inflicted on the Colonies, on the means which were best adapted to the redress of those alleged grievances, and on its employment of those means for that purpose.

Although the Assembly had been prorogued to meet on the tenth of January, 1775, the members from the distant Counties were not present on that day, nor on several succeeding days; and, on the twentieth of that month, a "Call of the House" was ordered to be made on the seventh of February ensuing; and the Clerk of the House was ordered to write to the absent Members, to require their punctual attendance on that day,[1] both factions of the House evidently understanding that that particular "Call of "the House" carried with it, in honor if in nothing else, the additional provision that no leading question which was likely to be brought before the Assembly, during that Session, should be thus introduced, until after that "Call" should have been made, agreeably to that Order.[2] It appears, however, that the minority was strengthened by the arrival of two of the absentees, within a few days after the "Call" had been ordered and nearly a fortnight before the day on which it was ordered to be made—at which time, too, it appeared to the minority that it had temporarily acquired the control of the House—and the majority was surprised, on the twenty-sixth of January, by the introduction of a Resolution, submitted by Colonel Abraham Ten Broeck, of the Manor of Rensselaerwyck, to "take into consideration the Proceed-"ings of the Continental Congress, held in the City "of Philadelphia, in the Months of September and "October last."

Under any circumstances and in any assemblage, there would be aroused an earnest, if not an angry, opposition to any movement which was covered with as much of bad faith and dishonor as was seen, surrounding the Resolution which Colonel Ten Broeck had thus submitted in violation of the honorable understanding, between the two factions, which had been entered into when the "Call of the House" was agreed to, by both; and, in the instance under consideration, "a warm debate ensued," between the rival factions of the Assembly, which was followed by a call "for the Previous Question," submitted by Colonel Philipse, of the County of Westchester, on which, agreeably to the parliamentary usage of that period, the House was carried from the consideration of the Resolution which was then before it, to the consideration of that "previous question," whether the question on the original Resolution should then be taken, in other words, if that original Resolution should not, then and there, be absolutely rejected, without being permitted to linger until another day, in the hands of an adverse majority. By a vote of ten to eleven, the House determined that the question on Colonel Ten Broeck's ill-timed Resolution should not "be now put," thereby entirely defeating the minority, in its certainly dishonorable attempt to force a consideration of the proceedings of the Congress, on the Assembly, in open violation of its own particular undertaking, and at the expense of its own honor.[3]

Very reasonably, although the welcome act was done by those who were not of the "friends of the "Government," the result of that early struggle in the General Assembly of the Colony, on such a momentous question, was very acceptable to the Colonial Government[4] as well as to the Ministry, at London;[5] and, from that date until this, separated from the motives of the majority of the Assembly who had thus rejected the Resolution, and from the other acts of the series, in opposition to the Government, of which

[1] Journal of the House, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., A.M., the 20th January, "1775."

[2] "It was some Days before a sufficient number of Members got to Town "to make a House, and there are still twelve of their number absent, "which has occasioned the House to put off the farther consideration of "their Important Business to the 7th of next Month, at which Time "they have ordered all their Members to attend."—(Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK, 21 January, 1775.")

In the Lieutenant-governor's Despatch to the Earl of Dartmouth, dated on the first of February, 1775, it is stated that the Call of the House referred to was made on a Motion offered by the minority of the House, for what was supposed would be beneficial to its purposes; and when it is remembered that the majority already possessed the control of whatever was brought forward, it will be seen that that majority not only had no occasion to make such a Call, but, also, that, when it consented that such a "Call" should be made, it had entire confidence in its continued supremacy, even when the entire strength of each of the two factions should have been brought into the House, an instance of its temerity which, very nearly, became disastrous to it.

[3] Journal of the House, "Die Jovis, 10 ho., A.M., the 26th January, "1775;" Lieutenant-governor Colden to General Gage, "NEW YORK 29th "Jany 1775;" the same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK 1st Feby "1775;" the same to Governor Tryon, "NEW YORK, 1st Feby, 1775;" the "same to Admiral Graves, "NEW YORK 29th Feb. 1775."

[4] The venerable Lieutenant-governor of the Province was evidently in excellent spirits, from that result, when he wrote the Despatches to General Gage and the Earl of Dartmouth, which were referred to in the last preceding Note.

[5] "When the question to adopt the Measures recommended by the Con-"gress was negatived by a Majority of one only, in this Assembly of "twenty-six Individuals, the Ministers were in high spirits; and these "Individuals were then represented as 'all America.'"—(Governor Johnstone's Speech in the House of Commons, May 15, 1775—Almon's Parliamentary Register, i., 47.)

that rejection of Colonel Ten Broeck's Resolution was only the prelude, that Vote of the Assembly has supplied a theme on which those who have seemed to play the part of historians of that portion of America's history, have based much of what they have said, unduly commendatory of Massachusetts and Virginia and quite as unduly denunciatory of everything which pertained to New York, unless of some of the men of New York, of that early period, whose characters, for fidelity to the truth and uprightness in the discharge of public duties, were no better than their own.[1]

The lesson which the defeat of its dishonorable movement, under Colonel Ten Broeck, had given to the minority of the Assembly, appears to have been well-studied by those who were of that minority; but it did not prevent it from continuing to hanker after the leadership of whatever movement, in the direction of a redress of the grievances of the Colonies, the Assembly should be inclined to take. Subsequent events very clearly indicated, indeed, that the minority desired to promote its own factional interests rather than to serve the Colony; and, undoubtedly with that end in view, five days after the defeat of its first ill-timed movement, and apparently actuated only by purely patriotic motives, Peter R. Livingston, of the Manor of Livingston, one of the leaders of the minority, offered a Resolution "that a day "may be appointed to take the state of this Colony "into consideration; to enter such Resolutions as the "House may agree to, on their Journals; and, in "consequence of such Resolutions, to prepare a humble, firm, dutiful, and loyal Petition to our most gracious Sovereign." Whatever may have been the purposes of the minority, in submitting that Resolution, however, it certainly gathered no special advantages to itself, in doing so, since the majority promptly accepted a proposition which was perfectly agreeable to it, and added importance to it, per se, by uniting with the minority in support of it, all the members who were present, the conservative as well as the radical, uniting in the unanimous adoption of it.[2]

Immediately after the adoption of the Resolution submitted by the Representative of the Livingston Manor, James De Lancey, of the City of New York, one of the leaders of the majority and the head of that powerful family, moved "that a Memorial to the Lords, and a Representation "and Remonstrance to the Commons of Great Brit"ain may be prepared, together with the Petition "to his Majesty;"[3] and, like the Resolution which [1] Gordon (History of American Revolution, i., 471) led off, in the work of detraction, by saying "The Massachusetts Congress were displeased with "the proceedings of the General Assembly of New York," for this Vote, among others, as if the approval of any merely insurrectionary body were necessary to ensure the respectability, in history, of any General Assembly, legally elected, legally convened, and acting in conformity with law. Ramsay (History of the American Revolution, i., 143) insinuated, in the absence of sufficient authority to assert, that "the party for "Royal Government,"—although there was not a member of that party within the Assembly, and although the Colonial Government was confessedly without influence enough to be made acquainted with its intentions—led the Assembly to reject the Resolution. Grahame (History of the United States, iv., 360) following Ramsey, and, generally, in his uncredited words, repeated the slander which that early writer insinuated. Leake (Memoir of General Lamb, 97) regarded the Vote as unpatriotic and "an important ministerial triumph." Lossing (Field Book of the Revolution, ii., 793) made "fifteen of the twenty-four Members of the As"sembly, Loyalists;" and he attributed the Vote to that unduly assumed cause, although, in fact, every member professed to have been equally loyal to the Sovereign. Bancroft, also, as far as his fragmentary paragraphs may be regarded as history (History of the United States, original edition, iv., 207–210; the same, centenary edition, iv., 454–456) insinuated what he would have been glad to have asserted, had he possessed even a shadow of evidence to support him, that it was the influence of the Government and that of the Established Church, the venality of the Representatives in the Assembly, the timidity of the Colonists themselves, and prejudice against lawyers and Presbyterians, combined, which produced that notable Vote. The servility of the Assembly to the Ministry, singularly enough, produced it, if the acute and untrustworthy John C. Hamilton (History of the Republic, i., 79), is to be believed. Lodge (History of the English Colonies, 491,) one of the latest specimens of Massachusetts dilettanteism, sneeringly refers to the Assembly of New York as "the close corporation known as the Assembly," as if the General Court of Massachusetts, locked in its Chamber, was not quite as "close" a body, while it was in session, as even he could find. Others, including Frothingham (Rise of the Republic, 398) told only of the rejection of Colonel Ten Broeck's Resolution, and, by the suppression of much of the truth concerning the subject, left their less informed readers to infer, if the latter are not directly told so, that the Assembly was influenced, in that action, by an antagonism to the popular cause.

No one, unacquainted with the facts and depending on any of the above-named historians for information, can possibly learn, from them, that the Vote referred to was taken in the interest of the common cause, as a prelude to what the Assembly intended to do, in its own manner, in support of that cause; that there was not a "friend of the Government," or "Tory," or member of the "party of the Government," among the members of that Assembly; that the Colonial Government was not consulted, respecting anything which was done, or to be done, by that Assembly; and that not even the Congress of the Continent, as will be seen hereafter, more earnestly, more powerfully, or more successfully opposed the Ministry and demanded a redress of the grievances of the Colonies, than that Assembly, in every thing which it did, on those subjects. Pitkin (History of the United States, i.. 324, 325,) and Hildreth (History of the United States, First Series, iii., 56,) notwithstanding they were New Englanders, did not permit the truth to be suppressed; but they gave to the Assembly of New York, at least a portion of what was due to it, in honestly written history.

[2] Journal of the House, "Die Martis, 10 ho., A.M., the 31st January, "1775."

[3] The peculiar force, if not the peculiar assertion of the political standing of the General Assembly, with which the proposed papers were vested, in the words of the Resolution, was noticed, in the Parliament, and used as one of the reasons for the Parliament's rejection of them—in the House of Lords, it was said, "the title of the paper rendered it "inadmissible. It was called 'a Memorial:' now, 'Memorials' are pre"sented from one crowned head to another; but as to a 'Memorial' from "an American Assembly, it was unheard of, and ought not to be read." In the same debate, it was said, also, by another Peer, that "the title "given to the paper was suspicious: a 'Petition' from the same Assem"bly had been presented to the King, the Colonies not denying the "supreme Rights of His Majesty; a 'Remonstrance' to the Commons; "and, now, a 'Memorial' to the Lords. They dropped the usual word "'Petition,' lest, from that, it should be imagined that they acknowl"edged the supreme power of those branches of the Legislature."—(Speeches of the Earl of Denbigh and Earl Gower, in the House of Lords, May 18, 1775.)

In the House of Commons, Mr. Jenkinson, in opposition to receiving the paper addressed to that House, "urged that the House had never re"ceived Petitions of this nature: that, here, the name of a Petition was "studiously avoided, lest anything like an obedience to Parliament "should be acknowledged. The opposition of the Colonies was not so "much against the tax which gave rise to the present dispute, as to the "whole legislative authority of Parliament, and to any restrictions of had immediately preceded it, that Resolution, also, received the affirmative vote of every member of the House who was then present. [1]

Continuing the commendable work in which it had thus commenced the proceedings of the day, and apparently without any dissent from any one, the House then ordered that James De Lancey, and Benjamin Kissam, of the City of New York, Colonel Philip Schuyler, of Albany-county, George Clinton, of Ulster-county, Dirk Brinkerhoof, of Duchess-county, Samuel Gale, of Orange-county, Isaac Wilkins, of the Borough of Westchester, Crean Brush, of Cumberland-county [now a part of Vermont], Christopher Billop, of Richmond-county, John Rapelje, of Kings-county, and William Nicoll, of Queens-county, or the major part of them—all, except Philip Schuyler and George Clinton being of the majority of the House—be "a Committee to prepare a State[2] of the "Grievances of this Colony, and report same to this "House, with all convenient speed, after the Call "thereof, to be had on the seventh of February "next." [3] Having thus indicated what the House proposed to do, in the common cause in which the body of the Colonists was so earnestly engaged, the House was then adjourned.

Time, very often, produces marvellous changes in the tempers and purposes of politicians, especially in those of politicians who are not of the controlling majority, in their own party or in the State; and, very often, the actions of those politicians, when the latter are engaged in a personal, or factional, or partisan struggle, cannot be brought within the provisions of any known rule of action, of any class. No reasonable reason which would be honorable to the minority of the Assembly, therefore, can be given for the eagerness which it displayed, on the sixteenth of February, to disturb the harmony of that body, in which all of both factions appeared to have been united in both purpose and action; but, on that day, Colonel Philip Schuyler, of Albany-county, in behalf of that minority, renewed the conflict of factions which had been opened, unsuccessfully, by Colonel Abraham Ten Broeck, of the Manor of Rensselaerswyck, on the preceding twenty-sixth of January. For that unseemly purpose, that distinguished member of the minority, on the day referred to, moved that certain specified letters, written by the Assembly's Committee of Correspondence, during the recess of the House, and urging the convention of a Congress of the Continent for the consideration of the grievances of the Colonies,[4] should be entered on the Journals of the House, and copies of them be sent to the newspapers, for publication; and, of course, "debates arose upon the said Motion," which was followed by the emphatic rejection of it, by a vote of nine, in the affirmative, against sixteen, in the negative—Judge Thomas and Pierre Van Cortlandt, of course, being among the former, and Colonel Philipse and Isaac Wilkins, of course, among the latter.[5]

On the following day, [February 17], Colonel Nathaniel Woodhull, of Suffolk-county, also a prominent member of the minority, continued the factional strife, by offering a Resolution of Thanks to those gentlemen who had represented this Colony in the recent Congress, "for their faithful and judicious dis-"charge of the trust reposed in them, by the good "people of this Colony;" and, of course, "debates "arose upon the said Motion;" after which, by a vote of nine, in the affirmative, against fifteen, in the negative, it was rejected—Judge Thomas being among the former, and Colonel Philipse and Isaac Wilkins being among the latter.[6]

On the twenty-first of February, Peter R. Livingston, of the Manor of Livingston, continued the struggle of the minority, by offering a Resolution giving "the Thanks of this House to the Merchants "and Inhabitants of this City and Colony, for their "repeated, disinterested, publick-spirited, and patri-"otic Conduct, in declining the Importation or Re-"ceiving of Goods from Great Britain, and for their "firm Adherence to the Association entered into and "recommended by the Grand Continental Congress, "held at Philadelphia, in the Months of September "and October last, and that Mr. Speaker signify the "same to the President of the Chamber of Commerce "in this City, at their next Meeting, and order a copy "of the same to be published in the public Prints." Like the other Resolutions of the series, which had preceded it, this peculiarly inappropriate Resolution, before such a deliberative body, after it had been amply discussed, was promptly rejected by a vote of ten, in the affirmative, among whom were Judge Thomas and Pierre Van Cortlandt, against fifteen,

"their trade."—(Speech of Mr. Jenkinson, in the House of Commons, May 15, 1775.—Almon's Parliamentary Register, i., 470.)

Besides the peculiarity of the titles of those several papers, to which reference has been made there was a grave significance in the fact that they were moved for, with those titles, by the head of the leading family in the Colony; and that they were ordered by an unanimous vote of the Assembly. It has suited those who have preferred to traduce New York and her General Assembly, however, to regard both the General Assembly and its papers as only favorable to the Home Government and antagonistic to the common cause.

[1] Journal of the House, "Die Martis, 10 ho., A.M., the 31st January, "1775."

[2] In the language of that period, the word "State," as it was used in this and similar connections, was the equivalent of the word "State-"ment," which, in such connections, is now employed.

[3] Journal of the House, "Die Martis, 10 ho., A.M., the 31st January, "1775."

[4] One of those letters, if not more of them, was noticed in our statement of the measures of the Committee of Correspondence in New York, relative to its proposition for the convention of a Congress of the Colonies, page 23, ante.

[5] Journal of the House, "Die Jovis, 10 ho., A.M., the 16th February, "1775."

[6] Journal of the House, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., A.M., the 17th February, "1775." Incontinent-gouvernor Colden to General Gage, "New York 24th "Febry, 1775."

See, also, Dunlap's History of New-York, i., 454, 455.

in the negative, among whom were Colonel Philipse and Isaac Wilkins.[1]

On the twenty third of February, Crean Brush, of Cumberland-county, from the Committee which had been appointed to prepare a State of the Grievances of this Colony, presented a Report from that Committee; which was "referred to the consideration of a Com-"mittee of the Whole House, and be proceeded on, "by the said Committee, on Wednesday next."[2]

Immediately after the Report on the Grievances of the Colony had been thus referred, Judge John Thomas, one of the Representatives of Westchester-county, and a leading member of the minority, offered a Resolution providing that "the sense of this House "be taken on the necessity of appointing Delegates "for this Colony, to meet the Delegates for the other "Colonies on this Continent, in General Congress, "on the tenth day of May next." The introduction of that resolution led to a spirited Debate in which the motives of the rival factions composing the confederated party of the Opposition and the undue assumption of authority which had not been delegated to it, by the recently held Congress of the Continent, were freely and ably discussed by Colonel Philip Schuyler and George Clinton, in support of the Resolution, and by Crean Brush and Isaac Wilkins,[3] in opposition to it; and the consideration of the subject was closed by the rejection of the Resolution, by a vote of nine in the affirmative and seventeen in the negative, the four Representatives from the County of Westchester being divided between the two factions, as they had been in the previous divisions of the House.[4]

The well-considered and, under the circumstances, the judicious determination of the majority of the General Assembly, to unite in the general opposition to the Colonial policy of the Home Government, in the general demand for a redress of the assumed grievances of the Colonies, and in the generally expressed desire to restore the harmony between the Colonies and the Mother Country, which the infliction of those grievances had disturbed, without, however, recognizing the existence of any other opposition thereto, in any other person, in any other organization, or in any other line of action, in New York or elsewhere, in order that its particular opposition might not encounter that reasonable disregard of the Home Government which the opposition of those who were in open insurrection would surely encounter, was as well known to the minority of that General Assembly, especially after the rejection of the Resolution offered by Colonel Ten Broeck and the subsequent adoption of those offered, respectively, by Peter R. Livingston and James De Lancey, as it was to the greater number of the members of that body, who sustained it; and a decent respect for the welfare of the Colony, that great end which all professed to regard as greater than all others, if that profession had been honestly made, would, unquestionably, have induced every member of each of the factions to have labored, earnestly and harmoniously, in the sincere promotion of the common cause. But it was clearly shown that "the common cause," which was so loudly talked of, was only a secondary matter; that personal and factional interests were, in fact, regarded as superior to the interests of the country; that it was the purpose of the minority and of those with whom it affiliated, for the especial advancement of their individual and factional interests, to obtain the entire control of the political affairs of the Colony, even at the expense of a revolutionary overthrow of the entire structure of the Colonial Government; that, for the promotion of that purpose, the series of Resolutions submitted by the minority, from that submitted by Colonel Schuyler to that submitted by Judge Thomas, was prepared and submitted with an entire knowledge that it would be promptly rejected by the House, as inconsistent with the line of action which the majority had adopted, for its guidance; and that the successive votes of the General Assembly, by which those Resolutions were successively rejected, divested of all that was so well known of the purposes of that body and surrounded with all of insinuation and falsehood which individual animosity and factional zeal could contrive, were industriously presented, one after another, in their naked form, to the populace in New York City and elsewhere, as evidences, as false as they were mischievous, of what was unduly assumed to have been the antagonism of the General Assembly to the common cause, and, at the same time, for the purpose of gradually undermining the affection for the Mother Country, which generally prevailed, throughout the Colony, and of preparing the populace for a revolutionary transfer of the legislative, as well as for that of the executive and judicial, authority of the Colonial Government, into other channels, in the interest of Rebellion, wherein the control would be assumed by other, if not by better, men.

Having fully accomplished its preliminary purpose, in securing from the legally constituted Legislature of the Colony a rejection of the several revolutionary Resolutions which it had submitted, and in, thereby,

---

[1] Journal of the House, "Die Martis, 10 ho., A.M., the 21st February, "1775;" Lieutenant-Governor Colden to General Gage, "NEW YORK 20th "Febry, 1775."

[2] Journal of the House, "Die Jovis, 10 ho., A.M., the 23d February, "1775." Lieutenant-governor Colden to General Gage, "NEW YORK, 20th "Febry 1775;" the same to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK, 1st March, "1775."

[3] Speeches, made by Brush and Wilkins, on that occasion, may be seen in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1290–1297, the former re-printed from Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 98, NEW-YORK, Thursday, March 2, 1775; the latter from the same paper, No. 103, NEW-YORK, Thursday, April 6, 1775. Students of the history of the Revolution in the Colonies will be well paid for the time occupied in a careful perusal of those Speeches, in connection with the other literature of that subject, published during that period.

[4] Journal of the House, "Die Jovis, 10 ho., A.M., the 23d of February, "1775;" Lieutenant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK, "1st March, 1775."

affording a pretext to those of its confederates, not of the General Assembly, for the assumption, by them, of authority, nominally in the name of the body of the Colonists but really in known opposition to the inclinations of by far the greater number, to call a Convention of the Colony, in the interests of Rebellion, in which should be reposed the uncontrolled power of exercising the various functions of an independent, despotic Government, without any limitation, and in open disregard of the existing, legally-constituted Government of the Colony—having accomplished that preliminary purpose, the minority of the Assembly discontinued the submission of Resolutions of any character; and, as will be seen, all its labors were subsequently devoted to the promotion of its factional purposes, only, in the consideration of the papers which the House had ordered to be prepared and laid before it, in which, however, the majority afforded very slight reasons for complaint.

On the appointed day, [March 1, 1775] the Assembly, in Committee of the Whole House, Colonel Benjamin Seaman, of Richmond-county, occupying the Chair, commenced the consideration of the State of the Colony's Grievances, which had been reported by the Special Committee which had prepared it;[1] and after having spent the entire day thereon, as well as the whole of the following day[2] and the greater portion of the succeeding day,[3] also, in Committee of the Whole House, the latter day's session was closed by the adoption of the Report, by the Assembly, with a single Amendment, which was submitted by Colonel Philip Schuyler, and supported by nine of the minority, and five of the majority—the only Amendment which was submitted by any one—a marked feature of the proceedings having been that the amended State of the Grievances of this Colony was adopted by the House, without a division.[4]

The State of Grievances which was thus adopted by the General Assembly of New York included not only all those Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain, relating to or affecting the Colony of New York, for which Colony only the Assembly presumed to legislate, which the Congress of the Continent had included in the Bill of Rights and Grievances which that body had adopted and published, but it included the additional Grievance inflicted in the Act of 6th George III., Chapter XII., "declaring the Right of "Parliament to bind the Colonies in all cases what-"soever," and that inflicted in the Act of 35th Henry VIII., Chapter II., authorizing the removal of prisoners accused of Crimes committed in America, to England, for Trial, neither of which was included in that Bill of Rights and Grievances which the Congress had published. It included, also, the Act of 7th George III., Chapter LIX., "requiring the Legisla-"ture of this Colony to provide for the Services there-"in mentioned, without application made to the "Representatives of the People of this Colony, in "General Assembly, and holding up, by any other "Acts, a Suspension of the legislative powers of this "Colony, until such Requisitions be complied with;" the Act of 14th George III. Chapter LXXXIII., "so "far as it may be construed to establish the Roman "Catholic Religion in the Province of Quebec," and "so far as it imposes Duties upon certain Ar-"ticles of Merchandise imported into that Province," "which by another Statute of the same year, Chapter "LXXXVIII., is so extended as to comprehend all the "Indian Country, from Hudson's Bay to the Mouth "of the Ohio-river;" and the four Acts especially relating to Boston and the Colony of Massachusetts-Bay, all of which it declared to be Grievances of this Colony;[5] and, as has been said, it concurred in that

[1] Journal of the House, "Die Mercurij, 10 ho., A.M., the 1st March, 1775."

[2] Journal of the House, "Die Jovis, 10 ho., A.M., the 2d March, 1775."

[3] Journal of the House, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., A.M., the 3d March, "1775."

[4] With that lack of modesty and truthfulness which characterized all, concerning his own family, which John C. Hamilton wrote, that gentleman (History of the Republic, i., 81, 82) has undertaken to glorify Colonel Schuyler, his grandfather, by falsifying the record, concerning this State of Grievances.

In the Committee which had been appointed for the preparation of the State, in which every member brought forward whatever he regarded as a Grievance, and not in the body of the Assembly, as is meanly insinuated, Colonel Schuyler introduced the Act of 4th George III., Chapter XV., as such a Grievance, which was approved and accepted by the Committee, with only two dissenting votes, notwithstanding the overwhelming majority, in that Committee, who was opposed to Colonel Schuyler. When the Report was considered in Committee of the Whole House, there was not the slightest opposition to it; and when the Committee of the House reported the completed paper to the House, John C. Hamilton to the contrary notwithstanding, the entire State was adopted without a division.

He also alluded to the third of the Grievances, offered in the original Committee, by James De Lancey, recognizing the Right of the Government of Great Britain to regulate the Trade of the Colonies and to impose Duties on such articles, the products of foreign Nations, as should be imported, directly, into the Colonies—the same, in substance if not in words, as that, on the same subject, which the Congress of the Continent had recently adopted—and he glorified his grandfather, because of that gentleman's labors in opposing it, and in endeavoring to qualify the Assembly's recognition of that Right, through an Amendment, which the Committee had rejected; without, however, alluding to that other fact that, in all that his grandfather did, on that occasion, he did in open antagonism to the action of the Continental Congress, on the same subject—he does not say, also, that all that which has been described was done in the original Committee; that when the Report of the Committee was submitted to the Committee of the Whole House, that larger body reversed the action of the original Committee, and united with Colonel Schuyler and his associates in the minority, in their qualification of that portion of the proceedings of the Continental Congress; nor that the House itself, when it accepted the completed State, endorsed and approved that emphatic repudiation of James Duane, and of John Adams, and of their unqualified recognition of the Right of the Mother Country to regulate the Trade of the Colonies and to receive the benefits of that Commerce.

Philip Schuyler needed no such fictitious praise, even from his grandson; and, although he was willing to promote the interests of his faction, he does not appear to have been thus employed, in what he did as a member of that Committee for preparing a State of the Grievances of this Colony, nor in any proceedings thereon, either in Committee of the Whole House or in the Assembly.

[5] "I was inform'd that the Boston and Quebec Bills were at first re-"jected in the Committee as not being Part of the Grievances of this "Colony; it seems however they were at last brought into the Report, "and I am affraid may not now be got rid of in the House."—(Lieuten-

action of the Continental Congress, moved by James Duane and supported by John Adams, and nearly in its words,[1] recognizing the Right of the Parliament "to regulate the Trade of the Colonies, and to lay "Duties on articles that are imported, directly, into "this Colony, from any foreign Country or Planta- "tation, which may interfere with the Products or "Manufactures of Great Britain or any other parts of "His Majesty's Dominions," qualified however, by "excluding every idea of Taxation, internal or exter- "nal, for the purpose of raising a Revenue on the "Subjects in America, without their Consent." It will be seen, therefore, that the State of the Grievances of this Colony, adopted and published by the General Assembly, was more extended than the Bill of Rights and Grievances which the Congress of the Colonies had adopted and published; and it will be seen, also, by any one who will compare the two papers, that the former, both in its tone and in its terms, was quite as firm and quite as plain spoken, on the several subjects to which it was devoted, as was the latter; and that, in the adoption and promulgation of that State, the majority of the Assembly openly maintained its character and standing, as intelligent and fearless opponents of the Colonial policy of the Home Government, without impairing its consistency as Members of the Legislature of a Colony—even the factional confederates of the minority, out in the populace, because of that Act, was compelled to acknowledge the fidelity of the majority, and to admit, in their correspondence with each other, that the State of the Grievances in this Colony which it had prepared and promulgated, was an accurate exposition of the feelings and opinions of the great body of the Colonists, in New York, wherever any feelings or opinions, on those subjects, really existed, concerning their grievances, and altogether favorable to the common cause.[2]

On the seventh of March, James De Lancey, and Benjamin Kissam, of New York City, and George Clinton, of Ulster-county, were appointed a Committee to prepare the series of Resolutions required as a basis for the Petition to the King, which had been ordered by the House, on the thirty-first of January preceding;[3] and, on the following day, Benjamin Kissam reported, from that Committee, a series of Resolutions, agreeably to that Order. The Assembly promptly went into a Committee of the Whole House, with Colonel Benjamin Seaman, of Richmond-county, in the Chair; and proceeded to consider the Report which had thus been presented; and, after having made some amendments in the proposed Resolutions,[4] the Chairman reported the result of the Committee's deliberations to the House; and, after some discussion, the House agreed with the Committee, in its Report and Resolutions.[5]

The first of these Resolutions, following the general sentiment of the Colonists, acknowledged the Faith and Allegiance to the King which were due to him from "the people of this Colony." The second acknowledged that the Colonists "owe obedience to all "Acts of Parliaments calculated for the general weal "of the whole Empire and the due regulation of the "Trade and Commerce thereof, and not inconsistent "with the essential Rights and Liberties of English- "men, to which they are equally entitled with their "fellow-subjects in Great Britain." The third declared "that it is essential to Freedom and the un- "doubted Right of Englishmen, that no Taxes be "imposed on them but with their consent, given per- "sonally or by their Representatives in General As- "sembly." The fourth maintained "that the Acts of "Parliament, raising a Revenue in America especially "to provide for the support of the Civil Government "and administration of Justice in the Colonies, ex- "tending the Jurisdiction of the Courts of Admiralty "beyond their ancient limits, authorizing the Judge's "Certificate to indemnify the Prosecutor from Dam- "ages he would otherwise be liable to, giving them a "concurrent Jurisdiction of Causes heretofore cog- "nizable only in the Courts of Common Law, and by "that means depriving the American Subject of his "Trial by a Jury, are destructive to Freedom, and "subversive of the Rights and Liberties of the Colo- "nies." The fifth and last of these Resolutions declared "that a Trial by a Jury of the Vicinage, in all "Capital Cases, is the grand Security of Freedom and "the Birthright of Englishmen; and, therefore, that "the seizing any Person or Persons, residing in this "Colony, suspected of Treasons, Misprisions of "Treason, or any other Offences, and sending such "Person or Persons out of the same, to be tried, is dan- "gerous to the Lives and Liberties of His Majesty's "American Subjects."[6]

The politicians of New York, those of later as well ant-governor Colden to the Earl of Dartmouth, "NEW YORK, 1st March, "1775,")

[1] Bancroft's History of the United States, original edition, vii., 139, 140; the same, centenary edition, iv., 401, 402.

[2] In a letter written by Alexander McDougal, the well-known popular leader, addressed to Josiah Quincy, Junior, then in London, and dated "NEW-YORK, April 6, 1775," the student of the history of the Revolution, in New York, may find much, relating to the opinions of the revolutionary elements in that Colony, concerning this State, as well as conce ning other kindred subjects.

[3] Journal of the House, "Die Martis, 10 ho., A.M., the 7th March, "1775."

[4] As the action of the Committee which resulted in those Amendments was not generally noticed on the Journal or in the Report, it is very evident that they were, generally, only verbal corrections, unimportant in character, and involving no distinguishing principles. But there were two amendments, proposed by Colonel Nathaniel Woodhull and George Clinton, respectively, which were rejected, although the the motions for amendment were supported, in each instance, by several members of the majority, as well as by the full force of the minority; but because the principle involved in each of the proposed Amendments was distinctly declared in another of the Resolutions, the rejection of the proposition to repeat it, possessed no political significance whatever.

[5] Journal of the House, "Die Mercurij, 10 ho., A.M., the 8th March, "1775."

[6] Ibid.

as those of earlier periods, have always been unlike those of any other Colony, or State, or Country; and in the matter of these declaratory Resolutions, the spirit and terms of which were quite as radical in their character as could have been desired by the most advanced republican who was not an anarchist, the well-established reputation of those politicians was amply sustained—every member of the majority of the Assembly, including James DeLancey, John Cruger, Benjamin Kissam, Crean Brush, Isaac Wilkins, and Frederic Philipse, except John Coe, of Orange-county, and Dirck Brinckerhoff, of Duchess-county, voted in favor of the adoption of them and, of course, in favor of the embodiment of their terms in an Address to the King; while every member of the minority of the House, with Coe and Brinckerhoff of the majority, voted in opposition to the adoption of them. Factional and partisan bitterness, very often, produces such remarkable instances of the inconsistency, if not of the incomprehensibility, of mere politicians; but history affords few, if any, such examples, among those who were really patriotic, as were afforded by John Thomas and Pierre Van Cortlandt, by Peter R. Livingston and Nathaniel Woodhull, by George Clinton and Philip Schuyler, in the instance under consideration, when they voted against the Resolutions which have been fully described and, consequently, against the great political principles which were asserted and maintained therein, for no other reason which is now discoverable than the peculiar fact that those Resolutions had proceeded from and were, then, supported by the majority of the Assembly, by that faction of the great party of the Opposition of which all were equally members, to which they—those who have been named and those who were with them—did not belong.[1]

Whatever may have influenced those who had assumed to be the peculiarly disinterested and sincere supporters of the common cause, in their united vote to reject the Resolutions which are, now, under consideration, those who are of the Westchester-county of the present day will continue to be interested in the fact that, on that very critical occasion, when the eyes of all sober-minded men, in Europe as well as in America, were turned toward that small Assembly-chamber, Isaac Wilkins, of the Borough of Westchester, and Frederic Philipse, representing the body of the County, manfully declared the Rights of the Colonists and those of the Colonies, and bravely resisted what were regarded as the usurpations of the Home Government; while Pierre Van Cortlandt, of the Manor of Cortlandt, and John Thomas, representing the body of the County, quite as manfully opposed them, and, indirectly, quite as bravely denied the existence of those individual and Colonial Rights, and quite as boldly sustained the Home Government, in what it had done, as any open and avowed "friend of the Government" could have done, had one been present,—a lesson of the highest importance to those who shall incline to ascertain the exact truth, concerning the origin of the American Revolution and the purposes of those who promoted it, within the Colony of New York, may be seen in the simple record of this single action of the Representatives of Colonial New York, in her General Assembly, in 1775.

On the day after these Resolutions had been adopted by the Assembly, [March 9th,] that body ordered the appointment of "a Committee to prepare and lay "before the House, with all convenient speed, the "Draft of an humble, firm, dutiful, and loyal Petition, "to be presented to our most Gracious Sovereign," pursuant to Colonel Peter R. Livingston's Motion on the thirty-first of the preceding January; and William Nicoll, of Suffolk-county, Leonard Van-Kleeck, of Duchess-county, and Isaac Wilkins, of the Borough of Westchester, were appointed the Committee for that purpose. During the same day, Crean Brush, from Cumberland-county, Colonel Benjamin Seaman, of Richmond-county, and Samuel Gale, of Orange-county, were appointed a Committee "to prepare the Draft of a Memorial to the Lords;" and Daniel Kissam, of Queens-county, and James De Lancey and Jacob Walton, of the City of New York, were appointed a Committee "to prepare the "Draft of a Representation and Remonstrance to the "Commons of Great Britain," both of them pursuant to the Resolution offered by James De Lancey, to which reference has been already made.[2] The House directed, also, that the Drafts of those several papers should be laid before it, "with all convenient "speed."[3]

It will be seen that on neither of these Committees was there a single member of the minority of the House, notwithstanding the Resolution on which the first-named of those Committees was appointed originated with a leading member of that faction, and notwithstanding, also, both the Resolutions pursuant to which all the Committees were appointed, had been adopted in the Assembly by an unanimous vote, every member of each of the two factions, in temporary harmony and good-will, having united in approving and supporting them—an evident result of the bitter factional feeling which had been aroused, first by the evidently dishonorable conduct of the minority, in springing upon the Assembly the Resolution which was offered by Colonel Ten Broeck, on the twenty-sixth of January, for taking into consideration the Proceedings of the Congress of the Colonies, while a "Call of the House," asked for by itself and for its

[1] The official record of the votes of the several Members of the Assembly, of both factions of the party of the Opposition, as it may be seen in the Journal of the House, is one of the most curious and most unaccountable, within our knowledge.

[2] Vide pages 50, 51, ante.

[3] Journal of the House, "Die Jovis, 10 ho., A.M., the 9th of March, "1775."

peculiar advantage, was pending;[1] and, subsequently, by the peculiarly factional proceedings of the minority, in the presentation of Resolution after Resolution, only for the promotion of Revolution; and in its dishonorable opposition, while the Assembly was considering the State of the Grievances and the series of declaratory Resolutions, to all of which proceedings reference has been herein made.[2]

On the sixteenth of March, Isaac Wilkins, from the Committee appointed to prepare it, reported "the "Draft of a Petition to the King;" and, immediately afterwards, Crean Brush, from the Committee appointed to prepare it, reported "a Draft of a Memor-"ial to the Lords." During the same day, James De Lancey, from the Committee appointed to prepare it, reported "the Draft of a Representation and Remon-"strance to the Commons of Great Britain;" and the Assembly promptly referred all those papers, for consideration, to a Committee of the Whole House.[3]

On the twenty-fourth of March, the Assembly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, upon the Draught of a Petition to the King, Colonel Benjamin Seaman, of Richmond-county, being in the Chair; and, again, the minority displayed its factional animosity by presenting Amendment after Amendment, by far the greater number of them being merely verbal, without disturbing either the sense or the spirit of the original. In one instance, however, very unaccountably and not very consistently, Colonel Philip Schuyler appeared to have entertained a more than usually tender regard for His Majesty's "prerogative," in the matter of the Paper Currency of the Colony, "in the preservation of which prerog-"ative," he said, "we are deeply interested;" and an Amendment, on that subject, which he submitted, was adopted by the House, without a division. Another Amendment, concerning the Judiciary of the Colony, and entirely cancelling the paragraph, on that subject, which the Committee had reported, was submitted by George Clinton, of Ulster-county, and agreed to, by an unanimous vote of the House; and another Amendment, submitted by Colonel Frederic Philipse, by striking the words "seem to," from one of the paragraphs, and, by doing so, making the Acts relating to Boston and the Colony of Massachusetts-Bay really "establish a dangerous precedent, by inflict-"ing Punishment without the formality of a Trial," instead of only seeming to do so, as the original paragraph described them, really strengthened the Petition, in its assertion of the Grievances to which the Colonies had been subjected.[4] As the records of the closing portion of the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole House and those of all that the House, itself, did, on this subject, "are missing," in our copy of the Journal, the details of those proceedings cannot be given;[5] but history bears testimony to the general fact that, in its amended form, the Petition to the King was duly agreed to, by the Assembly.[6]

On the same day, [March 24th], the Memorial to the House of Lords and the Representation and Remonstrance to the House of Commons, after several Amendments, none of them possessing any importance whatever and only three of them having called for a division of the House, had been negatived in the Committee of the Whole House, were successively reported to the House; and, in the respective forms in which they were thus reported, the House adopted them, in each instance, without a division of the House.[7]

On the following morning, [March 25th] the engrossed copies of the Petition to the King,[8] the Memorial to the Lords,[9] and the Representation and Remonstrance to the Commons of Great Britain[10] were respectively presented to the House, read, and again agreed to, in each case without a division of the House. In each instance, also, the Speaker was ordered to sign the document, in behalf of the House; and, after having ordered the Speaker to transmit these three several petitions to the King, the Lords, and the Commons, "with all convenient speed, to Edmund "Burke, Esquire, Agent of this Colony at the Court "of Great Britain; and that a Letter be prepared, to "be approved by this House, to the said Agent, with "directions that he present the same, in behalf of "this Colony, as they are respectively directed, as "soon after the receipt thereof as possible;" and with the additional Order "that Mr. Speaker trans-"mit, at the same time, to the Agent, the State of the "Grievances of this Colony and the Resolutions of "this House thereupon," the House adjourned.[11]

On the thirty-first of March, the Assembly ordered the Speaker to send to the Speakers of the several Houses of Assembly on this Continent, as soon after

[1] Vide pages 49, 50, ante.

[2] Vide pages 51–53, ante.

[3] Journal of the House, "Die Jovis, 10 ho., A.M., the 16th March, "1775."

[4] Journal of the House, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., A.M., the 24th March, "1775."

[5] The original Journals of the Assembly which included the proceedings of the entire Session which is now under consideration, were lost during the troublesome times of that period; and the only known copy of the original printed edition of those Journals wanted four pages, in this portion of it. Those missing pages contained the closing portion of the proceedings of the House, on the Petition to the King, as stated in the text, and the opening of its proceedings on the Memorial to the House of Lords.

[6] The completed Petition to the King, signed by the Speaker of the Assembly, may be seen in the Journal of the Assembly, "Die Sabbati, 10 "ho., A.M., the 25th March 1775."

[7] "Journal of the House, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., AM., the 24th March "1775."

The defect in the Journal, as it is now known to us, to which reference has been made, leaves us without any information concerning the proceedings of the House on the first twenty paragraphs of the Memorial to the House of Lords.

[8] Journal of the House, "Die Sabbati, 10 ho., A. M., the 25th March "1775."

[9] Ibid.

[10] Journal of the House, "Die Sabbati, 4 ho., P.M., the 25th March, "1775."

[11] Ibid.

the rise of this House as conveniently may be, copies of the State of the Grievances, of the Resolutions of the House, of the Petition to the King, of the Memorial to the Lords, and of the Representation and Remonstrance to the Commons, requesting those several Speakers to lay the same before their respective Houses of Assembly, at their first meeting after the receipt thereof.[1]

On the following day, [April 1st.] the Assembly appointed "a Standing Committee of Correspondence," composed of the Speaker, [John Cruger,] James De Lancey, James Jauncey, Benjamin Kissam, and Jacob Walton, all of them from the City of New York, Benjamin Seaman, of Richmond-county, Isaac Wilkins, of the Borough of Westchester, Frederic Philipse, of Westchester-county, Zebulon Seaman, of Queens-county, John Rapalje and Simon Boerum, of Kings-county, Samuel Gale, of Orange-county, and George Clinton, of Ulster-county, or any seven of them, "whose duty it shall be to obtain the most "early and authentic intelligence of all such Acts "and Resolutions of the British Parliament or Pro-"ceedings of Administration as do or may relate to "or affect the Liberties and Privileges of His Ma-"jesty's Subjects, in the British Colonies in America "and to keep up and maintain a Correspondence and "Communication with our Sister Colonies, respecting "these important considerations; and the result of "their Proceedings to lay before the House."[2]

On the following Monday, the third of April, the Assembly adjourned until the third of May;[3] and that eventful Session of the last General Assembly of the Colony of New York, which was assembled for the discharge of legislative duties, was ended.

That General Assembly and all that it did, from the opening of the Session until the final declaration of its Speaker brought that Session to a close, have been made the themes of unceasing misrepresentation and abuse or of absolute and contemptuous silence, from far the greater number of those who have assumed to write or to speak concerning the history of that notable period. They have been the themes, sometimes, of ignorant and unscrupulous bigots and, sometimes, of intelligent and unscrupulous tricksters; sometimes a personal and sometimes a local end has been served by either a falsification or a concealment of the truth, concerning them; and, sometimes, fragments of useless and glittering rhetoric, strung together, as farmers string fragments of useless and glittering tin and display them in order to deceive and to scatter unsuspecting birds from their cornfields, in like manner, have been employed by literary prestidigitators, in order to deceive those who are less intelligent than themselves, concerning that Assembly, and its members, and their doings; and, through that deception, to promote their own or their party's or their sectional purposes. Individual members of that Assembly, men of honor and unimpeachable integrity, have been stigmatized as "wretches," and as "the veriest reptiles on earth" and charged with "corruption" and every kindred vice—some of them were driven from their families and their homes; others of them were lawlessly seized and carried from their families and their homes, exiled, and held in lawless bondage; and others of them were stripped of their patrimonial estates or of the estates of their own creation—only because they had preferred, as Members of that Assembly, to assert the Grievances under which the Colony was said to have been laboring and to demand a Redress of those alleged Grievances, not with any less distinctness of words nor with any less firmness of manner, but after a manner and through instrumentalities of their own selection and which possessed their greater confidence, rather than after a manner and through instrumentalities which others would have thrust on them, which their own sense of fitness and adaptability had not approved, which were controlled by men in whose noisy pretensions to personal and political integrity they could not repose confidence. Measures which were sincerely intended for the promotion of the common cause of the Colonies, in their struggle with the Home Government,—measures which presented nothing else than political principles or recitals of facts which no one, of any sect or faction, pretended to dispute — were opposed, vehemently and without measure, within as well as without the Assembly, only because they had not originated and were not supported before the House, by the opposite faction of the Opposition; and, with that hereditary, or sectional, or sectarian, or partisan bitterness which the lapse of years has served only to intensify, that work of depreciation and misrepresentation of those measures and of all who favored them, continues to disgrace much, at the present day, which is audaciously called "history."

A candid and carefully-made comparison of the terms of those several State of Grievances, and declaratory Resolutions, and Petition, and Memorial, and Representation and Remonstrance, which were prepared, and agreed to, and presented, and published by that much-abused General Assembly of Colonial New York, with the several Resolutions, and Declaration of Rights, and Association, and Addresses, and Memorials, and Petition, which, in like manner, were prepared, and agreed to, and presented, and published by the much-eulogized Congress of the Continent, which had assembled in Philadelphia, in September, 1774, will clearly establish the fact that the former were quite as decided, in their tone, and quite as clear and distinct, in their terms, as the latter; and such a comparison will also clearly establish the fact that, in its continuous and violent opposition to the former,

[1] Journal of the House, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., A.M., the 31st March, "1775."

[2] Journal of the House, "Die Sabbati, 10 ho., A.M., the 1st April, "1775."

[3] Journal of the House, "Die Lunæ, 10 ho., A.M., the 3d April, 1775."

in every stage of its progress through the House, the minority of that General Assembly was clearly actuated by some other motive than that of simple, uncontaminated patriotism.

It will be seen, also, by every careful and candid reader of the published proceedings of that Congress to which reference has been made, that, notwithstanding the gravamen of the declared Grievances of the constituent Colonies, of that notable body, consisted of sundry Acts of Parliament, all of which were considered as oppressive, it had made no attempt whatever, either by Petition or otherwise, to induce the Parliament to remove or even to modify those Grievances, or any of them, by a repeal or even by an amendment of the obnoxious provisions of those oppressive legal enactments, contenting itself, instead, with preparing, and agreeing to, and presenting, only Addresses to the People of Great Britain, to the Inhabitants of the Province of Quebec, and to the King, and a Memorial to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies, respectively, not one of whom possessed the slightest legislative authority, nor the slightest ability, in any way, to remove nor even to modify those Grievances, whatever might have been its disposition to have done so — indeed, notwithstanding the well-known desires of the great body of the Colonists, throughout the entire Continent, notwithstanding the known purposes for which that Congress had been convened, and notwithstanding the express provisions of the greater number of the Credentials of the several Delegations, the proceedings of that Congress were mainly declaratory and justificatory of Rebellion, with scarcely an effort to obtain a redress of Grievances, and nothing whatever for the yet more desired reconciliation and union with the Mother Country, "so beneficial to the "whole Empire, and so ardently desired by all British "America,"[1] for "the restoration of union and har-"mony between Great Britain and the Colonies, most "ardently desired by all good men."[2] The tone and the tendency of all that it did, however, were peculiarly revolutionary, in all which it was eminently successful;[3] and, to that extent, if no further, it had failed to represent, truly, those in whose name it had nominally acted. On the other hand, the General Assembly of Colonial New York, the legitimacy of whose organization and the entire legality of whose action, in behalf of the common cause, no one has ever presumed to question; without compromising its dignity, as a General Assembly; with that common sense which, in Europe as well as in America, was, then, so peculiarly uncommon; without entangling itself with any questionable alliance; and without belittling its legitimate influence by expressing its official sympathy with any other body, even in relation to those measures which were similar, in character and purpose, to those of its own enactment—that General Assembly, quite as clearly and quite as energetically as the Congress had done, in behalf of its constituents, boldly declared the Grievances of those whom it represented, in a clear recital of the several Acts of Parliament which had been employed by the Home Government for the oppression of the Colonists; and, in addition to that recital of specific Statutes which were grievous in their provisions, it adopted a series of Resolutions, declaratory of the general Rights of the Colonists, as Englishmen, "to which they were "equally entitled with their fellow-subjects in Great "Britain"—Resolutions which no one could have made stronger, in support of the common cause. But, unlike that Congress, and more consistently with its duty to its constituency than anything, in that connection, which the Congress had professed to do, that General Assembly, in its official character, approached the King and the two Houses of Parliament, in whom, acting together, rested the only legitimate authority which could possibly be exercised for the removal of those Grievances which it had described, and for the restoration of that harmony, between the Colonies and the Mother Country, which the former so earnestly desired; and, unto these, respectively, it respectfully presented its manly, and dignified, and legally-expressed prayers for the repeal of those several Acts or parts of Acts which were oppressive or which threatened to become so. In all these, it violated no law and fostered no spirit of disaffection. Without the loss of any of that dignity which legitimately belonged to it, and without sacrificing any of that respect for its constituents which its duty required it to maintain, it recognized the sovereignty of the King, as the Congress had also done; and, consistently with that dignity and that respect, but with a boldness which was peculiarly its own, at the same time, it also asserted its own standing, as a General Assembly, by memorializing instead of petitioning the Peers, and by representing the facts of the usurpation, to the Commons, and by supplementing that "representation" with a "remonstrance" against the action of that distinguished body, in its serious disregard of the Rights of the Colonists. In all these several prayers, with whatever titles and in whatever form they were presented, the General Assembly employed terms which commanded the respect of those to whom they were respectively addressed; and, in one instance, so clearly was the Grievance represented and so earnest was the remonstrance which was made against it, in the Assembly's Remonstrance, that even Lord North was obliged to acknowledge the force and the fitness of the plea, and, in his place in the House of Commons,

[1] Credentials of the Delegation from Virginia, to the Congress.

[2] Credentials of the Delegation from Massachusetts, to the Congress.

[3] It is matter of history, well known to every student, that the action of the Congress on the Suffolk-county Resolutions, (Journal of the Congress, "Saturday, September 17, 1774, A.M."), closed the door of reconciliation against the Colonies, and led the Home Government to regard the great body of the Colonists as only rebels, against whom it had become the duty of that Government to throw the weight of its authority, a determination for which those Colonists, in their individual relations, had given no warrant, either in their actions or their dispositions.

to declare his willingness that that Grievance, if no other of the series, should be duly removed.

Notwithstanding all that has been said in depreciation of that particular Colonial General Assembly, it did not consider it necessary, nor even expedient, to override the minority of its members without even recognizing their existence on its Journal, under cover of the subsequently notorious "unit-rule," in recording the votes of its members, nor in any other manner; nor did it conceal its proceedings, whether honestly or questionably determined, by publishing as complete what were only mutilated copies of its Journal, all of which the Congress had done. It might have been charged with "corruption," with some degree of propriety, had it purchased an appearance of unanimity in its votes with unexplained exceptions in the mandatory provisions of some of its general enactments—exceptions in favor of one of the high-contracting parties, which were necessarily conceded as equivalents for commercial trickery in another—as the Congress had done; but the divided votes which are presented on nearly every page of its Journal very clearly indicate that, whatever of factional bitterness there might have been, neither codfish nor rice was recognized as an element in the determination of grave questions, affecting the peace of the Colonies and the welfare and happiness of millions, in Europe as well as in America. On the contrary, what it did was done honorably, and openly, and in conformity with the requirements of parliamentary, as well as of constitutional, Law; not by unanimous Votes, actual or fictitious, but by a majority of its members, duly and courteously exercising the authority with which that majority was duly and legally vested. It was not done by the action of the minority of that Assembly, which represented the revolutionary element of the Inhabitants of the City of New York more completely and with greater zeal than it represented those several constituencies who had given seats, in that body, to it; but it was done in the face of that factious minority, and notwithstanding its open, persistent, and resolute opposition. It was not done by reason of any prompting or influence of either the Colonial or the Home Government; but in well-known opposition to the wishes and the expectations of both. It was not done because of any popular influence, present or prospective; but only from the personal knowledge of its members, concerning the great wrongs to which, it was said, the Colonies had been subjected, concerning the rights and the interests of the Colonists which had been invaded, and concerning the measures which were necessary for the protection of those invaded rights and interests, for securing a redress of those great wrongs, and for the restoration of harmony and peace. In fact, that General Assembly, in all the proceedings of which mention has been made, more clearly and more faithfully represented the interests and the opinions and the inclinations, concerning governmental matters, of the aggregate body of the Colonists, in New York, including every class, and sect, and political party—and it possessed no authority to represent any other, and made no pretension to do so—than either the Congress of the Continent or the fragmentary revolutionary faction within the Colony had done or possibly could do; and there is very great reason for the belief that its orderly, and dignified, and more practically sensible influence would have been recognized beyond the limits of New York, and that it would have succeeded in its honorable efforts and evidently earnest purposes to restore, permanently and without dishonor, that harmony between the Colonies and the Mother Country which all professed to desire, had not the rashness of General Gage, in Massachusetts, during the brief recess which it had voted to itself, broken the well-strained barriers of Peace, loosed the worst elements of human nature in the Colonists, overturned everything which pertained to a Government of Law, and plunged the Continent into all the horrors of a needless and, necessarily, a bitter fratricidal War—a War which, at its conclusion, the farmers of Westchester-county, or those of them who remained, more than all New England combined, had sorrowful reasons for remembering, because of the devastated homesteads, the divided families, the antagonistic neighbors, and the remembrance of plunder, and outrages, and butcheries, among them, of which that War had been so abundantly and so sadly productive.

A few words only are required to complete the record of the results of that much-slandered General Assembly; and the space which they will occupy cannot be better occupied.

The Petition which was officially sent to the Agent of the Colony, the celebrated Edmund Burke, for presentation to the King, was duly laid before the Sovereign;[1] but, inasmuch as the General Assembly had, also, addressed the Parliament, on the same subjects, it is not known that any particular attention was paid to it.

On the fifteenth of May, the distinguished Agent of the Colony, offered to be presented to the House of Commons, the Representation and Remonstrance which the Colonial General Assembly had addressed to that body; and, in doing so, Mr. Burke made a short Speech, in which he told the House that "they never "had before them so fair an opportunity of putting "an end to the unhappy disputes with the Colonies, "as at present; and he conjured them, in the most

[1] "Mr Burke having delivered to me the Petition to the King, I had "the honour to present it to His Majesty, who was pleased to receive "it with the most gracious expressions of regard and attention to the "humble request of his faithful subjects in New-York, who have, on "this occasion, manifested a duty to His Majesty and a regard for the "authority of the Parent State, which, had they not, in the Memorial "to the House of Lords and in the Representation to the House of Commons, "been unfortunately blended with expressions containing Claims which "made it impossible for Parliament, consistent with its justice and dig-"nity, to receive them, might have laid the foundation of that Recon-"ciliation we have so long and so ardently wished for."—(The Earl of Dartmouth to Governor Tryon, "WHITEHALL, May 25, 1775.")

"earnest manner, not to let it escape, as possibly, the "like might never return;" closing his remarks with the statement that "he had, several times in "the Session, expressed his sentiments, very fully, "upon every thing contained in that Remonstrance; "as for the rest, it spoke so strongly for itself that he "did not see how people in their senses could refuse "at least the consideration of so reasonable and de- "cent an address;" and, after having "stated the "heads of the Remonstrance," "he moved for leave to "bring it up." The Ministry was not as well disposed, however, as Mr. Burke appeared to suppose; and Lord North promptly took the floor, to reply to what that gentleman had said. He commenced by asking the Clerk to read the official record of the proceedings of the House, in December, 1768, on a Petition of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, and what was known as the Declaratory Act; and he continued by saying that he was "greatly in favour of "New York; and that he would gladly do everything "in his power to shew his regard to the good behaviour "of that Colony;" but he declared that the "honour "of Parliament required that no paper should be pre- "sented to that House, which tended to call in ques- "tion the unlimited Rights of Parliament." "As to "the Quebec Duties," which was one of the Grievances against which the General Assembly had remonstrated, he said "he did not pretend to be infal- "lible; he confessed they were not laid as they ought "to be; and he declared that he was willing to give "satisfaction, in that point, immediately." "This, "however," he said, "was but a trifle to the general "objects of the Remonstrance." An earnest Debate ensued, Messrs. Cornwall and Jenkinson supporting the Ministry, and Messrs. Cruger, Aubrey, Charles James Fox, and Governor Johnstone supporting Mr. Burke; and that was followed by the submission by Lord North, of an Amendment to Mr. Burke's Motion "for leave to bring up," making it read thus: "That "the said Representation and Remonstrance (in which "the said Assembly claim to themselves Rights derog- "atory to, and inconsistent with, the legislative "authority of Parliament, as declared by the Declara- "tory Act) be brought up." By a vote of one hundred and eighty-six to sixty-seven, the Amendment was adopted; and the amended Motion, of course, was promptly rejected, without a division.[1]

Three days after that rejection of the Representation and Remonstrance of the General Assembly, by the House of Commons, [May 18, 1775] the Duke of Manchester brought the Memorial which that General Assembly had addressed to the House of Lords, before that House, and moved that it be read. The Earl of Dartmouth opposed the Motion; and a spirited Debate ensued, in which the Earls of Buckinghamshire, Denbigh, Gower, Hillsborough, and Sandwich, and Lord Mansfield, supported the Minister, and the Duke of Richmond, the Earls of Shelburne and Effingham, and Lord Camden, opposed him. The only objection raised against the reading of the Memorial was the bare suspicion that "it contained "matter derogatory to the supreme legislative power "of Great Britain;" and on that suspicion, alone, the Memorial not having been even described, the House sustained the Minister, and declined to allow the Memorial to be read, by a vote of twenty-five to forty-five, sending it, of course, into the legislative limbo.[2] Well might Edmund Burke subsequently say of that rejection of the Memorial and of the Remonstrance of the General Assembly of Colonial New York, by the two Houses of Parliament, "nothing done in Parlia- "ment seemed to be better calculated to widen the "breach between Great Britain and the Colonies."[3]

[1] Almon's Parliamentary Register, i., 467–473; Annual Register for 1775, "History of Europe," *115, *116.

[2] Almon's Parliamentary Register, ii., 152–156; Annual Register for 1775, "History of Europe," *116, *117.

It is a reasonable case, in such instances as those cited and in those of the earlier historians of the American Revolution who lived and wrote in Europe, that no more than the rejection, by the Parliament, of the two papers which were sent to that legislature by the General Assembly of New York, was mentioned in the writings of those gentlemen; but there is no valid excuse for those, in America, who have exhausted all their resources of misrepresentation and abuse on that General Assembly, charging it with having been everything which was detrimental to the honor or the integrity or the interests of the Colonies, and closing their respective narratives, on the subject of that Assembly, by reciting no more than the facts, stated in the text—that its Memorial and Remonstrance had been rejected by the two Houses of Parliament, without having been read—without having pretended to explain how it were possible that so bad an Assembly as they had described, could, by any possibility, have been, the author and publisher of such papers as, because of their peculiarly republican averments, the Home Government and the Parliament would not allow to be even read in their presence.

Bancroft, after having consolidated the Remonstrance and the Memorial, making them one paper, obliged Burke to offer both, on the same day, and in the same House, all of which were described in the narrow compass of four lines, without even a hint how such an Assembly as he had previously described, could have produced such a paper—his silence serving to screen his unfaithfulness, as a historian, both in a falsification and in a suppression of the truth. (History of the United States, original edition, iv., 286; the same, centenary edition, iv., 515.) John C. Hamilton, of course, by his suppression as well as by his falsification of the truth, in order that his father and his grandfather might he unduly eulogized, is equally untrustworthy (History of the Republic, i., 86.) Lendrum, (History of the American Revolution, i., 87;) "Paul Allen" (History of the American Revolution, i., 237, 238;) Gordon, (History of the American Revolution, i., 500;) Ramsay, (History of the American Revolution, i., 171, 172;) and others, less prominent but not less popular, have been equally unfaithful, as historians, in this matter.

Lossing, (Field Book of the Revolution;) Frothingham, (Rise of the Republic;) Ridpath, (History of the United States;) Lodge, (History of the English Colonies in America;) Morse, (Annals of the American Revolution;) Warren, (History of the American Revolution;) and others, although abounding in facts and fictions concerning Massachusetts, have not spared a line for the recognition of what was done for "the common "cause," by the General Assembly of the Colony of New York.

Pitkin, (History of the United States, i., 324, 325;) and Hildreth, (History of the United States, First Series, iii., 56, 65,) with that fidelity to the truth which distinguished them, as historians, and notwithstanding they were New Englanders, not only recited enough of the facts to enable their respective readers to understand what the General Assembly of New York really did, but they also compared the result of those doings with the doings of the Continental Congress, very much to the credit of the former, without belittling what they regarded as also due to the latter.

[3] Annual Register for 1775, "History of Europe," *117.

Except those matters to which we have already referred, nothing which requires especial notice in this narrative, occurred until, in February, 1775, the General Assembly of the Colony rejected the Resolution, submitted by Judge Thomas, of Westchester-county, which provided for the election, by that General Assembly, of Delegates to the proposed Congress of the Continent, to be held at Philadelphia, on the tenth of May ensuing, reference to which has been already made.[1] Four days after that determination, by the General Assembly, to take no official action on the subject referred to, [February 27, 1775,] Peter Van Brugh Livingston brought it before the "Committee "of Observation," by which name the Committee of Inspection evidently preferred to be known; and that Committee, notwithstanding its authority was limited to other and entirely different lines of duty, entertained and agreed to a Resolution, offered by that gentleman, "that the Committee take into Consider- "ation, the Ways and Means of causing Delegates to "be elected, to meet the Delegates of the other Col- "onies on this Continent in General Congress, to be "held at Philadelphia, on the 10th Day of May "next."[2] If any other action on the subject of that Resolution was taken at that time, it was not completed when the Committee adjourned; and not until the following Wednesday, [March 1, 1775,] at an Adjourned Meeting of the Committee, was the subject disposed of, by ordering the publication of an Advertisement, addressed "to the Freeholders and Freemen "of the City and County of New York," in which were made a recital of the recommendation that another Congress should be convened at Philadelphia, on the tenth of May ensuing; a suggestion that an Election of Delegates "ought not longer to be de- "layed;" an acknowledgment that that Committee possessed "no Power without the Approbation of "their Constituents, to take any Measures for the "Purpose;" and a "request" "that the Freeholders "and Freemen of the City and County of New York, "will be pleased to assemble at the Exchange, on "Monday the 6th Instant, at 12 o'clock, to signify "their Sense of the best Method of choosing such "Delegates; and whether they will appoint a cer- "tain Number of Persons to meet such Deputies as "the Counties may elect for that Purpose, and join "with them in appointing out of their Body Dele- "gates for the next Congress."[3] That Advertisement was published on the following day, [March 2, 1775;][4] and, what was very unusual, those who were opposed to the revolutionary faction of the confederated party of the Opposition appear to have organized, for the purpose of joining issue with the latter, at the proposed Meeting, on the questions which had thus been referred only to those who were either Freeholders or Freemen of the City, in whom, alone, the right of the elective franchise was, then, legally vested.[5]

An unusual excitement appears to have been aroused by the placards with which the walls and the fences throughout the City were covered,[6] and by the impassioned appeals with which the newspapers were filled; and the morning of the sixth of March opened with many appearances which betokened the approach of a serious conflict between the rival factions. As early as nine o'clock, the revolutionary faction, strengthened by many who were neither Freeholders nor Freemen, began to assemble around the Liberty-pole,[7] on which a large Union Flag had been raised, at an early hour; and, at eleven o'clock, preceded by a Band of Music and a large Union Flag, it moved, by a circuitous route, toward the appointed place of meeting, picking up, as it went, such a motley crowd of "boys, sailors, negroes, and New England and "New-Jersey boatmen" as a noisy Band and continuous invitations to "fall in," which have always been incidental to partisan political processions, could not have failed to secure. The conservative faction, strengthened by "some Officers of the Army "and Navy, several of His Majesty's Council, and "those Members of the House of Representatives "who had refused taking into consideration the Pro- "ceedings of the Congress, together with the Officers "of the Customs and other Dependents of the Court, "&c."—the Governmental Party, as far as there was one, having evidently united with the conservative faction of the party of the Opposition, on that occasion—assembled at the Widow De La Montagnie's, at ten o'clock; and that, also, moved, quietly, in a procession, to the Exchange, in season to take part in the proceedings of the proposed Meeting. It is said that "soon after the parties met some confusion "arose, but subsided without any bad consequences" —in other words, blows were exchanged, which, at one time, threatened to become a serious riot.

Isaac Low presided, as Chairman of the Committee who had requested the Meeting and proceeded to explain the purposes of that request, after which he pro-

[1] See page 52, ante.

[2] Proceedings of the Committee of Observation for the City and County of New York, at its Adjourned Meeting, February 27, 1775.

[3] Proceedings of the Committee of Observation for the City and County of New York, at its Adjourned Meeting, 1st March, 1775.

[4] Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1678, NEW-YORK, Thursday, March 2, 1775.

[5] That organization was effected at a public Meeting of the Inhabitants who disapproved the "request" of the Committee, which was held at the Widow De La Montagnie's, in Broadway, opposite the Fields, on Friday evening, March 3, John Thurber presiding.—(A Broadside, signed by John Thurber, in the Library of the New York Historical Society.)

[6] The Committee of Observation called its Meetings by means of handbills posted throughout the City; and the Meeting at the Widow De La Montagnie's was called in the same manner.

[7] As nearly as can be ascertained, the Liberty-pole stood in the Fields, now the Park, near the present line of Broadway, opposite the block which is bounded by Murray and Warren-streets.

It occupied a small lot of ground which had been bought for that purpose, by those who styled themselves "Sons of Liberty;" and, as lately as 1785, Isaac Sears, the assign of one of those who had bought it, many years previously, made a claim on the City, and was paid for his interest therein.—(Manual of the Corporation of the City of New York for 1856, 433.)

posed the following question: "Whether a certain "Number of persons shall be appointed and author- "ized to meet such Deputies as the Counties may "elect, and join with them for the sole object of ap- "pointing out of their body on the 20th of April next, "Delegates to the next Congress?" Those who were opposed to the question, the conservative faction and its governmental allies, promptly demanded a Poll of the Voters, giving as reasons for their demand, that the business of the day was to take only the sense of the Freeholders and Freemen; that none but those of these two classes of persons had a right to vote on the question; and that it was impossible to discriminate them from those who had not such a right. The large body of the members of the Committee who was present, "who had taken upon themselves the part of "Returning-officers," of course, refused the demand—as the number of qualified voters, then present, who were known to have been opposed to the question, was evidently so very largely in the majority, a Poll of the Voters, had one been permitted, would have determined the question in the negative, and have defeated the purpose of those who were seeking another advancement to place and authority, in the proposed Congress of the Colonies—and the question was, of course, declared to have been carried, in favor of the proposition. The second question which was proposed: "Whether "this Meeting will authorize the Committee to nomi- "nate Eleven Deputies for their Approbation?" being of secondary importance to those who had opposed the first, a Poll of the Voters was not demanded thereon; and, of course, like the preceding question, it was adopted "by a very great Majority of the Peo- "ple," promiscuous in its qualifications for such an action, voting viva voca. "The Business of the day "being finished," as the record stated, the assemblage dispersed; and, as far as that notable Meeting was concerned, the purposes of those who had evidently obtained the control of the Committee of Inspection, had been fully secured.[1]

There appears to have been thirty-eight of the Members of the Committee of Inspection present at the noon-day Meeting, on the Exchange, which has been described; and, on the evening of the same day, [March 6, 1775,] in their capacity as Returning-officers, they reported to the Committee itself, which had assembled in due form, the proceedings of that popular assemblage, including the affirmative answers to the two questions which had been presented to it; and so entirely satisfactory to the Committee was the result of the day's labor, that it directed the detailed statement of those transactions, thus reported to it, to be entered, in full, in the Minutes of its own proceedings. Having thus disposed of the main question, apparently to its entire satisfaction, the Committee then proceeded to nominate, by ballot, eleven persons, "for the Approbation of the Freemen "and Freeholders, for the City and County of New "York, to serve as Deputies to meet such other Dep- "uties as may be appointed by the remaining "Counties in this Province, for the sole Purpose of "electing out of their Body, Delegates for the next "Congress;" and the choice of the Committee fell on Isaac Low, Philip Livingston, James Duane, John Alsop, John Jay, Leonard Lispenard, Abraham Walton, Francis Lewis, Isaac Roosevelt, Alexander McDougal, and Abraham Brasher,[2] notwithstanding Isaac Low had previously "desired a Friend that in "Case he should be put on the Nomination, to de- "clare, in his Behalf, that he should be under the dis- "agreeable Necessity of Dissenting."[3]

It will be seen that, in this last performance, the Committee of Inspection, (or of Observation, as it was pleased to call itself,) notwithstanding the peculiarly aristocratic elements which entered into its composition, had accepted, if it had not resorted to, that questionable element which had been so frequently employed, on former occasions, for the performance of acts, which neither the Law of the Land nor their own self-respect would have permitted its high-toned employers to do, directly, with their own hands—that it had resorted, indeed, to that peculiarly questionable element, outside the limits of plebeian respectability, which Gouverneur Morris had so graphically described, in his letter to Governor Penn, which has been already laid before the reader.[4] It will be seen also, that in exact conformity with such questionable practises, already very well known to every membe rof the Committee noise and lawless acts of violence, in that last instance, had accomplished, at the Meeting at the Exchange, what an evidently insufficient supply of Freeholders and Freemen, unassisted by those who were not thus qualified to vote, could not have possibly secured to the Committee, on that occasion; and that, among those political tricksters among whom the end justified the means—a class which was evidently well represented in the Committee, at its Meeting on the evening of the sixth of March—the introduction of that very questionable mode of determining grave questions, involving the weal and the woe of the Colony, affirmatively, where, otherwise, the majority of competent voters would, unquestionably, have negatived those questions, was

[1] Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1679, NEW-YORK, Thursday, March 9, 1775; Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 99, NEW-YORK, Thursday, March 9, 1775; Proceedings of the Committee of Observation for the City and County of New York, 6th March, 1775, into which the record of the proceedings of the Meeting at the Exchange, in the Morning, was officially copied; Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 37, 38, and de Lancey's Notes on that History, i., 480–484; Leake's Memoir of General John Lamb, 100; Dawson's Park and its Vicinity, 38, 39; Gordon's History of the American Revolution, i., 472; Hildreth's History of the United States, First Series, iii., 71, 72; etc.

[2] Proceedings of the Committee of Observation for the City and County of New York, at its Meeting, "Monday Evening, 6th March, 1775."

[3] Card, signed by Mr. Low and addressed to "THE RESPECTABLE PUB- "LIC." dated "NEW YORK, March 9, 1775."

[4] Gouverneur Morris to Mr. Penn, "NEW-YORK, May 20, 1774," pages 11, 12, ante.

evidently regarded as an undoubted success. It seems, however, that, notwithstanding all that apparent success, at the Exchange, the machinery of selfishness did not move without a jar, within itself, as the very decided testimony and dissent of Isaac Low, the Chairman of the Committee as well as that of the Meeting, against whom some underhanded antagonism had been detected, have clearly shown;[1] and it is equally susceptible of proof that a very healthy feeling of disapproval of the dishonorable and unwarrantable proceedings, at that Meeting, which had been held under the auspices of the Committee of Inspection and had been controlled by a majority of the members of that body, was entertained "by a very "great Majority of our Fellow Citizens," throughout the City.[2] Under these circumstances, and with these warnings, it need not be matter of surprise that the Committee which had hastened to award unusual honors to that riotous assemblage, by incorporating what was said to have been a record of its tumultuous doings in the Minutes of its own proceedings, with almost as much haste, although with very much less of ostentatious and noisy display than had been previously exhibited in the unseemly approval of it, at an Adjourned Meeting, held within forty-eight hours after its hasty recognition of the doings of that assembled multitude, and prompted by John Jay who, only a few hours before, had been decidedly differently-minded—that Committee, thus predisposed, thus bashfully, thus hastily, and thus prompted, gravely repudiated the questionable vote which "a very great Majority of the People" was said to have given in approval of the fundamental question, concerning the appointment and authorization of Deputies to a proposed Provincial Convention, which, a few hours ago, it had declared to have been adopted "by a very great Majority of the People," at the Exchange; and, quite as gravely and with even greater inconsistency, it also yielded to those whom it had scornfully disregarded, at the Exchange as well as in its own Meeting, the right and the propriety of a Poll of the Voters, by which means the miscellaneous, unfranchised crowd would be silenced and the suffrage and the determination of the question, concerning the election of Delegates to the proposed Continental Congress, be confined to the Freeholders and Freemen of the City and County, to whom, alone, the Committee had originally referred it. It is a notable fact, however, that, notwithstanding the Committee repudiated the first Resolution which the miscellaneous crowd, at the Exchange, was said to have adopted, it rigidly maintained the equally questionable validity of the second Resolution, nominally authorizing the Committee to nominate eleven persons as candidates for the places of Delegates to the proposed Provincial Convention—the opportunity to obtain place and authority, no matter how ill-founded that opportunity might be, was an object so vastly more important to those aristocratic place-seekers, than all others, that, whether promising or unpromising of success, those who controlled that Committee could not possibly abandon it[3]—and, consequently, on the fifteenth of March, a Poll was opened in each Ward, at the usual places of Election, under the inspection, in each instance, of the two Vestrymen of the Ward and two Members of the Committee, who had been appointed for that duty; and the Freeholders and Freemen of the City then formally determined that Deputies should be appointed for the purpose named, and that the eleven nominees of the Committee should be such Deputies, to represent the City and County in the proposed Provincial Congress.[4] The result of the Poll was reported to the Committee on the evening of the same day, [March 15, 1775] when that body ordered "that Circular Letters be "written to all the Counties in the Colony, informing "them of the appointment of Deputies for this City "and County, and requesting them, with all con-"venient speed, to elect Deputies to meet in Pro-"vincial Convention, at the City of New York, on "the 20th of next April, for the sole purpose of "appointing Delegates to represent this Colony at the "next Congress to be held at Philadelphia the 10th "day of May next."[5]

[1] Card, signed by Mr. Low and addressed to "The Respectable Pub-"lic," dated "New York, March 9, 1775."

[2] The Communication, signed "Impartial," dated "New York, "March 8, 1775," which was printed in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 99, New-York, Thursday, March 9, 1775.

[3] Proceedings of the Committee of Observation for the City and County of New York, at an Adjourned Meeting, 8th March, 1775.

[4] Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1680, New-York, Thursday, March 16, 1775; Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 100, New-York, Thursday, March 16, 1775;* Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1223, New-York, Monday, March 20, 1775.

[5] Proceedings of the Committee of Observation for the City and County of New-York, "Committee-Chamber, 15th March, 1775."

With the single exception of de Lancey, in his Notes to Judge Jones's History of New York during the American Revolution, as far as our acquaintance with them extends, every writer on that subject, ourself included, has supposed and stated that the question of sending Delegates to a proposed Provincial Convention was unquestionably determined by the promiscuous Meeting, at the Exchange, without having seen that that vote had been subsequently repudiated by the Committee, for cause, and that it had been submitted to the Freeholders and Freemen, at the Polls, and definitely determined by them, and only by them, at the same time that Delegates were elected to represent the City and County, in that Convention.

* Holt and Gaine stated the vote to have been eight hundred and twenty-five in favor of the appointment of Deputies, and one hundred and sixty-three in opposition: Rivington stated the vote was nine hundred and twenty-nine, in favor, and one hundred and forty-three in opposition.

They all agree that many voters declined to vote—Holt and Gaine said, because their votes were seen to have been unnecessary: Rivington said "the friends of the old five Delegates, (finding that they were not "permitted to vote for them as Delegates) almost all declined giving "their voices at all."

They evidently suspected the managers of the movement were seeking to accomplish some mischief against those "old five Delegates;" and it may be that Isaac Low, in his declination to appear as a candidate, before the proposed Convention, was influenced by that evidently "crooked" movement. They preferred to vote directly for Delegates, instead of leaving the choice to an irresponsible Convention of politicians, who were evidently in the interest of other aspirants to Congressional honors and emoluments.

There is an abundance of evidence, of unquestionable truthfulness, showing that what has been represented to have been a conflict of rival parties, patriotically representing antagonistic political principles, on the occasion referred to, was, in fact, like all the political contests which had preceded it, during the preceding twelvemonth, only personal, factional, and local, in its origin and character; that it was not, really, concerning the great questions arising from the Colonial policy of the Home Government and the Grievances of the Colonies, relative to which there was very little diversity of sentiment throughout the City; and that, in fact, nothing else were involved in the questions which were submitted to the Meeting, than the local and minor questions concerning the control of the political affairs of the Colony itself and, especially, concerning those who should occupy the places of authority, and influence, and emoluments, therein.

It was conceded, by contemporaneous writers of both factions, that there was, really, no difference of opinion, among the various classes and sects and factions of which the City was composed, concerning the existing necessity for the redress of what were said to have been the Colonial Grievances, and that, if the Parliament should not interpose and indicate a willingness to afford the relief which was required, the proposed Congress ought to be convened, for a further consideration of the subject and for such further action relative thereto as should, then, be considered necessary; and no one, of either faction, pretended to be less loyal to the Sovereign nor less mindful of what were generally regarded as his prerogatives, than his most loyal supporters could have been—indeed, it was a notable fact, that, on the occasion of the Meeting now under consideration, even the revolutionary and miscellaneous crowd who assembled under the Liberty-pole was sheltered by a large Union Flag; and that when it moved from the Fields to the Exchange, with its noisy drum and fife and its yet more noisy attendants, it was preceded by another Union Jack, inscribed with the name and the title of the King.

That it might become expedient and proper to assemble the proposed Congress, if the Parliament should not, meanwhile, have indicated an inclination to redress the alleged Grievances of the Colonies, was not only conceded but freely acknowledged, even by those more earnest conservatives who had assembled at the Widow De La Montagnie's, on the preceding Friday evening; but they, in common with many others, hoped and believed that the Parliament would promptly indicate a willingness to afford the relief which was desired; and, in harmony with that hope and that belief, with a laudable desire to restore the harmony which had formerly prevailed between the Mother Country and the Colonies, and not with any intention to oppose the convention of the Congress, per se, they desired only a postponement of the action, in the proposed Meeting, which was designed for the inauguration of a movement for the election of Delegates to that proposed Congress, until the twentieth of April, which would have afforded time for the receipt from London of intelligence concerning the inclination and action of the Parliament, without depriving the Colony of the opportunity to elect its Delegation to the Congress, in due form, if it should become necessary to convene the Congress. But those who were anxiously seeking places and influence were not ignorant of the well-known fact that a sparrow in the hand is worth more than a dove on the roof; and, consequently, they were not willing to postpone the immediate action which would surely secure those desirable advantages to themselves; and they acted accordingly, marshaling their irregular allies, posting their handbills bearing unfounded accusations against their adversaries (accusations which were promptly contradicted in other handbills) accomplishing, or seeming to accomplish, by noise, what, at that time, they could not have accomplished, and did not accomplish, regularly, by the votes of those Freeholders and Freemen who were, then, present.[1] The result of that hasty and violent action has been noticed, and need not be repeated; but, notwithstanding it was subsequently disregarded by the Committee which had previously hastened to receive and accept it, it served to draw the lines of faction with more distinctness and to array neighbor against neighbor, in greater animosity and bitterness than had previously been witnessed.

On the sixteenth of March, 1775, in conformity with the Resolution adopted by the Committee, and under its authority, Isaac Low, the permanent Chairman of the Committee of Inspection, prepared the following Circular Letter; and, very soon afterwards, copies of it were sent to the several County Committees, where such Committees could be found, throughout the Colony:

"NEW-YORK, 16th March, 1775.

"GENTLEMEN:

"The late Congress having deemed it expedient, "that, in the present critical State of American "Affairs, another should be held at Philadelphia, the

[1] The motives of those who, respectively, originated and opposed the call for that Meeting may be best seen and understood in the placard and newspaper literature of that notable event; and, in that connection, the original Advertisement, requesting the Meeting, which was published in Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1678, NEW-YORK, Thursday, March 2, 1775, was the first of the series. The opponents of the Meeting, who assembled at the Widow De La Montagnie's, on the third of March, issued a handbill, in which reasons for a postponement of the question were stated; on the morning of the day on which the Meeting, was held, [March 6] a calm appeal, signed "A FREEMAN," and addressed "TO THE INHABITANTS OF NEW YORK," very forcibly urging a postponement of the questions, was published in Gaine's New-York Gazette and Weekly Mercury, No. 1221, Monday, March 6, 1775; a more elaborate appeal and argument, to the same effect, addressed "TO THE RESPECTABLE "INHABITANTS OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK," signed "A CITIZEN OF NEW "YORK," and published in the same issue of that newspaper; an elaborate reply to the last, signed "ANOTHER CITIZEN," and published in Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1679, NEW-YORK, Thursday, March 9, 1775; etc.

"10th Day of May next; and the neighbouring Col"onies having already appointed Delegates for that "Purpose, we beg Leave to call your Attention to "that Subject, and to remark, that the Honour as "well as the Interest of the Province requires that
"we also should be fully and properly represented.

"Influenced by these Considerations, this City
"and County conceive it highly necessary that a "Provincial Convention should, without Delay, be "formed of Deputies from all the Counties, for the "sole Purpose of appointing, out of their Body, Dele"gates for the next Congress, and therefore have "already chosen their Deputies: They prefer this "Mode to any other, as it tends to unite the Counties,
"and to preserve that Harmony between them so
"essential to the Interest of our common Cause.

"Be pleased to communicate this Letter to the "Inhabitants of your County; and should they con-
"cur with us in Sentiment, we beg they will consider,
"whether it would not be best to choose their Depu-
"ties so soon as that they may be down here by the "20th of April next; which Day we take the Liberty
"of proposing to you as proper for the Meeting of "the Convention.

"We forbear urging any Arguments to induce "your Concurrence, being well persuaded you are "fully sensible that the Happiness of this Colony
"and the Preservation of our Rights and Liberties,
"depend on our acceding to the General Union and "observing such a Line of Conduct as may be firm,
"as well as Temperate.

"By Order of the Committee:
"ISAAC LOW, Chairman."[1]

It is a very significant fact that, when the Committee's Circular Letter was written and made ready for transmission to Westchester-county, there was no appearance whatever, within that County, of the slightest organized opposition to either the Home or the Colonial Government; and that, among the debris of what had been conveniently regarded as a Convention of the County, assembled, in the preceding August, for the election of Deputies to represent the County in the late Congress, at Philadelphia, neither a County nor a Town Committee, actual or imaginary, remained, to bear testimony to the fact that such a Convention had ever existed, or to receive the Committee's Circular Letter and to take action on its recommendation. Indeed, there can be very little doubt that the well-to-do and generally contented farmers, throughout that County, those who were Freeholders quite as much as those who were only Leaseholders of properties on the various Manors, with here and there a rare exception, had continued to gather their crops and to send them to market, during the preceding Autumn; to enjoy their usual indoor and outdoor recreations, during the preceding Winter; and to return to the labors of the season, on their farms or elsewhere, during the earlier weeks of the Spring, as they had done, before, year after year and generation after generation, knowing little and caring less concerning that bitter struggle for commercial gain, no matter how lawlessly conducted, or concerning that equally bitter struggle for the honors and emoluments of political place, no matter with what auxiliaries nor with what disregard of individual and social proprieties and of public morals that struggle should be conducted, which had kept the neighboring City and the entire seaboard in an unceasing and disgraceful turmoil, during that entire period.

It is not now evident, if it ever was, that these honest, hard-working, contented men, in any portion of that unceasing and undisguised indifference to the clamor and the unblushing immorality and the audacious lawlessness of politicians, of high or of low degree, beyond the borders of the County, which they had steadily and consistently presented, were really offenders against any law, human or divine; and it will require more evidence than has yet been presented by those who have spoken or written adversely concerning those quiet Westchester-county farmers and their unostentatious conservatism, to establish the fact, if it be a fact, that, regardless of that peculiar standing which was awarded to Westchester-county, during the period now under consideration, and regardless of the recognized manhood of those who then lived there, the "consent" of those farmers, previously given, was not quite as necessary to have warranted the invasion of their rural quiet and contentment, by those, not of themselves, who were eager to thrust upon them, uninvited, new political methods, new political principles, and a new form of political government, none of which had yet secured their favor and approval, as it was, then, and as it has ever since been, assumed to have been necessary, everywhere, before a political right could be disturbed or a new form of political government be established.

The farmers in Westchester-county, in 1774 and 1775, were quiet men, quietly pursuing their peaceful vocations, interfering with no one, and avoiding the interference of others. They were not political in their aims or inclinations; they had very clearly manifested, over and over again, their disinclination to be associated, in any degree, with those who were inclined to become, if they had not already become, politicians; and, as will be seen, in their action, during the Winter, and in their subsequent actions, under similar circumstances, they were not inclined to be crowded into any political associations, without their consent, without presenting, at least, an open, a manly, and a vigorous opposition. The reader will determine for himself, therefore, how much, if any, there was of individual and social propriety, and how much, if any, there was of consideration for the welfare of those farmers or for that of the Colony, dissevered from all other considerations, in the Committee of Inspection, alias the Committee of Observation, for the City and County of New York—a merely local organization, vested with no more than the barest local authority, and that confined, exclusively, to an entirely different service—when it thrust itself, unasked and undesired, into the midst of that peaceful and peacefully inclined community, only in order to disturb that prevailing peace by marshalling those who composed that rural community into rival parties, embittered against each other, without any aim or purpose in which they were, or in which they were likely to become, in the slightest degree interested, and for nothing else than for the promotion of individual aims and for the advancement to political place and authority, of aspiring politicians who were not always entitled, by their individual integrity, to any such advancement, anywhere.

[1] This is a copy of the original publication, as it apppeared in Gaine's New-York Gazette and Weekly Mercury, No. 1223, NEW-YORK, Monday, March 20, 1775.

As we have said, there was no Town or County Committee, within Westchester-county, unto whom the Chairman of New York's Committee of Inspection could send the Committee's Circular Letter, to which reference has been made; and other than usual means, therefore, were necessarily resorted to, to secure for it even a nominal circulation, within that County. It is not, now, known, beyond a peradventure, just what means were thus employed; but the copies of that insidious Circular Letter which were intended for residents of Westchester-county were evidently sent to a leading Westchester-county politician; and, by him, whomsoever he may have been, they were so manipulated that they reached only those residents of the County who would most surely promote the political purposes of that particular Westchesterian who had been thus entrusted with the delivery of them.[1]

On the twenty-eighth of March, Theodosius Bartow, Esq., James Willis, and Abraham Guion, Esq., all of New Rochelle; William Sutton, Esq., of Mamaroneck[2]; Colonel Lewis Morris, Thomas Hunt, and Abraham Leggett, of Westchester; Captain Joseph Drake, Benjamin Drake, Moses Drake, and Stephen Ward, of East Chester; and James Horton, Junior, Esq., of Rye,[2] all of them, it said, "having received "letters from the Chairman of the City and County "of New York, relative to the appointment of Depu-"ties for this County," to a proposed Provincial Convention, "met at the White-Plains, for the purpose of "devising means for taking the Sense of the County "upon the Subject."

At best, that meeting of local politicians, or of those who were not indisposed to become politicians, from the south-eastern Towns of the County, no matter by what means they had been induced to go to the White Plains, on that particular March morning, on such an unusual errand, was nothing more nor less than a Caucus of those who were known or supposed to have been in the interest of the Morris family and to have favored the aspirations of those members of that family who hankered after official place and authority. Neither Yonkers, nor Greenburgh, nor any of the Towns to the northward of them and of the White Plains, were in the slightest degree represented in that important assemblage; and every one who had previously appeared as a leader of the farmers of the County, in their very unfrequent political doings, regardless of party associations, appears to have been, also, very carefully excluded, not improbably for the purpose of securing that harmonious action, in a preordained direction, which the presence of older and more experienced rivals might have turned toward some other part of the County than toward the Manor of Morrisania.

The Caucus undoubtedly discharged all the duties which its controlling spirit assigned to it—it took into consideration, after a fashion of its own creation, the subject of the proposed election of Delegates to represent the County, or to assume to do so; and it "agreed to send the following Notification to the "principal Freeholders in the different Towns and "Districts in the County," the designation of whom,

[1] We have preferred to consider that there was an intermediate agency, between the Chairman of the New York Committee and the several Westchester-county gentlemen into whose hands his Circular Letters eventually fell, because those gentlemen were mainly residents of the town of Westchester and of the neighboring village of New Rochelle; because there was nothing, in that Circular Letter, which designated any time or place of meeting, for any Caucus or other Assemblage which might be considered necessary, for the particular purposes mentioned in that Circular Letter; because, only on the warrant of that particular Circular Letter, explicitly stated by them, a dozen men, from at least four different Towns, spontaneously came together, at the same time, in a distant Town in which none of them lived, and on the same errand. Not one of the number was from Towns lying northward from the White Plains; not one had come from all the country lying westward from the Bronx-river; there was not present either a Van Cortlandt or a Thomas, already well-known popular leaders, either of whom would have been formidable, as a rival, against any new aspirant for the leadership of the movement and the spoils of office to which that movement tended. There was present, however, one who had, previously, been politically dormant; by whom the machinery of the movement was evidently run; and by whom, subsequently, as will be hereafter seen, entirely through its instrumentality, a place was secured for himself, in the Congress of the Continent, and an opening made for the accession to office and aristocratic consequence and influence, of others of his wide-spread family.

It will have been seen, by every attentive reader, that, very evidently, Isaac Low's package of Circular Letters, intended for circulation in Westchester-county, was entrusted to Lewis Morris, of Morrisania, in the Borough Town of Westchester, a brother-in-law of Isaac Wilkins, of that Town, with the last-named of whom, as the leader of the majority of the General Assembly of the Colony, the reader has been already made acquainted.

In all that had previously been said or done, in behalf of the Colony, in its dispute with the Home Government, not a Morris had been heard, except in that instance when one of them described the unfranchised masses of the Colonists as "poor reptiles" (vide Page 188, ante); but the fragrance of the distant emoluments and influences of office, more fully developed than ever before, had passed over from the City into Westchester-county; and, reasonably enough to all who knew of the greed for office which every Morris of every period had possessed, both Lewis and Gouverneur, to say nothing of others, were no longer torpid and indifferent.

[2] Subsequently distinguished as Loyalists.

in that selection, having been left to him by whom the Caucus had evidently been controlled—and having, in behalf of somebody else more than in behalf of the body of the County, thus put the political machinery in motion, satisfactorily to themselves and to their chief, the twelve gentleman waded through the Spring-time mud, back, to their respective homes.

The "Notification" to which reference has been made, that which the Caucus authorized to be sent to the elect, among the Freeholders of the County, was in these words:

"March 28th, 1775.

"SIR:

"A number of gentlemen from different districts in "the county of Westchester having this day met at "the White Plains to Consider of the most proper "method of taking the Sense of the Freeholders, of "the Said County, upon the Expediency of choosing "Deputies to meet the Deputies of the other Coun-"ties, for the purpose of Electing delegates to repre-"sent this Colony in the General Congress to be held "at Philadelphia on the 10th of May next, are of "opinion that the best way of proceeding for that "purpose, will be to have a general Meeting of the "Freeholders of the Said County.

"As this County is very Extensive we take the "liberty of recommending the meeting to be held at "the White Plains on Tuesday the 11th day of April "next at ten o'clock in the forenoon at the Court "House, and therefore do desire you, to give notice "of the Same to all the freeholders in your district, "without exception, as those who do not appear and "vote on that day, will be presumed to acquiesce in "the Sentiment of the majority of those who vote.

"We are &c."[1]

There can be no good reason for supposing that that Caucus failed to employ the best means which it could control, to secure the attendance, at the appointed place, on the appointed day, and at the designated hour, of all those of the farmers of the County of Westchester, whom it supposed to have been friendly to the Morris family, and who were willing or who could be induced to accept the head of that wealthy and aristocratic, but really unpopular, family, as their political leader—to that family, the stake was a very important one; and, to secure that stake, it played desperately. On the other hand, those of the inhabitants of the County who were conservative in their political opinions, and those who were not favorers of the new-born, but selfish, zeal of the Lord of the Manor of Morrisania, were aroused; and, especially in the Borough Town of Westchester, within which the ancestral home of the Morrises was situated, the ambitious purposes of that gentleman and of his family were empathically snubbed, by a Meeting of his townsmen, duly summoned to take into consideration "whether or not they should choose Deputies "to represent them at a Provincial Convention."[2] Besides that local and evidently personal rebuke, by the townsmen of the Morrises, the great body of "the "Freeholders and Inhabitants of the County of West-"chester," or such of them as were "friends of Gov-"ernment and our happy Constitution," was earnestly appealed to, in the circulation of the following stirring Address:

"To the Freeholders and Inhabitants of the County of Westchester.

"NEW-YORK, April 6, 1775.

"You are earnestly desired to attend a general "meeting of the county, to be held at the White "Plains, on Tuesday next, the 11th inst. to give your "votes upon the questions:—

"Whether you are inclined to choose deputies to "meet at the city of New-York, in a Provincial Con-"vention? Or,

"Whether you are determined to abide by the "loyal and judicious measures already taken by your "own worthy representatives in the general assembly "of this province, for a redress of American grievances?

"The consequences that may arise from your ne-"glecting to attend at the White Plains, on Tuesday "next, to declare your sentiments relative to the ap-"pointment of deputies to meet in Provincial Con-"gress, may be very fatal to this county; the friends "of goverment, and our happy constitution, are there-"fore earnestly invited in person, to oppose a measure "so replete with ruin and misery. Remember the "extravagant price we are now obliged to pay for "goods purchased of the merchants, in consequence "of the Non-Importation agreement; and when the "NON-EXPORTATION agreement takes place, we "shall be in the situation of those who were obliged "to make bricks without straw.

"A WHITE OAK."[3]

[1] This narrative of the organization and doings of that notable Caucus, including the copy of the "Notification" which was issued, by its authority, is based on the elaborate paper, signed by "LEWIS MORRIS, "Chairman," which served as the Credentials of those who appeared in the Provincial Convention, as Deputies from Westchester-county, and which is preserved in the Credentials of Delegates, Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution—Volume xxiv., Page 25—in the Office of the Secretary of State, at Albany.

The "Notification," as printed in the text, was copied from the original Manuscript.

[2] "A Correspondent acquaints us, That, on Monday the 3d of March, "the Inhabitants of the Borough of Westchester met, in Consequence of "a Summons, to give their Sentiments upon a Question, whether or not "they would choose Deputies to represent them at a Provincial Conven-"tion in this City; when they declared themselves already very ably "and effectually represented in the General Assembly of this Province, "by Isaac Wilkins, Esquire;* peremptorily disowned all Congressional "Conventions and Committees, most loyally repeating the old Chorus, "God save the King, which was seconded by three hearty Cheers; and "then the jolly Freeholders and Inhabitants spent the Day with great "Hilarity and good Humour over their Tankards and Bowls."—(Gaine's New-York Gazette, and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1226, NEW-YORK, Monday, April 10, 1775.)

[3] This appeal, an exact copy of the original, was printed in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 103, NEW-YORK, Thursday, April 6, 1775.

* The wife of Isaac Wilkins was Isabella Morris, sister of Gouverneur and half-sister of Colonel Lewis Morris, the head of that family.

It is reasonable to suppose that many of the farmers of Westchester-county, whatever their political opinions may have been, were more than usually excited by these extraordinary appeals and by others which have not been preserved, addressed to them by those whom they had hitherto regarded as leaders in political affairs; but it is equally clear that not even those extraordinary means, thus employed, were successful in withdrawing even a respectable minority of the Freeholders, to say nothing of those heads of families who were not Freeholders, who, at that time, inhabited that extensive and thickly settled County, from their homesteads and from the urgent duties, at home, which the opening Spring had imposed upon them. Notwithstanding all the reasons which existed for their continued attention to their respective home duties, however, there were some, relatively a small proportion, of either party, those who were opposed to the Morrises and to the proposition to elect Deputies to a proposed Convention of the Colony and those who favored both, who went to the Plains, on that Tuesday morning, the eleventh of April, as, respectively, they had been requested to go. They went, as farmers were wont to go and as they continue to go, on such occasions, on horseback or on foot, over Westchester-county's Spring-time muddy roads or "across lots," as best suited their individual convenience; and the little Village, what there was of it, scattered along the wide spread Post-road, was undoubtedly, the scene of many a discussion, friendly or unfriendly, as friend met friend or neighbor met neighbor in that ancient thoroughfare, each intent, as farmers only can be intent, on the promotion of the particular cause to which each had become especially devoted. Reasonably enough, the two Taverns which were, then, prominent within the limits of the Village, were made the stopping-places of those rural incomers unto whom no Village householder had extended a Village welcome, Captain Hatfield, the landlord of one of those Taverns, entertaining those who were opposed to the Morrises and to the proposed election of Deputies, while those who favored that family and that proposed election, "put up in another "Public House in the Town," probably that which was kept by Isaac Oakley.[1]

It is evident that neither of the two factions was very punctual in its attendance, at the appointed hour—a practice which is continued to this day, in Westchester-county, on similar occasions—and, for a reason which was perfectly obvious, the promoters of the proposed Meeting, very evidently, were not in a hurry to assume the great responsibility of carrying forward the schemes of the revolutionary faction in the City of New York, to which they had been invited, especially in view of the greater number of those who were opposed to those schemes, and who were present and apparently prepared to oppose them; while those who were opposed to the Morrises and to their schemes and to the proposed election, and whose evidently superior numbers had served to dampen the ardor of their opponents, could do nothing else than to wait, and to watch the progress of events. Notwithstanding the hour of ten had been named in the Notification through which the assembled farmers had thus met, it was nearly noon before any attempt to organize a Meeting was made—probably, some whose presence was desired and expected, had not arrived; probably, those leaders of the movement who were present were, meanwhile, "comparing notes," and arranging plans of action, and enjoying that social glass, frequently renewed, of which their Chairman subsequently made mention, unwittingly; most probably, the superior numbers of those who were known to be opposed to them, whose strength of numbers was being constantly increased, warned the ambitious Lord of the Manor of Morrisania and his adherents that "the "better part of Valor is—Discretion."

About twelve o'clock, however, those who favored the Morrises and the proposed election of Deputies appear to have quietly and noiselessly left the Tavern, passed over the old post-road, and re assembled in the Courthouse; organized a Meeting; and appointed Colonel Lewis Morris, its Chairman. It was done quietly, if it was not done secretly: it was done quietly, without inviting any others than those of their own faction, to assemble with them: it was done quietly and in a manner which clearly indicated that something else than an untrammeled and unbiased expression of the will of all those who were present—carrying with it, also, the assumed acquiescence of all those who were not present—concerning the Morrises and the questions which were propounded in the Notification, was chiefly desired, and must be procured, "by fair means or by foul:" most evidently, it was done, quietly, with an inclination and a hope that it might accomplish all the purposes of [1] Protest of the Inhabitants and Freeholders of Westchester-county, New-York, "COUNTY OF WESTCHESTER, April 13, 1775," published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 105, NEW YORK, Thursday, April 20, 1775; and in Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1227, NEW YORK, Monday, April 17, 1775.

We have been favored by our unwearied friends, Hon. Lewis C. Platt and Hon. J. O. Dykman with information, concerning these two Taverns, which our readers will find worthy of their remembrance.

Captain Hatfield's Tavern stood almost due South from the old Courthouse, and nearly half a mile distant, on the North side of the OLD stage-road to New York,—the line of that road has been changed, since 1775—on property more recently owned by Samuel E. Lyon, Esq., and now by the heirs of the late Alfred Waller, Esq.

The old building has been removed from the place on which it stood, in 1775, to a place, further to the northward, not far from the site of the old Court-house; and is now occupied as a tenement.

Isaac Oakley's Tavern stood on the East side of the old stage-road, directly opposite to the old Court-house. We remember the old house, very distinctly, having often seen it and, more than once, at least forty years ago, having slept under its roof. It is said that it was burned, about 1868; and that the site remains unoccupied.

The old Court-house, the scene of many an adventure during the later Colonial era, occupied the site of the present residence of W. P. Fiero, Esq., on the West side of the stage-road to New York.

those who had originated and promoted it, secretly and rapidly, without alarming those who were assembled at Captain Hatfield's, and before they could be brought to the Courthouse, to defeat those purposes and to relegate the Morrises to that political obscurity in which, very ungraciously, they had so long and so ingloriously rested. It was, in short, nothing else than a political coup-de-main; but, unfortunately for the honor of those who participated in it, it was not as respectably successful as those who had contrived it, had desired.[1]

Intelligence of the movement of their opponents very soon reached those who were assembled at Captain Hatfield's Tavern; and we are told that, undoubtedly with very little delay, they, also, "walked "down to the Courthouse, although not half of their "friends who were expected had yet appeared." At that time, when the full force of all who thus presumed to act, in so vital a question, in the name of all who were, then, in Westchester-county—and that, too, without any delegation of authority and, certainly, without any expressed "consent"—was undoubtedly present and acting, there was not present more than from a hundred to a hundred and twenty-five, Freeholders and others; and there is evidence that quite as large a number, Freeholders and others, walked down to the Courthouse, from Captain Hatfield's Tavern, and stripped all the novelty and all there was of what was said to have been integrity from the exposed and unsuccessful coup-de-main.[2] The individual respectability of none of these, of either faction, appears to have been impeached by any one; but Colonel Morris subsequently attempted to depreciate the political standing of some of those who were not of his supporters, by saying there were among them "many tenants who were not entitled to vote," etc., —they were recognized as respectable farmers, even by that particular Morris who aimed to belittle them; but, in the presence of such as he, with nothing but what he had inherited, to ensure to him even a nominal respectability, they were evidently expected to be no more than dumb dogs, even while their homes and their properties were put in jeopardy and the peace and happiness of their families endangered by the doings of those "better classes," before one of whom they then stood.

It is said that Isaac Wilkins, of the Borough of Westchester, and Colonel Frederic Philipse, of the Manor of Philipsborough, both of them Members of the General Assembly of the Colony, walked at the head of those who moved from the Tavern to the Courthouse, and who interrupted the proceedings of the Meeting; and all agreed that, when the entire number of those new incomers had entered the Courtroom, without indecorously attempting to disturb the Meeting, in the slightest degree, Isaac Wilkins, in behalf of those with whom he had come, "declared that, as they had been unlawfully called "together, and for an unlawful purpose, they did not "intend to contest the matter, by a Poll, which would "be tacitly acknowledging the authority that had "summoned them thither; but that they had come only "with a design to protest against all such disorderly "proceedings, and to shew their detestation of all un-"lawful Committees and Congresses. They then fur-"ther declared their determined resolution to continue "steadfast in their allegiance to their gracious and "merciful Sovereign, King George the Third; to sub-"mit to lawful authority; and to abide by and sup-"port the only true representatives of the People of "this Colony, the General Assembly." They then gave three cheers, and returned to Captain Hatfield's Tavern, "singing, as they went, with a loyal enthusi-"asm, the grand and animating Song of

"'God save great George, our King,
"'Long live our noble King! etc."[3]

After the protestants had thus peacefully left the Courthouse, the Meeting returned to the business for the transaction of which it had been convened and organized; and the question was submitted, by the Chairman, "Whether they would appoint Depu-"ties for this County, to meet the Deputies of the "other Counties, at the City of New York, on the "twentieth of April instant, for the purpose of "electing Delegates to represent this Colony in the "General Congress, to be held at Philadelphia, on

[1] From the fact that the Meeting had been organized and "had already "entered upon the business of the day," before it was known to those who were at Hatfield's Tavern, that any movement toward such an organization had been made—a fact which was openly stated in the Protest of the one faction without having been controverted in the elaborate reply of the Chairman of the Meeting—the secrecy of the movement is established, beyond a question. The motives of those who contrived that particular mode of operations, will be manifest to all who are acquainted with the facts and with the practices of unscrupulous politicians, in Westchester-county as often as elsewhere.

[2] In the narrative which the Chairman of the Meeting prepared, immediately after the adjournment of that Meeting, he stated that "a very "numerous body of the Freeholders of the County assembled at the "Court House;" and that "an inconsiderable number of Persons "(among whom were many tenants not entitled to a vote) with Isaac "Wilkins, Esq., and Col. Philipse at their head, then appeared." In the Protest of the Inhabitants and Freeholders, subsequently published, it is stated, specifically, that when those from Captain Hatfield's Tavern entered the Courthouse, "the numbers on each side seemed to be nearly "equal; and both together might amount to two hundred or, at most, "two hundred and fifty." Nearly a month after the publication of that Protest, and after he had secured the seat in the Continental Congress for which he had so earnestly hankered—his half-brother, Gouverneur, being then an aspirant to a seat in the proposed Provincial Congress, to which he was elected, on the following day—Lewis Morris published an elaborate and very minute reply to that Protest, in which, although nearly every feature of the latter was bitterly controverted, he conveniently said nothing whatever of the number of those, of either faction, who were at the Plains; and, therein, he emphatically acquiesced in what was said, on that subject, with so much precision, in the Protest.

[3] There is very little difference, concerning what occurred in the Courtroom, in the narrative drawn up by Lewis Morris and in that portion of the Protest which relates to that subject; and both are referred to, as authorities, for what has been said, in the text, relative thereto. Concerning what was done, elsewhere, by the protestants, after they had left the Courthouse, the Protest is our sufficient authority.

"the tenth day of May next." By an unanimous vote, it determined to do so; and it then appointed, also without opposition, Colonel Lewis Morris and Doctor Robert Graham—the latter a kinsman of the former—both of Westchester; Stephen Ward, of Eastchester; Colonel James Holmes and Jonathan Platt, of Bedford; John Thomas, Junior, of Rye; and Samuel Drake and Philip Van Cortlandt, both of the Manor of Cortlandt; a majority of whom was authorized to represent the County, and to cast the Vote of the County, in the proposed Convention.[1]

The following Resolutions were, then, submitted to the Meeting; and they were duly adopted, also without a dissenting voice:

"RESOLVED: That the thanks of this body be "given to the virtuous Minority of the General "Assembly of this Province, and particularly to "John Thomas and Pierre Van Cortlandt, Esquires, "two of our Representatives, for their firm attach- "ment to and zeal, on a late occasion for the preser- "vation of the union of the Colonies and the Rights "and Liberties of America; and that this Resolve be "communicated, by the Chairman, to every Gentle- "man of whom that Minority consisted.

"RESOLVED: That the thanks of this country is "due to the Delegates who composed the late Con- "gress, for the essential services they have rendered "to America, in general; and that this Resolve be "forthwith published."

We are told, also, by the Chairman of the Meeting, that, "after the business of the day was thus con- "cluded, the people gave three huzzas for our gra- "cious Sovereign,[2] and dispersed, quickly, without the "least disorder."[3]

Although no action, on that subject, appears to have been taken by the Meeting, its master-spirit and Chairman, in his official capacity, appears to have continued the work for which the Meeting had been convened, completing it before he left the White Plains, by preparing an official narrative of the origin of the Meeting; of the Caucus which had "recom- "mended" it; of its Proceedings, when convened; and of its noisy loyalty to that "gracious Sove- "reign" whose recognized authority it had so boldly assailed. That narrative was duly published; and, at the expense of repeating some matters of which mention has been already made, as an important portion of the historical literature of Westchester-county, a place is made for it, in this work. It was in the following words:

"WHITE PLAINS, IN THE COUNTY OF WESTCHESTER "the 11th day of April 1775.

"On the 28th day of March last, the following "Gentlemen having received letters from the Chair- "man of the Committee of the City and County of "New-York relative to the appointment of Deputies "for this County, met at this place for the purpose of "devising means for taking the Sense of this County "upon the Subject, viz:

"Col. Lewis Morris,	Theodosius Barlow, Esq.,[4]
"Thomas Hunt,	William Sutton, Esq.,
"Abraham Leggot,	Capt. Joseph Drake,
"James Horton, Jr., Esq.,	James Willis,
"Stephen Ward,	Benjamin Drake,
"Abraham Guion, Esq.,	Moses Drake,

"who having taken the Same into consideration, "agreed to send the following notification to the "principal freeholders in the different Towns and "districts in the County, viz—

"'March 28th, 1775.

"'SIR. A number of gentlemen from different dis- "'tricts in the county of Westchester having this "'day met at the White Plains to Consider of the "'most proper method of taking the Sense of the "'Freeholders, of the said County, upon the Expedi- "'ency of choosing Deputies to meet the Deputies of "'the other Counties, for the purpose of Electing

[1] As Jonathan Platt and Colonel Holmes did not accept the appointment, and as only six took their seats in the Convention, the majority which was necessary to cast the vote of the County was reduced to four; and, thus, the control of the Delegation was retained by those who went from Westchester, Eastchester, and Rye.

[2] The practice of all, at that period and subsequently, on all such occasions as that referred to in the text, will sufficiently indicate to the reader, that the enthusiasm for the King which was displayed, as much by one faction as by the other, at the White Plains, on that eventful April day, was due quite as much to what had been drunk at the two Taverns, before either of those factions had gone to the Courthouse, as to the love for the King which either of them really possessed. But the Chairman of the Meeting kindly furnished conclusive evidence on the subject, when he wrote, "much pains, I confess, were, on that day, "taken, to make temporary enthusiasts, and with other more exhilara- "ting spirit than the spirit of loyalty."—(Lewis Morris to the Publick, "MORRISANIA, May 7, 1775.")

Only culprits "confess" a wrong-doing; and with this "confession" of one of the principal offenders, on the occasion referred to, the reader will be enabled to understand how small an amount of genuine patriot- ism there was, in such a crowd, no matter for whom it hurrahed; and how small the price was with which that crowd had been purchased, to further the purposes of either "the friends of the Government" or those of the revolutionary faction—may he not be enabled to understand, also, something more of those who originated and fostered the revolutionary spirit, in the Colonies, and something more of the means which they employed, call them what you may, than those, claiming to be "historians," with a very few really honorable exceptions, have hitherto told to him?

One of the most important political movements in which New York has ever been engaged, was carried through Westchester-county in known opposition to the great body of its inhabitants, and in the face of a formal Protest of a larger number, by only a factional minority, in the interest of an aspiring politician, and while that minority was staggering under the evil influences of the New England Rum which had been freely dispensed, for that particular purpose.

[3] The narrative, signed by "LEWIS MORRIS, Chairman," already referred to, has afforded a sufficient authority, for all that has been said, in the text, concerning the Meeting, after the protestants had left the Courthouse.

[4] Although the name was thus written, in the original manuscript, there can be no doubt that reference was made to Theodosius Bartow, second son of the Rev. John Bartow, the first Rector of the Parish of Westchester. Mr. Bartow subsequently held the comfortable and profitable place of a "Commissary at New Rochelle;" and his son, (subsequently Rector of St. Matthew's Church, at Bedford) held the profitable place of Quarter-master, in the First Westchester-county Regiment.

"'delegates to represent this Colony in the General "'Congress to be held at Philadelphia on the 10th of "'May next, are of opinion that the best way of pro-"'ceeding for that purpose, will be to have a general "'Meeting of the Freeholders of the Said County.

"'As this County is very Extensive we take the lib-"'erty of recommending the meeting to be held at "'the White Plains on Tuesday the 11th day of April "'next at ten o'clock in the forenoon at the Court "'House, and therefore do desire you, to give notice "'of the Same to all the freeholders in your district, "'without exception, as those who do not appear and "'vote on that day, will be presumed to acquiesce "'in the Sentiment of the majority of those who vote.

"'We are, &c.'

"The above notice having been generally given "and distributed, a very numerous body of the Free-"holders of the County assembled at the Court "House at the White Plains, on this day, and chose, "Col. Lewis Morris for their Chairman.

"An inconsiderable number of Persons (among "whom were many tenants not entitled to a vote) with "Isaac Wilkins, Esq., and Col. Philipse at their "head, then appeared, and Mr. Wilkins in their be-"half as he said, declared that they would not join "in the business of the day or have anything to "do with Deputies or congresses, but that they came "there, for the sole purpose of protesting against "such illegal and unconstitutional proceedings, after "which they departed.

"The following Question was then put to the peo-"ple by the chairman, viz:

"'Whether they would appoint Deputies for this "'county, to meet the Deputies of the other counties "'at the city of New York on the 20th of April in-"'stant, for the purpose of electing delegates to re-"'present this colony in the general congress to be "'held at Philadelphia on the 10th day of May "'next.'

"To which Question they unanimously answered that they would.

"They then appointed the following eight persons, "or the majority of them, to be the deputies of this "county, for the purposes aforesaid, viz:

"Col. Lewis Morris, John Thomas, Jr., Esq.,
"Stephen Ward, Jonathan Platt, Esq.,
"Samuel Drake, Esq., Robert Graham, Esq.,
"Col. James Holmes, Major Philip Van Courtlandt.

"The two following Resolves were then unani-"mously Entered into, viz:

"Resolved, that the thanks of this Body be given to "the virtuous minority of the general Assembly of "this Province, and particularly to John Thomas and "Pierre Van Cortlandt, Esqrs., two of our representa-"tives for their firm attachment to and zeal, on a late "occasion for the preservation of the Union of the "Colonies and the rights and liberties of America; "and that this Resolve be communicated by the "chairman, to every gentleman of whom that min-"ority consisted.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this country is due "to the delegates who composed the late congress for "the Essential Services they have rendered to Amer-"ica in general, and that this Resolve be forthwith "published.

"After the business of the day was thus concluded, "the people gave three Huzzas for our gracious "Sovereign and dispersed quickly[1] without the least "disorder.

"LEWIS MORRIS, Chairman."[2]

In the proceedings of the revolutionary faction, after its Meeting was organized, probably because of a consciousness of its own relative weakness within the County, there was an evident attempt to appear, at least, to be fair and honest in whatever was said or done—no personalities or harsh words, of any kind, appear to have been used against those who entered its Meeting, and respectfully protested against the organization and doings and purposes of that Meeting; the County, as such, was not referred to, in either of the two Resolutions which were adopted, the thanks of nothing else than those who were then present and voting having been voted to the minority of the General Assembly, while an obligation then due to the Continental Congress, which rested on the entire country, if that Meeting was not misinformed, was simply recognized by it, without an attempt being made for the liquidation of even its own portion of the debt—it gave its thanks to the minority of the Colonial Assembly; but it had no thanks to spare for the Continental Congress;—no attempt was made, then or afterwards, to exult over the results of the Meeting; the narrative written by the Chairman of the Meeting continued that commendable courtesy; and, the principal purpose of the Meeting, if not its only purpose, the restoration of the Morris family to the political life from which it had been excluded, having been accomplished, the peace of the County, for the present, was not further disturbed; although it is scarcely possible that every one continued, thenceforth, to regard all his neighbors with the same friendly feelings which had bound them together, during the past.

While the Meeting at the Courthouse was thus quietly engaged in the continued discharge of "the "business of the day," those who had protested, before it, against the call for the Meeting as well as against its proposed proceedings, returned to Captain Hatfield's Tavern, where they were joined, during the afternoon, by "many of their friends;" and "they

[1] In some of the re-prints of this paper, this word is called "quietly:" we have preferred to use the word which was used by the author, in the original manuscript.

[2] This is an exact copy of the original manuscript, which was used as the Credentials of the Deputies and has been preserved in the Credentials of Delegates, Volume XXIV., Page 25, Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution, in the Office of the Secretary of State, at Albany.

"proceeded to draw up and sign a Declaration, which "they seemed to do," it is said, "with as much pat- "riotic zeal as ever warmed the hearts of true and "faithful Subjects; and, afterwards, they dispersed to "their different habitations.[1]"

A narrative of the events was subsequently written, probably by Isaac Wilkins, and, with the Declaration affixed, it was printed in the newspapers of the day, where, from that day to this, they have remained, serving as authorities in the history of that period. The narrative and the Declaration are in these words:

"County of Westchester, April 13, 1775.

"MR. RIVINGTON,

"Be pleased to insert the following, and you will "oblige a number of your Friends and Subscribers:

"ON Thursday the 11th inst. a very respectable num- "ber of freeholders and inhabitants of the county "of Westchester, assembled at the White Plains, in "the said County, agreeable to notice given, that "their sentiments might be known concerning the "choice of a committee, to meet other committees in "the city of New-York, for the purpose of choosing "delegates to represent this colony in the next Con- "tinental Congress.

"The friends to order and government met at the "house of Captain Hatfield. Those who were for "a committee, put up at another public house in "the town. About 12 o'clock word was brought to "the gentlemen at Captain Hatfield's that the oppo- "site party had already entered upon the business of "the day. Upon which they immediately walked "down to the Courthouse, although not half of their "friends who were expected, had yet appeared; where "they found the other company collected in a body. "The numbers on each side seemed to be nearly "equal, and both together might amount to 200, or "at most 250. The friends to government then de- "clared, that as they had been unlawfully called to- "gether, and for an unlawful purpose, they did not "intend to contest the matter with them by a poll, "which would be tacitly acknowledging the author- "ity that had summoned them thither; but that they "came only with a design to PROTEST against all "such disorderly proceedings, and to shew their de- "testation of all unlawful committees and con- "gresses. They then declared their determined "resolution to continue stedfast in their allegiance to "their gracious and merciful sovereign King George "the Third—to submit to lawful authority, and to "abide by and support the only true representatives "of the people of this colony, the General Assembly. "Then giving three huzzas, they returned to Captain "Hatfield's, singing as they went, with loyal enthusi- "asm, the good and animating song of,

"'God save great George our King,
"'Long live our noble King, &c.'

"At their return, finding that many of their friends "had arrived during their absence, and that many "still kept coming in, they proceeded to draw up, and "sign the following declaration, which they seemed to "do with as much patriotic zeal, as ever warmed the "hearts of true and faithful subjects, and afterwards "dispersed to their different habitations.

"'WE the subscribers, freeholders and inhabitants "'of the county of Westchester, having assem- "'bled at the White Plains, in consequence of certain "'advertisements, do now declare, that we met here to "'express our honest abhorrence of all unlawful con- "'gresses and committees, and that we are determined "'at the hazard of our lives and properties, to sup- "'port the King and Constitution, and that we ac- "'knowledge no representatives but the General "'Assembly, to whose wisdom and integrity we sub- "'mit the guardianship of our rights and privileges.

"'Frederick Philipse,	Jacob Post,
"'Isaac Wilkins,	Joseph Gidney,
"'Samuel Seabury,	James Baxter,
"'Luke Babcock,	John Hart,
"'Jonathan Fowler, Judge,	Cornelius Losee,
"'Caleb Fowler, Judge,	Jesse Park,
"'Jonathan P. Horton, Esq;	Roger Purdy, jun.
"'William Sutton, Esq.;	Gilbert Pugsley,
"'Daniel Oakly, Esq.;	Abraham Leadeau,
"'Benjamin Fowler, Esq.;	Benjamin Brown,
"'William Davids, Esq.;	Isaac Keed,
"'William Anderson, Esq.;	Aaron Buis,
"'William Barker, Esq.;	Moses Weymen,
"'Capt. Abra. Hatfield, Esq.;	Israel Underhill,
"'Natha Underhill, Mayor,	John Baisley,
"'George Cornwell, Esq.;	David Oakley, jun.
"'Philip Pell, Esq.;	Isaac Smith,
"'Joshua Pell,	John Hyatt,
"'James Pell,	Hezekiah Cudney,
"'Edward Pell,	Abraham Odell,
"'John Hunt,	Thomas Lawrence,
"'Gilbert Horton,	John Seyson,
"'Adrian Leforge,	Jeremiah Travis,
"'Joshua Gidney,	Griffen Corey,
"'Jonathan Gidney,	Isaa Forsheu,
"'Lieut. Jonathan Purdy,	Gabriel Requeaw,
"'Solomon Gidney,	Samuel Webb,
"'Joseph Bude,	Benjamin Downing.
"'James Whetmore,	Gabriel Archer,
"'Moses Williams,	Elias Secord,
"'John Haight,	Thomas Veal,
"'Isaac Brown,	James Pierce,
"'Philip Kelly,	Edward Bugbe,
"'James Hains,	David Haight,
"'Joseph Hains, Jun.	Sylvanus Lyon,
"'James Hains, Jun.	Daniel Haight,
"'Matthew Hains,	John Williams,
"'Bartholomew Hains,	Joseph Purdy,
"'Gilbert Hains,	Ezekiel Halstead,
"'John Hains,	John Hunt, jun.

[1] The Declaration here referred to, forms a portion of the Protest which is published, in full, on this page, below, and on page 73 post., and the reader is referred to it, in that place.

"'Elijah Hains,	Isaac Purdy,
"'Lieut. Solomon Fowler,	Elijah Purdy,
"'Isaac Williams,	Abraham Losee,
"'John M'Collum,	Isaac Tomkins,
"'Joseph Clark,	William Grey,
"'Joseph Oakly,	Nathaniel Merit,
"'Caleb Ferris,	Joseph Palding,
"'Capt. Benjamin Griffen,	Hendricus Storm,
"'Capt. Joshua Purdy,	Francis Secord,
"'James Mott,	John Parker,
"'Lieut. William Laensberry,	Gilbert Hatfield,
"'Lieut. Samuel Purdy,	Gabriel Purdy,
"'John Ruflin,	Alexander Haines,
"'Nathan Osborn,	Benjamin Ogden,
"'Philemon Halstead,	Thomas Meritt,
"'Daniel Purdy,	Gilbert Bates,
"'John Crab,	John Gidney,
"'Izariah Whetmore,	Stephen Arnode,
"'Capt. Absolom Gidney,	Israel Secord,
"'David Haight,	John Arnode,
"'John Brown,	David Purdy,
"'Jasper Stivers,	David Belcher,
"'Peter M'Farthing,	Jordan Downing,
"'Joshua Purdy, jun.	Levi Devoe,
"'Haccaliah Purdy, jun.	Abraham Acker,
"'James Tomkins,	Corn. Van Tassell,
"'Michael Chatterton,	Elisha Merit,
"'Elnathan Taylor,	Jacob Schureman,
"'Gilbert Theal,	Joseph Appleby,
"'William Saxen,	John Tomkins, jun.
"'Thomas Champenirs,	Job Hadden, jun.
"'John Champenirs,	Patrick Carey,
"'William Griffin,	James Hart,
"'Isaac Gidney,	Gilbert Ward,
"'John Bates,	Monmouth Hart,
"'Joseph Haviland,	William Dunlap,
"'Eleazer Hart,	Joshua Ferris,
"'Timothy Whetmore,	Timothy Purdy,
"'James Hunt,	James Maguire,
"'Joseph Parker,	James Regnaw,
"'Joshua Barns,	Daniel Shadin,
"'Joseph Purdy,	Samuel Purdy,
"'John Park,	Sylvanus Purdy,
"'Samuel Purdy,	William Dalton,
"'Gilbert Purdy,	David Davids,
"'James Chatterton,	Elijah Purdy, jun.
"'John Dusenburgh,	Elijah Tomkins,
"'Thomas Cromwell,	Daniel Jerow,
"'Solomon Horton,	Charles Lawrence,
"'Peter Busing,	Joseph Purdy, jun.
"'Peter Busing, jun.	James Sniffen, jun.
"'James Kniffen,	Thomas Valentine,
"'Nathaniel Underhill, jun.	Gilbert Valentine,
"'Philip Fowler,	Abraham Rich,
"'John M'Farthing,	Andrew Gerow,
"'John Tomkins,	Gilbert Hunter,
"'Joseph Hart,	Lieut. Peter Bonet,
"'Samuel Sneden,	Isaac Merit,
"'Peter Fashee,	Edward Merit,
"'Jesse Lawrence,	John Gale,
"'William Sneden,	John Smith,
"'Lieut. Daniel Knap,	Roger Purdy,
"'Solomon Dean,	James Hart, jun.
"'Charles Vincent, sen.	Jonathan Purdy, jun.
"'Lieut. Thomas Hyat,	Monmouth Hart, jun.
"'James Gidney,	Christopher Purdy,
"'William Woodward,	Gabriel Purdy,
"'Jonathan Budd,	Edward Merit, jun.
"'John Whetmore,	Elijah Miller,
"'William Underhill,	Henry Disborough,
"'Thomas Brown,	Benjamin Hunt,
"'Lieut. Isaac Gidney,	Elnathan Hunt,
"'Nehemiah Tomkins,	William Van Wart,
"'Henry Leforge,	Abraham Storm,
"'Evert Brown,	Thomas Berry,
"'Benjamin Beyea,	Lancaster Underhill,
"'Bartholomew Gidney,	Charles Merit,
"'Josiah Brown,	Benjamin Underhill,
"'Seth Purdy,	Benjamin Griffin, jun.
"'Peter Huggeford,	Jeremiah Coon,
"'Jacob Gidney,	John Hall,
"'John Loce,	James Angevine,
"'Elnathan Appleby,	Jacob Coon,
"'John Baker,	Jeremiah Anderson, jun.
"'Jonathan Underhill,	Gilbert Williams,
"'James M'Chain,	William Barker, jun.
"'Benjamin Seacord,	Gideon Arden,
"'Joshua Hunt,	William Field,
"'Betts Chatterdon,	Joseph Purdy,
"'William Landrine,	George Storm,
"'Enoch Hunt,	Jacob Vermiller,
"'Peter Corne,	Samuel Heusted,
"'Dennis Kennedy,	Bartow Underhill,
"'James Hains,	Lieut. John Warner,
"'Andrew Bainton,	Nathaniel Purdy,
"'Hezekiah Simmons,	Isaac Bennet,
"'Nathaniel Tomkins,	Samuel Baker,
"'Caleb Archer,	John Cornwell,
"'Benjamin Bugbee,	John Storm,
"'Francis Purdy,	Andrew Fowler,
"'William Odell,	Joshua Secord,
"'Israel Hunt,	George French,
"'Thomas Tomkins,	John Underhill,
"'Frederick Underhill,	Caleb Gidney,
"'Peter Post,	William Underhill, jun.
"'Benjamin M'Cord,	James Hill,
"'John Williams,	William Watkins,
"'John Ackerman,	John Rustin,
"'Peter Rusting,	Richard Baker,
"'Thomas Barker,	William Ascough,
"'Jeremiah Hunter	Bishop Heustice,
"'Abraham Storm,	James Miller,
"'Peter Jenning,	Phineas Hunt,'

"The following persons, not being able to attend at "the Plains, requested by their Friends that their "names might be added to the list of protestors, viz.:

"John Hunt, Esq.,	Jeremiah Hitchcock,
"Philip Palmer, Esq.,	William Bond,
"John Hitchcock,	Joseph Bond.

"The foregoing account is strictly true, as can be "proven by the testimony (or if necessary by the affi-

"davits) of a number of persons, of the most unques-
"tionable character in this county. What then must
"we think of such persons as have propagated a report,
"that the friends of government were upon this occa"sion out-numbered 5 to 1, and that many of the "persons whose names were subscribed to the fore-
"going Declaration, were not on that day present at "the White Plains? They must be conscious to "themselves, that they have spread abroad a falsehood,
"and they are hereby called upon if they dare to set
"their names to those assertions.

"In what manner those Gentlemen who chose the "Committee at the Plains proceeded, we cannot posi"tively say: But this we can declare with truth, that
"we do not believe they can produce to the public
"the names of an hundred and fifty persons who "voted for a Committee that day, and we are verily
"persuaded that they did their utmost to make their "party as numerous as possible. How then can they "justify their choice of a Committee? Or how can "they presume to impose upon the world, and to
"insult the loyal county of Westchester, in so bare-
"faced a manner?

"It is well-known here, that two-thirds at least of "the inhabitants of this county, are friends to order
"and government, and opposed to Committees and all
"unlawful combinations[1]; and it will be made ap"parent to the world, that they are so, as soon as "certain resolves now signing freely by the people,
"shall be ready for publication.—And one principal
"reason why the friends to government did not assem-
"ble in greater numbers than they did on Tuesday
"last, was, that many of them had already, by sign"ing those resolves, testified their loyalty to the "King, their attachment to the constitution, their "enmity to Committees, and their acquiescence in the "prudent measures taken by their Assembly in the "late session, for accommodating the unhappy differ"ences between the mother country and the colonies;
"and consequently thought they had already done
"their duty.[2]

"The Committee that was chosen, may, with some "kind of propriety, be said to represent those partic"ular persons who chose them: But how they can "be denominated the representatives of the County
"of Westchester, who in general abhor Committees
"and Committee-men; and are determined to take
"no steps that may have the least tendency to lead
"them into Rebellion, we cannot conceive. Certainly "the friends to government who were collected at
"Captain Hatfield's, had a better right, from their "number, to determine that there should be no Com"mittee, than the opposite party had to appoint one,
"and might with much greater propriety be said to
"shew the sense of the county, than the few who "acted without authority, and in direct opposition to "government, and to the determinations of our worthy "Assembly. And we doubt not but the impartial "public will consider the matter in this light, and
"not esteem the act of a few individuals, unlawfully
"assembled, as the act (which it most assuredly is "not) of the very respectable, populous and loyal coun-
"ty of WESTCHESTER."[3]

The promoters of the Meeting were evidently only a minority of those present, at the Courthouse, on that memorable eleventh of April; and it is equally evident that if those who were opposed to them had pursued a different line of conduct and had joined issue with them, on the main question, the weight of the County would have been emphatically cast on the side of the conservatives, and in opposition to the election of Delegates to the proposed Convention. But the majority, very correctly, considered that were it to assert its undoubted power, within the Meeting, and to participate in the proceedings of that Meeting, no matter for what pupose, it would be a tacit acknowledgment of the authority to do so, of those who had called the Meeting; and it confined itself, therefore, to simply protesting against the entire proceedings, as disorderly and revolutionary, without appearing to have remembered that political revolutions never move backward, voluntarily; and that there was not the slightest reason for supposing that, in that particular instance, in the absence of all restraint, there would be an exception to that general law. Whether the majority, in that instance, acted wisely or unwisely, is a question which the reader must determine for himself: it is not, in the slightest degree, probable, however, that the great movement which was then in progress, and which ended only in the entire separation of the thirteen Colonies from the Mother Country, was either assisted or obstructed, in the slightest degree, by that peculiar opposition, from the conservative yeomanry of Westchester-county.

The Provincial Convention duly assembled at the Exchange, in the City of New York, on the twentieth of April, 1775, the Counties of New York, Albany, Ulster, Orange, Westchester, Duchess, Kings, Suffolk, and two Towns in Queens, being, more or less, represented by Delegates—of the Delegation which had

[1] Vide pages 40, 42, ante.

[2] The "RESOLVES," referred to in the text, are undoubtedly those which were re-produced on page 43, ante. They originated in Duchess-county, which, at that time, extended, southward, to Westchester-county; and it is understood that they were widely circulated throughout the former County, and, to a considerable extent, throughout Westchester-county.

[3] This very important paper was published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 105, NEW-YORK, Thursday, April 20, 1775, and, in Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1227, NEW-YORK, Monday, April 17th, 1775.

The entire paper, including the signatures, as they appear in the text, was very carefully copied from the original publication, in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, already referred to.

Those who are familiar with the history of Westchester-county will recognize, among the signers to this Protest, members of a great number of the leading families of that ancient County.

been elected by the Meeting at the White Plains, all were present, except Colonel James Holmes and Jonathan Platt.

After spending nearly two days in the adjustment of its, sometimes, very questionable membership,[1] Isaac Low and John Haring, who had been members of the preceding Congress, having declined re-elections, the Convention adopted a Resolution re-electing Philip Livingston, James Duane, John Jay, and John Alsop, all of the City of New York; Simon Boerum, of Kings-county; William Floyd, of Suffolk; and Henry Wisner, of Orange-county; all of whom had been Members of that Congress; and added to them, Colonel Philip Schuyler, of Albany-county; George Clinton, of Ulster-county; Colonel Lewis Morris, of Westchester-county; Robert R. Livingston, Junior, of Duchess county; and Francis Lewis, of the City of New York; as Delegates from the Colony of New York to the second Congress of the Continent; and, on Saturday, the twenty-second of April, after the Credentials of the Delegates-elect had been signed by every member of the Convention,[2] that body having been called for the single purpose of electing Delegates to the Congress, it was adjourned, sine die.[3]

The movement of the Royal troops from Boston to Concord; the reckless slaughter of unresisting Colonists who had assembled on the Green, at Lexington, and of those who were retiring from that place;[4] the destruction of the Provincial stores, at Concord; the collision of the raiders with the excited Colonists, while on their retreat, from Concord to Boston; the disastrous result of that retreat; the intense excitement into which the entire Continent was consequently plunged; the entire disregard of the Royal authority, in the City of New York, which immediately followed; the temporary fortification of the pass, at Kingsbridge; and the control, within the City, which the Committee of Inspection necessarily assumed, are, all of them, matters of history, known to all intelligent persons, and need not be repeated, in this place.

The intelligence of that commencement of military operations, in the field, was received in the City of New York, on Sunday, the twenty-third of April;[5] and, at a Meeting of the Committee of Inspection, on the following Wednesday, that body, among other proceedings, resolved that "this Committee is further "unanimously of opinion, that, at the present alarming juncture, it is highly advisable that a Provincial "Congress be immediately summoned; and that it be "recommended to the Freeholders and Freemen of "this City and County, to choose, at the same time "that they vote for the new Committee aforesaid,[6] "twenty Deputies to represent them at the said Con"gress; and that a Letter be forthwith prepared and "despatched to all the Counties, requesting them to "unite with us in forming a Provincial Congress, and "to appoint their Deputies without delay, to meet at "New York, on Monday, the twenty-second of May "next."[7]

[1] Among the very paltry Credentials which were generally presented by those who aspired to seats in that Convention, those which were presented by Robert R. Livingston, Junior, Egbert Benson, and Morris Graham—the latter a kinsman of the Morrises of Morrisania—were decidedly the shabbiest. Through them, however, a Livingston and a Benson crept into place and authority.

[2] The peculiar words with which those Credentials closed, very clearly indicate the political status of the Colony, at the date of that Convention. They were these . . . "were unanimously elected Delegates to represent "this Colony at such Congress, with full power to them or any five of "them, to meet the Delegates from the other Colonies and to concert "and determine upon such measures as shall be judged most effectual "for the preservation and re-establishment of American Rights and "Privileges, and for the restoration of harmony between Great Britain "and the Colonies."—(Journal of the Convention, "Die Sabatti, 11 hora "a. m. April, 22nd, 1775.")

[3] The Journal of this, the first, Provincial Convention of the Colony, was "printed in pursuance of a Resolution of the Legislature," in 1842; and it has been our authority, in whatever has been stated, in the text, concerning that body.

See, also, deLanceys' Notes to Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 486, 487; Pitkin's History of the United States, i., 325; Hildreth's History of the United States, First Series, iii., 72; etc.

Judge Jones, (History of New York, i., 38, 39,) strangely supposed the Members to the Congress were elected by the several Counties—those from the City of New York, at that promiscuous mass Meeting, at the Exchange, of which an account has been already presented. Bancroft, with all the authorities before him. (History of the United States, original edition, vi., 283; the same, centenary edition, iv., 513,) made all "the ru"ral Counties," without exception, "co-operate with the City," in electing the Deputies, although Richmond, all of Queens except two Towns, Tyron, Cumberland and Charlotte-counties, made no pretension so send Deputies. He said, also, that all the members of the former Congress, "except the luke-warm Isaac Low," were re-elected: both Isaac Low and John Haring, both of them members of that Congress, declined re-elections, notwithstanding the Convention desired to return them. Lossing, (Field-Book of the Revolution,) appears to have regarded the action of New York, concerning the second Congress, as too insignificant to be worthy of even a passing allusion.

[4] Notwithstanding the unaccountable display of armed men, on the Green, no attempt whatever was made, by any of them, to oppose the march of the Royal Troops; and when they were ordered to disperse, they did disperse, all of them seeking safety in running away, as fast as they could go. While they were thus running away, the Royal troops opened a fire on them, with the result which is known to the world. It is positively and authoritatively stated, that, with the exception, the only exception, of one, who, when "he was at some "distance"—out of harm's way—turned and "gave them the guts "of his gun," not a single gun was fired by the Colonists. Those curious to learn more on that subject—that "Battle" in which one of the parties did ALL the firing, and the other all the RUNNING—may find the testimony in Dawson's Battles of the United States by Sea and Land, Article "LEXINGTON AND CONCORD;" Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, ii., 489–501; etc.

[5] The most graphic account of the proceedings, in the City of New-York, on that memorable Sunday, as far as we have knowledge of the subject, is that presented by Judge Jones, in his History of New York during the Revolutionary War, (i., 39–41.)

[6] The Committee of Inspection had recommended the dissolution of that Committee, because it was invested with powers respecting only the "Association" of the Continental Congress; and it had also recommended the election of a new Committee of one hundred persons, thirty-three of whom should be a quorum, all of whom should retire and the Committee be "dissolved within a fortnight next after the end of the "next Session of the Continental Congress."

The "Committee of One hundred," which was thus called, subsequently became the local Committee of the Revolutionary element, in the City of New York, and well known to every student of the history of that period.

[7] Minutes of the Committee of Inspection, "Wednesday, April 26, "1775."

Inasmuch as the City and, to a considerable extent, the Colony were practically in a state of anarchy, the Colonial Government being confessedly unable to do anything, even for the maintenance of a shadow of its official dignity and authority,[1] the calmness and ability with which the Committee controlled the excitable masses, within the City—those who had been schooled, for many years, in acts of lawless violence and destruction, and whose organization and leadership had not been disturbed,—were peculiarly noteworthy and entitled to the highest praise; and, under the circumstances which then existed, which clearly indicated that the Colonial General Assembly would not re-assemble on the third of May, to which day it had adjourned, there was an existing necessity that some other body, possessing a general influence, should be assembled, in its stead, for the control of the excited revolutionary elements, if not to lead them; and the call for a Provincial Congress, thus published, was, therefore, under the existing circumstances, both prudent and praiseworthy.

It is proper, however, that notice should be taken, in this connection, of the fact that, during the entire period preceding the publication of that call for a Provincial Congress, there had been a wholesome fear, among all classes, unless the most radical and reckless, that such a body, called and organized without warrant in law and liable to become controlled by those who would be inclined to resort to the most violent measures, notwithstanding the pretensions and professions of those who promoted the call for such a body, would soon become more oppressive than the Colonial Government, administered agreeably to law, by the legally constituted officers, had ever been or could thenceforth become. They referred, especially, in support of their fears, to the Colony of South Carolina, where such a Congress had superseded the Colonial Legislature; and they called attention to the fact that, there, the entire machinery of the Colonial Government had been stopped; the Courts had been closed; and decrees of the most oppressive character had been enacted; and these, not by the Colonial Government nor by those who were peculiarly supporters of the authority of the King, but by those who had assumed to lead the popular movement, who had utilized the project of a Provincial Convention or Congress as a more powerful instrumentality for the acquirement of authority which they had not previously possessed, for the establishment of systems of government which were neither practical nor useful, and for the gratification of malice and revenge, between individuals and communities, all of them done, too, in the name of "Liberty" and the "Rights of the "Colonies," with violent denunciations of tyranny and official oppression, per se, and with solemn appeals to Heaven, as guaranties of the self-assumed righteousness and of the good intentions of the self-constituted and lawless oppressors.[2] Reference was also made to other instances, in other Colonies, in which the revolutionary elements, regardless of all law, human or divine, and governed only by their own unbridled wills and for their own individual purposes, had become more oppressive than those Colonial Governments had been, against whom the full force of the revolutionary opposition had been so noisily hurled; and it was peculiarly noticeable, in the greater number, if not in all, such instances, that the most violent and lawless of those who were most reckless of the rights of individuals, were those demagogues who, previously to the uprising, had been most unmindful of the complaints of the masses—those of the "poor reptiles" of their estimates—and most sycophantic in their zeal for the promotion of the pretensions of the Colonial and Home Governments.

That serious distrust, among thoughtful men, to

[2] Judge Jones, who was on the Bench of the Supreme Court of the Colony, said that a meeting of His Majesty's Council was held at Lieutenant-governor Colden's house, on the afternoon of that Sunday which has been made memorable, in history; and that the Judges of the Supreme Court of the Colony, the Attorney-general of the Colony, the Mayor and Recorder of the City, and the Field-officers of the City Militia, were present, on invitation. "The Governor desired their advice in the "then critical situation of affairs. Several things were mentioned, pro-"posed, agitated, and talked of, but to little purpose. A Judge of the "Supreme Court," [Thomas Jones, who wrote this statement,] "then "present, boldly proposed that the Militia should be called out, the "Riot Act read, and if the mob did not thereupon disperse, to apprehend "and imprison the ringleaders, and by such coercive means to secure "the peace of the City. This proposal was instantly opposed by William "Smith, one of his Majesty's Council, who openly declared 'that the "'ferment which then raged in the City was general and not confined to "'a few; that it was owing to a design in the British Ministry to en-"'slave the Colonies, and to carry such design into execution by dint of "'a military force; that the Battle of Lexington was looked upon as "'a prelude to such intention; and that the spirit then prevailing in "'the Town (which he represented as universal) would subside as soon "'as the grievances of the people were redressed; and advised to let "'the populace act as they pleased'—Nobody replied, the times were "critical, a declaration of one's sentiments might be dangerous, the "Council broke up, and nothing was done."—(History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i. 41.)

[1] The Provincial Congress of South Carolina assembled at Charleston, on Wednesday, the eleventh of January, 1775, and adjourned on Tuesday, the seventeenth of the same month. Besides approving the doings of the Continental Congress, it forbade the commencement of any Action for Debt, and the prosecution of any such Action as had been commenced since the preceding September, unless with the consent of the Committee of the Parish in which the Defendant resided; "that "Seizures and Sales upon Mortgages should be considered on the same "footing as Actions for Debts;" "that no Summons should be issued "by any Magistrate, in small and mean Causes, without the like con-"sent of the Parish Committee;" that "compensation should be made "by those who raise articles which may be exported" [which, agreeably to the Association of the Continental Congress, was only Rice] "to those "who cannot raise such articles, for the losses which they may sustain "by not exporting the commodities they raise," "that if the Exportation "of Rice should be continued" [under the exception, in its favor, which the Continental Congress had made] "one-third of the Rice made in the "Colony should be deposited in the hands of Committees" appointed to receive it, for the public use, at prices named by the Congress, and payable in the paper currency of the Colony, which was depreciated to seven for one of specie; and other decrees of the most oppressive characters.

Descriptions of that Provincial Congress and of its remarkable methods and still more remarkable doings, may be seen in Ramsay's History of the Revolution in South Carolina, i., 23–25; Drayton's Memoirs of the American Revolution as relating to South Carolina, i., 166–180; etc.

See, also, Journal of the Congress, re-printed in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, i., 1109–1118.

which reference has been made in connection with the call for a Provincial Congress, was greatly strengthened, immediately after the receipt of the intelligence of the military expedition to Concord, and in the midst of the intense excitement which then prevailed throughout the City, by the inroad into the County of Westchester and the City of New York, of a large number of men, from Connecticut, who had come on their own motion, unsolicited by any one in New York or elsewhere; without the slightest authority from the Government of their own Colony; and, evidently, bent on nothing else than to be present to share in the distribution of the booty which an evidently expected general overturning of the homes and the business-offices and warehouses of that City would have placed within their reach. They lived, on their way through Westchester-county as well as while they were within the City, entirely on their wits and on the products of their wits, professing to have come only "with a view of aiding and assisting "us in preparing for our defense;" but their reckless arrogance and audacity, in their assumption of authority in local affairs as well as in other matters, in which they were evidently sustained by some of the more desperate of the leaders of the revolutionary faction, in the City of New York, which were made matters of record, had they not been only earlier specimens of the peculiarly "New England ideas" which, subsequently, became so common and so well known, would have been regarded, by those of later periods, as unaccountable, if not impossible.[1] Thoughtful men, therefore, had abundant reason for reflection; and men of property needed to provide for the security of their possessions; and peaceful men and heads of families did well, when they sought shelter in distant parts of the country, while there were so many and such portentous warnings of the ills which were so evidently and so rapidly approaching.

The excitement and bitterness of factional strife, not always of a purely political character, with which the City of New York had been unceasingly afflicted, during several years preceding the period now under consideration, had tended to the serious disturbance of the individual and social relations of many of those who lived in that City; and the political annals of that period afford ample testimony to the fact that terrorism, there, one of the reasonable results of the existing excitement, was prevalent, audacious, and unchecked by those in authority. The County of Westchester, in her rural contentment, as has been seen in other portions of this narrative, had continued, during the entire period of that earlier revolutionary era, in the City of New York, to enjoy peace and good-will among her inhabitants; but the Meeting at the White Plains, on the eleventh of April, and the military Expedition to Concord, on the nineteenth of that month, with their respective trains of discord and malevolence, appear to have rapidly disturbed that quiet and neighborly feeling which had previously prevailed, and to have originated that reign of terror, throughout that County, which, subsequently, distinguished it so highly in the annals of partisan strife. History has recorded two notable instances of that rapidly developed, so called, "public opinion," among the new-born and, consequently, unnaturally zealous "fire-eaters" of that ancient and orderly County; and they may properly find attention, at this time, not only as portions of the history of Westchester-county, during the era of the American Revolution, but as instances of the dangers which attend an unchecked zeal, even when exercised in behalf of what may be regarded as purely commendable purposes.

The first of these acts of terrorism, exercised by the rampant revolutionary elements in Westchester-county, was that in the case of Jonathan Fowler and George Cornwell, two respectable residents of the County, both of whom had signed the Declaration and Protest, at the White Plains, on the eleventh of April, as well as the Resolves which were referred to, in that Declaration and Protest, both of whom were compelled by that, so called, "public opinion," to publish a recantation of their evidently well-considered political opinions, which was done in the following words, carefully copied from the original publication, in Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1229, NEW-YORK, Monday, May 1, 1775:

"TO THE PRINTER.

"WE the subscribers do hereby make this public Declaration, That whereas we "and several others in Westchester-County, having "signed a certain Number of Resolves, which at the "Time of our said signing, we deemed Constitutional, "and as having a Tendency to promote the Interest "of our Country; but since, upon mature Deliberation, and more full Knowledge of the Matter, find "not only injurious to our present Cause, but likewise offensive to our Fellow Colonists. We do "therefore thus publicly testify our Abhorrence of "the same, and declare ourselves Friends to the Colonies, and ever ready cheerfully to exert ourselves "in the Defence and Preservation of the same.

"JONATHAN FOWLER, Esq.
"GEORGE CORNWELL, Esq.

"29th April, 1775."

As both the signers of that recantation were evidently intelligent men, one of them having been, at that time, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas of the County, it is not probable that they had signed those Resolves—no mention having been made of the Declaration and Protest—without having understood the effect of their action on "the common cause;"

[1] Proceedings of the Committee of One hundred, Adjourned Meeting, May 3, 1775; Leake's Memoir of General John Lamb, 103; etc.

and the offence which they had given to their neighbors, or to such of them as could inflict injury on them or on their property, was clearly the cause which produced their recantation.

The second of those acts of terrorism, to which reference has been made, was that in the case of Isaac Wilkins, that leading Member of the General Assembly of the Colony, in its contest with the Home Government; that very able "A. W. FARMER" who, with his pen, had aroused so much indignation; and that spokesman of the protestants, at the Meeting at the White Plains, with whom the reader is well acquainted. That gentleman, in order to secure his personal safety, was compelled to abandon his home and family, and to take refuge in England. On the eve of his departure, while he was in the City of New York, he wrote the following touching address to his countrymen, which has been carefully copied from Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 108, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 11, 1775:

"MY COUNTRYMEN:

"Before I leave America, the land I love, and in "which is contained everything that is valuable and "dear to me, my wife, my children, my friends, and "property; permit me to make a short and faithful "declaration, which I am induced to do neither "through fear, nor a consciousness of having acted "wrong. An honest man, and a Christian, hath noth-"ing to apprehend from this world. God is my judge, "and God is my witness, that all I have done, written, "or said, in relation to the present unnatural dispute "between Great Britain and her Colonies, proceeded "from an honest intention of serving my country. "Her welfare and prosperity were the objects towards "which all my endeavours have been directed. They "are still the sacred objects which I shall ever stead-"ily and invariably keep in view: And when in "England, all the influence that so inconsiderable "a man as I am, can have, shall be exerted in her "behalf.

"It has been my constant maxim through life, to "do my duty conscientiously, and to trust the issue of "my actions to the Almighty.—May that God in "whose hands are all events, speedily restore peace "and liberty to my unhappy country. May Great-"Britain and America be soon united in the bands of "everlasting amity: and when united, may they con-"tinue a free, a virtuous, and happy nation to the "end of time.

"I leave America, and every endearing connection, "because I will not raise my hand against my Sover-"eign,—nor will I draw my sword against my Coun-"try; when I can conscientiously draw it in her "favour, my life shall be chearfully devoted to her "service.

"ISAAC WILKINS.

"NEW YORK,
"May 3, 1775."

While these unwelcome features of the political movements, in Westchester-county, were extending over the entire community, Lewis Morris was busily employed, after his seat in the forthcoming Congress of the Colonies had been secured beyond a peradventure, in an attempt to belittle the Declaration and Protest of those, at the White Plains, who had objected to the proceedings of the Meeting of which he was, there, the manager and Chairman. For that purpose, on the seventh of May, he prepared an elaborate reply, which, a few days afterwards, with some other historical material, he gave to the newspapers, for publication. As an important portion of the local literature of Westchester-county, of that period, it may properly find a place in this work. The following is a carefully prepared copy of it:

"To the PUBLIC.

"A Very extraordinary paper, called a protest against the proceedings of the Freeholders "of the county of West-Chester, relative to the elec-"tion of deputies for the late Convention, and said to "have been subscribed by the several persons whose "names are printed with it, was published in Mess. "Rivington and Gaine's Gazetteers, a few weeks "ago.

"By whom this performance was given to the pub-"lic, is uncertain, and being as little distinguished by "decency as by truth, there is reason to suspect, the "author's name will remain a secret.

"The falsities contained in this representation, are "too flagrant to impose upon any person in this col-"ony, and nothing but the apprehension of its gain-"ing credit in other parts of the world, would have "induced me to have made it the subject of ani-"madversion.

"I shall pass over the many little embellishments "with which the author's fancy has endeavoured to "decorate his narrative; nor is it necessary to call in "question the reality of that loyal enthusiasm, by "which it was said these good people were influenced; "and I really wish it had been the fact, because when "inconsistencies and fooleries result from inebriety or "enthusiasm, they merit our pity, and escape indig-"nation and resentment.

"Much pains, I confess, were on that day taken to "make temporary enthusiasts, and with other more "exhilirating spirit, than the spirit of loyalty.

"To give the appearance of dignity to these curious "and very orderly protestors, the author has been "very mindful to annex every man's addition to his "name, upon a presumption perhaps that it would "derive weight from the title of Mayor, Esquire, Cap-"tain, Lieutenant, Judge, &c.

"But it is not easy to conceive why the publisher "should be less civil to the Clergy than to the gentry "and commonalty, Samuel Seabury and Luke Babcock, "certainly ought not to have been sent into the world "floating on a news paper in that plain way,—the

"one is the REVEREND Mr. Samuel Seabury, Rector of "the united parishes of East and West-Chester, and one "of the Missionaries for propagating the GOSPEL, and "not POLITICKS, in foreign parts, &c., &c., the other is "the Reverend Mr. Luke Babcock, who preaches and "prays for Col. Philips and his tenants at Philipsburg.

"In this formidable catalogue of 312 sober and loyal "protestors, there are not less than one hundred and "seventy, who after a most diligent enquiry, I cannot "find have the least pretensions to a vote, and indeed "many of them are lads under age. Their names are "as follows:

"'Samuel Seabury,	Timothy Purdy,
"'Luke Babcock,	James M'Guire,
"'Benjamin Fowler, Esq.	James Regnaw,
"'Joshua Pell,	Samuel Purdy,
"'Edward Pell,	Sylvanus Purdy,
"'John Hunt,	William Dalton,
"'Gilbert Horton,	Elijah Tomkins,
"'Adrian Leforge,	Charles Lawrence,
"'Moses Williams,	Joshua Purdy, junr.
"'Philip Kelley,	James Sniffen, junr.
"'James Hains, jun.	Peter Bonet,
"'Matthew Hains,	Peter Fashee,
"'Bartholomew Hains,	Jesse Lawrence,
"'John Hains,	William Sniden,
"'Elijah Hains,	Solomon Dean,
"'Joseph Clark,	Thomas Hiat,
"'Joseph Oakly,	William Woodward,
"'James Mott,	John Whitmore,
"'Daniel Purdy,	William Underhill,
"'John Crab,	Nehemiah Tomkins,
"'Izariah Whitmore,	Henry Leforge,
"'Absalom Gidney,	Evert Brown,
"'John Brown,	Benjamin Beyea,
"'Jasper Stivers,	John Lorce,
"'Peter M'Farthing,	Elnathan Appleby,
"'Joshua Purdy, jun.	John Baker,
"'Haccaliah Purdy, jun.	Jonathan Underhill,
"'James Tomkins,	James M'Chain,
"'Gilbert Thial,	Joshua Hunt,
"'William Sexen,	Bates Chatterdon,
"'Thomas Champeniers,	William Londrine,
"'John Champeniers,	Dennis Kennedy,
"'Eliazer Hart,	James Hains,
"'James Hunt,	Andrew Bainton,
"'Joshua Parker,	Nathaniel Tomkins,
"'Joshua Barnes,	Caleb Archer,
"'John Park,	Benjamin Bugbe,
"'Samuel Purdy,	Francis Purdy,
"'Gilbert Purdy,	William Odell,
"'James Chatterton,	Israel Hunt,
"'Thomas Cromwell,	Thomas Tomkins,
"'Solomon Horton,	Frederick Underhill,
"'Nathaniel Underhill, jun.	Peter Post,
"'Philip Fowler,	Benjamin M'Cord,
"'John M'Farthing,	John Williams,
"'Jacob Post,	John Ackeman,
"'James Baxter,	Peter Rusting,
"'John Hart,	Jeremiah Hunter,
"'Cornelius Losee,	Abraham Storm,
"'Jesse Park,	Peter Jenning,
"'Roger Purdy, jun.	John Gale,
"'Gilbert Pugsley,	John Smith,
"'Abraham Lediau,	James Hart, junr.
"'Benjamin Brown,	Jonathan Purdy, junr.
"'Aaron Buis,	Monmouth Hart, junr.
"'John Baizley,	Christopher Purdy,
"'David Oakley, jun.	Gabriel Purdy,
"'Isaac Smith,	Edward Merrit, junr.
"'John Hyatt,	Henry Disborough,
"'Abraham Odell,	William Van Wart,
"'Thomas Lawrence,	Abraham Storm,
"'John Seyson,	Thomas Berry,
"'Isaac Forsheu,	Charles Merit,
"'Gabriel Requeaw,	Benjamin Griffen,
"'Gabriel Archer,	James Angevine,
"'Elias Secord,	Jeremiah Anderson, junr.
"'James Peirce,	William Barker, junr.
"'Edward Bugbe,	Gideon Arden,
"'Daniel Haight,	Joshua Purdy,
"'John Hunt, junr.	George Storm,
"'Abraham Losee,	Jacob Vermiller,
"'Isaac Tomkins,	Samuel Heusted,
"'Joseph Paulding,	John Warner,
"'Hendricus Storm,	John Storm,
"'Francis Secord,	Joshua Secord,
"'John Parker,	John Underhill,
"'Gilbert Bates,	William Underhill, junr.
"'David Purdy,	James Hill,
"'David Bleecker,	William Watkins,
"'Jordan Downing,	Richard Baker,
"'Corn. Van Tassell,	Bishop Heustice,
"'Joseph Appleby,	Jeremiah Hitchcock,
"'Patrick Cary,	William Bond,
"'Gilbert Ward,	Samuel Sneden,
"'William Dunlap,	Joshua Ferriss.'

"Of the others who are Freeholders, many also "hold lands at will of Col. Philips, so that the truth "really is, that very few independent Freeholders ob-"jected to the appointment of Deputies.

"LEWIS MORRIS.

"MORRISANIA,
"May 7, 1775."[1]

It will be seen that, with more than his usual shrewdness, Lewis Morris postponed his attempt to reply to the Declaration and Protest which had been made, some weeks previously, by those who had objected to the Meeting at the White Plains, until after his brother-in-law, Isaac Wilkins, who had led those protestants, and who was known to have been the [1] This notable paper, except the list of names, was published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 108, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 11, 1775; and the names were published in the next number of that paper —No. 109, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 18, 1775; the text of the article was published in Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1231, NEW-YORK, Monday, May 15, 1775—although promise was made that the names should be published in the succeeding number, they were not—and both the text of the article and the names appear in Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1689, NEW-YORK, May 18, 1775.

From the first-named of those two papers, the re-print of it, in the text, was very carefully made author of their Declaration and Protest, had left America, when he knew that he was probably secured from challenge concerning the untruthfulness of whatever he should write, in that reply—neither Samuel Seabury nor Luke Babcock had written anything concerning the political questions of that period;[1] it was not thought they would do so; and there was no other person, in Westchester-county, whose pen promised trouble to the new-made leader, no matter how much that peculiar failing which had made his family conspicuous, throughout the Colony,[2] should be manifested in whatever he should write.

The relative merits of the two papers, the Declaration and Protest and the reply, will be very readily seen, by every careful reader. The author of the latter was very profuse in his very general charge of "falsities contained in this representation;" but he failed to specify, even a single instance in which the former had presented an untruth; and every one will perceive that he did not except, from the general impeachment, even those portions of the Declaration and Protest which agreed, in their recital of facts, with his own statement of those facts, contained in the official report of the proceedings of that Meeting, at the White Plains, written over his own signature, on the afternoon of the day on which the Meeting was held, and subsequently presented by him, to the Provincial Convention, as the Credentials through which he and his associates were admitted to seats in that body, as, nominally, a delegation from Westchester-county—if the recital contained in the one was untruthful, therefore, the similar recital contained in the other was, necessarily, quite as untrustworthy as the other. He also impeached the "decency" of what the Declaration and Protest contained; but, again, he failed to specify in what their "indecency" consisted. He impeached the bona fide of the "enthusiasm" of the protestants, at the Plains; but he "confessed," and only those who are guilty "confess," that his own companions, those who had given the much coveted place and authority to him, were also noisy, from the effects of other Spirits than that of loyalty to the King—inasmuch as each of the two factions, at the Plains, claimed to have been noisy as well as loyal, the author of the reply had little reason for making such an objection, unless he desired to secure to his own faction the credit of making all the noise and of expressing all the loyalty which were then produced, by any one. He objected, also, that the titles of those who had signed the Declaration and Protest were appended to the names of those to whom they respectively belonged; but a reference to the official report of the proceedings of that Meeting, signed by himself and evidently from his own pen, to which reference has been made, will show to any one that the specific titles of "Mr.," "Esq.," "Captain," "Major," and "Colonel," were added to eighteen of the twenty-six names which that report contained—indeed, he had given the distinctive title of "Colonel," to himself, in three different places, in that report; and that, too, without a word of apology. He insinuated that one hundred and seventy of those who had signed the Protest were not voters—"after the most diligent inquiry, "I cannot find they have the least pretensions to "vote," he said; adding, "and indeed, many of them "are lads under age"—but he conveniently omitted to make a direct and positive averment of such a want of qualification, in any one of those protestants; and he also conveniently failed to designate which of the one hundred and seventy whom he named, in any single instance, was a minor. Most of all, he disregarded the fact that the Declaration and Protest, to which he assumed to make a reply, had made no pretension to having been made exclusively by "Free-"holders," but, on the contrary, it was thus headed: "We the subscribers, freeholders and inhabitants of "the county of Westchester, having assembled at the "White Plains, in consequence of certain advertise-"ments," etc., from which every appearance of exclusiveness, in the signers of it, was expressly excluded. Finally: he impeached the "independence" of those of the signers of that Protest who were Freeholders, by saying "many also hold lands at will un-"der Col. Philips;" but he conveniently forgot to tell how a mere tenant at will could, thereby, become a Freeholder, or how many, in the Manor of Cortlandt, who were only tenants or who held lands at the will of the Proprietors of that Manor, had been induced by other causes than loyalty to those Proprietors or discontent with the General Assembly, to go to the White Plains, to assist into a place in the revolutionary organization, the young member of that "patriotic" family, Philip, on whom, a few months before, the Royal Governor, William Tryon, had bestowed a Royal Commission of Major, which he then bore; nor was it convenient for the author of that reply, to state, therein, just how many of the tenants and other retainers of the lordly Lord of the Manor of Morrisania had been induced, contrary to their unassisted inclinations, to ride from the Borough Town of Westchester to the White Plains, on that eleventh of April, to assist in the elevation of himself into an office, no matter what. The character of Colonel Frederic Philipse, whom he was so swift to impeach, whether regarded as a man or as a gentleman, as a landlord or as a citizen, was quite as pure, and quite as upright, and quite as worthy of [1] Mr. Seabury, in his Memorial to the General Assembly of Connecticut, presented on the twentieth of December, 1775, in reply to one of the four accusations which had been made against him, expressly stated that he had not, at that time, written any "pamphlets and newspapers "against the liberties of America;" which effectually disproves much that has been written, on that subject, by modern bibliographers.

[2] "This family are so remarkable for 'enlarging the truth,' that all "stories suspected of not being true are known throughout the County "of Westchester, in the City of New York, and on the westernmost part "of Long Island, by the name of 'Morrisanias.'"—(Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 140.)

respect, as was that of Colonel Lewis Morris or that of any other member of that unpopular family; and his practises, in private and in public life, against which not even a Morris, in his bitterest mood, could say a word of open disrespect, merited no such fling from the office-seeking head of the small, new-born revolutionary faction, then in Westchester-county—from one whose only antagonism to the Colonial and Home Governments originated in and was sustained by the continued ill-success of the family of which he was the head, in its unceasing hankering for that official station from which, except in a single notorious instance, the controlling power within the Colony, for many years, had rigidly excluded it.

At the same time, and through the same public press in which Lewis Morris published his reply to the Declaration and Protest, to which reference has been made, he also published the following Cards,[1] evidently the only trophies of the kind, which he had secured, during the political campaign in which he had been engaged, since the publication of the Declaration and Protest had aroused his indignation, and the withdrawal of his brother-in-law had left him without an opponent:

I

"That our names were not subscribed to the "protest of West-Chester, either by our-"selves, or our orders or permission, directly or indi-"rectly, is certified by us, each for himself.

"PETER BUSSING.
"PETER BUSSING, jun.

"May 4, 1775."

II

"MR. RIVINGTON,

"I Did sign a protest, which was printed in your "paper; but I did so, because I was told that the in-"tent of signing it was to shew, that I was for the "liberties of the country.

"SAMUEL BAKER."

III

"NORTH-CASTLE, May 8, 1775.

"MR. RIVINGTON,

"IN your paper lately I saw my name to a pro-"test. I never signed it, but went into Capt. "Hatfield's house, and was asked, whether I was a "Whig or a Tory? I made answer, that I did not "understand the meaning of those words, but was for "liberty and peace. Upon which somebody put down "my name. Now, Sir, I desire that you will print "this to shew to the world, that I have not deserved "to be held up in the light of a protestor.

"JEREMIAH HUNTER."

With these four publications—the reply to the Declaration and Protest and the three Cards of recantation—as far as Westchester-county was concerned, the literature of the first Provincial Convention of the Colony of New York ended—and, as every farmer had returned to his rural home, at the close of the eventful eleventh of April, and had resumed his work, the necessary work of the season, on his farm or on the river, with the exceptions, here and there, of a disturbed mind, an angry thought, or an unneighborly resentment, new features in the social life of Westchester-county farmers, the whole subject gradually became a thing of the past, fit only for material for history.

Reference has been made to the action of the Committee of Inspection, in the City of New York, on the twenty-sixth of April, providing for its own dissolution; for the election of a new Committee of one hundred, to occupy its place, in that City; and for the organization of a Provincial Congress, with general authority for the government of the entire Colony.[2] For the accomplishment of the last-named of those purposes, a Circular Letter was addressed, by the Chairman of that Committee, to the Committees of those Counties in which Committees had been chosen, and to prominent residents of those Counties in which Committees had not been chosen, inviting their co-operation, and recommending them to choose Deputies to the proposed Congress, the following being a copy of that Circular Letter:

"CIRCULAR.

"COMMITTEE CHAMBER, NEW-YORK, April 28, 1775.

"GENTLEMEN,

"The distressed and alarming situation of our "Country, occasioned by the sanguinary measures "adopted by the British Ministry, (to enforce which, "the Sword has been actually drawn against our "brethren in the Massachusetts), threatening to "involve this Continent in all the horrors of a civil "War, obliges us to call for the united aid and council "of the Colony, at this dangerous crisis.

"Most of the Deputies who composed the late "Provincial Congress, held in this City, were only "vested with powers to chose Delegates to represent "the Province at the next Continental Congress, "and the Convention having executed that trust "dissolved themselves: It is therefore thought "adviseable by this Committee, that a Provincial "Congress be immediately summoned to deliberate "upon, and from time to time to direct such measures "as may be expedient for our common safety.

"We persuade ourselves, that no argumen's can

[1] Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 108, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 11, 1775.

Any one who is acquainted with the habits of printers, in "making "up" the forms of a newspaper, for the press, will understand, from the places which these three Cards, and the reply of Lewis Morris to the Declaration and Protest (omitting the names), and the proceedings of the Meeting at the White Plains—five distinct articles relating to Westchester-county—occupy, together, in the last Column of the inside form of the paper, that they all proceeded from the same hand; and that the three Cards of recanting protesters were, evidently, among the results of Lewis Morris's political pilgrimage through that County, in his diligent search for protestants who were not, also, Freeholders.

[2] Vide Page 251, ante.

"now be wanting to evince the necessity of a perfect "union; and we know of no method in which "the united sense of the people of the province can "be collected, but the one now proposed. We there- "fore entreat your County heartily to unite in the "choice of proper persons to represent them at a "Provincial Congress to be held in this City on the "22d of May next.—Twenty Deputies are proposed "for this City, and in order to give the greater weight "and influence to the councils of the Congress, we "could wish the number of Deputies from the "counties, may be considerable.

"We can assure you, that the appointment of a "Provincial Congress,[1] approved of by the inhabitants "of this city in general, is the most proper and "salutary measure that can be adopted in the present "melancholy state of this Continent; and we shall be "happy to find, that our brethren in the different "Counties concur with us in opinion.

"By order of the Committee.

"ISAAC LOW, Chairman."[2]

As there was not, at that time, any Committee, within the County of Westchester, unto whom that Circular Letter could be sent, it was probably sent, as that relating to the proposed Provincial Convention had been sent, to some prominent resident of that County, most convenient to the Chairman of the Committee of the City, for circulation in the several Towns, throughout the County; and, by that local politician, whomsoever he may have been, it may be reasonably supposed that those Circular Letters which were thus sent to him, were duly circulated "where they would "do the most good," for his own interest and for those of his family. It is said, however, that "a general "notice," inviting a Meeting of the Freeholders of the County, was published; and history has recorded, over the official signature of the "Chairman for the "day," that such a Meeting was held, at the White Plains, on Monday, the eighth of May, 1775, "pur- "suant to a general notice for that purpose," James Van Cortlandt, of the Borough Town of Westchester, occupying the Chair. No pretensions were made, in the official report of the Meeting or elsewhere, that the attendance was large: on the contrary, it is very probable that not more than two dozens were present. Whatever the number may have been, it assumed to be the representative of all who were, then, within the County, of every condition in life; and, in the name and in behalf of all those who then lived therein, whether present or absent, it appointed "a Committee "of ninety persons, for the said County," and determined that any twenty of them, "should be "impowered to act for the said County;" and it also determined to send a Deputation to the proposed Provincial Congress, referring to the new-appointed Committee of the County, the nomination of those who should be members of that Deputation.

There were only twenty-three of the ninety who had been named for the Committee, present and acting on the subject which had been referred to it; but it was not slow in nominating, "to represent the said "County in Provincial Convention," Gouverneur Morris, Doctor Robert Graham, Colonel Lewis Graham, and Colonel James Van Cortlandt, all of them from the Borough Town of Westchester; Stephen Ward and Joseph Drake, from Eastchester; Major Philip Van Cortlandt, of the Manor of Cortlandt; Colonel James Holmes, of Bedford; John Thomas, Junior, of Rye; David Dayton, of North Castle; and William Paulding, of ———; and, undoubtedly, with equal promptness, the Meeting confirmed the nominations, by electing the eleven nominees to seats in the proposed Congress of the Colony.

It is said, in the official report of the Meeting, that, after the election of the Deputation, as above "stated, "the Committee signed an association, simi- "lar to that which was signed in the city of New- "York, and appointed Sub-Committees to superintend "the signing of the same throughout the County;"[3]

[1] It will be noticed that the proposed assembly was, in this Circular Letter, called a "Provincial Congress," not a "Convention," as the last was named.

[2] The re-print of this Circular Letter, in the text, is made from a carefully-made copy of one of the originals, which has been preserved among Associations in the Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution, in the Secretary of State's Office, at Albany, Volume XXX., Page 182.

[3] The Association, which was thus "signed by the Committee"—if any others than Members of the Committee had been present, they also would have signed it—was not that Association which the Continental Congress had decreed and promulgated, in the preceding October, but another and entirely different affair, which had been drawn up by James Duane, John Jay, and Peter Van Schaack, and "set on foot in "New-York," on the twenty-ninth of April. It had been largely signed, in the City, and copies of it had been sent "through all the "counties in the Province;" and the action taken at the White Plains, concerning it, was only responsive to the request of the Committee of One hundred, which had superseded the Committee of Inspection, in the City of New York. The following is a copy of that Association, carefully copied from Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 107, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 4, 1775:

"PERSUADED that the salvation of the rights and liberties of "America, depends, under God, on the firm union of its in- "habitants, in a vigorous prosecution of the measures necessary for its "safety, and convinced of the necessity of preventing the anarchy and "confusion which attend a dissolution of the powers of government; "we, the freemen, freeholders, and inhabitants of the city and county of "New-York, being greatly alarmed at the avowed design of the minis- "try to raise a revenue in America, and shocked by the bloody scene "now acting in the Massachusetts-Bay; do, in the most solemn manner "resolve never to become slaves; and to associate under all the ties of "religion, honour, and love to our country, to adopt, and endeavour to "carry into execution, whatever measures may be recommended by the "continental congress, or resolved upon by our provincial convention, "for the purpose of preserving our constitution, and opposing the exe- "cution of several arbitrary and oppressive acts of the British Parlia- "ment, until a reconciliation between Great Britain and America, on "constitutional principles, (which we most ardently desire) can be ob- "tained; and that we will, in all things, follow the advice of our "general committee, respecting the purposes aforesaid, the preservation "of peace and good order, and the safety of individuals and private prop- "erty.

"Dated in New-York, April and May, 1775."

This Association, with some slight changes, was re-printed (without any and after that had been done, the Meeting was adjourned.[1]

The official report of the proceedings of the Meeting does not give the names of any of the ninety persons who were said to have been chosen as a "Committee for the County of Westchester;" and a careful search for those names, in other contemporary publications, has been rewarded with only a partial success—the Credentials of the Deputies to the Provincial Congress, to which reference has been made, reveal the names of the following:

David Dan.[2],	George Comb,
Miles Oakley,	Micah Townsend,
John G. Graham,	Benoni Platt,
Samuel Drake,	Frederic Van Cortlandt,
Lewis Morris,	James Varian,
Jonathan Platt,[3]	Samuel Haviland,
Michael Hays,	Benjamin Lyon,
Samuel Crawford,	Robert Bloomer,
Gilbert Thorn,	William Miller,
Thomas Thomas,	Joshua Ferris,
James Newman,	Gilbert Drake,
Jonathan G. Tompkins,	Chairman.

It will be evident to the reader that, until the appointment of the "Committee for the County of Westchester," by the Meeting which was held at the White Plains, on the eighth of May, 1775, as has been already stated, there had not been even the slightest appearance of any central organization, for political purposes, within the County; that, until they were crowded into the political arena, by the place-seekers who were among them, the hardworking farmers throughout the County had not permitted the political questions of the day to disturb their peaceful labors; and that the place-hunting few, as insignificant in numbers as they were in honest patriotism, did not constitute even a respectable minority of those who were heads of families and householders, throughout the County.[4] It will be seen, also, that the Morris family, strengthened by its alliance with its kindred family of Graham, had fully entrenched itself, as the political head of the County; and it will be particularly noticed of what kind of material Delegates were made, even at that early period of the revolutionary movement in Westchester-county, the most ill-disguised monarchists and even office-holders holding Commissions under the Crown, from among the non-producing class in that purely agricultural community, boldly, if not audaciously, assuming to be in harmony with the industrial masses whom they really despised, and crowding forward, in their greed for place and emoluments, to seize whatever opportunity for advancement, their ingenuity and their superior intelligence should place within their reach.

If a mere handful of the inhabitants of the County, who neither possessed nor claimed to possess any legal qualifications whatever to do such an act; who did not act nor claim to act under the guidance of any thing except its own unrighteous impulses; and who neither possessed nor claimed to possess even a shadow of delegated authority from any one, within or without the County, to do any such acts or any others, with the authority and in the name of the County, can be said, with even a semblance of truth, to have really done so, the ancient and entirely conservative County of Westchester, by the revolutionary action at the Meeting at the White Plains, on the eighth of May, was wheeled into the front line of the Rebellion, apparent reason) appended to the Journal of the Provincial Convention, which Convention had adjourned a week before the Association was written and before it was known that any reason for such an Association was imminent. In de Lancey's Notes to Jones's History of New-York during the Revolutionary War, i., 505, 506, it has been again re-printed, this time from the inaccurate re-print just referred to, and, of course, with its imperfections, together with a more serious omission than any which that had presented.

Judge Jones, in his History of New York, i,, 41–45, gave a very interesting account of the Association and of the signing of it, warmly tinted, of course, with his peculiar bitterness; but, nevertheless, he is our principal authority on those subjects.

[1] This statement of the proceedings of the Meeting at which a Deputation was chosen to represent Westchester-county, in the first Provincial Congress, is made on the authority of the official report of that Meeting, signed by "JAMES VAN CORTLANDT, Chairman for the Day," and published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 108, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 11, 1775; and on that of the Credentials, signed by each of the twenty-three Members of the Committee for the County who were then present, which Credentials have been preserved among Credentials of Delegates, in the Historical Manuscripts, relating to the War of the Revolution, in the Secretary of State's Office at Albany, Volume XXIV., Page 133.

[2] The Provincial Congress, on the twenty-ninth of June, 1775, issued a Warrant to David Dan, as First Lieutenant, under Captain Jonathan Platt.

[3] The Provincial Congress, on the twenty-ninth of June, 1775, issued a Warrant to Jonathan Platt, as Captain.

[4] In all which has been written concerning the political affairs of Westchester-county, prior to the first Session of the First Provincial Congress, which assembled on the twenty-second of May, 1775, as far as we have knowledge on the subject, only fifty-one persons have been named, as residents of that County, who favored the revolutionary proceedings recommended by the Continental Congress of 1774. Of these fifty-one, two were Representatives in the General Assembly—one of them, was, then, the County Judge, under the Royal Government. Of the remaining forty-nine, one rose no higher than a place in the Committee of his Town; six were satisfied with only places on the Committee of the County, in whom, however, great power in local matters was vested, and by whom much money was disbursed for the support of prisoners of war quartered in their vicinities; one aspired to both the Town and County Committees, and held seats in both; three were given nothing else than Commissions in the Regiments of the County; eleven held various Civil Offices, as well as Commissions in the Regiments of the County; one held a seat in the Provincial Congress, and was contented with that single place; sixteen held seats in one or more of the Provincial Congresses, together with other places, at the same time or subsequently; five became discontented with their associations, and were accused of being loyalists, and were prosecuted as such; leaving only five of the entire forty-nine who did not, as far as we have knowledge, accept places of either authority or emolument. Even the Secretary of the first County Committee looked out for the profits of official station, and secured, through his associations, some of the fat things of place—Micah Townsend, the Clerk of the first County-Committee, secured the command of a Company of Colonial Troops, early in 1776; and he was, in other respects, well provided for, during that era of distress and ruin.

The reader may judge from this exhibit how much of genuine patriotism and how much of personal selfishness, controlled the revolutionary politics of Westchester-County, 1774–75.

abreast of the most advanced of the anarchists of that period; and if, without a semblance of that "consent" of which so much had been said and written, as a prerequisite to any change of government—without, also, any of those qualifications in itself and authorities from others, of which mention has been made—the same handful of new-born revolutionists, at the same time, can be said to have really done so, the allegiance of the great body of the anti-revolutionary farmers of that County, and there were no others, to its Sovereign, was violated, if not abrogated, and all the obligations of that great body of the inhabitants of the County, to obey the legally established Governments and the legally enacted Laws of the Country, were dissolved, and all were made subject, instead, to that self-constituted County Committee which was then organized and taking its first step in Rebellion; to the proposed Congress of the Colony, in whom was to be vested absolute, unrestrained authority, in all classes of governmental affairs relating only to the Colony of New York; and to the coming second Continental Congress, in whom, also, a similarly absolute, unrestrained authority, on every conceivable subject, within each and every of the several Colonies, would, also, be seated; and, therefore, every one of those peaceful and peacefully inclined farmers and every member of their respective families were, by that handful of revolutionists, insignificant in numbers and only tools in the hands of an unprincipled master mischief-maker, made subject, nolens volens, to every edict which should be promulgated by either of those three self-constituted, unrestrained, revolutionary bodies; to whatever they or either of them should determine, no matter how monstrous its character might be; and, very often, to whatever individual members of one or other of those bodies, intoxicated with the possession of a power to which, previously, they had been strangers and reveling in a despotism to which the Colony had not, at any period of its existence, been subjected, should demand and require.

With those partisan catchwords and political maxims which, a very short time previously, had filled the air with their noisiness, before the reader, he will readily determine how much of even revolutionary consistency and propriety and integrity there was in those doings which are now under consideration; but, among such as those by whom those doings were inaugurated and conducted—among those whose aims were only personal and selfish and wholly regardless of every other principle whatever than that of self-aggrandizement; among whom the supremacy of the general good of the great body of the Colony or of the Continent—the "patriotism" of poets, of professional politicians, and of exuberant eulogists—was only a toy intended for nothing else than for the temporary amusement of their gaping, credulous auditory, while the political prestidigitator who presided over the show, bedizened with the tinsel which was not what it seemed to be, was secretly perfecting the juggle which was intended to deceive all others than those who were participants in the performance and sharers in the profits to be derived from it,—neither consistency nor propriety nor integrity was regarded or even thought of, the cupidity of the end entirely justified the unrighteousness of the means; and new governing powers and new rules of conduct and new methods took their places in every Town, throughout the County; and old obligations were disregarded, and old guaranties were abrogated, and the safety of persons and of properties rested on other foundations than those which were known to and depended on by those of an earlier period.

The American Revolution had finished its work and was ended: the long-established Government of Law had been crowded aside and, in fact if not entirely in form, had given place to a new Government of arbitrary, unbridled Force: thenceforth, the peace of the County and the rights of Individuals and of Property, within the County, sacredly respected even under a Monarchy, were held only by those who possessed them, subject to the unrestrained will of the stronger.

The careful reader will not have failed to see, in what has been written in this narrative and in the testimony which has been adduced to sustain it, the stern fact that, as far as the Colony of New York was concerned, and we write of no other Colony, the opposition to the measures of the Home Goverment, from 1763 until the Spring of 1775, which, subsequently, became more widely known as THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, was not, in the slightest degree, the outcome of a popular movement, in which the great body of the Colonists or any considerable portion of it arose in opposition to a wrong, inflicted or sought to be inflicted by the Parliament of Great Britain or by any other body, on the Colony or on any individual member of it, as has been rhetorically pretended, by orators and poets and historians, from that day until the present; but, on the contrary, that it originated in the City of New York, among those of the commercial and mercantile classes, relatively few in number, whom, by reason of their greater wealth or of their higher social standing, we may properly regard, as they were regarded by themselves, as the aristocracy of the Colony—with few, if any exceptions, they were those wealthy and enterprising Merchants, of various names and families and parties and sects and nationalities, each of whom had sunk, for all the purposes of that particular movement, whatever of individual or family or partisan or sectarian or national animosity, against others, he possessed, combined and acting in a common opposition to all those measures of the Home Government which had tended to break down the unblushing lawlessness of those confederated Merchants, in their entire disregard of the Navigation and Revenue Laws of the Empire, and to enforce on each of those Merchants, in his individual business, that obedience to the Laws which would be no more than his reasonable duty, while it would also tend to the suppression of that corruption of the local Revenue-officers and of that general practise of Smuggling from which he was so complacently acquiring wealth and influence. Except wherein these aristocratic Smugglers employed their ships' crews and the habitués of the docks and slums of the City, for purposes of intimidation and political effect, the unfranchised masses of the Colonists, in the country as well as in the City, with very rare exceptions, and the Freeholders of small estates and those Freeholders, of either large or small degree, who possessed no pecuniary interest in the foreign commerce of the Port, whether inhabitants of the City or of the rural Counties, had no part nor lot in the inception or in the organization or in the promotion of that opposition to the Home Government which, subsequently, in its more advanced stages, became known, at home and abroad, as THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

In fact, while the aristocracy of the Colony was thus confederating and consolidating discordant elements and plotting and breeding disaffection to the Mother Country, the unfranchised Mechanics and Working-men, residents of the City and toilers for their daily bread, with occasional exceptions, pursued their respective industrial vocations, peacefully and industriously, without taking any greater interest in the anxieties of their aristocratic neighbors than those "well-born" "Gentlemen in Trade" were taking in their welfare or in that of their respective families; while the great body of those who occupied the rural Counties of the Colony, also hard-working and peacefully inclined, knew little of and cared less for what was then disturbing the previously well-sustained quiet of the metropolitan counting-rooms.

It is, indeed, true, in this connection, that the aristocratic Merchants and Ship-owners, in the City of New York, had been, during many years, more or less reasonably aggrieved by reason of the governmental interference with their well-established and very profitable "illicit trade," to which reference has been made: it is also true that, for the purpose of influencing and, if possible, of intimidating the Home Government, in their opposition to that Home Government, because of those assumed grievances, those high-toned lawbreakers had repeatedly resorted to the desperate means of, first, appealing to the maxims and the teachings of the fundamental law; of employing the former for their partisan slogan, and the latter for the foundations of their passionate appeals; and, sometimes, second, of employing, directly or indirectly, the floating and the less respectable portions of the population of the City, as supernumeraries on the stage on which they were acting their several parts in the drama of their seeming patriotism—means which were as unreal, in their hands, as their own "patrotism," so called, was deceptive; and, particularly, in the last-mentioned of the two means employed, as hazardous as it was fraudulent—but it is also true that, while the maxims and the teachings of the fundamental law which they so freely bandied, were only words of convenience, meaning nothing beyond the end for securing which they had been thus employed, their auxiliaries, thus enlisted from among the unfranchised and lowly, if not from among the vicious, were, by those who employed them, only regarded as temporary employees, engaged for the performance of particular services, of more or less danger and lawlessness; and not as common heirs to a common inheritance for which both they and those who had thus employed them, as parties possessing an equal interest therein—as the maxims and the teachings of the fundamental law, with which both the employers and the employees, in this instance, were familiar, had clearly indicated to both—were jointly contending.

The American Revolution, as we said in the beginning, originated, not in a popular movement of the great body of the Colonists, nor in any considerable number of those Colonists, in opposition to a wrong, inflicted or sought to be inflicted by the Parliament of Great Britain or by any other body, on the Colony or on any individual member of it, but the commercial and mercantile classes, in the City of New York, the aristocracy of the Colony, in their desperate efforts to shelter "the illicit Trade"—the Smuggling—in which they had been so long and so profitably employed, from the obstructions, more than ordinarily effective, which the Home Government had raised against it, subsequent to the establishment of the Peace, in 1763. As we have said, also, the elaborate essays on the "Rights of Man and of Englishmen," on the "consent" which was necessary in order to give validity to Laws, and, generally, on the assumed grievances to which the Colonists had been subjected, all of them the productions of well-paid Counsel or other interested writers, with which the newspapers of that period were filled to overflowing, were nothing else than means employed for the protection of that prolific, but corrupt, source of the wealth of the Merchants of the City of New York; and the yells and the outrages, inflicted on both persons and properties, of those who had been employed to give effect to those labored arguments of the press, by what were assumed to have been spontaneous outbursts of popular resentment against the usurpations of the Home Government—usurpations of individual rights, by the way, which were only the same as those which were subsequently inflicted, in every State, on those who were not Freeholders; and which the Constitution for the United States has always inflicted and continues to inflict on the inhabitants of the several Territories, who have always been and who are, now, taxed without having consented to any such taxation, their Delegates in the federal Congress having had no right, at any time, to vote on any question whatever abreast of the most advanced of the anarchists of that period; and if, without a semblance of that "consent" of which so much had been said and written, as a prerequisite to any change of government—without, also, any of those qualifications in itself and authorities from others, of which mention has been made—the same handful of new-born revolutionists, at the same time, can be said to have really done so, the allegiance of the great body of the anti-revolutionary farmers of that County, and there were no others, to its Sovereign, was violated, if not abrogated, and all the obligations of that great body of the inhabitants of the County, to obey the legally established Governments and the legally enacted Laws of the Country, were dissolved, and all were made subject, instead, to that self-constituted County Committee which was then organized and taking its first step in Rebellion; to the proposed Congress of the Colony, in whom was to be vested absolute, unrestrained authority, in all classes of governmental affairs relating only to the Colony of New York; and to the coming second Continental Congress, in whom, also, a similarly absolute, unrestrained authority, on every conceivable subject, within each and every of the several Colonies, would, also, be seated; and, therefore, every one of those peaceful and peacefully inclined farmers and every member of their respective families were, by that handful of revolutionists, insignificant in numbers and only tools in the hands of an unprincipled master mischief-maker, made subject, nolens volens, to every edict which should be promulgated by either of those three self-constituted, unrestrained, revolutionary bodies; to whatever they or either of them should determine, no matter how monstrous its character might be; and, very often, to whatever individual members of one or other of those bodies, intoxicated with the possession of a power to which, previously, they had been strangers and reveling in a despotism to which the Colony had not, at any period of its existence, been subjected, should demand and require.

With those partisan catchwords and political maxims which, a very short time previously, had filled the air with their noisiness, before the reader, he will readily determine how much of even revolutionary consistency and propriety and integrity there was in those doings which are now under consideration; but, among such as those by whom those doings were inaugurated and conducted—among those whose aims were only personal and selfish and wholly regardless of every other principle whatever than that of self-aggrandizement; among whom the supremacy of the general good of the great body of the Colony or of the Continent—the "patriotism" of poets, of professional politicians, and of exuberant eulogists—was only a toy intended for nothing else than for the temporary amusement of their gaping, credulous auditory, while the political prestidigitator who presided over the show, bedizened with the tinsel which was not what it seemed to be, was secretly perfecting the juggle which was intended to deceive all others than those who were participants in the performance and sharers in the profits to be derived from it,—neither consistency nor propriety nor integrity was regarded or even thought of, the cupidity of the end entirely justified the unrighteousness of the means; and new governing powers and new rules of conduct and new methods took their places in every Town, throughout the County; and old obligations were disregarded, and old guaranties were abrogated, and the safety of persons and of properties rested on other foundations than those which were known to and depended on by those of an earlier period.

The American Revolution had finished its work and was ended: the long-established Government of Law had been crowded aside and, in fact if not entirely in form, had given place to a new Government of arbitrary, unbridled Force: thenceforth, the peace of the County and the rights of Individuals and of Property, within the County, sacredly respected even under a Monarchy, were held only by those who possessed them, subject to the unrestrained will of the stronger.

The careful reader will not have failed to see, in what has been written in this narrative and in the testimony which has been adduced to sustain it, the stern fact that, as far as the Colony of New York was concerned, and we write of no other Colony, the opposition to the measures of the Home Goverment, from 1763 until the Spring of 1775, which, subsequently, became more widely known as THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, was not, in the slightest degree, the outcome of a popular movement, in which the great body of the Colonists or any considerable portion of it arose in opposition to a wrong, inflicted or sought to be inflicted by the Parliament of Great Britain or by any other body, on the Colony or on any individual member of it, as has been rhetorically pretended, by orators and poets and historians, from that day until the present; but, on the contrary, that it originated in the City of New York, among those of the commercial and mercantile classes, relatively few in number, whom, by reason of their greater wealth or of their higher social standing, we may properly regard, as they were regarded by themselves, as the aristocracy of the Colony—with few, if any exceptions, they were those wealthy and enterprising Merchants, of various names and families and parties and sects and nationalities, each of whom had sunk, for all the purposes of that particular movement, whatever of individual or family or partisan or sectarian or national animosity, against others, he possessed, combined and acting in a common opposition to all those measures of the Home Government which had tended to break down the unblushing lawlessness of those confederated Merchants, in their entire disregard of the Navigation and Revenue Laws of the Empire, and to enforce on each of those Merchants, in his individual business, that obedience to the Laws which would be no more than his reasonable duty, while it would also tend to the suppression of that corruption of the local Revenue-officers and of that general practise of Smuggling from which he was so complacently acquiring wealth and influence. Except wherein these aristocratic Smugglers employed their ships' crews and the habitués of the docks and slums of the City, for purposes of intimidation and political effect, the unfranchised masses of the Colonists, in the country as well as in the City, with very rare exceptions, and the Freeholders of small estates and those Freeholders, of either large or small degree, who possessed no pecuniary interest in the foreign commerce of the Port, whether inhabitants of the City or of the rural Counties, had no part nor lot in the inception or in the organization or in the promotion of that opposition to the Home Government which, subsequently, in its more advanced stages, became known, at home and abroad, as THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

In fact, while the aristocracy of the Colony was thus confederating and consolidating discordant elements and plotting and breeding disaffection to the Mother Country, the unfranchised Mechanics and Working-men, residents of the City and toilers for their daily bread, with occasional exceptions, pursued their respective industrial vocations, peacefully and industriously, without taking any greater interest in the anxieties of their aristocratic neighbors than those "well-born" "Gentlemen in Trade" were taking in their welfare or in that of their respective families; while the great body of those who occupied the rural Counties of the Colony, also hard-working and peacefully inclined, knew little of and cared less for what was then disturbing the previously well-sustained quiet of the metropolitan counting-rooms.

It is, indeed, true, in this connection, that the aristocratic Merchants and Ship-owners, in the City of New York, had been, during many years, more or less reasonably aggrieved by reason of the governmental interference with their well-established and very profitable "illicit trade," to which reference has been made: it is also true that, for the purpose of influencing and, if possible, of intimidating the Home Government, in their opposition to that Home Government, because of those assumed grievances, those high-toned lawbreakers had repeatedly resorted to the desperate means of, first, appealing to the maxims and the teachings of the fundamental law; of employing the former for their partisan slogan, and the latter for the foundations of their passionate appeals; and, sometimes, second, of employing, directly or indirectly, the floating and the less respectable portions of the population of the City, as supernumeraries on the stage on which they were acting their several parts in the drama of their seeming patriotism—means which were as unreal, in their hands, as their own "patrotism," so called, was deceptive; and, particularly, in the last-mentioned of the two means employed, as hazardous as it was fraudulent—but it is also true that, while the maxims and the teachings of the fundamental law which they so freely bandied, were only words of convenience, meaning nothing beyond the end for securing which they had been thus employed, their auxiliaries, thus enlisted from among the unfranchised and lowly, if not from among the vicious, were, by those who employed them, only regarded as temporary employees, engaged for the performance of particular services, of more or less danger and lawlessness; and not as common heirs to a common inheritance for which both they and those who had thus employed them, as parties possessing an equal interest therein—as the maxims and the teachings of the fundamental law, with which both the employers and the employees, in this instance, were familiar, had clearly indicated to both—were jointly contending.

The American Revolution, as we said in the beginning, originated, not in a popular movement of the great body of the Colonists, nor in any considerable number of those Colonists, in opposition to a wrong, inflicted or sought to be inflicted by the Parliament of Great Britain or by any other body, on the Colony or on any individual member of it, but the commercial and mercantile classes, in the City of New York, the aristocracy of the Colony, in their desperate efforts to shelter "the illicit Trade"—the Smuggling—in which they had been so long and so profitably employed, from the obstructions, more than ordinarily effective, which the Home Government had raised against it, subsequent to the establishment of the Peace, in 1763. As we have said, also, the elaborate essays on the "Rights of Man and of Englishmen," on the "consent" which was necessary in order to give validity to Laws, and, generally, on the assumed grievances to which the Colonists had been subjected, all of them the productions of well-paid Counsel or other interested writers, with which the newspapers of that period were filled to overflowing, were nothing else than means employed for the protection of that prolific, but corrupt, source of the wealth of the Merchants of the City of New York; and the yells and the outrages, inflicted on both persons and properties, of those who had been employed to give effect to those labored arguments of the press, by what were assumed to have been spontaneous outbursts of popular resentment against the usurpations of the Home Government—usurpations of individual rights, by the way, which were only the same as those which were subsequently inflicted, in every State, on those who were not Freeholders; and which the Constitution for the United States has always inflicted and continues to inflict on the inhabitants of the several Territories, who have always been and who are, now, taxed without having consented to any such taxation, their Delegates in the federal Congress having had no right, at any time, to vote on any question whatever —were no more than additional instrumentalities in the hands of wealthy and unprincipled lawbreakers, Smugglers, employed for the purpose of sheltering those aristocratic culprits from the penalties which the Revenue-laws had imposed on them and, if possible, of enabling them to continue, with impunity, those flagrant violations of morality and of Law which men of less wealth and influence could not have committed without having been exposed to fine and imprisonment and confiscation of property. This, and nothing else, in fact, constituted the beginning of what has been, more recently, unduly elevated to the dignity of a popular patriotic uprising, in support of violated Rights and for the preservation of the Colonies from governmental devastation and ruin; and this, in its various phases, was all there was of that notable Revolution, until the "fire-eaters" of Massachusetts and Virginia, members of the Continental Congress of 1774, seized the control of that body, which had been convened for nothing else than for the promotion of reconciliation and harmony and peace, and transformed it into an instrumentality of lawless violence, of internal strife, and of a disastrous Rebellion.

The careful reader will not have failed to see, also, in what has been written in this narrative and in the testimony which has been adduced to sustain it, that, while honesty and integrity and humanity and patriotism formed no portion of the motives which led the aristocratic Smugglers, in the City of New York, to inaugurate and to sustain a general disaffection against the Home Government; and while their aims, in thus creating and fostering a general discontent among the Colonists, were purely temporary and selfish, intended for nothing else than to perpetuate their own immediate opportunities to make gain at the expense of the Laws and the morals of the Colony, the methods which those influential "Gen-"tlemen in Trade" employed for the promotion of those individual and unholy purposes, were better calculated for the production of permanent than for that of temporary results, since they were employed among those, no matter how homely they were, whose recognized leaders were already well-schooled in the theories of political science, which had been employed for the texts of every political essay and of every partisan harangue, for years past, and who, besides having been politically ambitious, were, also, very shrewd and very energetic men; and, as wealth and a long and successful career in crime are frequently productive of that arrogance and of that recklessness in the selection and employment of means, either for the perpetuation of the opportunities for wrong-doing or for the protection of the offender from the penalties of an outraged Law, which tend, more surely, to the production of disaster than to that of success, so the wealthy and aristocratic culprits, in the City of New York, to whom we have referred, in the instance now under consideration, through the means which they had employed for the intimidation of the Home Government and by their own persistent selfishness, gradually produced a new and powerful political element, adverse to their own pretensions to exclusiveness, to which they had been, previously, strangers. Their want of abilities, as navigators on the troubled waters of Colonial politics, was painfully evident to all others than to themselves; and the adverse power of the new-formed political element was haughtily disregarded, until it had become so well established that it was enabled not only to assert but to maintain its standing.

The character and influence of that new factor in Colonial politics, during the revolutionary era, require a few words concerning its origin, beyond what we have already said of it.

The outlay of wealth can generally secure ingenious advocates for any cause, no matter how unsavory it may be; and, in that of the confederated aristocratic Smugglers of the City of New York, of which mention has been made, well-paid Counsel and ready writers for the newspapers, in their eagerness to support their wealthy and liberal connections and clients, in their systematic violation of the written Law of the land and in their determined struggle to retain the "illicit trade" in which they were so profitably engaged, in the absence of better authorities for the support of their impassioned rhetoric, were obliged to resort to the fundamental and ill-defined theories of political science, with which, through long-continued iteration, the entire body of the inhabitants, the unfranchised as well as the franchised, had already become well acquainted; and, in their purposes to oppose the Home Government and to shelter their opulent employers, those who were thus employed, speakers and writers, loudly spoke and glibly wrote of "the natural Rights of Man" and of "the Rights "of Englishmen," of "Magna Charta," and of "repre-"sentation," and of "consent," without the slightest qualification, as if every man and every Colonist were intended to be included in those general and unqualified terms; as if every man throughout the Colony were intended to be considered the equal of every other man, therein and elsewhere; as if every Colonist of every sect and party and in every condition of life were entitled, of right, to be recognized and received and entertained, as an equal, socially and politically and in every other relation, by every other Colonist, of high or of low degree—and, without any qualification, those popular catchwords with which the City had echoed, year after year, meant all these, if they meant anything—all of which, however, in the spirit in which they had been uttered, were audacious fictions, spoken or written in the interest of those who had resorted to them, only for deceitful and illegal and immoral purposes, as would have been quickly seen had "the poor reptiles" who had constituted that lowly mass of unfranchised Workingmen, directly and unreservedly, at any time, during that long period, presumed to have asserted, for themselves, their own manhood, and to have claimed, for themselves, those Rights which had been speciously conceded as having properly belonged to them as much as to any others. In the progress of events, however, either on their own motion or on that of their ambitious leaders—the latter, generally of those who, before the confederation of all parties in an opposition to the Colonial policy of the Home Government, had been of the minority, among the Colonial politicians—these Working-men had commenced to measure their own lowliness and their own political insignificance with the standards which had been placed in their hands, by their aristocratic neighbors, for other purposes; to assert their own political manhood; and to demand a hearing in even the local politics of the day; and in the efforts which were made by the confederated aristocracy of the City, to relegate that new-born and growing power—the growing power of the great body of the Mechanics and Working-men, throughout the Colony—back to its normal obscurity and political insignificance, may be seen the beginning of that ceaseless conflict between the aristocratic and the democratic elements of this mighty Commonwealth, which, having been continued from father to son, is not yet ended.

As we have already intimated, the confederated aristocracy of New York witnessed the appearance of that new element in the politics of the Colony, with anxiety and alarm; and it evidently noticed, also, the constituent parts of it, and duly measured its probable strength, and judiciously determined that, in opposing it, "art" would be better suited to ensure success; than anything of a seemingly unfriendly character would be—in other words, that what appeared to be concessions to the working-classes should be made, but with sufficient of modifications, in reserve, to neutralize the effect of those seeming concessions; and to continue, without abatement, the control of the confederated party of the Opposition to the Home Government, in the Colony, in those aristocratic hands which already possessed it. Indeed, the high-toned "Gentlemen in Trade," guided by their acute legal and political advisers, John Jay and James Duane, determined to continue the same system of contemptuous deceit and treachery which had characterized all their previous political intercourse with the Working-men of the Colony; and, in doing so, they very clearly indicated, a second time, how ill-qualified they were to navigate the troubled waters of Colonial politics.

The first formal organization of those who were in confederated opposition to the Home Government of that period, which was made within the City of New York and, probably, within the Colony—the Caucus of the confederated Merchants, at Sam. Francis's, in May, 1774, which had been evidently assembled under the inspiration of James Duane and John Jay, who were not Merchants, but Lawyers—was really intended quite as much for the adoption of measures which should practically rebuke the evidently growing sense of their own political power which has been recently seen arising among the Working-men and the lowly, throughout the City, if for nothing else, as for the adoption of measures in further opposition to the Home Government, to which it was nominally devoted; and, by adroitness in their management of the movement—the master-spirits of that aristocratic assemblage were not novices in political chicanery—while they really secured, more firmly than ever, the controlling authority in the confederated Opposition to the Home Government, in the aristocracy of the Colony, those master-spirits not only laid the foundations of their own and their family's further advancement, but they, also, so far placated the disaffected Working-men, by making the greater number of their leaders a helpless and powerless minority in the proposed Committee of Fifty-one, that peace and harmony of action, thoroughout the entire Opposition, were immediately restored—they had again deceived the masses of the people; and, once more, a share of that confidence which those lowly masses had reposed in their aristocratic neighbors, was entirely forfeited. Although that new-born element was represented in that Committee of Fifty-one, its representatives were in a powerless minority; and whatever was done in that body, whether the representatives of the Working-men assented or dissented, was, therefore, in fact, nothing else than the act of the confederated aristocracy. It was not long, however, before that fraudulent treatment of the Working-men produced "the "great Meeting in the Fields," and the dissolution of that incongruous alliance, and the resumption of the antagonism of the masses; and it was not long, also. before the confederation of the aristocracy itself, within as well as without the Committee of Fifty-one, was broken by the defection of those who had been the master-spirits of the organization, who, for the advancement of their own and their family's aspirations for place and emolument, had become as unfaithful to their aristocratic associates in the Committee and to the political principles which that Committee had so resolutely maintained, as they and those whom they had controlled and guided, in the Committee, a few weeks previously, had been, to the great body of the Inhabitants of the City, by whom that Committee had been really created and vested with authority to represent the entire body of the Opposition, within the City of New York. There was no abatement of the previously united opposition to the demands of the Working-men, however; and in each of the new-formed factions of the confederated aristocratic Opposition to the Home Government and in all which they or either of them did, there was the same entire disregard of the political rights of the Working-men, then without leaders, which had been so clearly conspicuous in all the actions of the aristocracy, from the beginning of the political troubles, within the Colony.

The reader has been made acquainted with the successful opposition which the Committee of Fifty-one had made to the plan of operations which the Boston-men had proposed and insisted on; and with the successful establishment, instead, of its own project to call a Congress of the several Colonies, for consultation and for the promotion of harmony, in the party of the Opposition, throughout the Continent. He will remember, also, the narrative of the refusal of the Committee of Fifty-one to permit the Mechanics and Working-men to be represented on the ticket for Delegates to the Congress of the Colonies which it had proposed, and that of the consequent failure to elect its proposed Delegation, when its ticket was submitted to the body of the Freeholders and Freemen of the City, at the Polls. He will remember, also, what has been said of the various movements and counter-movements of the rival factions, after the defeat of the Committee's candidates; of the treachery to the Committee who had nominated them and to their aristocratic associates, of four of the five candidates of the Committee; of the consequent election of those five candidates, in the absence of any other candidates, by the united support, at the Polls, of portions of both the aristocratic and democratic elements; of the assembling of the proposed Continental Congress, in which there was not a single representative who was in sympathy with or who honestly represented the working masses of the Colonists; of the seizure of the control of that Congress by the "fire-"eaters" of Massachusetts and Virginia and South Carolina, and the consequent transformation of it, from the instrument for the promotion of reconciliation and peace, for which it had been specifically created and put in motion, into one for the promotion of rebellion and bloodshed, which was utterly obnoxious to all, except a very few, of the Colonists throughout the Continent; of the entire neglect, by that Congress, to seek that redress of the grievances of the Colonists from those by whom, only, such a redress could have been made, notwithstanding it was for that particular purpose the Congress had been convened, and notwithstanding such a reconciliation was what was most earnestly desired "by all good men;" and of the readiness of that Congress to inaugurate a system of violence, in each of the Colonies, for which it afforded ample warrants. He will remember, also, what has been stated concerning the General Assembly of the Colony; its organization; its bold and determined opposition to the obnoxious Colonial policy of the Home Government; its sturdy refusal to become auxiliary to or identified with the Continental Congress, notwithstanding it was not less determined in its opposition to the Ministry; its measures for securing from the Parliament of Great Britain, the only body from whom it could be obtained, a complete redress of what the Colonists regarded as grievances; and the unsuccessful result of its efforts, in that commendable undertaking, only by reason of the boldness of its declarations and of the audacity of its pretensions to rank, as the legally constituted representatives of a free people, notwithstanding they were Colonists.

It will be remembered by all who are familiar with the history of Colonial New York, however, that, although the aristocracy of that old and respectable Colony had always been consistent and united, in its undeviating disregard of the real political rights of the working masses, those in the rural districts as well as those in the Cities, there had been, during many years before the period of which we write [May, 1775], and there was, then, a bitter feud, existing within itself, between two rival families and their respective associated families and their several adherents. It will, also, be remembered that, during a long period of years, one of those powerful families and its friends had occupied all or nearly all the high places in the Colonial Government, and had dispensed the extensive patronage of that Government and disposed of its valuable emoluments among those who were known to have been the friends and adherents of the family, agreeably to the dictates of its own controlling will; while the other of those two antagonistic families and those who had been its friends and adherents, during the same long period, had uneasily and unsatisfactorily reposed on nothing else than on their own rural respectability, without any place in the Government of the Colony, without any of that influence which place had afforded so bounteously to its more powerful rival, and without any of those emoluments of office which, more than almost all else, would have been so exceedingly acceptable to every Scotchman and to every other within whose veins the controlling blood was Scotch. The feud between the De Lanceys and the Livingstons, in Colonial New York, is matter of history which is familiarly known to every New-Yorker who is reasonably acquainted with the history of his own country.

When the Home Government, eager to reduce the heavy land-tax to which the country gentlemen of England had been subjected by reason of the demands of that Government, in its vigorous prosecution of the War with France and Spain, first tightened the lines of those who administered the Customs, in the Colonies, and thereby seriously interfered with the smuggling in which every class of the local aristocracy was so largely and so profitably engaged, there was a common reason, which appealed to those of the De Lanceys and those of the Livingstons with equal force, for an opposition to the Home Government, in which those of both the families could harmoniously unite and from which both could be more surely benefitted; and, in accordance with that teaching of common sense, that opposition to the Home Government, of which the reader has been told, was really established in the City of New York, with its organized Committee of Fifty-one and its more noted Continental Congress among the results of that union.

At the time of which we write, the threatened danger from the working classes appeared to have been averted; the Committee of Fifty-one, or those who had remained in it after the treachery of those who had used it for a stepping-stone to something of greater influence, had slowly retired from the field of political action and had been dissolved by its own action; the Continental Congress and its policy and its methods had been accepted by the Livingstons and their friends and adherents as that which seemed to be best adapted to add strength to their hereditary antagonism to the De Lanceys and their friends and adherents; the General Assembly of the Colony and its policy and its methods, not less in opposition to the Colonial policy of the Home Government than the others, had been accepted by the De Lanceys and their friends and adherents, as well as by the great body of the Colonists, throughout the entire Colony, as the only legitimate exponent of the will of the Colony and the only one which could reasonably be expected to obtain a hearing before the Home Government and the Parliament and the people of Great Britain, from whom, only, a redress of the grievances of the Colony could be obtained; and the Colony was again made the witness and the victim of a bitter feud between rival families, one of them holding and the other endeavoring to obtain all the places and influence and emoluments of the Colonial Government. A Delegation of twelve had been elected, by a Convention which had been convened for that purpose, to represent the Colony in a second Congress of the Colonies; and of that Delegation, two were Livingstons, two were of those who had married Livingstons, and two others were assured and well-tried supporters of the Livingston interest. The excitement which was occasioned by "the news from Lexington" had added strength to the friends of the Continental Congress and its revolutionary policy, to the Livingston interests, and to the revolutionary faction, generally; and, in the same interests and with the same revolutionary ends in view, a Provincial Congress had been called and elected, although, as was subsequently seen, the Deputies thus elected were not always pliant tools, to be handled by a skilful politician, for purely partisan purposes. The control of the political affairs of the Colony, it will be seen, as far as those affairs could be controlled by the revolutionary faction, was, by the election of the members of the Provincial Congress, firmly secured to the Livingstons and to their friends; and the government of the Colonists, thenceforth, was revolutionary, without warrant of Law, and oligarchic.

In England, at the time of which we write, the Ministry, revelling in the strength of its party and haughtily disregarding everything of prudence and conciliation, had recently led the Parliament to enact, first, the Bill for restraining the Trade and Commerce of the Provinces of Massachusetts-Bay and New Hampshire and the Colonies of Connecticut and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, in North America, with Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Islands in the West Indies; and to prohibit such Provinces and Colonies from carrying on any Fishery on the Banks of Newfoundland or other places therein mentioned, under certain specified conditions and limitations; and, second, the Bill for restraining the Trade and Commerce of the Colonies of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, with Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Islands in the West Indies, under certain conditions and limitations—the Commerce and Fishing Rights of the Colony of New York, in each instance, having been left, undisturbed—and the First Session of the Fourteenth Parliament was drawing near to its close. The disturbance of Trade which was consequent on the political differences, had already produced great distress, in Great Britain, among those whose lives and labors and properties were employed in the manufacture of goods specifically intended for the American market; and, at the same time, the Merchants, in that country, and those who had given credits, commercial or financial, to the Colonists, in America, were anxiously considering in what way, if at all, since entire commercial non-intercourse, except that which was surreptitious and corrupt,[1] had been ordered by the Parliament as well as by the Continental Congress, they were to receive payment of what was due or becoming due to them—anxieties which were not removed by the aristocratic and "patriotic" "debtors," in some of the Colonies, at least, whence remittances had been entirely suspended and where the Courts of Justice were not permitted to assist in the collection of debts.

In New York, at the time of which we write, as far as the great body of the Colonists in the rural Counties were concerned, there does not appear to have been any noticeable change—the farmers had not been disturbed in their labors, during 1774; and the surplus of their productions, which had found early markets, had undoubtedly been disposed of at those better than ordinary prices which are known to have prevailed, in consequence of the increased demand which had been produced, early in the Autumn, by the approaching embargo. In the City, the suspen-

[1] The full supplies of goods, of every description, which were shipped to Boston, with the knowledge of officers who occupied high places in the Government, on Transport Ships and disguised as Stores for the Royal Army—sometimes paid for, as Stores for the Army, by the King's Treasurer—subsequently became a subject of searching investigation before the House of Commons. The Schedules of Goods thus shipped afford amusing evidence of what were officially considered as Army Stores: they clearly show, also, the relative weight of morality and immorality, whenever the profits of trade are considered, and how vastly more the Profit and Loss Accounts, on their respective Ledgers, will influence the morals and the religion and the doings of "Men in Business," Merchants and others, than anything which their Mothers have taught them, anything which their Bibles have presented to their consideration, or anything which their consciences have brought before them sion of the foreign trade, by the experimental action of the first Continental Congress, must have been as disastrous to the great body of the inhabitants—those possessing small Estates as well as the Tradesmen and Mechanics and Workingmen, of every lowly class—as that much written-of Port Bill, imposed by the retributive action of the King and the Parliament of Great Britain, had produced on the similar classes who had inhabited the Town of Boston, in the preceding year; but the men of New York and their dependent families had endured whatever of hardships there had been in the suspension of their respective means of support, without those outcries, nominally of assumed distress among "the suffering inhabitants"—more loudly uttered by demagogues, for other purposes, than by those who were really sufferers, praying for relief—which had distinguished Boston, a few months previously, and which had induced the tender-hearted, the world over, to become politicians and to reprobate the Home Government by whom the Port Bill had been imposed; to sympathize with those who were said to have been "suffering," although the latter could have found remunerative labor elsewhere than in Boston; and to contribute the means which were really expended, very largely, more for the benefit of the tax-payers than for that of the "suffering poor" of the Town. The suspension of their business, by the aristocracy of America, who could sustain the present strain in order to ensure the receipt of an ultimate advantage, was, we say, no less severe in New York than the similar suspension of her business, by the aristocracy of Great Britain, had been in Boston; and the sufferngs of of the working classes were, undoubtedly, quite as keenly felt in the one case as in the other; but, in the instance of New York, there was neither an appeal for help nor an ostentatious display of "patriotic" sympathy, extending help; and if the sufferings of the lowly victims, in New York, were noticed at all, by those "patriotic" aristocrats who had produced those distresses, it was only in those congratulatory remarks, not unfrequently seen in the published correspondence of the not distant later period, that the necessities of the working-classes were compelling them to enlist in the Armies, in order to obtain even a portion of the food which was needed to keep their dependent wives and little ones from starvation, and that "for the "Rights of man and of Englishmen."

The "determination" of the Continental Congress of 1774, to appoint Committees "in every County, "City, and Town," "whose business it should be at-"tentively to observe the conduct of all persons, "touching the Association," which that Congress also enacted, and with extraordinary powers for persecuting and bringing ruin on whomsoever those local Committees should determine to put under a ban, had not yet become as well-seated, in the Colony of New York, as in some of the other Colonies;[1] but the City of New York was thus controlled; and, possibly, some of the rural communities who were more than ordinarily revolutionary in their inclinations, may, also, have already appointed such Committees. In Westchester-county, however, although the handful of officeseekers who hovered around the Morrises, and who did what those haughty leaders told them to do in return for official favors received or looked for, had recently appointed such a County Committee, at the time of which we write, it had not yet commenced its subsequently well-known work of inquisitorial proscription and plunder and outrage. There were individuals, among the farmers or in the little villages or at the several landings, who remembered and continued to condemn the usurpations of political authority which had signalized the first Continental Congress and had divided and lessened the power of the Opposition; and these and others who had attended the recently-held meeting at the White Plains may have been and undoubtedly were discontented and outspoken, within their respective families and among their neighbors, producing, in some instances, undoubtedly, ill-feelings and personal animosities and less harmonious neighborhoods. But, notwithstanding all these, the great body of the inhabitants of the County was entirely undisturbed; the labors of the day had been done, as they had previously been done, on the hundreds of homesteads, throughout the County; political questions in which they felt no interest had not slackened the domestic or the out-door industries nor lessened the holiday or evening pleasures of by far the greater number; and, with here and there a clearly perceptible change, the staid old agricultural County was undisturbed, in all its various relations. The Colonial officers continued to discharge their various duties, as their predecessors had done—John Thomas, who had occupied the Bench of the Court of Common Pleas, since May, 1755, continued to discharge the duties of that office, as well as those of the other office of Representative of the County, in the General Assembly, without

[1] The following description of the methods adopted by those local Committees, and the extent to which they carried their new-found authority, although it relates peculiarly to Virginia, is entirely applicable to the methods and the extent of authority of similar Committees, in every other Colony: "The Associations first, in part, entered into, recommended by the people of this Colony, and adopted by what is called "'the Continental Congress,' are now enforcing, throughout this country, with the greatest rigour. A Committee has been chosen in every "County, whose business it is to carry the Association of the Congress "into execution: which Committee assumes an authority to inspect the "books, invoices, and all other secrets of the trade and correspondence "of Merchants; to watch the conduct of every Inhabitant, without distinction; and to send for all such as come under their suspicion, into "their presence, to interrogate them respecting all matters which, at "their pleasure, they think fit objects of their inquiry, and to 'stigmatize,' as they term it, such as they find transgressing what they "are now hardy enough to call 'the Laws of the Congress,' which 'stigmatizing' is no other than inviting the vengeance of an outrageous "and lawless mob, to be exercised upon the unhappy victims."—(The Earl of Dunmore to the Earl of Dartmouth, "WILLIAMSBURG," [Virginia,] "December 24, 1774," laid before the House of Commons, February 15, 1775.—Almon's Parliamentary Register, House of Commons, First Session, Fourteenth Parliament, i., 185, 186.)

being disturbed, by any one; and James De Lancey, who had been the Sheriff of the County, since June, 1770, and David Dayton, who had been the Surrogate, since June, 1766, and John Bartow, who had been the Clerk of the County, since April, 1760, each in his appointed official place, continued to discharge the official duties which were incumbent on them, and to receive and to enjoy the emoluments which those several offices secured to them—the Courts of the County continued their several Sessions, at the appointed times; and, as we have said, with occasional individual or neighborhood exceptions, a general quiet prevailed, a quiet which preceded a terrible convulsion, as the reader will shortly see.

The machinery of government which had been created by the revolutionary elements, within and without the Colony of New York, was, very soon, put in motion. It was composed of only a series of conclaves, each of which exercised, arbitrarily, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial functions, unrestrained by either constitutional or statutory provisions, and controlled, in whatever it determined to do or not to do, only by the individual impulses of such, within this Colony, as the Livingstons and the Morrises, the Van Cortlandts and the Thomases, and as James Duane and John Jay, men, in every instance, who were distinguished for their entire disregard of and contempt for the unfranchised and lowly masses, of every class, as well as of those who were franchished, but not "well-born"—the former being looked on, by them, as fit only for labor and for fighting; and the latter as no better than the others, unless on election-days—and who represented only the uncontrolled and purely aristocratic prejudices and antipathies and the equally uncontrolled and malignant partisan animosities and jealousies of those who, during many years, had been excluded from official life, and who, by the whirligig of rebellion, were, then, first enjoying, in an extremely diluted form, what they had so long and so anxiously hankered for.[1]

The Congress of the Continent assembled at Philadelphia, agreeably to order, on Wednesday, the tenth of May, 1775; and, ten Colonies being represented—only three of the Delegates from New York having been present, that Colony was not counted—it was formally organized by the election of Peyton Randolph, of Virginia, as its President, and Charles Thomson, of Pennsylvania, as its Secretary.[2] The history of its doings, generally, is known to every intelligent person, and need not be repeated, unless in such instances as particularly related to Westchester-county or to those who were within the bounds of that County, during the period of the War of the Revolution.

On Monday, the twenty-second of May, 1775, a number of those who had been designated as Deputies from the several Counties of the Colony, assembled at the Exchange, in the City of New York, for the purpose of forming a Provincial Congress; but, because they conceived there was not a sufficient number of Deputies present, they adjourned until the following day, without having attempted to organize. On the latter day, [Tuesday, May 23, 1775,] those Deputies who were then present assembled at the Exchange, "the Deputies of a majority of the Counties" having appeared; and a "Provincial Congress for the "Colony of New-York" was organized by the election of Peter Van Brugh Livingston—one of the most violent of the former "Committee of Correspondence," a brother of the Lord of the Manor of Livingston, and a brother-in-law and partner in business of that Earl of Stirling, so called, who figured so largely in the military history of the War of the Revolution—to be its President; and John McKesson and Robert Benson, the latter a brother of that Egbert Benson whose extraordinary election as a Deputy from Duchess-county to the earlier Provincial Convention, has been already noticed, were elected to be its Secretaries.[3] Although the doings of that body are less generally known than those of the Continental Congress, the purposes of this work will not require any further reference to them, than to such portions as relate particularly, to Westchester-county or to those who were within that County, and to such other portions thereof as, in their effects, affected that County or its inhabitants, during the period of the War of the Revolution.

As has been already stated, the local Committee for Westchester-county was created on the eighth of May, 1775, ninety members having been miraculously created out of the material of which twenty-three were actually composed; and Gilbert Drake was made its Chairman.[4] Micah Townsend, subsequently holding other offices of honor, in both Westchester and Cumberland-counties, was made the Secretary of that Committee;[5] and its doings, as far as they were

[1] It was well-said by Henry C. Van Schaack, in his Life of his father, "It will scarcely now be credited that powers so undefined and extraordinary should have been intrusted to a few individuals, by a people so "jealous of encroachments; whose sense of liberty was so keen as to "'snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze;' and who, "on their own part, had gone to war against a preamble."—Van Schaack's Life of Peter Van Schaack, 67.

The barbarities which were officially inflicted on individuals and families, in many instances only for an opinion extorted by their persecutors, without an overt act or the inclination to commit one, as those barbarities have been officially recorded, were perfectly shocking: and some of those which were inflicted on residents of Westchester-county, under the guidance of such notable Westchester-county men as John Jay and Gouverneur Morris, will find places in other parts of this narrative.

[2] Journal of the Congress, "PHILADELPHIA, Wednesday, May 10, 1775."

[3] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "CITY OF NEW-YORK, May 22nd, "1775," and addition, including the proceedings on the following day.

[4] Credentials of Delegates to Provincial Congress, May 8, 1775.—Historical Manuscripts relative to the War of the Revolution: Credentials of Delegates, xxiv., 133; Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 108, NEW-YORK, Thursday, May 11, 1775.

The Credentials mentioned above were signed "GILBERT DRAKE, "Chairman;" but those of the Delegates elected to the Second Provincial Congress, signed by the same person, bear the signature of "GILBERT "H. DRAKE, Chairman."—(Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Credentials of Delegates, xxiv., 67.)

[5] Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Credentials of Delegates, xxiv., 67.

recorded in the annals of the County, will be duly noticed, as the narrative progresses.

The organization of the Provincial Congress, on the twenty-third of May, 1775, has been already mentioned and described :[1] a more particular description of the membership of that body which, in the interest of those who were in rebellion, was to take places beside the several departments of the legally constituted Colonial Government, in the government of the Colony, and which was to wield so important an influence over all who were within the Colony, seems to be incumbent on us, in this place.

Of the fourteen Counties of which the Colony of New York was then composed, thirteen were properly designated "the Counties," or "the country Counties," since they were mainly occupied by communities of farmers, unless in the instances of the frontier Counties, in which hunters and trappers and surveying parties and, not unfrequently, families and villages of the aborigines, afforded considerable portions of their continually changing populations. Of these thirteen rural Counties, some of the inhabitants of Albany and Duchess and Westchester and Queens made pretensions to something of social superiority, somewhat akin to the aristocracy of the City of New York ; but, in none of them, unless in Albany-county, was there any pretension to a controlling local aristocracy ; and in all of them, the actual tillers of the soil largely outnumbered all other classes, on the Census-lists. From such widely dissimilar constituencies, in town and country, therefore, even from those who were not widely separated and differently situated, there could not be expected Delegations to the Provincial Congress who were homogeneous in their characters and dispositions and inclinations; and as all those rural Delegations possessed more or less of the elements which prevailed among those who were nominally their respective constituencies, it was to be a work of time and patience and skill, in partisan and factional discipline, to bring all of them into "working order," in the interest of the controlling, or revolutionary, faction of the aristocracy—a work of which notice will be taken, hereafter.

The City and County of New York, of course, was represented in the Provincial Congress by the extremes of both conservatism and of radicalism, with a generous sprinkling of those who favored that political association which promised the greater pecuniary profits ; and the several Delegations from Albany and Queens and Westchester and Duchess-counties, respectively contained, also, more or less of mixed memberships. From the remaining nine Counties, the Delegations were generally smaller in number; and, very largely, especially in the earlier days of the existence of the Congress, they were composed of those who had honestly come for the purpose of protecting the Colony from the wrongs to which the Home Government was said to have subjected it ; but, at the same time, their inclinations were peaceful; and they preferred a reconciliation with Great Britain, instead of a Civil War, which had been already commenced; and, because they had not yet been corrupted by the social influences of life in the City nor by the allurements of official plunder, they were ready to join with all or with any, regardless of their factional affiliations, who entertained similar views, in the practical establishment of those fundamental principles. The individual members of the first Provincial Congress of New York, at the opening and during the earlier period of the existence of that body, may, therefore, be classed as, first, the avowed Conservatives, who were led by such as John De Lancey and Benjamin Kissam and Abraham Walton and Richard Yates and George Folliot and Walter Franklin; as, second, the "Corporal's Guard" of avowed Revolutionists, who were led by John Morin Scott and Alexander McDougal and Abraham Brasier ; as, third, a larger number, those who, under the guise of patriotism, were aiming at nothing else than at places and at the influences and emoluments to be produced by those places, who were led by the Livingstons and the Van Cortlandts, by Gouverneur Morris and John Thomas and Melanthon Smith and Abraham Ten Broeck and Egbert Dumond and Nathaniel Woodhull and John Sloss Hobart ; and as, last, outnumbering all others, those who had left their several rural homes and come to the City of New York, for the purpose of serving their country, without having had, at that time, any other aim.

As the several Delegations voted as units, the votes of the several Counties having been cast in accordance with the determination of the majority of the Delegates of each who were then present, the votes of individual Delegates, unless in instances of formal dissent, are not recorded ; but the conservatism of the organized Congress, as an aggregate, was seen, immediately after the organization of that body and the adoption of its necessary Rules of Order, on the first day of the Session, when Isaac Low, of the City of New York, who is already so well known to the reader, had commenced the work of centralizing all of political authority and power which were within the Colony, except those of the local police, in the Continental Congress, a work which has been persistently continued until this day, by men of the same classes of society and politics, and for the same purposes; and when, very promptly and very aptly, Gouverneur Morris, of the County of Westchester, who was already conspicuously notorious for his contemptuous disregard of the personal and political rights of the unfranchised masses of the Colonists, who were only "poor reptiles" in his aristocratic vocabulary,[2] had seconded the motion. The Resolution which Isaac Low had thus offered, was in these words :

[1] Vide page 267, ante.

[2] See his letter to Mr. Penn, pages 187, 188, ante.

"RESOLVED, As the opinion of this Congress, that im-
"plicit obedience ought to be paid to every recom-
"mendation of the Continental Congress, for the gen"eral regulation of the associated Colonies; but this "Congress is competent to and ought, freely, to de"liberate and determine on all matters relative to the "internal police of this Colony."[1]

Such a Resolution, so evidently in the interest of the master-spirits of the revolt and in that of the most ultra of the aristocracy of the Colony, at the same time so radically subversive of those fundamental principles of government which were professed to have been the basis of the existing Rebellion against the Mother Country, very reasonably excited immediate alarm; and, notwithstanding the Delegates were scarcely warm in their seats, the two ill-concealed monarchists who were temporarily masquerading, within the Provincial Congress, as republicans, and those, of the same class, elsewhere, in whose behalf the Resolution had been offered, were very effectually snubbed—on a motion of John Morin Scott, the very able leader of the handful of ultra-revolutionists, seconded by David Clarkson, both of the City of New York, the Resolution was defeated, only Richmond-county having voted in favor of it,[2] neither the mover nor the seconder of it having received the support of the County of which he professed to have been a proper representative.[3]

The signal rebuke which the not yet corrupted "country gentlemen," members of the Provincial Congress of New York, had thus given to those who had proposed to make the Colony of New York and all which it possessed subject, in all its relations, except in the local power of police, to a foreign body over whom neither the individual Colonists nor the aggregated Colony could possibly have exercised the slightest control, and by whom both the individual Colonists and the Colony in its entirety would have been subjected to an absolutely despotic control by those, of other Colonies, who already envied the rising greatness of New York, appears to have been effective, in that direction; but, two days afterwards, the little ultra-revolutionary clique, within the Congress, taking courage from the evidently independent spirit which had been manifested by the rural Delegations, in the former vote, and hoping that the same spirit of antagonism to the monarchical inclinations, which those "country gentlemen" had then presented, would rest, peacefully and usefully, on an inclination in the opposite direction, made a movement, within the Congress, in behalf of Revolution and Rebellion and a Civil War.

As the Colony of New York had not yet given that public testimony of its entire and cordial accession to the confederacy of the revolted Colonies which had been given to it by the other Colonies, in the express approbation, by each, of the proceedings of the Continental Congress of 1774, of which proceedings detailed mention has been made in other portions of this narrative, an attempt was made, in the Provincial Congress, on the twenty-fifth of May, to supply that previously omitted ratification and approval of the proceedings of that already notable Congress, and, by that ratification and approval, to carry the Colony of New York within the circle of the confederacy of the revolt, and to make her subject to influences and obligations from which she had previously been free. For those purposes, and for others which were not less important although they were less visible, John Morin Scott, the leader of the revolutionary clique, moved "in the words following, to wit:

"As this Colony has not as yet given that public
"testimony of their entire and cordial accession to
"the confederacy of the Colonies on this Continent
"which has been given by the other Colonies, in their "express approbation of the proceedings of the last
"Continental Congress, I move that it be

"RESOLVED, That this Congress do fully approve
"of the proceedings of the said Congress."

This Resolution was promptly seconded by Thomas Smith, a brother of William and of Joshua Hett Smith who subsequently became more widely known than they were, at that time; and it is evident that a defeat of that well-devised plan, also, had not been considered as even probable, by those who had devised it. But, as we are informed, "debates arose on "the said motion"—there were grave questions, at that time, concerning the propriety of such an approval of all the proceedings of that first Congress, as was proposed by the leaders of the ultra-revolutionists—and the rural Delegations again determined on the side of peace and reconciliation and Colonial independence from all foreign influences, by postponing the further consideration of the proposition, without day,[4] where it has remained, from that day until the present.

It is more than possible that the avowed Conservative elements within the Provincial Congress had been largely instrumental in securing both these votes, in opposition to the discordant efforts, successively, of the ultra-aristocracy, represented by Isaac Low and Gouverneur Morris, and of the ultra-revolu-

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "5 ho., P.M., May 23d."

[2] The vote of Richmond-county, in this early instance, is very remarkable, especially when it is considered in connection with the later instances of that County's want of sympathy with both the Continental Congress and those who engineered that notable body.

This vote also affords a lesson of the greatest significance, illustrative of the effects of that ill-considered policy of uniformity in political opinions, enforced by a military power, which the Provincial Congress, in its later and more corrupt days, adopted and enforced—by the adoption and enforcement of such an extremely violent policy, instead of one in which conciliation and local peace might have been the more prominent features, the inhabitants of Richmond-county were violently repelled, by the ultra-revolutionists, as others like-situated were similarly repelled, compelling them to seek first, protection, and, next, fellowship, among those with whom they had, previously, had no sympathy.

[3] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "5 ho., P.M., May 23d."

[4] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "5 ho., P.M., May 25th."

tionary faction, represented by John Morin Scott and Thomas Smith; but, whatever may have led to the practical rejection of those two propositions, each of which tended toward the centralization of the entire authority and all the power of the several Colonies, in the Congress of the Continent, thereby destroying the autonomy of each of the Colonies, without subjecting that Congress, in its exercise of that authority and that power, to any other limitation than the unbridled will of a majority of the Delegations composing it, this is clearly evident: the Provincial Congress intended, by those two adverse votes, to declare that, though a purely local body, it was, nevertheless, determined not to divest itself, even by implication, of that unquestioned governmental supremacy, within the Colony of New York, which it had already acquired, no matter how; that, on the contrary, it had determined to retain, within itself, and to continue to exercise, unhampered by the interference of any other body, the several legislative, and judicial, and executive authorities, within the Colony, which it already held, no matter by what warrant; that it would yield to the Continental Congress, if it yielded anything to that foreign body, nothing else than a voluntary acquiescence; that it would promulgate the Orders and Resolutions and "recommendations" of that other Congress, if it promulgated them at all, not as original and supreme rules of action of all who were or who might be within the Colony of New York, but as the bases of its own local enactments, to the latter of which, per se, and not to the former, it required the implicit obedience of all those within or to come within the Colony, whose supreme political ruler it assumed to be and to remain. In short, from the beginning, the Provincial Congress of New York recognized no superior, controlling power, except that of its own actual constituents; and, at no subsequent period—not even when the Governor of New York declined the release of Alexander McLeod, though demanded by both the Government of Great Britain and the President of the United States—has there been any more resolute supporter of the Sovereignty of the several States, any more determined opponent of a transfer to any other body, from the People—which latter word is only an equivalent term for the State, and, in New York, if not elsewhere, is used, officially, to designate the State, itself—of the original authority, the Sovereignty of those several Peoples, than was that revolutionary Congress of the Colony of New York, in its opposition, on the one hand, to its ultra-aristocratic masterspirits, and, on the other, to the ultra-revolutionists among its members, early in the year 1775.

As a portion of the history f those times, reference may be made, in this place, to an incident which occurred in the Provincial Congress, soon after that body had rejected the Resolution which Isaac Low and Gouverneur Morris had offered, of which mention has been made. On the same day, the first day of the Session of that revolutionary body, during the same afternoon, a motion was made by Alexander McDougal, a Presbyterian, providing for the appointment of a Committee of two, to apply to all the Ministers in the City who could pray in English, "to "make such an arrangement among themselves as "would enable them alternately to open the Congress, "every morning, with prayer;" but Gouverneur Morris, Lewis Graham, Colonel Philip Van Cortlandt, Colonel James Holmes, Stephen Ward, and John Thomas, Junior, six of the nine members of the Congress who were from Westchester-county, probably recognizing the evident impropriety of spreading their politically dirty hands before Him who giveth no favor to those who loveth and maketh a lie, dissented from a majority of the Congress, and caused their dissent to be entered on the Journal of that body.[1]

On Friday, the twenty-sixth of May, the Provincial Congress adopted, unanimously, a Resolution, offered by Gilbert Livingston of Duchess-county and seconded by John De Lancey of New York City, providing for the appointment of a Committee of one from each County, "to draw "up and report a proper Resolve of this Con- "gress, recommending to the different Counties "in this Colony, to form themselves into County "Committees, and also into Sub-committees for their "respective Townships and Districts, and recommend- "ing the signing of the General Association; and also "to prepare and report to this Congress a draft of a "letter to be sent to the Committees and other per- "sons in the several Counties, for the above purposes, "and with copies of such Resolution." In that Committee of one from each County, Major Philip Van Cortlandt represented Westchester-county;[2] and, on the following day, [May 27, 1775] it made a Report, in due form.[3]

The Resolution which was thus reported, was in these words: "RESOLVED: That it be recommended, "and it is hereby accordingly recommended, to all the "Counties in this Colony, (who have not already done "it,) to appoint County Committees, and also Sub- "committees for their respective Townships, Pre- "cincts, and Districts, without delay, in order to carry "into execution the Resolutions of the Continental "and this Provincial Congress.

"And that it is also recommended to every Inhabitant "of this Colony, who has hitherto neglected to sub- "scribe the General Association, to do it with all con- "venient speed. And for these purposes that the "Committees in the respective Counties in which "Committees have been formed, do tender the said "Association to every Inhabitant within the several "Districts in each County. And that such persons,

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress "5 ho., P.M., May 23d."
[2] Journal of the Congress, "4 ho., P.M., May 26th, 1775."
[3] Journal of the Congress, "Die Saturnii, 9 ho., A.M., May 27th, 1775."

"in those Counties or Districts who have not appointed Committees, as shall be appointed by the members of this Congress representing such Counties and Districts respectively,[1] do make such tender as aforesaid in such Counties and Districts respectively; and that the said Committees and persons respectively do return the said Association and the names of those who shall neglect or refuse to sign the same, to this Congress, by the fifteenth day of July next, or sooner, if possible."

The letter which was reported, as a companion to this Resolution, was in the following words:

"NEW-YORK, May 29, 1775.

"GENTLEMEN:

"You will see by the enclosed Resolution of this Congress, that it is recommended to such of the Counties as have not already formed Committees, to do it without delay, and that such of the Inhabitants of this Colony as have hitherto neglected to subscribe the General Association, do it, so as to enable you to make a return within the time limited in the Resolution.

"As the execution of this Resolve is committed to your care, we request you to use your best endeavours to see that this recommendation be complied with. It may, nevertheless, be proper to inform you that it is the sense of this Congress that no coercive steps ought to be used to induce any person to sign the Association. The propriety of the measure, the example of the other Counties, and the necessity of maintaining a perfect union in every part of this Colony, it is presumed, are sufficient reasons to induce the Inhabitants of your County to comply with this requisition."

The Resolution and letter which were thus reported to the Provincial Congress, were taken up, for consideration, on the twenty-ninth of May; and, after some amendments had been made therein, they were "approved, agreed to, and resolved;" and five hundred copies were ordered to be printed; and as many copies of the letter as should be necessary were ordered to be signed by the President and delivered to the members of the Congress, "to be by them directed."[2]

As the County of Westchester had already been favored with the appointment of a County-committee, or what purported to have been such a Committee,[3] it is probable that it was not considered necessary, in that instance, to interfere with that former appointment; and there is very little evidence, as far as we have been able to find any, which indicates that the several Towns throughout the County paid any attention to the recommendation of the Congress, for the appointment of Town-committees;[4] and there is no evidence whatever, that any attempt was made, in any of those Towns, to obtain the signatures of the body of the inhabitants of the County, to the General Association which had been enacted by the Continental Congress of 1774, nor to any other such Association[5]—the Provincial Congress had done no more than, nominally, to "recommend" to the inhabitants to sign the Association;[6] it not only did not authorize the employment of force in order to obtain signatures thereto, but it expressly disclaimed, in advance, the entertainment of any such idea;[7] the Congress itself, by a formal vote, had postponed a formal approval of that General Association as well as all of the other doings of the Continental Congress, who had enacted it;[8] and, for these reasons, as well as for others with which the reader is already familiar, the conservative yeomanry of Westchester-county was not in a hurry to either recognize or sign it.

The Committee of the Provincial Congress who had been appointed to consider the very important subject of the Currency, for the support of the Rebellion, made a very clear and able Report, on the thirtieth of May, in which some of the commercial troubles produced or likely to be produced by the Rebellion were very graphically presented; and an issue

[1] The authority which appears to have been vested in members of the Provincial Congress, to appoint local Committees where the inhabitants had not done so, probably originated in that Congress, in an earlier secret meeting of that body; but no record of any such action is seen on its published Journal—like the Secret Journals of the Continental Congress, those of the Provincial Congress of New York, could they also be published, would undoubtedly throw different tints of light and color on many a romance, called "history."

[2] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Lunæ 4 ho., P.M., May 29th, "1775."

[3] See pages 258, 259, ante.

[4] There were Committees in a small number of the Towns, at a later period; but there is no evidence, as far as we have knowledge, that they originated in the recommendation of the Provincial Congress, nor as early as in 1775.

[5] The Association, duly signed by those who would sign it and duly noting those who declined to do so, was to be returned to the Secretary of the Provincial Congress, on or before the fifteenth of July, 1775. The files of that Congress, which are preserved in the office of the Secretary of State, at Albany, show, however, that the only Counties or Towns which made any Returns of Associators, in response to this Resolution, were Orange, Ulster, Suffolk, Duchess, one District in Charlotte, three Districts in Cumberland, and a few scattering names, not more than fifty, in Queens; but there is no such Return from Westchester-county; there is no such Return among the archives of the County, in the office of the County-clerk; and we have failed to find anything resembling such a Return, in the offices of the Town-clerks, in the several Towns.

The signer of the following, which was sent from Amenia, in Duchess-county, is classed among the "3 Tories" of that "Precinct:"

"June ye 8th, Ad 1775. This may sertyfy all pepel whome It may "cornsern that I the Svlscriber am willing to do what is best and "wright to secure the priviligs of a mariga both sivel and sacred and to "follow the advise of our Reverend congres so far as they do the word "of God and the exzample of Jesvs Christ and I hope in the grace of God "no more will be required, as witness my hand,

"JOHN GARNSEY."

[6] See the Resolutions of the Provincial Congress, page 270, ante.

[7] See the general Circular Letter of the Congress, on this page, ante.

The same declaration, more distinctly uttered, may be seen in the Letter of the Provincial Congress to Christopher Yates and Major Willet Fonda, of Tryon-county; in that from the same to Colonel James Rogers, of Kent, in Cumberland-county; and in that from the same to Jacob Bailey and Colonel Peters, of Gloucester-county—all of them dated "IN PROVIN-"CIAL CONGRESS, NEW YORK, the 31st May, 1775."

[8] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "3 ho., P.M., May 29th, [1929-93, ante.

of that Currency by the Continental Congress, with specified provisions for the payment of it, was recommended [1]—the original proposition for the emission of those immense amounts of "Continental-bills," which, subsequently and with the help of friendly legislation in the Continental Congress, afforded so favorable an opportunity for repudiation by the United States, "the faith of the Nation" to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Report of the Committee was "fully debated "and considered," by the Provincial Congress, and, by an unanimous vote, it was adopted, with an order transmitting a copy of it to the Delegates of the Colony, in the Continental Congress.[2]

A circumstance occurred, within the Provincial Congress, early in its Session, which requires particular notice in this place.

One week after that body had been originally organized, [May 30, 1775] Benjamin Kissam, of the City of New York, "moved in the words following, "to wit: 'Forasmuch as a reconciliation between "Great Britain and these Colonies, on constitutional "principles, is essential to the well-being of both "countries, and will prevent the horrors of a Civil "War, in which this Continent is now about to be "involved, it is, therefore, the indispensable duty "of this Congress, to communicate to the Delegates "of this Colony, in Continental Congress, their sen-"timents respecting the terms of such reconciliation; "I, therefore, move that a Committee be appointed "to prepare and state the terms on which such re-"conciliation may be tendered to Great Britain, con-"sistent with the just Liberties and Freedom of the "subject, in America, to the intent that the same, "when approved by this Congress, may be laid before "the said Delegates, as our sense, on this important "subject, to be humbly submitted to their considera-"tion."

A question of such great importance and so distasteful to many of the Deputies, was reasonably discussed with much warmth; and it is very evident that, had the vote been taken, at that time, the motion would have been adopted by the Provincial Congress. It was evidently approved by a majority of the Counties; but, if the vote could be postponed, changes might be effected, by fair means or by foul —there were astute and experienced politicians within and around that Provincial Congress—and three of the Counties who were opposed to the motion resorted to the tenth Rule of the Congress,[3] not resorted to, on any other occasion, during the entire period of the existence of that Congress, to secure that advantage and, thereby, if possible, to defeat the motion—"at the request of the Deputies of the City "and County of Albany and the Counties of "Ulster, Suffolk, and Charlotte," it was "ORDERED, "That the same be deferred."[4]

Although the Rule required the Congress to resume the consideration of the motion on "the next day," the Rule was disregarded;[5] and, on the following day [June 1, 1775,] Mr. Kissam, with the leave of the Congress, withdrew the motion, "in order to "amend it."[6]

On the second of June, the amended motion was submitted by Mr. Kissam, "in the words following, "to wit: Forasmuch as a reconciliation between "Great Britain and these Colonies, on constitutional "principles, is essential to the well-being of both "countries, and will prevent the horrors of a Civil "War, in which this Continent is now about to be "involved: I move that a Committee be appointed "to prepare a plan of such accommodation, and re-"port the same to this House."

The revolutionary faction, led by John Morin Scott and Alexander McDougal, resolutely opposed the motion; and the last-named, seconded by Abraham Brasher, moved for the previous question, in order to defeat it; but only Ulster, Orange, Suffolk, and Duchess-counties favored the motion for the previous question; and it was defeated—Philip Van Cortlandt, differing from all his associates from Westchester-county, voting with the revolutionary faction. The motion of Mr. Kissam was then carried, without any dissent, except that of Philip Van Cortlandt, who recorded that dissent on the Journal of the Congress.

Colonel Woodhull, of Suffolk, one of those who had opposed the motion, then moved, as an amendment of the motion, the addition of these words: "That we may be ready, if we shall think it neces-"sary, to communicate our sentiments upon that sub-"ject to our Delegates at Philadelphia;" which was subsequently adopted, without a division, in the following words: "RESOLVED, therefore, That, although "we would, by no means, presume to dictate to the "General Continental Congress, yet it is highly nec-"essary that this House be prepared to give our sen-"timents to our Delegates, in the said Congress, upon "such plan of accommodation." With the appointment of John Morin Scott, Isaac Low, Alexander McDougal, Benjamin Kissam, and Thomas Smith, of the City of New York; John Sloss Hobart, Colonel Nathaniel Woodhull, and Thomas Tredwell, of Suffolk; Robert Yates and Peter Silvester, of the City and County of Albany; Gouverneur Morris, of

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 9 ho., A.M., May "30th, 1775."

[2] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 9 ho., A.M., May "30, 1775."

[3] "10th.—That no question shall be determined on the day that it is "agitated, if three Counties shall request that it be deferred to the "next day."—(Rules of the Congress, in the Journal of the Provincial Congress, Tuesday, 23rd of May, 1775.)

[4] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "5 ho., P.M., May 30, 1775."

[5] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., A.M., May "31, 1775."

[6] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Jovis, 9 ho., June 1, 1775."

Westchester-county; Ephraim Paine, of Duchess-county; John Williams, of Queens-county; and Paul Micheau, of Richmond-county—six of whom, including Messrs. Scott, McDougal, Hobart, Woodhull, Paine, and Tredwell, were undoubtedly opposed to the entire movement—for a Committee, with instructions to "make report with all convenient speed," the subject rested, temporarily.[1]

It was not until the twenty-second of June, that the Committee was ready to report to the Provincial Congress the result of its deliberations on the subject which had been referred to it. On that day, the Report was presented, and read, twice, when the following very significant Order thereon was made by the Congress:

"ORDERED, That the same be taken into consider-"ation on Saturday morning next; that the mem-"bers of each County have leave to take one copy "thereof, each copy to be numbered by one of the "Secretaries, who shall take a memorandum of the "name of the member who shall take with him such "copy and the number of the copy by him taken, "that all such copies may, on Saturday next, be re-"turned to and filed with the Secretaries; and all "the members are directed by the President, from "the Chair, to take the utmost care to preserve the "said copies secret, and to keep secret the subject "matter thereof. And it is agreed that no member "shall transcribe the said Report, or take any copy "from the copies taken out of the House for the use "of the members of each County; and that all the "said copies shall, on Saturday next, be returned to "the Secretaries."[2]

On the following Saturday [June 24, 1775,] the Provincial Congress proceeded to consider the Report, agreeable to its Order made on the preceding Thursday; and, after the Report had been read and re-read, debated and amended, during the greater portion of that day and a portion of the following Tuesday, the proposed "Plan of Accommodation "with Great Britain," thus amended, was adopted, apparently with much cordiality, by all, except by those of the revolutionary faction.[3]

That very important paper, the "Plan of Accommo-"dation with Great Britain," which is essential to a proper understanding of the character of the doings of the Provincial Congress, at a later period of its existence, was, in its completed form, in these words:

"That all the Statutes and parts of Statutes of the "British Parliament, which are held up for repeal by "the late Continental Congress, in their Association, "dated the twentieth day of October, 1774, and all the "Statutes of the British Parliament, passed since that "day, restraining the Trade and Fishery of Colonies "on this Continent, ought to be repealed.

"That from the necessity of the case, Britain ought "to regulate the Trade of the whole Empire, for the "general benefit of the whole, and not for the sep-"arate interest of any particular part; and that, from "the natural Right of Property, the powers of Taxa-"tion ought to be confined to the Colony Legislatures, "respectively.

"THEREFORE, That the monies raised as Duties, "upon the Regulations of Trade, ought to be paid "into the respective Colony Treasuries, and be subject "to the disposal of their Deputies.

"That in those Colonies whose Representatives in "General Assembly are now chosen for a greater term "than three years, such Assemblies, for the future, "ought, in their duration, not to exceed that "term.

"That the Colonists are ready and willing to sup-"port the Civil Government within their respec-"tive Colonies; and, on proper requisitions, to "assist in the general defence of the Empire, in "as ample manner as their respective abilities will "admit.

"That if objections be made that a resort to a "variety of Colony Legislatures, for general aids, is "inconvenient, and that large, unappropriated Grants "to the Crown, from America, would endanger the "Liberty of the Empire, then the Colonies are ready "and willing to assent to a Continental Congress, "deputed from the several Colonies, to meet with a "President appointed by the Crown, for the purpose "of raising and apportioning their general aids, upon "application made by the Crown, according to the "advice of the British Parliament, to be judged of by "the said Congress.

"And as the free enjoyment of the Rights of Con-"science is, of all others, the most valuable branch of "human Liberty; and the indulgence and establish-"ment of Popery, all along the interior confines of "the old Protestant Colonies, tends not only to "obstruct their growth but weaken their security; "that neither the Parliament of Great Britain nor "any other earthly Legislature or Tribunal ought or "can interfere or interpose, in any wise, howsoever, "in the religious and ecclesiastical concerns of the "Colonies.

"That the Colonies, respectively, are entitled to a "free and exclusive power of legislation, within "themselves, respectively, in all cases of internal "polity, whatsoever, subject only to the negative of "their Sovereign, in such manner as has been, here-"tofore, accustomed.

"RESOLVED: That no one Article of the afore-"going Report be considered preliminary to another, "so as to preclude an accommodation without such "Article; and that no part of the said Report be

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 9 ho., A.M., June 2, "1775."

[2] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Jovis, 9 ho., A.M., June 22, "1775."

[3] "Journal of the Provincial Congress," 4 ho., P.M., Die Martis, June "27, 1775."

"deemed binding or obligatory upon the Repre-"sentatives of this Colony, in Continental Congress."[1]

The principles on which that Plan was constructed and the methods which were proposed for the execution of its provisions were so radically subversive of all the purposes for which Colonies were established and protected; so singularly presumptuous in claiming all the privileges and benefits enjoyed by Englishmen without assuming any of the burdens under which Englishmen were then staggering; so unaccountably inconsistent in conceding the authority of the Parliament to regulate their Trade and to levy Duties on their Imports while, at the same time, they denied the authority of that Parliament to impose Taxes on them, for general purposes, in the same manner and to the same extent and for the same purposes that it imposed similar Taxes on Englishmen, in England; so unduly arrogant in dictating to the Home Government and to the Parliament what they should do and what they should not do—including, in the former, a removal of all those obstructions to the "illicit Trade" of the Colonists, which that Home Government and that Parliament had interposed—as the price of their indirect proffer of an abandonment of their rebellious movements and of their return to their duties, as subjects of the Crown, that it is difficult to bring one's self to a belief that the framers and supporters of that proposed Plan were really sincere in proposing it, unless with the qualification that their enthusiasm and the seeming indifference of the Home and Colonial Governments had blinded them to its remarkable peculiarities, and induced them to regard the Colonists as something superior, in their political standing, to other subjects of the Crown—as something more than subjects, owing obedience to those in authority and to the Laws of the land. Such a Plan, had it been submitted to the Home Government and to the Parliament, would, unquestionably, have aggravated instead of conciliated, and have widened the breach which then separated the Colonies and the Mother Country, instead of closing it. It is serviceable, however, to the careful student of the history of that period, to indicate how much the Rebellion had already palled upon the senses of even those who were its local leaders; how much a reconciliation was secretly hankered for, even among those who were blustering in fictitious bravery; how much of hypocrisy there was among those who were loudly pretending to be "patriots," in harmony with similar "patriots" in each of the other Colonies, all of them zealously and noisily crowding the entire Continent into an open and unqualified Rebellion, while, at the same time, they were secretly determining, among themselves, by how slight a bond they were bound to their associates in crime, how delicately constructed were their honor and their patriotism, and at what price the Home Government could purchase their adherence and their "patriotism" and their sympathy with their compatriots, whenever that Home Government should incline to enter the market of "patriot-"ism," for such a purpose.

At a very early period, the security of the pass at Kingsbridge appears to have attracted the attention of the revolutionary faction; and measures were taken with the evident intention of throwing up some defensive works, at that point, for the protection of the City.

Immediately after the receipt of intelligence concerning the raid of the Royal troops on Lexington and Concord, without any formal order from the Committee of One hundred, great numbers of men were employed in hauling the cannon from the City to Kingsbridge, in readiness for the work of intrenchment;[2] and on the fourth of May, the Committee "ordered, that Captain Sears, Captain Randall, and "Captain Fleming be a Committee to procure proper "judges to go and view the ground at or near Kings-"bridge, and report to this Committee, with all "convenient speed, whether it will answer the pur-"poses intended by it"[3]—although they were not described, the "purposes" referred to were, evidently, for the protection of the City from any irruption, by land, from the country Towns.

The published Proceedings of the Committee of One hundred, in the City of New York, make no mention of the doings of that Committee; and it is not probable that it accomplished anything, in the way of fortifying Kingsbridge; but, on the twenty-fifth of May, the Continental Congress agreed to the following Resolutions, "respecting New York," one of which relates to the defence of Kingsbridge. These Resolutions were in the following words:

"1.—RESOLVED, That a Post be immediately taken "and fortified at or near King's-Bridge, in the Colony "of New-York; and that the ground be chosen with "a particular view to prevent the communication "between the City of New-York and the country "from being interrupted by land.

"2.—RESOLVED, that a Post be also taken in the "Highlands, on each side of Hudson's River, and Bat-"teries erected in such manner as will most effectual-"ly prevent any Vessels passing, that may be sent to "harass the Inhabitants on the borders of said River; "and that experienced persons be immediately sent "to examine said River, in order to discover where it "will be most advisable and proper to obstruct the "Navigation.

"3.—RESOLVED, That the Militia of New-York be "armed and trained, and in constant readiness to act

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, 4 ho., P. M., Die Martis, June 27, 1775.

[2] Proceedings of the Council of the Colony of New York, "Monday, May 1, "1775."

[3] Minutes of the Committee of One hundred, Adjourned Meeting, "Thurs-"day morning, 4th May, 1775."

"at a moment's warning; and that a number of Men "be immediately embodied, and kept in that City, and "so disposed of as to give protection to the Inhabit- "ants, in case any insult should be offered by the "Troops that may land there, and to prevent any "attempts that may be made to gain possession of "the City, and interrupt its intercourse with the "country.

"4."—[RESOLVED.] "That it be left to the Provincial "Congress of New-York to determine the number of "men sufficient to occupy the several Posts above- "mentioned, and also that already recommended to be "taken at or near Lake George, as well as to guard the "City, Provided, the whole do not exceed the number "of three thousand men, to be commanded by such "Officers as shall be thereunto appointed by said "Provincial Congress, and to be governed by such "Rules and Regulations as shall be established by said "Congress, until farther order is taken by this Con- "gress; Provided, also, that if the said Provincial "Congress should be of opinion that the number pro- "posed will not be sufficient for the several services "above recommended, that the said Congress report "their sentiments upon this subject to this Congress, "as soon as may be.

"5."—[RESOLVED.] "That it be recommended to "the said Provincial Congress, that in raising those "Forces, they allow no Bounties or Clothing, and "that their Pay shall not exceed the establishment "of the New-England Colonies.

"6."—[RESOLVED.] "That it be further recom- "mended to the Provincial Congress, aforesaid, that "the Troops be enlisted to serve until the last day "of December next, unless this Congress shall direct "that they be sooner disbanded."[1]

On the following day, [May 26, 1775,] the Conti- nental Congress farther "RESOLVED, That it be recom- "mended to the Congress aforesaid, to persevere the "more vigorously in preparing for their defence, as it "is very uncertain whether the earnest endeavours of "this Congress to accommodate the unhappy differences "between Great Britain and the Colonies, by concilia- "tory measures, will be successful;" and, in addition, it "ORDERED, That the above Resolves, respecting "New-York, be transmitted by the President in a let- "ter, to the Provincial Congress of New-York; and "that it be particularly recommended to said Con- "gress, by the President, not to publish the foregoing "Resolves, but to keep them as secret as the nature of "the case requires."[2]

On the twenty-ninth of May, the Resolutions which had been thus adopted by the Continental Congress, were received by the Provincial Congress;[3] and on the following day, on motion of John Morin Scott, of the City of New-York, they were taken into consideration—that portion of them which directed the fortifying of Kingsbridge, was referred to Cap- tain Richard Montgomery, of Duchess-county, Henry Glenn and Robert Yates, of Albany-county, and Col- onel James Van Cortlandt and Colonel James Holmes, of Westchester-county, with orders "to view "the ground at or near King's Bridge, and report to "this Congress whether the ground near King's "Bridge will admit of making a fortification there, "that will be tenable; and at what particular place "the ground will admit of making the best and "most tenable fortification; and that they call to "their assistance such persons as they shall think "necessary, and make report to this Congress, with all "convenient speed:" that portion of them which directed the erection of fortifications in the High- lands, on the Hudson-river, was referred to Colonel James Clinton and Christopher Tappan, both of Ul- ster-county, with orders to "take to their assistance "such persons as they shall think necessary; to go to "the Highlands, and view the banks of Hudson's "river there; and to report to this Congress the most "proper place for erecting one or more fortifications; "and, likewise, an estimate of the expense that will "attend erecting the same."[4]

Both these Resolutions were initiatory of prolonged and not always harmonious and agreeable proceed- ings, both without and within the Provincial Con- gress and both without and within the Congress of the Continent, all of which can be considered with greater propriety in the local publications concerning the Towns of Kingsbridge and Cortlandt and in the general publications concerning the War of the Ameri- can Revolution, than in a general History of the County of Westchester; and, for that reason and with this introductory send-off, the construction of those military works to which the Resolutions referred will receive no further attention, in this narrative.

On the thirty-first of May, in its further considera- tion of the Resolutions of the Continental Congress, which have been already laid before the reader, the Provincial Congress resolved, "that it be recommended "to the Inhabitants of this Colony, in general, im- "mediately to furnish themselves with necessary arms "and ammunitions; to use all diligence to perfect "themselves in the military art; and, if necessary, to "form themselves into Companies, for that purpose, "until the further order of the Congress;" and it ordered the Resolution to be printed in the news- papers and in handbills. At the same time, it met the call of the Continental Congress, for men to oc- cupy the proposed posts at Kingsbridge and in the Highlands, for the protection of the City of New York, and for that of Lake George, referred to in the third and fourth Resolutions of that Congress, by re- solving that it "would use all possible diligence in

[1] Journal of the Continental Congress, "Thursday, May 25, 1775."

[2] Journal of the Continental Congress, "Friday, May 26, 1775."

[3] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Dies Lunæ, 4 hor., P.M., May "29th, 1775."

[4] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "5 hrs., P.M., May 30, 1775."

"embodying men according to the said Resolutions;" and by appointing a Committee "to report an ar-"rangement of the troops to be embodied for the "defence of this Colony; and to report such Rules "and Regulations as would be proper to be established "by this Congress, for the government of such "troops."[1]

The doings of the Provincial Congress were, of course, entirely in the interest of the Rebellion.

* * * * * * * *

Early in the Summer, as has been stated, the Continental Congress ordered the enlistment of a large armed force, of which three thousand were to be raised and put into the field by the Colony of New York. These troops were to be commanded by such Officers as should be thereunto appointed by the Provincial Congress; they were to be governed by such Rules and Regulations as that Congress should establish for that purpose; they were to be mustered into the service, to serve no longer than the last day of the succeeding December;[2] and as there was no enemy before them, and as little probability existed that there would be any one to molest them, during their short term of service, the proffered opportunity to take the field, as Continental Soldiers, appeared to be very inviting—it seemed, in fact, to promise what would be little else than an organized picnic-party, for the succeeding Summer and Autumn and early Winter months.

There were, of course, plenty of applications from those of the well-born, among the revolutionary faction and from among those who had been instrumental in bringing the Livingstons and the Morrises and others into authority, for each of the offices, in each of the four Regiments into which the levy on New York was arranged; but there was an evident backwardness, among the masses, from the beginning, in enlisting for "the private station;" there was a greater anxiety, among those who did enlist, concerning their pay and bounty and "under clothes," than for the welfare of the Colony; and, generally, there was very little inclination, any where, among those who had them, to exchange their peaceful occupations and their domestic comforts and their quiet homes, under such circumstances as then existed, for a distant encampment or a distant military post and the sometimes laborious and not always well-supplied and always irregular lives of soldiers, in garrison as well as in the field.

Of the four Regiments thus ordered, on the Continental Establishment, only the Fourth, or Duchess, appears to have had any connection with Westchester-county—James Holmes, of Bedford, an experienced soldier of the former War, was its Colonel;[3] and Philip Van Cortlandt, of Cortlandt Manor, who held, also, a Royal Commission of Major in the Colonial Militia, was its Lieutenant-colonel;[4] Barnabas Tuthill, of Southold, Suffolk county, was its Major;[5] Benjamin Chapman was its Quarter-master; and Ebenezer Haviland was its Surgeon.[6] Of the ten Companies of which the Regiment was composed, three were largely from Westchester-county—of one of these Jonathan Platt, of Bedford, was Captain,[7] David Dan, of Poundridge, was First Lieutenant;[8] and Manning Bull, of ———, was Second Lieutenant: of another of those Companies, Daniel Mills, of Bed-

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., A.M., May "31st, 1775."

[2] Journal of the Continental Congress, "Thursday, May 25, and Friday, "May 26, 1775—pages 274, 275, ante.

[3] James Holmes was the grandson of one of the original proprietors and settlers of the Town of Bedford. He was born in that Town, in 1737; and a Captain in the Army, during the War with France, in which he gained great credit. He was elected to the Provincial Convention for the appointment of Delegates to the Continental Congress of 1774; and he was a member of the Provincial Congress, by whom he was made Colonel of this Regiment. He went with his Regiment to the northern frontier, and occupied Ticonderoga, very much to his disgust; quarrelled with General Schuyler, who commanded in that Department; declined to continue in the service, after the term of the enlistment of his command had expired; became a Loyalist; took the Lieutenant-colonelcy of the Corps of the Westchester-county Refugees; continued to live in Bedford, until about 1810, when he removed to New Haven, where he died, on the eighth of July, 1824, aged eighty-seven years.

An extended notice of him may be seen in Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, ii., 334-336; and, in his Notes to that History (ii., 618–621.) Mr. de Lancey has re-produced, in full, an exceedingly interesting autobiographical tract, from the Colonel's own pen.

[4] Philip Van Cortlandt, eldest son of Pierre Van Cortlandt, was born in the City of New York, in 1749(?), and was a graduate of King's (now Columbia) College, in the class of 1758 (?). He was a Surveyor and a Country Merchant and Miller; a Major in the Westchester-county Militia, under Governor Tryon; and a member of the Provincial Congress by whom he was made Lieutenant-colonel of this Regiment. He continued in the military service, until the close of the War of the Revolution; after which he was one of the Commissioners of Forfeitures; represented Westchester-county in the Assembly, 1788-'9, 1789-'90; the Southern District, in the Senate, 1791-'4; his District, in Congress, 1793–1809; and died on the twenty-first of November, 1831.—(Bolton's History of Westchester-county, original edition, i., 58–60; the same, second edition, i., 111–112; etc.)

[5] Barnabas Tuthill was a resident of Southold; had not joined the Regiment, which was then at Ticonderoga, as late as the first of September, when he was in New York City, "unable to proceed for want of "money to pay his expenses." He appears to have returned to the service, in 1776; but, during the Summer, he was dismissed from the Army, at his own request.—(Journal of the Provincial Congress, "4 ho., P.M., "September 1st, 1775;" General McDougal to Robert Yates, "YONKERS, "21 October, 1776.")

[6] The Roster of the entire Regiment may be seen in the Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution—Military Committee, XXV., 531—in the office of the Secretary of State, at Albany.

[7] Jonathan Platt was an aged man, whom Mr. Bolton has erroneously made the great-grandfather of Hon. Lewis C. Platt of White Plains; he was Mr. Platt's grand-Uncle. He was elected a Delegate to the Provincial Convention called to elect Deputies to the Continental Congress of 1774; he was a member of the first County Committee of Westchester-county, in 1775; and a member of the fourth Provincial Congress, or, as it was called after a while, the Provincial Convention—that which declared the Independence of New York from the King of Great Britain, which had not been done by the Congress, at Philadelphia, on the fourth of July, 1776.

[8] David Dan was a member of the first County Committee of Westchester-county, in 1775, and a member of the Town Committee of Poundridge, in 1776. He was appointed to the command of a Company, in Colonel Thomas's Regiment, in August, 1776.

ford, was Captain;[1] Elijah Hunter, of the same Town, was First Lieutenant;[2] and John Bayley, of ———, was Second Lieutenant:[3] of the remaining Company, Ambrose Horton, apparently from the White Plains, was Captain;[4] David Palmer, of ———, was First Lieutenant;[5] and Samuel Tredwell Pell, of ———, was Second Lieutenant.[6] The names of none of those who held Warrants, as Non-commissioned Officers, in either of these Companies, have been preserved; and it is to be regretted that, except in the instance of the Bedford Company, the names of those who were in the ranks, as Privates, are no longer known. A considerable number of the latter classes, with no other claim to distinction than their physical ability to work or to fight and their good intentions, was probably taken from the yeomaury of Westchester-county; and, notwithstanding they were mostly detained at Ticonderoga, without having been permitted to join General Montgomery, before Quebec, as he particularly desired and requested they should do, there is no reason for supposing that they failed, in the slightest degree, to discharge every duty which was laid on them, satisfactorily to their commanding Officers. Some of them are said to have served in Canada;[7] but it is understood that the Regiment was discharged, at the close of the term for which it had been enlisted; and that the greater number returned, with honor, to their respective homes.

It will be remembered that the Continental Congress, among the Resolutions relating to the Colony of New York, which it adopted on the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth of May,[8] included a requisition "that the Militia of New-York be armed and trained "and in constant readiness to act at a moment's "warning," etc.; and that those Resolutions were duly transmitted to the Provincial Congress of that Colony.[9] After a prolonged consideration of the subject, by two Committees and by the body of the Provincial Congress,[10] on the ninth of August, a Report was made and adopted, providing for the complete re-organization of the Militia of the Colony, and for a complete change in the personnel of those who commanded it.[11] On the twenty-second of the same

[1] Captain Daniel Mills continued in the service, after the Regiment was disbanded, at the close of the year, serving as a Captain in Colonel Van Schaick's Regiment of the New York Line, in the Continental Army.

[2] Elijah Hunter was originally named for Second Lieutenant, with Samuel Haight, subsequently Sheriff of the County, as First Lieutenant. He was a member of the County Committee, representing Bedford, 1776–7; subsequently became a Captain in Van Cortlandt's Regiment; and left the service at the close of 1776.

[3] John Bayley evidently left the Regiment before it went into active service, since, in August, 1775, Miles Oakley, a member of the first County Committee, was appointed in his place, leaving the service at the end of the year.

The following paper, with the names of the men enlisted into this Company, is taken from the original manuscript, among the Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvii., 266; and will be interesting to those who have descended from the older families of Bedford:

"Beadford, July 29th, 1775.

"A Return of the Men inlisted by Daniel Mills, Capt. and Elijah Hunter first Lent.

"Abijah Dan,	Abijah Weed,
"Jonathan Weeks,	John thomas,
"willis major wilks,	Lewis Miller,
"John feris,	James trowbridg,
"James Raymond, Junr	Joseph Clarke, Junr
"John Bud,	John ellit, Junr
"Amos Roberts,	James Cannady,
"Henry Rich,	John Gosseper,
"Abram Nickels,	James Miller,
"Nathanel Smith,	Nathan Holmes,
"Mosis Higgins,	John Runnelds,
"ebenesor weeb,	William Miller,
"Charles parsons,	Daniel Holmes,
"Ambres Benedick,	Jeremiah Lane,
"James Bennet,	Giddeon Smith.
"Daniel McClean,	Zephaniah Milller,
"Lemuel Light,	Isaac titus,
"James Mills,	John Daniels,
"Thomas Golding,	John Still,
"Joseph Sears,	George Garret,
"Lowran Brinney,	Holmes astin,
"newman wayrin,	newman betts,
"Timothy Conner,	John Dayly,
"Henry Noole,	Shubel Cunninggame,
"John Cunninggame,	Patrick Cuhana.

"Total 50.

"To Peter V. B. Livingston, Esqr

"President, of ye New York Provincial Congress."

[4] There is some reason for supposing that Ambrose Horton was imported from Southold, in Suffolk-county, to take the command of a Company in this Regiment; but, wherever he may have originated, he enlisted "fifty-six able bodyed men" for the Company; and reported them to the Provincial Congress, from the White Plains, on the twenty-sixth of July, 1775, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 57.) Unfortunately, he did not return the names of those enlisted men.

[5] The First Lieutenancy of this Company was originally given to Samuel Clannon, who appears to have given way for David Palmer, apparently from Duchess-county; and, in August, 1775, the latter was again raised, by being appointed to the command of a Company, in this Regiment. While he held the Lieutenancy, he enlisted twenty-three men for this Company, in Richmond-county, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 53.)

[6] The Second Lieutenancy of this Company was originally given to Nehemiah Marshall; but, in July, 1775, that gentleman withdrew and Mr. Pell was appointed to the vacancy. The latter was evidently promoted to the First Lieutenancy, when, in August of that year, Lieutenant Palmer was promoted to the command of a Company; and, on the same day, Isaac Van Wuert was appointed to the vacant Second Lieutenancy.

[7] Captain David Palmer, Lieutenant Samuel T. Pell, and Lieutenant Isaac Van Waert are particularly noticed as having served in Canada, in 1775, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Committee's Papers, xxv., 764; the same; Military Returns, xxvii., 166;) and it may reasonably be supposed that the Company of which they were Officers, accompanied them.

[8] Journal of the Continental Congress, "Thursday, May 25, and Friday, "May 26, 1775," pages 274, 275, ante.

[9] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Lunæ, 4 ho., P.M., May 29th, "1775."

[10] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 9 ho., A.M., July 7, "1775;" the same, "Die Jovis, 9 ho., A.M., July 27, 1775;" the same, "Die Lunæ, 9 ho., A.M., August 7, 1775;" and the same, "Die Mercurii, "9 ho., A.M., August 9, 1775."

[11] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., A.M., "August 9, 1775."

month, with a very important change, which permitted those who were not residents of the Districts or Beats to take and to hold offices therein, that Report was included in an elaborate "Militia Bill," which provided that every portion of the Colony should be divided into "Districts or Beats," in such manner that each of those Districts should include, as nearly as possible, eighty-three men and boys, between sixteen and sixty years of age, and capable of bearing arms. These Companies were to be commanded by Officers to be elected by the respective Companies, and commissioned by the Provincial Congress. One fourth of the entire force was to be organized as Minute-men; the Companies were to be organized into Regiments; the Regiments were to be organized into Brigades; and all were to be commanded by a Major-general, to be appointed and commissioned by the Provincial Congress. Provisions were also made requiring "every man, between the ages of sixteen "and fifty," to provide himself with a musket and bayonet, a sword or tomahawk, a cartridge-box to contain twenty-three rounds of cartridges, a knapsack, one pound of gunpowder, and three pounds of balls; and various other provisions, for the government of the Militia, were also enacted.[1]

There does not appear to have been much discontent, in any part of the Colony, because of the passage of that Ordinance or Act for the re-organization of the Militia; but it afforded opportunities, in various places, for displays of that contempt for the unfranchised and lowly masses, which those of higher social and political rank, even those who were ostentatiously assuming to be the especial guardians and defenders of the Rights of the Colonists, were not slow in presenting to the world. A notable instance of this contempt was seen at Yonkers, where Frederick Van Cortlandt, an unprovided-for member of that extended family, aspired to the command of the Company in that Beat, probably as a stepping-stone to something better. The enrolled members of the Company, in whom the right of election rested, preferred one of their own number, John Cock, for their Captain; and when the Poll was closed, it was found that the aristocratic aspirant had received only eleven votes, while his plebeian opponent had received forty-eight, and one had been given to William Betts.[2] The defeated aspirant subsequently complained that, although his successful opponent had signed the Association, he had done so without having heartily approved it, supporting his charge with an affidavit of William Hadley,[3] who had aspired to the First Lieutenancy of the Company, and had received only twelve of the sixty votes which were cast for that office;[4] and, of course, the Committee of Safety of the County transmitted the affidavit to the Provincial Congress, promising to supplement what was then sent with evidence that Cock had "spoken very dis-"respectfully of the Congress;" and inviting that body to withhold the Commission to which Cock was entitled under the provisions of the Congress's own enactment.[5] Six days afterwards, fifty-nine of the Inhabitants of Yonkers presented a Petition to the Committee of Safety, justifying their action in electing Cock as their Captain, and asking that he might be commissioned, as such;[6] but Isaac Green, one of

[1] That "Militia Bill," in extenso, was published as a Note to the Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 9 ho., A.M., August 22, "1775."

[2] Votes of the Militia Embodyed in ye Precinct of the Yonkers and of officers names this 24 August, 1775.—Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 23; xxvii., 263.

[3] "Westchester County, ss.

"William Hadley, of the said County, yeoman, personally appeared "before the Committee of Safety for the County aforesaid, and being "duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of the Almighty God, saith that "he the Deponent being appointed one of the Sub-Committee for the "superintending the signing of the General Association of this Province, "carried the same to one, John Cock, of the Yonkers, in said County, "and asked the said John Cock to sign the same; he, the said John "Cock taking the pen in his hand uttered the following words: 'I sign "'this with my hand, but not with my heart, for I would not have "'signed it had it not been for my wife and family's sake;' and this he "several times repeated in the hearing of him the Deponent. And "further the Deponent saith not.

"William Hadley.

"Sworn the 11th Sept., 1775,
"before me,
"Gilbt Drake."

[4] Votes of the Militia Embodyed, etc.—Historical Manuscripts, etc., Military Returns, xxvi., 23; xxvii., 263.

[5] Letter from Gilbert Drake, Chairman, to John Haring, Chairman of the Committee of Safety, at New York, "White-Plains, Sept. 11th, 1775."

[6] Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Lunæ, 9 ho., A.M., Septem-"ber 18, 1775."

The Petition thus presented has been preserved; and the following has been copied from it—Historical Manuscripts, etc., Petitions, xxxi., 101.

"To the Honble The Provincial Congress of the Province of New "York in the City of New York Convend—Or in their Recess,
"To the Honble The Committee of Safety.

"The Honorable Petition of the Inhabitants of the Precinct of the "lower Yonkers in the County of Westchester Humbly Sheweth:

"That your Honourable House have made a Resolve and Published "the same Recommending to the Inhabitants of every Town Mannor "Precinct & District within the Province aforesaid, to meet nominate "and appoint Captains and Other Officers To form Themselves as Com-"panys of Militia.

"And whereas the Inhabitants of this Precinct Did meet agreeable to "your said Resolve On the Twenty-fourth Day of August Last, under "the Inspection of the Commitee for that District Did by a very great "Majority as by the List will appear, Did Nominate and appoint Mr. "John Cock of the said Precinct for his known Skill and ability in the "Military Discipline and for other good Cause, appointed him Captain "of the said Company for the District aforesaid.

"And whereas we are informed that a Complaint hath been made to "the Commitee by a few of the Inhabitants against the said Mr. John "Cock out of Spite and Malice and as we conceive what has been alegd "against him was before the Signing the Association, we are well "assured that Since his Signing the said Association no person Can ac-"cuse him of breaking the same by any ways or means whatever.

"Therefore we the Petitioners and Subscribers Do Humbly beg the "Indulgence of This Honourable House To Grant unto Mr. John Cock "the Commission of Captain for the Company aforesaid as we are Con-"vinced he was chossen agreeable to your said Resolve and your Peti-"tioners as in Duty Bound shall ever pray.

those who had voted for Cock, at the Election, was induced to join with George Hadley, the latter in a second Affidavit, showing that Cock "had damned the "Provincial Congress of this Colony, and spoke dis- "respectfully of them;" and these were laid before the Colonial Committee of Safety, in opposition to the Petition of the fifty-nine and to the claim of the Captain-elect. The result was probably foreseen by the Petitioners and their successful candidate—why should the carefully expressed will of fifty-nine respectable men, declared in conformity with the published terms of the Congress itself, be permitted to stand in the way of a Van Cortlandt, the latter with nothing else than two ex-parte Affidavits to sustain the evidently ridiculous charge of wrong-doing in the successful candidate? and why, also, should those other successful candidates who had, also, been elected by the same great majority and at the same time, without even the semblance of an accusation against either of them, be permitted to receive their Commissions? It was true, that the latter had not been known to have spoken disrespectfully of either the Association or of the Congress: it was true, that they had received nearly five-sixths of the votes which were cast: it was true, that the Election had been held under the inspection of the proper Committee: it was true, that every requirement of the Congress's own enactments had been duly observed: it was also true, however, that they were obnoxious to "a few "of the Inhabitants," and, therefore, without an accusation, without a hearing, without a shadow of authority, even in the elastic law of the Congress, the expressed will of the Company was disregarded and the pretended principles of the Revolution were thrown aside, by the refusal of the Committee of Safety to recognize either of the successful candidates, and by the issue of an order for a new Election,[1] which, if it was held, was not held until the following March.

With "the letter of the Militia Regulations," as has been said, there did not appear to be any extended discontentment; but with the arbitrary conduct of some of those who were to oversee the execution of it —the instance, at Yonkers, being only one of several —there was, very reasonably, much dissatisfaction among those, being men from whom duties were exacted, who were, nevertheless, regarded and treated as if they were not men, and as if they possessed no social or political privilege which those who were better born were legally obliged to recognize and respect.

In a community, such as that which constituted Colonial Westchester-county, which was already known and distinguished because of its consistent conservatism and, therefore, because of its backwardness in promoting the cause of the Rebellion, such a tyrannical exercise of political authority as had been seen in connection with the Election of Militia Officers, at Yonkers, by those who were, themselves, exercising only an authority which had been usurped and which was held and exercised without due warrant in law, was everything else than conciliatory, and was far better adapted to arouse and to inflame

"Charles Tylor, John Devoe,
"Martin Post, Jacob Post,
"James Munro, Henry Brown,
"Anthy Allaire, Henrey Taylor,
"Edward Ryer, Anthoney Archer,
"Benjamin Farrington, Basal Archer,
"William Rose, Thomas Oakley,
"Henry presher, Jonathan Fowler,
"Thomas Farington, his
"Isaac Postt, Abm X Post,
"James Rich, mark
"Gilbert Brown, his
his Dennis X Post,
"Thomas X Tippit, mark
mark, his
"Samuel Laurence, William X Post,
"thomas Merrell, mark
"Samuel Williams, Robert Brown,
"Fredrick Brown, Danel Deen,
"Israel Underhill, Stephen Bastine,
"David Oakley, Junr, Benjm Arsdan,
"Joseph Oakley, Junr, Henry Norris,
"George Crawford, John Guevnau,
"Moses Oakley, Thomas Rich,
"Abraham Rich, Elijh taylor,
"Mathious Archer, Jacob Taylor,
his James Crawford,
"Ezk X Brown, Elnathan Taylor,
mark, Isrel Post,
his his
"Abraham X Asten, Lewis X post, mark mark
"Robert Farrington, John Warner,
his Francis Smith,
"John X Odle, Jordan Norris,
mark frederick Vermilyea,
his John Cortright,
"Abm X Odle, Edward Cortright.
mark
"Lower Yonkers, Septr 15, 1775."

[1] Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Martis, 9 ho., A.M., Septem- "ber 19th, 1775."

The following letter, addressed by the Colonial Committee of Safety to Frederic Van Cortlandt and others, informing them of the remarkable result of this Election, in Yonkers, will interest those who desire to learn the inside history of the Revolution, in Westchester-county:

"In Committee of Safety,
"New-York, Sept. 19th, 1775.

"Gentlemen:

"Having considered your report, and also the report of "your County Committee, concerning the Election of John Cox, as "a Captain of the Company of Militia at Yonkers. We have determined "him to be disqualified for a Commission, not only because at the time "of his signing the Association he declared it to be an involuntary act, but "also because he has spoke most contemptuously of the Provincial Con- "gress. And in order that the other Officers in the Company may have "a chance of promotion, which cannot be done according to the letter of "the Militia Regulations, you are hereby desired to cause a new Election "to be made of all the Officers of the Company, pursuant to the said "Regulations, taking care to give public notice that the said John Cocks "cannot be admitted to any office whatsoever.

"We are respectfully, Gentlemen,
"Your very humble Servants,
"By order of the Committee of Safety,
"John Haring, Chairman.

"To Frederic V. Cortlandt, Benjamin "Drake, Stephen Sneden, Thomas Em- "moss, William Betts and William "Hadley, at Yonkers, Westchester."

the passions of those who were loyal to the universally recognized Sovereign and obedient to the public Laws of the land, than to soothe them. But the farmers of the County were generally peaceable men, preferring to endure a wrong instead of resenting and resisting it by force; and they appear to have generally proceeded, therefore, to the election of Officers, in the reorganized Militia of the County, with much unanimity and general good feeling. The first to respond to the call of the Provincial Congress, by the election of its Militia Officers, was the Borough Town of Westchester, where, on the twenty-fourth of August, John Oakley was elected to the command of the local Company,[1] with Nicholas Berrian, for its First Lieutenant;[2] Isaac Leggett, for its Second Lieutenant; and Frederic Philipse Stevenson, for its Ensign.[3] Subsequently, when West Farms and the Manor of Fordham were separated from the body of the Town and made a separate and distinct Beat, Nicholas Berrian was elected to the command of the new Company, with Gilbert Taylor, for its First Lieutenant; Daniel Devoe, for its Second Lieutenant; and Benjamin Valentine, for its Ensign.[4]

In the Manor of Cortlandt, there were eight Districts or Beats, which appear to have been the same, in their several territorial limits, as those under the former arrangement; and these elected the following Officers for the respective Companies:

The District formerly commanded by Francis Lent elected James Kronkhyte, for its Captain; Abraham Lamb, for its First Lieutenant; Staats De Grote, for its Second Lieutenant; and David Penore, for its Ensign.

The District formerly commanded by Barton Underhill elected Gilbert Van Cortlandt, for its Captain; Daniel Hains, for its First Lieutenant;[5] James Taller, for its Second Lieutenant; and Haramanos Gardinear minor, or "Third," for its Ensign.

The District formerly commanded by Jeremiah Drake elected Gilbert Lockwood, for its Captain; John Drake, for its First Lieutenant;[6] Joshua Drake, for its Second Lieutenant;[7] and Peter Carman, for its Ensign.[8]

The District formerly commanded by David Montros declined to make a new Election; and its Officers under the former arrangement appear to have been retained and to have received new Commissions.

The District formerly commanded by Ebenezer Theall elected Andrew Brown, for its Captain; Samuel Haight, for its First Lieutenant;[9] John Chrissey Miller, for its Second Lieutenant; and Solomon Purdy, for its Ensign.

The northern division of the District formerly commanded by Levi Baily elected Nathaniel Delevan, for its Captain;[10] Thomas Nicholls, Junior, for its First

[1] John Oakley represented Westchester, in the County Committee, from May, 1776, until May, 1777.

[2] Nicholas Berrian was one of those, at Fordham and West Farms, who, in September, 1775, petitioned for the establishment of a Company, in that portion of the Town, separate from the other portions of it, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxi. 114); and, in October of the same year, when that Petition was granted, he was elected to the command of the new Company, (Historical Manuscripts, etc. Military Returns, xxvi., 234.)

[3] Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvi., 23; xxvii., 263.

[4] Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvi., 234.

The following list of the names of those, from West Farms and the Manor of Fordham, who were summoned to meet at Westchester; who petitioned for the organization of the new Company; and who were its members, when it was organized, may properly find a place in this narrative. It was copied from the original manuscript, (Historical Manuscripts, Petitions, xxxi., 114.)

Nicholas Berrian,
Isaac Valintine,
Peter Valintine,
John Stevens,
Benjamin Curser [Corsa?]
Abraham Dyckman,
John Turner,
Benjamin Valentine,
his
Georg X Philpet,
mark
Isaac Valintine, Junior,
Peter Bussing, Juner,
Peter Bussing,
Abraham Wils,
Benjamin Curser, Jr.,
Hendrick Ryer,
John Lint, [Lent?]
John Ryer,
Isaac Corser, [Corsa?]
Isaac Corser, Jur, tunus Leforge,
Phillip Hunt,
Stephen Embree,
Nathaniel Lawrenc,
Peter Devoe,
James McKay,
Robert Campbell,
Eden Hunt,
Isaac Hunt,
James Archer,
Samuel Embree, Junr,
Edward Harris,
John Collard,
Cornelius Jacobs,
hezekiah Ward,
Tunis Garrison,
Isack Cant,
Gilbert Taylor,
Robert Gilmer,
Benjamin Archer, Junr,
Daniel Devoe, Jur,
John Embree, Senr,
Jacob Lent,
his Abram X Lent,
mark
Dennis Ryer,
Jacob Valentine,
Abraham garison,
James Grobe,
John Embree, Junr,
James Swaim,
Nazareth Breuer,
Thomas Hunt,
Abram Leggett,
William Leggett,
John Leggett, Junr,
Robert Hunt, Junr,
Cornelius Leggett,
Mr. Woods,
John Hedger,
Thomas Hedger,
Stephen Edwards,
James Rock,
George Higby,
Jacob Hunt,
Levi Hunt,
Jeremiah Regen,
Thomas Cromwell,
Gerrardus Cromwell,
Obadiah Hide,
John Cursor,
Sirion Williams,
John Ryer, Junr,
Jacob Chappel,
John Garrison,
John Jacobs,
Thomas Dogherty,
John Clark,
John Devoe,
John Blizard,
John Walbrin,
John Warnick,
Thomas Gemble.

[5] David Hains did not sign the Association until the day of the Election.

[6] John Drake did not sign the Association until the day of the Election.

[7] Joshua Drake did not sign the Association until the day of the Election. He was subsequently made an Ensign in the Continental Service; but soon became tired and resigned, and brought influences to bear in order to secure a Lieutenancy in the same service, in which latter operation, however, he does not seem to have been successful.

[8] Peter Carman, also, did not sign the Association until the day of the Election.

[9] Samuel Haight represented Westchester-county, in the Assembly of the State, 1782–'3, 1784, 1789–'90, 1791, 1792; he was Sheriff of the County, 1792–'6; and he was one of the Senators from the Southern District, 1797–1800. In 1800, he represented the Southern District in the Council of Appointment.

[10] Nathaniel Delevan represented Westchester-county in the Assembly of the State, 1781–'2.

Lieutenant; Titus Runnels, for its Second Lieutenant; and Abraham Purdy, for its Ensign.[1] The southern division of the same former District elected Gideon Selah [Seeley?] for its Captain, Samuel Lawrence for its First Lieutenant; Caleb Hobby, for its Second Lieutenant;[2] and Abraham Todd, for its Ensign.

The District formerly commanded by Joseph Strang[3] elected John Hyatt, for its Captain;[4] John Drake, for its First Lieutenant;[5] Obediah Purdy, for its Second Lieutenant; and Joseph Horton, for its Ensign.[6]

The eight Companies, in the Manor of Cortlandt, which were thus reorganized and re-officered, were known as the North Battalion of Westchester-county, of which, soon afterwards, Pierre Van Cortlandt was made Colonel,[7] Gilbert Drake its Lieutenant-colonel,[8] Joseph Strang its First Major,[9] Ebenezer Purdy its Second Major,[10] John Cooley its Adjutant, and Isaac Norton its Quartermaster.[11]

The District of Eastchester elected Stephen Sneden, for its Captain;[12] Thomas Pinkney, for its First Lieutenant;[13] Daniel Sebring, for its Second Lieutenant;[14] and William Pinkney, for its Ensign.[15] For some reason which is not now known, a new Election was held in the following March, when Thomas Pinkney was made its Captain, William Pinkney its First Lieutenant, John Sneden its Second Lieutenant, and William Reed its Ensign.[16]

New Rochelle and the Manor of Pelham, united, formed a District or Beat; and it elected Joseph Drake, for its Captain;[17] James Willis, for its First Lieutenant;[18] and David Guion, for its Second Lieutenant. It did not elect an Ensign.

The Manor of Philipsborough included six distinct Districts or Beats—the Upper, the East, the Lower, the Yonkers, the Tarrytown, and the Associated Company, in the upper part of the Manor—and these elected the following Officers in their several Districts:

The Upper District elected Abraham Ledew, for its Captain;[19] Benjamin Brown, for its First Lieutenant; John Relyea, for its Second Lieutenant; and John Oakley, for its Ensign. John Relyea having declined the proffered Second Lieutenancy, Jonas Arsor [Orsor?] was subsequently elected to fill the vacancy.[20]

The East Company elected David Davids, for its Captain: Benjamin Vermilyea, for its First Lieutenant; Gilbert Dean, for its Second Lieutenant; and Gabriel Reguaw, [Requa?] for its Ensign.[21] Captain-elect Davids appears to have declined the proffered office; and, at a subsequent Election, the Company elected Benjamin Vermilyea, for its Captain; Gilbert Dean, for its First Lieutenant; and William Fushie, [Forshee?] to its Second Lieutenancy; Ensign Requa evidently retaining the Office to which he had been originally appointed.[22]

The Lower Company elected Isaac Vermilyea, for its

[1] Abraham Purdy was a member of the County Committee, representing the Manor of Cortlandt, in 1776–7, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxviii., 309.)

[2] In April, 1776, Caleb Hobby, who was said to have been a "Gentleman," received a Commission from the Continental Congress, as First Lieutenant in "the First Regiment of New York Forces," (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvii., 104); and he appears to have joined the Seventh, or Captain Hait's, Company, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Commissions, xxv., 165, 676.) Soon afterwards, it was said that he and the Second Lieutenant and the Ensign of the Company [Hait's or Hyatt's] "wish to decline the service; they will be no loss to "it." (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Committee's Papers, xxv., 488.)

[3] Joseph Strang was subsequently made First Major of the Regiment, the Third of the Westchester-county Militia, of which the eight Companies in the Manor of Cortlandt appear to have been members, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 13.) He represented the County in the Assembly of this State, in 1780–1, 1788, 1789.

[4] John Hyatt was subsequently a Captain, in General John Morin Scott's Brigade.—(Letter of Captain John Osburn to the Convention of the State of New York, "Fishkills, 13th Janr, 1777.")

[5] John Drake was a son of Gilbert Drake, Chairman of the County Committee.

[6] Joseph Horton did not sign the Association until the day of the Election.

[7] Pierre Van Cortlandt was subsequently a member of the Second Provincial Congress, 1775–6, and Chairman of its Committee of Safety, January and February, 1776; a member of the Third Provincial Congress, 1776; of the Fourth Provincial Congress, 1776; of the Convention of the State of New York, 1776–7; of the First Council of Safety, 1777, of which he was the President; a Senator from the Southern District, 1777; President of the Convention of the State, 1777; Lieutenant-Governor of the State, 1777–1795; and died on the first of May, 1819, aged ninety-four years.

[8] Gilbert Drake was Chairman of the County Committee, in 1775–6; a member of the Second Provincial Congress, 1775–6; of the Third Provincial Congress, 1776; and of the Fourth Provincial Congress, 1776–7.

[9] Joseph Strang had held the command, under the Colonial Government, of the District commanded, under the reorganization, by Captain John Hyatt.

[10] Ebenezer Purdy was a member of the County Committee, from the Manor of Cortlandt, 1776–'7; he represented Westchester County in the Assembly of the State, 1779–'80, 1782–'3, 1784, 1784–'5, 1787, 1791, 1792, 1795; he was one of the Senators from the Southern District, 1801–'6; and County Judge in 1797–'8.

[11] Isaac Norton was a member of the County Committee, from the Manor of Cortlandt, 1776–'7.

[12] Stephen Sneden represented the Town of Eastchester, in the County Committee, 1776–'7.

[13] Thomas Pinkney was promoted to the command of the Company, in March, 1776.

[14] Daniel Sebring represented the Town of Eastchester, in the County Committee, 1776–'7.

[15] William Pinkney was promoted to the First Lieutenancy in March, 1776.

[16] Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvii., 144.

[17] Joseph Drake was a member of the First and Second Provincial Congresses, by the former of whom he was made Colonel of the First Westchester-county Regiment, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns xxvi., 13.)

[18] A very interesting Affidavit, made by Lieutenant Willis, on the sixth of August, 1776, illustrative of the unpopularity of Colonel John Thomas, Junior, may be seen in the Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxix., 347.

[19] Abraham Ledew represented the Manor of Philipsborough in the County Committee, in 1776–'7. This name was written, elsewhere, La Doux.

[20] Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvi., 140.

[21] Gabriel Requa lived about two miles back from Tarrytown; in 1777, he was a Lieutenant; and he was known, favorably, at that time, because of his capture of a Recruiting Officer from the City of New York. (Proceedings of a General Court Martial, "Peekskill, April 18, 1777.")

[22] Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvi, 140.

Captain; Israel Honeywell, for its First Lieutenant;[1] Dennis Lent, for its Second Lieutenant; and Hendrick Odell, for its Ensign.

The Beat or District of Yonkers made its election of Officers, agreeably to the provisions of the Congress's enactments; but the result was not satisfactory to Frederic Van Cortlandt and others, who had been rejected by the Company; and, through their influence in the Provincial Committee of Safety and Provincial Congress, the Commissions were withheld from the Officers-elect, and a new Election was ordered.[2] For some reason which has not been stated, although it can be very easily seen, that new Election was not held until the eighteenth of March, 1776, when John Warner, who had been elected Second Lieutenant in the former Election, was made the Captain; Jacob Post, who had been elected Ensign in the former Election, was made the First Lieutenant; Samuel Lawrence, the Second Lieutenant; and Israel Post, the Ensign of the Company.[3]

The Tarrytown Company originally elected Abraham Storm, for its Captain;[4] George Combs, for its First Lieutenant;[5] Joseph Appleby, for its Second Lieutenant; and Nathaniel Underhill, for its Ensign; but all of these, except Lieutenant Combs, having declined the honors and responsibilities of offices, a new Election was held, and Gload Requa[6] was chosen in the place of Captain-elect Storm; Cornelius Van Tassel was chosen Second Lieutenant, in the place of Lieutenant-elect Appleby; and Sibourt Acker was chosen Ensign, in the place of Ensign-elect Underhill.

The Associated Company in the upper part of Philipsborough elected William Dutcher, for its Captain;[7] Daniel Martlinghs, for its First Lieutenant;[8] Gershom Sherwood, for its Second Lieutenant;[9] and George Monson, for its Third Lieutenant.[10]

The six Companies on the Manor of Philipsborough, and those at Westchester, previously referred to, at Eastchester, and at New Rochelle and the Manor of Pelham, all of them reorganized and re-officered as thus described, were known as the South Battalion of Westchester-county, of which, soon afterwards, Joseph Drake was made Colonel,[11] James Hammond its Lieutenant-colonel,[12] Moses Drake its First Major,[13] Jonathan G. Graham its Second Major,[14] Abraham Emmons its Adjutant,[15] and Theophilus Barton, Junior, its Quarter-master.[16]

The District of Mamaroneck and Rye, except the upper end of King-street, elected Robert Bloomer for its Captain;[17] Alexander Hunt, for its First Lieutenant; Ezekial Halsted, for its Second Lieutenant; and Daniel Horton, for its Ensign.

The District in which were included Harrison's Precinct and the upper end of King-street, elected Henry Dusinberry, for its Captain; Lyon Miller, for its First Lieutenant;[18] Caleb Paulding Horton, for its Second Lieutenant; and Gilbert Dunsinberry, for its Ensign.[19] For some reason which is now unknown, a second Election for Officers of this Company was made on the tenth of January, 1776,[20] when John Thomas Minor was chosen for its Captain,[21] Gilbert Dusenberry, for [1] Israel Honeywell was one of the Commissioners of Sequestration for Westchester County, 1777. He represented the Town of Westchester in the County Committee, 1776–'7; and he was also a Member of the Constitutional Convention of 1801, representing Westchester-county.

Israel Honeywell, Junior, was said to have been a member of the County Committee, representing the Manor of Philipsborough, 1776–'7; and, in 1777–'8 and 1778–'9, he was said to have represented Westchester-county in the Assembly of the State. It is not impossible that, in some instances, these references have become mixed.

[2] See pages 278, 279 ante.

[3] Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvii., 142.

[4] Abraham Storm represented the Manor of Philipsborough in the County Committee, 1776–'7.

[5] George Combs was a member of the first County Committee, appointed in 1775; and in 1800, he represented Westchester-county, in the Assembly of the State.

[6] Gload Requa represented the Manor of Philipsborough in the County Committee, 1776–'7.

[7] William Dutcher was subsequently in command of a Company in the Secret Service of the Convention of the State, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxv., 457.)

The village of Irvington, on the Hudson-river, was built on his farm; and his large house was standing in the middle of that village, within a few years, and, probably, stands there, now.

[8] Daniel Martling was subsequently a Lieutenant in Colonel Thomas's Regiment, by whom he was "recommended for the Standing Army," in 1777, although he was said to have been "illiteral," (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Committee's Papers, xxv., 849.)

[9] Gershom Sherwood represented the Manor of Philipsborough in the County Committee, 1776–'7.

[10] George Morrison was the name of this officer, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxv., 63.)

[11] Joseph Drake was elected to the command of the Company of New Rochelle and Pelham Manor, (page 281, ante;) but, as he was, also, a member of the Provincial Congress, he found means, within that body, to secure his appointment to the command of the Regiment, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 13.)

[12] James Hammond represented the Manor of Philipsborough in the County Committee, 1776–'7. A very interesting paper concerning his conduct on the day when the enemy's ships came to anchor off Tarrytown, in July, 1776, and concerning his doings "as a buyer of Pork for "this State," may be seen in Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxiv., 549.

[13] Probably an importation from Suffolk.

[14] We have found no other mention of this person.

[15] Abraham Emmons, of Yonkers, was one of those, in the Yonkers Company, who had voted for Frederic Van Cortlandt for its Captain, and who had united with that gentleman, who was the defeated candidate, in disregarding the Election and securing the degradation of John Cock, from the office to which he had been elected,—(See pages 278, 279, ante.)

[16] Thus printed in the records of the State; but it was probably intended for Theophilus Bartow, Junior, of New Rochelle.

[17] Robert Bloomer was a member of the first County Committee, appointed in May, 1775.

[18] Lyon Miller was reported as a Loyalist, soon after his election to the Lieutenancy of this Company, (List of Westchester County Tories, Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxiv., 193;) and, very probably, that was one of the reasons for the holding of a new Election, by the Company.

[19] Gilbert Dusenberry was promoted to the First Lieutenancy of the Company, at the second Election for officers, in January, 1776.

[20] Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvii., 236.

[21] John Thomas, evidently a very young man, but one of the office-holding Thomas family. He was probably the second son of John Thomas, Junior, who was, at that time, a member of the Provincial Congress and, generally, a leader of the revolutionary party, and a continual office-holder.

This Captain John Thomas died January 6, 1835.—(Bolton's History of Westchester-county, original edition, i., 254; the same, second edition, ii., 761.)

its First Lieutenant; William Woodward, for its Second Lieutenant; and James Miller, Junior, for its Ensign.

The District which included the eastern portion of Northcastle elected Benoni Platt, for its Captain;[1] David Holby, for its First Lieutenant; Abraham Knapp, for its Second Lieutenant; and Jonathan Guion, for its Ensign.

The District which included the southern portion of Northcastle elected Benjamin Ogden, for its Captain; Jeremiah Hunter, for its First Lieutenant; Caleb Merritt, for its Second Lieutenant; and James Brundige, for its Ensign.

The District which included the northern portion of Northcastle was so entirely opposed to the Rebellion that "there were not persons sufficient in num-"bers who had signed the Association to make Offi-"cers of, so that nothing was done," in the form of an Election, during the Summer and Autumn of 1775; but an attempt was made to organize the Company, in the following January, when Joseph Green was found, to accept the command of the Company, and Henry Peers, to accept the First Lieutenancy; the Second Lieutenancy and the place of Ensign remaining vacant.[2]

The District which included Scarsdale, the White Plains, and Brown's Point elected Joshua Hatfield, for its Captain; James Verrian, for its First Lieutenant;[3] Anthony Miller, for its Second Lieutenant;[4] and John Falconer, for its Ensign; but, for some reason which is not now known, a new Election was made, which resulted in the election of Anthony Miller, for Captain; Nicholas Fisher, for First Lieutenant;[5] and John Crumton, for Second Lieutenant; Ensign Falconer appearing to have retained the Office to which he had been elected.[6]

The District which included the eastern portion of Bedford elected Lewis McDonald, for its Captain; James Miller, for its First Lieutenant;[7] Henry Lord, for its Second Lieutenant; and Jesse Miller, for its Ensign.

The District which included the western portion of Bedford elected Eli Seeley, for its Captain; Hezekiah Grey, for its First Lieutenant;[8] Ephraim Raymond, for its Second Lieutenant; and Gabriel Higgins, for its Ensign.

The District of Poundridge elected Joseph Lockwood, for its Captain; Noah Bouton, for its First Lieutenant; William Fausher, for its Second Lieutenant; and Gilbert Reynolds, for its Ensign.[9]

The District which included the southern portion of Salem elected Abijah Gilbert, for its Captain;[10] Jacob Hait, for its First Lieutenant; Sands Raymond, for its Second Lieutenant; and Joseph Coley, for its Ensign.

The District which included the northern portion of Salem elected Thaddeus Crane, for its Captain;[11] Jesse Truesdale, for its First Lieutenant; Ezekiel Halley, for its Second Lieutenant;[12] and Ebenezer Brown, for its Ensign. For some reason, the Captain-elect and the Ensign-elect "did not take their Com-"missions;" and on the eighteenth of December, 1775, a new Election resulted in the choice of Jesse Truesdale for Captain; Ezekiel Hawley, for First Lieutenant; Solomon Close, for Second Lieutenant; and Elijah Dean, for Ensign.[13]

The Companies at Scarsdale White Plains and Brown's Point, Bedford, Poundridge, Salem, Mamaroneck and Rye, Harrison's Precinct, and Northcastle, eleven in number, which were thus reorganized and re-officered, were known as the Middle Battalion of Westchester-county of which, soon afterwards, Thomas Thomas was made Colonel;[14] Gilbert

[1] Benoni Platt was a member of the first County Committee, appointed in May, 1775. The Hon. Lewis C. Platt, formerly Surrogate of the County, is his grandson.

[2] Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvii., 234.

[3] James Varian was a member of the first County Committee, chosen in May, 1775.

[4] Anthony Miller was elected to the command of the Company, at the second Election, in December, 1775.

[5] Nicholas Fisher was a member of the County Committee, in February, 1776. (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvii., 84.)

[6] Letter from Robert Graham to the Provincial Congress," White Plains, "Decem^r 21^st, 1775." (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvii., 246.)

[7] James Miller appears to have held offices, subsequently, in the New York Regiments, commanded by Colonels Ritzema, Gansevoort, and Van Cortlandt; but, inasmuch as there were several persons bearing that name—two, at the same time, in the same Regiment, bearing exactly opposite characters—it is not, now, known which, if either, was the particular James Miller who is named in the text.

[8] Hezekiah Gray was chosen Captain of the Bedford Company of Minute-men, in February, 1776, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvii., 196;) a Report on the military status of which Company, may be seen in Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxix., 323. He and his Company, although not regularly enlisted, were ordered to join the Continental Troops, at Peekskill (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxix., 325.)

[9] In April, 1777, Gilbert Reynolds was a member and "Clarck" of the local Committee of Cortlandt Manor, (Proceedings of the Committee, "Cutlenssmanner, April 2^th, 1777"—Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxvii., 391.)

[10] Abijah Gilbert was a member of the County Committee, from Salem, 1776–'7; and he represented Westchester-county in the Assembly of the State, in 1779–'80, 1781–'2, 1782–'3, 1784, 1784–'5, 1786, 1788, 1791, 1800, 1800–'01, 1802, 1803, 1804, and 1804–'5.

[11] Thaddeus Crane was appointed Second Major of the Regiment; and he was succeeded by Lieutenant Truesdale, who was elected Captain, in the following December. He represented the County in the Assembly of the State, 1777–'8, 1778–'9, 1788–'9, and 1825; and in the Convention which ratified the Constitution for the United States.

[12] Ezekiel Hawley was Chairman of the Committee at Salem, in December, 1776 (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxv. 307).

[13] Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution: Military Returns, xxvii., 245.

[14] Thomas Thomas was a son of Hon. John Thomas and a brother of John Thomas, Junior, who was a member of the Provincial Congress. He was a member of the first County Committee, appointed in May, 1775; and he represented Harrison's Precinct in the County Committee, 1776–'7. He was unpopular as a Military Officer; and several Officers refused to serve under him, in August, 1776, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxix., 347.) He represented Westchester-county in the Assembly of the State, in 1780–'1, 1781–'2, 1782–'3, 1784, 1784–'5, 1786, 1787, 1788, 1792–'3, 1800–'1, 1802, 1803, 1804; he was Sheriff of the County, 1788–1792; he was a Senator from the Southern District, 1805–'8; in 1807, he was one of the Council of Appointment; and he died on the twenty-ninth of May, 1824.

Budd, its Lieutenant-colonel; Ebenezer Lockwood, its First Major;[1] Thaddeus Crane, its Second Major; Jonathan G. Tompkins, its Adjutant;[2] and John Thomas, Junior, its Quarter-master.[3]

The provisions of the Provincial Congress's enactment requiring one-fourth of the Militia of the County to be organized as Minute-men, appear to have been very indifferently obeyed; and the following are the Officers of the only Companies which were raised in Westchester-county, as far as they are now procurable from the records which have been preserved:

The Company of Poundridge and Lower Salem—which was called, also, "the First Company of Min-"ute-men of the County"—elected, originally, Ebenezer Slason, to be its Captain; Henry Slason, to be its First Lieutenant; Ebenezer Scofield, to be its Second Lieutenant; and Daniel Waterberry, to be its Ensign; but, subsequently, when Captain Slason was promoted, Henry Slason was made Captain, Ebenezer Scofield was promoted to the First Lieutenancy, Daniel Waterberry to the Second Lieutenancy, and David Purdy was made its Ensign.[4]

The Company of Bedford elected Eli Seeley, to be its Captain;[5] Zephaniah Mills, to be its First Lieutenant; Cornelius Clarke, to be its Second Lieutenant; and Philip Leek, to be its Ensign; and their Commissions were issued by the Provincial Congress, on the twenty-seventh of October, 1775.[6]

Subsequently, "agreeable to the Demand made by "Colon[l] Drake to the Sub-Committee of Bedford," another Company of Minute-men was organized, in that Town, with Hezekiah Gray, for its Captain;[7] Cornelius Clark, for its First Lieutenant; James Miller for its Second Lieutenant;[8] and Isaac Titus, for its Ensign.[9]

A Company of nineteen men assembled at the White Plains and constituted themselves a Company of Minute-men, electing James Varian, to be their Captain;[10] Samuel Crawford, to be their First Lieutenant;[11] Isaac Oakley, to be their Second Lieutenant; and Joseph Todd, to be their Ensign.[12]

Besides these four Companies, such as they were, there does not appear to have been any Minute-men enlisted in the County—why should any have been

[1] Ebenezer Lockwood was a Justice of the Peace and one of the Quorum, under the Colonial Government; a member of the Second, Third, and Fourth Provincial Congresses; and of the Convention of the State of New York. He was a member of the Assembly of the State, representing Westchester-county, 1778–'9, 1784–'5, 1786, 1787, 1788; and he was County Judge, 1791–'3; and one of the Regents of the University, 1784–'7; etc. He died on the twenty-ninth of July, 1821, aged eighty-four years.

[2] Jonathan G. Tompkins was a member of the first County Committee, elected in May, 1775; a member of the Third and Fourth Provincial Congresses, of the Committee of Safety, and of the Council of Safety. He was a member of the Assembly of the State, 1780–'1, 1781–'2, 1786, 1787, 1788, 1791, 1792; of the Board of Regents of the University, 1787–1808; and of the Constitutional Convention of 1801. He was the First Judge of the County, 1793–'7, 1798–1802; and died on the twenty-second of May, 1823.

The distinguished Daniel D. Tompkins, Governor of the State, Vice President of the United States, and one of the greatest men of his period, was a son of Jonathan G. Tompkins.

[3] John Thomas, Junior, as the reader knows, was one of the leading men of his party, in Westchester-county; a member of its County Committee and of the Provincial Congress; and a brother of the Colonel of the Regiment. Although it is said, positively, that he was also the Quartermaster of this Regiment, it appears incredible that he was the person, and can be accounted for only by the profits which attended such an office and the well known proclivities of that family, in that direction, wherever an opportunity was presented. We prefer to believe that this Quartermaster's place was given to that "John Thomas Minor," the second son of John Thomas, Junior, who had been already elected to the command of the Company in Harrison's Precinct, at a second Election, after Henry Dusenberry had been elected and accepted the Office, a few weeks previously.

With the exception of the two Companies in the Borough Town of Westchester and at Yonkers, the elections of whose Officers were separately reported, the list of Officers who were originally elected by the several Companies, as stated in the text, have been taken, generally without any change in the spelling of the proper names, even when known to have been erroneous, from the Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 122–125. In the instances of Yonkers, Eastchester, Tarrytown, Harrison, Scarsdale and the White Plains, Salem, etc., where new Elections were held, the statements of those new Elections have been taken from the several Returns of those new Elections, referred to, at the foot of each, respectively.

[4] Letter from Samuel Drake and Lewis Graham to the Provincial Congress, "1st March, 1776;" Journal of the Provincial Congress, "4 ho., P.M., "March 1, 1876."

In the Journals of the Provincial Congress: Correspondence, ii., 90, Ebenezer Scofield is called "Ebenezer Scofield, Junior;" and the Commissions of the original Officers are said to have been issued on the twenty-seventh of October, 1775.

[5] Eli Seeley was originally elected to the command of the Company in the western part of the Town of Bedford, (Page 283, ante.)

[6] Journals of the Provincial Congress: Correspondence, ii., 90.

[7] Hezekiah Gray was originally the First Lieutenant in the Company in the western part of the Town of Bedford, of which Eli Seeley was the Captain, (Page 283, ante.)

[8] James Miller was originally the First Lieutenant in the Company in the eastern part of the Town of Bedford, of which Lewis McDonald, Junior, was the Captain, (Page 283, ante.)

[9] Isaac Titus had served in Captain Mills's Company, under Colonel Holmes, in the Campaign of 1775, (Page 277, ante.)

The authority for the statement concerning the second Company may be seen in a Letter from the Sub-committee at Bedford to the Chairman of the County Committee, "Bedford 15 February 1776,"—(Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvii., 196.)

See, also, Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 3 ho., P.M. "Feb. 20th, 1776," where the Secretary erroneously recorded the Sub-Committee and the Company as of Harrison's Precinct instead as of Bedford.

[10] Captain James Varian was a member of the first County Committee, appointed in May, 1775, (Page 259, ante;) and First Lieutenant of the Scarsdale, White Plains, and Brown's Point Company of Militia, of which Joshua Hatfield was the Captain, (Page 283, ante.)

[11] Lieutenant Samuel Crawford was a member of the first County Committee, appointed in May, 1775, (Page 259, ante;) and the only representative of the Manor of Scarsdale, in the County Committee, 1776–'7.

[12] The authority for this statement is a Letter from Jonathan G. Tompkins and Nicolas Fisher to the Provincial Congress, "White Plains, Febru-"ery 14th, 1776"—(Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvii., 84.)

From the same manuscript, the following list of the names of the nineteen who thus organized themselves into a Company of Minute-men, has been carefully copied, without changing the spelling of the names:

"Benjamin Lyon,	Joseph Todd,
"Olliver Killick,	John Drake,
"John Beeks,	Ezekiel Duten,
"Stephen Shelley,	James Farrel,
"Philip Huestis,	Andrew Fach,
"Micah Townsend, Esq.,	James Brundage,
"James Verryan,	Gilbert Horton,
"Samuel Crawford,	David Johnston,
"Isaac Oakley,	Robert Graham.

"William Tompson."

expected from a community in which the revolutionary party had scarcely "a Corporal's Guard," except of those who were office-holders or office-seekers?—but as soon as two Companies had been organized, the County Committee "took the liberty, with all "submission, to recommend Samuel Drake, to be "Colonel;[1] Lewis Graham, to be Lieutenant-Colonel;[2] "Abraham Storm, to be First Major;[3] Samuel Lyon, "of Northcastle, to be Second Major; Elijah Miller, to "be Adjutant;[4] and Josiah Mills, to be Quarter-mas-"ter[5];" and thus the re-organization of the Militia of Westchester-county and the organization of her fighting population were completed.

There was one feature in the Provincial Congress's enactment for the reorganization of the Militia which was oppressive on the great body of the working classes, who were unable to bear the burden it imposed; and it was made the subject of serious complaint to those of the well-born whom, in many instances, they had, unwittingly, placed in authority—revolutionary authority—over themselves. Reference is made to the requirement that every one, between the ages of sixteen and fifty years, should furnish himself with a good musket and bayonet, a sword or tomahawk, a cartridge-box and belts, twenty-three rounds of cartridges, twelve flints, and a knapsack; in addition to which he was to keep, in reserve, a pound of gunpowder and three pounds of bullets, of proper size for his musket. These he was required to have and to keep, continually; and he was required, also, to parade, for drill, on the first Monday of each month. Heavy penalties were imposed on those who should fail to discharge all these requirements; with levies on the properties of the delinquents, if they possessed property, or, in the absence of property, they were to be imprisoned "until such fine, together "with the charges, should be paid," which meant, at that time, an imprisonment in a cold Jail, without any other food than that which the prisoners' friends or the charitable could provide; without the slightest opportunity to earn anything, from which to support themselves or pay the fines; and the starvation of those who were dependent on the unfortunate victims.[6]

While these provisions of that enactment were peculiarly oppressive on that class of poverty-stricken working-men and boys, in the Cities, then largely unemployed, who had been the ever-ready, ever-noisy, and ever-destructive auxiliaries of the revolutionary faction, in all the riotous demonstrations of the preceding ten years, and while these enactments, therefore, in those instances, appeared to be somewhat retributive in their character and operations, they were, also, very oppressive on many a farmer in Westchester-county, who had been more peaceful in his inclinations and conduct than those working-men, in the Cities, had been. Indeed, the required equipment, in specified form, of themselves, and their boys, and their hired help—their well-tried fowling-pieces having been unavailable for that purpose—and the stated withdrawal of all of them from their farms, for drill, on frequent, specified days, no matter how necessary their presence, at home, might have been, were unduly burdensome on all those farmers, to say nothing of the opportunity which was thereby afforded, very soon afterwards, for still greater acts of lawless oppression, in the seizure of those very equipments,

[1] Samuel Drake was a member of the Provincial Convention, 1775; a member of the first County Committee, 1775; and of that of 1776–'7. He represented Westchester-county in the Assembly of the State, 1777–'8, 1779–'80, 1780–'81, 1786 and 1788; etc. He was a resident of the Manor of Cortlandt.

[2] Lewis Graham was connected with the Morrises, of Morrisania, by marriage; and he was a member of all the Provincial Congresses and of the Convention of the State, 1775–'78. He was made Judge of the Court of Admiralty, in February, 1778.

[3] Abraham Storm had been originally elected to the command of the Tarrytown Company of Militia, (Page 282, ante;) and he represented the Manor of Philipsborough in the County Committee of 1776–'7. He lived at Tarrytown.

[4] Elijah Miller was a resident and one of the Sub-committee of Northcastle.

[5] This statement is made on the authority of a Letter from Gilbert Drake, Chairman of the County Committee, to the Provincial Congress, "WHITE PLAINS, October 24th, 1775." The Journal of the Provincial Congress, ("Die Mercurii, 10 ho., A.M., October, 1775,") shows the receipt of the letter, by that body, and the issue of the Commissions to the several gentlemen named.

[6] As an illustration of the effect of the Rebellion on the great body of the lowly working-men, in this particular feature, as early as in the Autumn of 1775, and as an evidence of the uneasiness of those working-men, because of this oppressive enactment, the following homely Petition has been copied from the original manuscript, in the Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxi., 52:

"NEW YORK, Sept. ye 9, 1775.

"TO THE GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS IN NEW YORK.

"We your humble Pertisners Gentlemen are now warned To bear "arms In Defence of our Country truly It is the Native place of some of "us wich Now Gentlemen may it please your onners To take it in Con-"sideration we are Controld more by poverty than By our own will we "must Now beg of your honners To take it in Consideration were you "in our State of Poverty you wold not lay on us more than we can "Bare Some of this poor Cyty Now who you have you have Command. "To bare Arms In Defence of ours Liberty and Rites Not our Rite but "such gentlemen as has got lands and Estates But some of us Now has "Skarsely got Victuals from one Day to another Neyther fire Nor Can-"dles our Wifes and poor Children Suffering for Bread and your honners "have pleased To lay on us or some of us such things as we Cant supply "ourselves with gun Bagnet Belts Cartridge Box Powder and Ball as "for Powder It must Please your honners some of you To open a Store "of it for I have Tryd in this City To get a Small Quantity but Could "Not and our Officers says It will be a fine to neglect having any of "them so therefore we your humble pertisoners Earnestly Beg That It "may Please your honners To lend us such thing as you have laid out "for us poor And Destressed men to get Gentlemen we beg It may be "taken in no afence we are willing to beare with with any thing It "may please you to put on us if In our power some cant without Run-"ning in Deat for For them the Next go to gail for it will any one pay "The Det Consider it would Now for you to loose All your time wich "you sit Now making laws for us as one of us or some of us to by a gun "Consider our poverty and assist the poor or make some of those with "Ruffles Turn out as well as we or supply us with acutrements I Im-"magine some of those Rich wich have lands and thousands In Estates "will not get find if neglect appearing we Beg you will think of us as "you are our hed and parliament who Ever gets This is Desired to "Covay it to the Congress In New York.

"September 9, 1775."

With this menacing paper before one, it is not difficult to make one's self believe that the "poor reptiles" had really some thoughts of "biting," as Gouverneur Morris had foreseen a few months previously.

sometimes with warrants of "impressment," nominally for the equipment of Regiments, in garrison or elsewhere; sometimes with arbitrary orders for seizing them, on ex parte assumptions of the disaffection to the Rebellion, of those who owned them; and sometimes, not unfrequently, by inroads of organized bodies of thieves, from Connecticut or elsewhere, who, without even a shadow of legal or local authority and only on the shallow pretext of superior "patriotism," overpowered the isolated and peaceful farmers, and retired with well-supplied stocks of lawlessly acquired plunder.

The Provincial Congress, like similar Congresses in other Colonies, and as was foretold of this, by those who had opposed the creation of it, was not long in existence and in possession of its usurped authority, when, as has been already stated, it commenced to arrest those, strangers and residents, who ventured to differ from it and to speak and to act in accordance with existing Laws and with their own convictions of duty;[1] and it did not hesitate to throw into prison[2] or to send into exile,[3] those whom it had arrested. It waited for no verified complaint: it made no pretence that a breach of any written Law or of any other enactment was necessary, to warrant an arrest: it received secret, ex parte "information" as all which was needed to authorize the arrest, the confinement, and the infliction of punishment on its victims, not unfrequently without a hearing or an examination: and it held those who were accused, and tried them in secret Sessions, and passed judgments on them, not unfrequently without permitting them to confront their accusers or to see and read the papers on which they had been arrested, and held, and tried—in one notable instance, the accused was not permitted to see the fifteen affidavits, which had been trumped up against him, after he had been arrested and thrown into a jail, nor to know their contents nor the nature of the accusation, until he was brought out for trial when they were only read to him; and copies of those affidavits were withheld from him, by a formal vote of the Congress, when they were asked for and when the cost of copying them was tendered, only because the publication of those several papers would have exposed the fifteen partisan tools and the eminently genteel hand who had guided them in a shameless and unfounded persecution of an innocent man, to the contempt of the country and of the world.[4] It sat in secret judgment over those whom it had arrested, in instances wherein it was, also, the only accuser;[5] and it recognized the existence, in merely local self-constituted "Committees," in the several Counties, of the same authority to arrest and to imprison those who were obnoxious to them, either with or without accusers or accusations, which it claimed for itself and exercised.[6] In short, it very promptly set aside the government of the written Law, and established, in its stead, that of the unrestrained will of an oligarchy, seated within every Town, against which there was no other security, for either persons or properties, than the personal favor of the stronger local power, no matter how obtained—all that, too, was done in the name of Freedom and the Rights of Man, by those who assumed to be honorable men, and, most of all, by those who insisted that their allegiance to their Prince and their attachment to "the illustrious House "of Hanover" were ranked, by themselves, as among their most singular blessings;[7] by those, indeed, who, nearly at the same time, declared they were "deeply "impressed with the importance, the utility, and the "necessity of an accommodation with their Parent "State;" and who were, also, they said, "conscious "that the best service we can render to the present "and all future generations must consist in promoting "it."[8]

[1] See, in the Journals and Correspondence of the Congress and in the Historical Manuscripts relating to the War of the Revolution, preserved in the office of the Secretary of State, at Albany, the records and papers in the several cases, among others, of Angus McDonald, Captain Patrick Sinclair, Captain Johan Christian Drewidz, John Morrell, Adam Patrick, Isaiah Purdy, Captain Melancton Lawrence, Joseph Allicock, Captain Charles De Kay, and John Candell. A simple reference to the several papers, in detail, would require more room than can be given to it, in this place.

[2] The instances of Angus McDonald, Captain Drewidz, John Morrell, Adam Patrick, and Isaiah Purdy, already referred to, among others.

[3] Angus McDonald was sent to General Wooster, then in command of a body of Connecticut troops; and, by him, he was sent to Fairfield, and imprisoned, with aggravated severity, of which even his jailer complained.

[4] Reference is here made to the case of Timothy Doughty, of Duchess-county, in which the victim, because he declined to sign the General Association—there was no evidence which the Congress considered respectable, showing any other offence—was seized by Egbert Benson, whose methods at an Election have been noticed; and sent to New York, without any evidence of wrong-doing; and thrown into a jail, without any provision for his support. At the request of Benson, he was kept in jail, for several weeks, without knowing for what he had been arrested; and that, only to enable his unseen and malignant accuser to manufacture evidence against him. Fifteen worthless affidavits were subsequently sent to the Congress, and READ to the victim, when he was given a hearing; but their worthlessness was so evident that the Congress discharged Doughty, although, as stated, it would not permit him to have copies of the papers, nor even to read them, (Journals of the Committee of Safety, September 4th; the same, September 28th, 1775; Journals of the Provincial Congress, "Die Jovis, 9 ho., A.M., October "19, 1775;" the same, "Die Martis, 9 ho., A.M., October 24, 1775;" Petitions of Timothy Doughty and others, September 22, 25, October 4, 11, 1775, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, XXXI., 96, 88, 70, 36.)

[5] Among other instances, those of Angus McDonald, Melancton Lawrence, and Captain Drewitz, may be referred to.

[6] The local authorities arrested and confined, without any trustworthy evidence, John Morrell, Adam Patrick, and Isaiah Purdy, in Orange-county; the Berghs, Timothy Doughty, and Mordecai Lester, in Duchess-county; John Connor, in Tryon-county; Abraham Lawrence, in Queens county; etc.

[7] Letter from the Provincial Congress to the Gentlemen Merchants of the Province of Quebec. "In Provincial Congress, New-York, June 12th, 1775,"

[8] Letter from the Provincial Congress to the Delegates for the Colony of New York, in the Continental Congress, "IN PROVINCIAL CONGRESS, NEW-"YORK, June 28th, 1775."

See, also, the Plan of Accommodation, adopted in advance and kept in constant readiness for immediate use, by the same Provincial Congress, "4 ho., P.M., Die Martis, June 27th, 1775," (see pages 273, 274, ante;) Letter from the Provincial Congress to the Committee of Richmond county, "NEW-"YORK, 2d December, 1775:" etc.

In the earlier days of its existence, the Provincial Congress made those arbitrary arrests without any enactment, its own or that of any other body, which could have afforded even a shadow of even revolutionary law, if the enactments of a body in acknowledged rebellion may be regarded as Laws, for such a radical violation of what were said to have been, and of what were, the fundamental principles of the Duties of those in authority and of the Rights of Person and of Property which belonged to those who were governed; but there appear to have been some, among the supporters of the Rebellion, who continued to have doubts concerning the unauthorized and unrestrained right of arrest, even where an opposition to the measures of the Rebellion was openly and unreservedly expressed.

On the eleventh of August, a letter was received by the Provincial Congress, from the local Committee at Brookhaven, on Long Island, stating that certain persons, named therein, were "counteracting every "measure recommended for redress and grievances,[1] "and opposing the measures of Congresses and Com- "mittees; and that they declared they would furnish, "and that it is suspected they have furnished, the "men-of-war and cutters with provisions,"[2] in the same manner that the Asia and other men-of-war were supplied, with the approval of the Provincial Congress, at that time and subsequently, by those who were more in favor with that body; and, at the same time, "requesting the Congress to direct such "measures as they shall think proper, to suppress "such conduct." That letter was referred to a Committee of which Benjamin Kissam, of the City of New York, was Chairman.[3] A Report from that Committee was laid before the Congress, on the twenty-sixth of August;[4] and, after consideration of the subject, and apparently without dissent, the following enactment was made on the general subject of the Brookhaven Committee's inquiry:

"WHEREAS attempts may be made to promote dis- "cord among the Inhabitants of this Colony, and to "assist and aid the Ministerial Army and Navy, in "their endeavours to carry into execution the cruel and "oppressive Acts of Parliament, against the Rights "and Liberties of the Inhabitants of this Continent:

"And as the immutable laws of self-defence and "preservation justify every reasonable measure en- "tered into, to counteract or frustrate such attempts: "Therefore,

"RESOLVED, That if any person or persons shall be "found guilty, before the Committee of any City "or County, of attempting, (after the date of this "Resolution,) to furnish the Ministerial Army or "Navy with Provisions or other necessaries, contrary "to the Resolutions of the Continental or of this "Congress;[5] or of holding a correspondence, by letter "or otherwise, for the purpose of giving information "to the said Army or Navy, of the measures pursued "by the United Colonies or any of them;[6] or of ad- "vising expedients which the said Army or Navy "might or ought to pursue, against the said Colonies

[1] Thus printed in the official copy of the Journal of the Provincial Congress.

[2] Those who shall desire to learn more of that Brookhaven matter may be gratified by a perusal of Gaine's New-York Gazette and Mercury, No. 1217, NEW-YORK, Monday, February 6, 1775; of a Letter from Major Benjamin Floyd and others to James Rivington, "BROOK-HAVEN, SUF- "FOLK-COUNTY, NEW-YORK, March 6, 1775," (Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 103, NEW-YORK, Thursday, April 6, 1775;) and of a Declaration of the Inhabitants of Brook-haven, Suffolk-county, New York, "BROOK- "HAVEN, March 10, 1775," (Gaine's New-York Gazette: and the Weekly Mercury, No. 1223, NEW-YORK, Monday, March 20, 1775.)

[3] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 9 ho. A.M., August "11th, 1775."

[4] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Sabbati, 9 ho. A.M., August "26th, 1775."

[5] The Provincial Congress not only had passed no Resolutions prohibiting the supply of "the Ministerial Army and Navy with provisions or other "necessaries," thereby, even from the revolutionary standpoint, leaving that business open to whomsoever might embark in it; but, on the morning of the day on which this enactment was made, it gave its official sanction to the supply of the Asia, man-of-war, with its necessary supplies, from the City of New York, and with water and beer, from Brooklyn, all of them by Abraham Lott, the official "Agent-victualler "for His Majesty's Ships in this Port," (Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 9 ho., A.M., September 1st, 1775.") Four days afterwards, Doctor McLean was authorized to supply the same ship, with Drugs and Medicines, as he had previously done, (Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Martis, 9 ho., A.M., September 5th, 1775.") On the twenty-ninth of January, 1776, William Allen had permission to go on board the Asia, to measure the men for shoes, and to make and deliver a hundred pairs, if so many should be needed. (Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Lunæ, 10 ho., A.M., January 29th, 1776.") On the sixteenth of February, 1776, Henry White was permitted to supply the Asia and the Phœnix with fresh provisions and vegetables. (Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., A.M., February 16th, 1776.")

While the Provincial Congress was thus monopolizing the supplying of the men-of-war, it "was filled with the utmost anxiety" when, during the Autumn of 1775, "small boats from Queens and Westchester-coun- "ties" undertook to enter into the same business; and "to prevent so "great a mischief," a small armed vessel was purchased, "to watch those "and other dangerous supplies of the like kind,"—(The Committee of Safety to the New-York Delegates in Continental Congress, "IN COMMITTEE OF "SAFETY, NEW-YORK, January 22, 1776.") On the seventh of February, 1776, when the Chairman of the Committee of the City asked permission for an unnamed applicant to send on board the Asia, two hogsheads of Spirits, two dozens of Coffee, and one dozen of Chocolate, the solicited permission was withheld until the name of the applicant could be ascertained, which does not appear to have been accomplished, (Letter from Henry Remsen, Chairman of the Committee of the City, to the Committee of Safety, and the reply of the latter, both undated: Journal of the Committee of Safety: "Die Mercurii, 10 ho., A.M., Feb'y 7th, 1776.")

There does not seem to have been any hesitation in supplying the provisions, on the part of any one, either in New York, or in Westchester-county, or in Queens-county—why should there have been? The only question appears to have been, by whom and for whose pecuniary benefit they should be thus supplied. There were those, in the Provincial Congress, who were always ready to enjoy an advantage, in trade or elsewhere: there was a commercial advantage, in victualing the ships, which those "patriots" preferred to retain. Had the boatmen of Westchester and Queens-counties, while bringing their surplus products to market, been wise enough to have consigned their cargoes to some of those enterprising "Merchants," Alexander McDougal and his armed vessel, watching "those dangerous supplies," would not have been necessary.

Verily, patriotism and pelf were closely connected, in those times.

[6] James Duane, the friend and correspondent of Lieutenant-governor Colden, was, at that time, one of the Delegates from New York, in the Congress of the Colonies; and Egbert Dumond, the friend and correspondent of the Royal Governor, William Tryon, represented Ulster-county, in that Provincial Congress, and was probably present—he was in New York—when this enactment was considered and adopted.

"or any of them,[1] such person or persons, so found "guilty, shall be punished at the discretion of the "Committee before whom he or they shall be so found "guilty, or at the discretion of the Congress or Com- "mittee of Safety of this Colony, so as the punish- "ment, by them, at their discretion inflicted, shall "not exceed three months imprisonment or other the "punishments hereinafter mentioned, for the first "offence.

"RESOLVED, That if any person or persons shall "be found guilty, before the Committee of any City or "County in this Colony, of having furnished the "Ministerial Army or Navy (after the date of this "Resolution,) with Provisions or other necessaries, "contrary to any Resolution of the Continental or of "this Congress, such person or persons, so found "guilty thereof, upon due proof thereof, shall be "disarmed and forfeit double the value of the Pro- "visions or other necessaries so furnished, to be ap- "plied to the public exigencies of this Colony, in "such manner as the Congress or Committee of Safety "of this Colony, for the time being, shall order and "direct. And that such person or persons, so found "guilty, shall be put into and detained in close con- "finement, at his or their own expense and charge, "until three months after he or they, respectively, "shall have paid such forfeiture. And that every "such person or persons, who shall be found guilty "of a second offence of the same kind, shall be ban- "ished from this Colony, for the term of seven years "from the time of such second conviction.

"Although this Congress have a tender regard to "the freedom of Speech, the rights of Conscience, "and personal Liberty, as far as an indulgence in "these particulars may be consistent with our gen- "eral security; yet, for the public safety, be it

"RESOLVED, That if any person or persons shall, "hereafter, oppose or deny the authority of the Con- "tinental or of this Congress, or the Committee of "Safety, or the Committees of the respective "Counties, Cities, Towns, Manors, Precincts, or Dis- "tricts in this Colony, or dissuade any person or "persons from obeying the recommendations of the "Continental or this Congress, or the Committee of "Safety, or the Committees aforesaid, and be thereof "convicted before the Committee of the County or "any thirteen or more of their number, who shall or "may meet upon a general call of the Chairman of "such Committee where such person or persons may "reside, that such Committee shall cause such of "fenders to be disarmed;[2] and for the second offence- "they shall be committed to close confinement, at "their respective expense.[3] And, in case any of the "said Committees are unable to carry this or any "Resolution into execution, they are hereby directed "to apply to the next County Committee or command- "ing Officer of the Militia, or to the Congress or the "Committee of Safety of this Colony, for necessary "assistance, as the case may require.[4] But if it "shall so happen that any violators of this Resolu- "tion shall reside in a County where there is no "Committee of the County, in that case, the matter "shall be triable before the Committee of the next "County: PROVIDED that no person shall be tried "before the General Committee of the City and "County of New York, upon the Resolutions herein "contained, unless the stated quorum be present; "and in the City and County of Albany, unless "there are present twenty-five members.

"RESOLVED FARTHER, That the respective Com- "mittees and the Militia of the several Counties, by "order of the respective Committees or of the Com- "missioned Officer of the Militia then nearest, are "hereby expressly enjoined to apprehend every "Inhabitant or Resident of this Colony, who now is "or who shall hereafter be discovered to be enlisted "or in arms against the Liberties of America, and to "confine such offender or offenders, in safe custody; "and his or their punishment is reserved to the "determination of this or some future Provincial "Congress. And the Committee nearest to any per- "son who shall be so enlisted or have taken up "arms against the Liberties of America are hereby "directed to appoint some discreet person to take "the charge of the Estate, both real and personal, of "any such person or persons; which person so ap- "pointed shall be invested with such Estate, and "render, on oath, a just and true account thereof, to "this or some future Congress or to Commissioners "by them to be appointed, and to pay the issues and "profits thereof to the Treasurer appointed by this "Congress, for the use of the associated Colonies.

"RESOLVED, That if any person be taken up on "suspicion of any of the Crimes in the above Reso- "lutions specified, he shall immediately be taken "before the Committee of the City, Town, Manor,

[1] Charles Lee, the second in command in the Continental Army, had not, then, laid his well-devised "Plan" before General Howe; General Samuel H. Parsons had not yet commenced the supply of information, concerning projected military movements, etc., through "Squire "Heron," to Sir Henry Clinton; Israel Putnam had not yet led Robert R. Livingston to "question" "his very fidelity;" and Benedict Arnold, maddened by wrongs imposed on him, had not yet commenced his correspondence with John André.

[2] Compare this particular penalty with the particular requirement, contained in the enactment concerning the Militia, adopted eleven days previously, (page 102 ante,) that every Inhabitant, between sixteen and fifty years of age, should fully equip himself with arms and largely supply himself with ammunition, heavy penalties being imposed, in case of default, in either respect.

[3] That particular feature of this enactment was intended to impoverish the victim, if he possessed property, or to leave him to be starved, if he had none; and the barbarism of the provision and of those who framed it, was seen, subsequently, in the physical sufferings of John O'Connor and David Purdy; and in those of the Berghs, the Dobbses, and Timothy Doughty, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxi., 98, 96, 88, 70, 36; etc.)

[4] Not long after this enactment was made, the Committee of Westchester-county, as will be seen, hereafter, called for and received the armed assistance of men of Connecticut, to enforce obedience to its Resolutions or submission to some of its arbitrary seizures of the properties of some of their law-abiding neighbors.

"Precinct, or District where the offender shall have "been taken up; and if, upon examination, the sus- "picion shall appear to the said Committee to be "groundless, that he be discharged: PROVIDED, "ALSO, that no person charged to be an offender "shall be tried upon any of the foregoing Resolves, "until the persons to be Judges of the offence be "first severally sworn to try and adjudge the person "so charged, without partiality, favour, or affection, "or hope of reward, according to evidence; and that "every witness who shall be examined on such trial "shall have the charge distinctly and clearly stated "to him; and be thereupon sworn to speak the truth, "the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."[1]

* * * * * * *

It will be seen that, by this remarkable enactment, every person in the Colony was placed at the mercy of the local Committee of the County in which he lived; that no one was permitted to disregard or to treat with disrespect either the "recommendations" or the "Resolutions" of Congresses or Committees, of either high or low degree, no matter with what disclaimers of obligation those "recommendations" and "Resolutions" might have been accompanied,[2] nor to dissent from whatever outrages on persons or properties there might be inflicted on quiet, law-abiding persons, by even the most insignificant "District Committee" in the Colony, nor even to question the authority to do whatever it should incline to do, no matter how monstrous its actions should be, in any such Congress or Committee; that sequestration, if not confiscation and absolute sale,[3] of properties, real and personal, and close confinement in barracks or jails, and banishment from home and family, no matter at what cost to him or to those who were dependent on him, were penalties to which every one was subject, whenever a County Committee saw fit to inflict them; that, by making the offences and the penalties matters of general interest to "the associa- "ted Colonies"—for doing which no one can pretend that a local Provincial Congress, even during a Rebellion, could consistently assume to legislate—this enactment afforded a warrant for inroads from other Colonies, whenever the latter were inclined to make them, for the direct adjustment of matters in which they possessed a conceded interest; that no appeal from the judgment of such a local revolutionary tribunal, too often controlled by personal or family quarrels[4] or by ecclesiastical or neighborhood feuds or by foreign interferences, was provided for or allowed; and that the dictates of his conscience and the oath of his office, if he held an office, as far as these should assert his duty to his Sovereign and to the Colonial and Home Governments, must be sternly disregarded and suppressed, by every one.

History has failed to record, in the annals of any other community, another such instance of solemn mockery and of refined hypocrisy and of relentless personal and partisan bitterness as is seen in this enactment, framed and ordained and promulgated by men who pretended to so much of honor and intelligence, to so much of loyalty to the King and of regard for the Constitution, to so much of veneration for the Rights of Man and of reverence for the supreme Laws of God, as were claimed, for themselves, by the Livingstons and the Morrises, the Van Cortlandts and the Clintons, and their several supporters, in the Provincial Congress of Colonial New York; and the annals of partisan malignity, ecclesiastical or civil, afford few instances wherein an ecclesiastical or civil enactment, no matter by what authority nor under what circumstances it may have been ordained and promulgated, has been more relentlessly enforced, in its penalties, than this enactment of a revolutionary Congress was enforced, in the Colony and State of New York. Scarcely a homestead existed in Colonial Westchester-county, in which the unbridled despotism of a self-constituted Precinct or District or Town Committee did not display its ill-gotten, ill-regulated power, under the sanction of this enactment, protected and supported, whenever protection and support were needed to ensure entire success, by the local and the Continental military power or by hungry ruffians from over the border;[5] and there are enough of [2] Compare the disclaimers which accompanied the Associations which were sent out, for signatures, (pages 270, 271, ante;) with the penalties which were subsequently imposed on those who had declined to sign those Associations, in the orders issued for their disarmament, (page 288, ante;) in this remarkable enactment; and with the multitude of arbitrary arrests and painful imprisonments, throughout the Colony, with which the pages of the records of the doings of the revolutionary faction so peculiarly abound.

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "4 ho., P.M., September 1st, "1775."

[3] We are sensible that the letter of this enactment affords a warrant for nothing else than a sequestration of the properties of those who were proscribed; but the spirit of it was seen in the action of those Committees who were, by this enactment, made masters of the great body of the Colonists, when those Committees, as will be seen, hereafter, not only sequestrated, but confiscated and sold, the properties of those who were personally obnoxious to them.

[4] "The information you have received, in respect to Captain Cuthbert, "is, I believe, in part true, but has originated from a private pique, and "is much exaggerated. You will observe I have bought his wheat from "him, which he readily sold me, at the same time complained, most "bitterly, of being threatened with the loss of his life, by the same Don "you mentioned, who, I believe, is a very bad man. Many persons in "the country are seeking for private revenge under pretence of concern "for the publick safety."—General (Benedict Arnold to Samuel Chase, "SOREL, May 15, 1776.")

General Arnold's remarks were perfectly applicable to every portion of the Colony. Who, among historical students, does not know that one of the most virulent of those who persecuted the loyal and law abiding Colonists, in Colonial New York—a very thinly disguised monarchist who was thus figuring as a most zealous republican—had been largely prompted to play a part in the politics of the period which was radically distasteful to himself, in order that he might, thereby, revengefully oppose and persecute the friends and family of the two young ladies, sisters, who had successively preferred more graceful and more companionable, if not as mentally and scholastically deserving, suitors for their hands and fortunes?

[5] This sentence has been written with a perfect understanding of what is stated in the text, concerning those who passed from Connecticut into Westchester-county, to assist the local Committees, in that County, in their work of outrage and robbery. Greenwich, Stamford, Ridgefield, Danbury, Wilton, New Canaan, and the other border Towns merely incidental allusions, left among the well-concealed records of those times, to say nothing of those more startling evidences which went, unrecorded, into the graves of those who had been thus plundered and outraged, when the latter were carried to their last earthly homes, to show that the Drakes and the Thomases, the Odells and the Martlings, the Lockwoods and the Dutchers, and those who were associated with them, "patriotically" supporting what was called "the glorious cause of Liberty," were experts in ruthless barbarism, and entirely worthy of thecrowns of infamy which history has awarded to more distinguished, but not more accomplished, inquisitors and despots.

The publication of this barbarous enactment was followed, immediately, by active preparations for persecution, by those, in Westchester-county, who were engaged in promoting the cause of the Rebellion; and they promptly reported to the Provincial Congress, for what purpose is very evident, the following list of those, in that County, who were especially obnoxious to them :[1]

"Col. Phillips,[2]
"Joseph Harris,
"James Harris,
"Major Brown's two sons
"Isaac and Josiah that "lives at home,[3]
"Lyon Miller,[4]
Bartholomew Hains,[5]
Mr. Duncan and Brown
at Marroneck,
Capt. Joshua Purdy,[6]
Jeremiah Travess,
Solomon Fowler,[7]
Joshua Purdy,[8]
"Elijah Purdy,
"Gilbert Horton,[9]
"Edmond Ward,[10]
"Caleb Morgain,[11]
"James Hortan, Esq.[12]
"William Barker, Esq.[13]
"Person Seabury,[14]
"Godfrey Haines, added
"on Saturday evening,[15]
"Jeremiah Travess, Junr.,
Jonathan Pardie, White
Plains,[16]
Saml. Merrit, Manor of Courtlandt,[17]
Mr. Peter Hatfield,
Isaac Hatfield,
Edward Palmer,[18]
Nath. Whitney, Esq.
Pater Drake,[19]
Peter Corney,[20]
"Joshua Carne."

There need be no surprise that that remarkable enactment and the activity in enforcing its provisions which was seen among those who favored the Rebellion and among those who desired the advantages which a general breaking down of those who opposed that Rebellion would probably ensure to them, in the expected and intended sequestrations and confiscations and sales of properties, real and personal, throughout the County, aroused the attention and the indignation of the great body of the conservative in Connecticut, as is well known, were too nearly akin in sentiment to the Towns in Westchester-county to have supplied respectable men, for such a questionable service; and specimens of those of Connecticut who were so zealous in the support of the Rebellion, in New York, when there was no armed forces before them—those, from that Colony were not so zealous, on the northern frontier and in Canada, at Kips Bay and in New Jersey, when an armed enemy was either before or behind them—might have been seen in those who were led by Waterbury and by Sears, by Wooster and by Webb, of whom and of whose peculiarly "New Eng-"land Ideas," concerning the laws of meum et tuum, history has left abundant evidence.

[1] Historical Manuscripts, etc. : Miscellaneous Papers, xxxiv., 193.

[2] Colonel Frederic Philipse, of Yonkers and Sleepy Hollow, Member of the General Assembly, already made known to the reader. He was exiled; and his property sequestrated, confiscated, and sold.

[3] Isaac and Josiah Brown were arrested; thrown into the Prison at the White Plains; and subsequently released on condition that they should board with William Miller, Deputy Chairman of the County Committee, at their own expense, instead of at their own homes.

[4] Lyon Miller was First Lieutenant in the Harrison Precinct Company of Militia, reorganized under the enactment of the Provincial Congress, in August, 1775.

[5] Bartholomew Haines was arrested and thrown into Prison at the White Plains. His name will be seen, very frequently, in the following pages of this narrative.

[6] Captain Joshua Purdy was, probably, the person of that name who has been referred to, elsewhere, in these notes, in connection with another person, bearing the same name but without a title, who was, also, named on this list of the proscribed of Westchester-county. Although the records do not mention the distinguishing title, if he had one, of the victim whose arrest and imprisonment and conditional release are mentioned in the note referred to, and, therefore, the untitled "Joshua Purdy" has been connected with those records, there are circumstances which favor the impression that Captain Joshua was the person to whom they really referred.

[7] Solomon Fowler was reported to the Provincial Congress, a second time, in June, 1776, and summoned to appear before the "Committee "on Conspiracies," soon after.

[8] Joshua Purdy, either this person of that name or Captain Joshua who is also named on this list, was reported to the Provincial Congress, a second time; summoned before the "Committee on Conspiracies;" imprisoned at the White Plains; and released from prison on condition that he should board with William Miller, Deputy Chairman of the County Committee, at his own expense, instead of at his own home.

[9] Gilbert Horton was arrested and thrown into the Prison at the White Plains.

[10] Edmund Ward was arrested and thrown into the Prison at the White Plains.

[11] Caleb Morgan was reported to the Provincial Congress, a second time; arrested; and thrown into the Prison at the White Plains.

[12] James Horton, Esq., was summoned before the "Committee of "Safety," as the County Committee called itself, in August, 1777; was unusually independent in his answers to that body; and appears to have remained without further trouble.

[13] William Barker, Esq., was reported to the Provincial Congress, a second time; arrested; examined by the Committee on Conspiracies; and thrown into the Prison at the White Plains.

[14] Rev. Samuel Seabury, soon afterwards, was seized and carried to Connecticut, where he was imprisoned. His very peculiar case will be noticed in the text, in its order.

[15] Godfrey Haines was seized, and sent to the City of New York, a few days after the transmission of this memorandum. His case will be seen in the text of this narrative, pages 291–296, post.

[16] Jonathan Purdy, of the White Plains, was arrested and thrown into the Prison at that place.

[17] Samuel Merrit was reported to the Provincial Congress, a second time; arrested; and thrown into the Prison at the White Plains.

[18] Edward Palmer was a resident of Cortlandt's Manor; and was subsequently accused of enlisting men for the Royal Army. There are some reasons for supposing that he was the young man who was so ostentatiously hung, as a spy, by the order of General Putnam, in August, 1777, of which mention will be made hereafter.

[19] Peter Drake was one of the Drakes of the Cortlandt Manor; and was an active Loyalist; but was not disturbed—he was a Drake.

[20] Peter Corney was reported to the Provincial Congress, a second time; arrested and taken before the "Committee on Conspiracies;" and permitted to go to Long Island, where he was peculiarly serviceable to those who desired to remove from that place. Because of this, the Committee of Safety and Committee on Conspiracies of the Provincial Congress, permitted his son-in-law to take and occupy his property; but the local Committee of Sequestration disregarded that permission; seized the property; and sold it, under peculiarly distressing circumstances. (Historical Manuscripts, etc. : Petitions, xxxiii., 522; the same: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxvii., 95, 99; xxxviii., 147; Journal of Committee of Safety, with Corney's son-in law's affidavit, "Die Veneris, 4 ho., P.M "June 6, 1777.") farmers of Westchester-county—they would have been less than men, and unworthy of either respect or sympathy, had they remained passive spectators of what was then in progress, for the seizure of their persons, for the sequestration of their homes and of their estates, and for the impoverishment of their aged parents, of their wives, and of their dependent children, without just cause, without due process of Law, and by those who were in acknowledged rebellion against their recognized Sovereign. Indeed, the honest, hard-working yeomanry, throughout the entire extent of the County, those of revolutionary as well as those of conservative associations, was immediately thrown into a state of the most intense excitement; suspicion between those who had been peaceful neighbors and friends, was aroused and fostered; memories of half-forgotten piques and quarrels were recalled; and the animosities and the jealousies and the misunderstandings and the disputes of the past were revived and intensified; and, while the more zealous of the party of the Rebellion were loud in their threats and aggressive in their actions, those who constituted the great body of the inhabitants of the County and who were peaceful in all their relations, anxiously watched the progress of events, and, in some notable instances, denounced the enactments of the Provincial Congress and the Congress who had enacted them; declared their confidence—their ill-founded but honest confidence — that the Home Government would soon interfere for their protection; armed and organized themselves for their immediate security; and established strong patrols, from among themselves, to guard against surprise, by night or by day. Violence on the one side, of actions as well as of words, begat violence on the other. A lawless assault on the persons or the properties of the conservatives and the loyal, by the promptings of embittered human nature and the unwritten law of retaliation, was followed, sooner or later, by equally lawless assaults on the persons or on the families or on the properties of those, of the opposite party, who had been the original aggressors; and, very seldom, on those occasions, was a tooth or an eye regarded as a sufficient equivalent for the tooth or the eye which had been taken. "They hunted every man his "brother with a net;" the reign of peace, of happiness, and of prosperity — the era of good-feelings between neighbors, of regard among friends, of affection in families—in the old agricultural County of Westchester was ended; and partisan strife and personal and domestic misery and general waste and ruin prevailed.

Rye, even at a later period, was noted for its solid, unyielding conservatism;[1] and, in Rye and throughout Westchester-county, generally, the Purdys were peculiarly noted for their unfaltering loyalty.[2] Early in September, 1775, before the passage of the enactment by the Provincial Congress, to which reference has been made, could have become generally known throughout that "border Town," Godfrey Haines, an unmarried man, was at the house of Daniel Purdy, in Rye; and, in conversation, he condemned the reorganization of the Militia, by the Provincial Congress; declared he would not perform any duty in the new-organized Company; and denounced the Congresses and Committees, generally, saying "he had as "leave be in hell as in the hands of any of them," an opinion which was, probably, confirmed, very soon afterwards. He evidently looked forward to an expected movement of the Home Government, for the maintenance of its authority; he wished the men-of-war would move up the Sound; and, in his youthful outburst of indignation, he said he would be one of those who would indicate the persons on whom the Government should first lay the weight of its retributive power.

Of that Godfrey Haines, nothing is now definitely known beyond the facts, told by himself,[3] that he was tolerably well educated, but was without any available property; but it can be learned, from the papers in the case, that he was not a stranger in that neighborhood nor in that house. He was evidently a young man, suffering from wrongs already inflicted on him or on his personal friends, possessing a fiery temper, and warmly indignant at the movements and the threats of the revolutionary faction. He undoubtedly knew that he was among those who entertained opinions and preferences which were similar in their character to those which he had declared; but the latter may have been less willing to declare what they preferred and what their opinions were, concerning the doings of those who were, then, aspiring to the Government of the Colony—he was, however, less fortunate than they, in the expression of his opinions in the presence of one who, either through ignorance or malevolence, was mean enough to betray him.

Samson had his Delilah; and Godfrey had his Eunice. Of Delilah, not an Israelite, we know that she betrayed her lover to his enemies, to the oppressors of his kindred and his people: of Eunice, an ignorant, unmarried woman; unable to write her own name and, probably, unable to read what others had written—just such a tool, indeed, as suited the purposes of such men as, then, manipulated her spitefully-told information—and, evidently, a daughter or sister or other kinswoman of the man under whose roof and in the enjoyment of whose hospitality Godfrey was,

[1] "The People of Rye being wholly devoted to the Interest of the "Crown shut their Eyes and Ears against reason and knowledge" * * (Petition of George Harris, "HAERLEM, August 26, 1776"—Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxiii., 158.)

[2] At the marriage of Gabriel Purdy to Charity Purdy, at the White Plains, on the twenty-eighth of March, 1775, a large company, forty-seven in number, was assembled, among whom thirty-seven were Purdys, "and not a single Whig among them."—Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 105, NEW-YORK, Thursday, April 20, 1775.)

[3] Petition to the Provincial Congress, "CITY HALL, October ye 4th, "1775"—page 117, post.

when he made those utterances, we know, also, that she betrayed a guest of the family, if not her own lover, into the hands of his enemies, into the hands of those who were oppressing his kindred and his people. She was not prompt in her treachery, which clearly indicates that it was an afterthought—probably, it was a girlish act of spiteful retaliation for some boyish affront, to which she had been subjected, subsequently to the day on which he had exposed himself to her ignorant vindictiveness. Whatever incited her, however, the story of Godfrey's outspoken utterances was told by her, within three or four weeks from the day of his visit to Purdy's; and, because he had evidently thus made himself obnoxious to the controlling faction, although he had not been previously regarded with suspicion,[1] the County Committee, with intemperate zeal, promptly proceeded to display and to exercise its new-found authority—Godfrey was arrested and taken to the White Plains, on no other accusation than the merely verbal information of the affronted Eunice; and that vindictive maiden was, also, taken to the same place, and before the same County Committee, there, in order that her accusation might be made in a more formal manner.

None of the details of the doings of that zealous County Committee, thus acting in its threefold character of prosecutor, judge, and executioner, have been recorded in history; but an affidavit was framed; and Eunice added "her mark" to it, and disappeared—even the industrious local historian has not found a place for her, in his genealogical record of the family of which she was apparently a member. The following is a copy of that affidavit, thus made, honestly or dishonestly, by Eunice Purdy, before the Committee of Safety of the County of Westchester:

"WESTCHESTER COUNTY, ss.:

"Eunice Purdy, of Rye, in the said County, "Spinster, being duly sworn upon the Holy Evange- "lists of Almighty God, deposeth and saith that, on or "about the second of September instant, Godfrey "Hains was at Daniel Purdy's, at Rye, and in con- "versation, at that time, said he understood that the "Committee or Congress had made a law to oblige all "to train under them; and that, 'damn them, if they "'came after him, they should either kill him or he "'would kill some of them; and that, dead or alive, "'he would be revenged;[2] and that he had enough "'in his pocket, then, for five or six of them.' That "he also damned the Congresses and Committees, "frequently, and said that he had as leave be in hell "as in the hands of the Congress or Committee; that "they would see if they were not all cut down, in a "fortnight, at farthest; that he wished the men-of- "war would come along the Sound; and that he wish- "ed they had raised their Company, three months "ago, for then the matter would have been settled "before that time; and further this Deponent saith "not.

her
"EUNICE + PURDY.
mark.

"Sworn the 28th September, 1775, }
"before me, }
"GILBT. DRAKE."

There was no other evidence than this evidently spitefully-made affidavit; and it is said Godfrey was "convicted," on this testimony, of "denying the au- "thority and speaking contemptuously of the Con- "gresses and the Committee of the County"—nothing appears to have been done on the charge, by Eunice, that he had used other and, apparently, more offensive words. He was ordered to be disarmed; but the judgment was returned unsatisfied, since he had concealed his arms and ammunition; and the Committee stated that it was highly improbable that they could be found. It was determined, however, that he was "a very dangerous man;" and, for its own peace sake as well as for its own safety, that very zealous Committee determined to send him to the Provincial Congress, in the City of New York, in order that that body might employ its more practised hand, in the further prosecution of him.

On the day after he had been tried and convicted and punished, as far as the Westchester-county Committee could do all these, [September 29, 1775,] Godfrey was placed in the custody of Daniel Winter, and sent to the City, the following letter, from that Committee, explaining the circumstances under which the victim had been thus transported from the County in which he had lived, being sent with him:

"WHITE PLAINS, Sept^r. 29, 1775.

"GENTLEMEN:

"We send you by Mr. Daniel Winter, Godfrey "Hains, a person who was accused and convicted, be- "fore us, of denying the authority and speaking con- "temptuously of the Congresses and the Committee "of this County. He was ordered to be disarmed; and, "upon examining him respecting his arms and am- "munition, he confessed that he has a gun, pistol, "sword, powder, and ball, but refused informing the "Committee where they are; and as Hains is a single "man, the Committee think it highly improbable that "his arms can be found.

"We enclose you an affidavit which induces us to "think him a dangerous man; and therefore send "him to you to be dealt with as you think proper.

"After reading the affidavit we think it needless to "acquaint you that his conduct (by the best infor- "mation we can get) has been very extraordinary—

[1] It will be seen, by reference to the list of those who were proscribed, (page 114, ante,) that Godfrey Haines's name was not on it, as it was originally written—it was "added" to that list "on Saturday "evening."

[2] This remark very clearly indicated that, when Godfrey made these violent remarks, he was smarting from wrongs already inflicted on himself or on those who were dear to him, by those of the revolutionary faction in Westchester-county or by those, from Connecticut, under General Wooster or others, who had come into the County, for the support of the Rebellion.

"such as going armed, and giving out threats against "some of the Committee and the Connecticut "troops, etc.

"The committee think it extremely necessary, for "the safety of the County, that the Commissions for "the Militia Officers should be immediately for-"warded.

"We are, gentlemen,
"Your most humble servants,
"By order of the Committee,
"GILBT. DRAKE, Chairman.

"TO THE COMMITTEE OF SAFETY,
"FOR THE PROVINCE OF NEW YORK."

Although the Autumn was well advanced and the days had become much shorter, Winter and his prisoner and the guard who accompanied them left the White Plains early enough to reach the City before nine o'clock on the morning of the twenty-ninth of September, the day on which the letter was written;[1] and the first subject which was brought before the Committee of Safety, there, at its morning session, in the City of New York, was the letter from the Committee of Westchester-county, which Winter had brought, with his prisoner.

Although Gilbert Livingston, and Alexander McDougal, and Isaac Sears, and others of the more radical revolutionists were present, in the Committee, that body handled the subject with great caution, and determined to have no connection with it, ordering, as the result of its deliberations, "That the said "Godfrey Haines be sent back to the Committee of "Westchester, under the care of the persons who "brought him to this City; and that Mr. Paulding, a "Deputy for the said County, be requested to write a "letter to the said Committee, informing them that "it is the opinion of this Committee, that, agreeable "to the Resolutions of the Provincial Congress of this "Colony, the County Committees are altogether com-"petent for punishing and confining persons guilty "of a breach of the said Resolutions or of either of "them."[2]

The Westchester-county-men were not inclined, however, to be troubled with the subject, especially with the knowledge which they possessed concerning the temper of many of those who were within that County; and, on the morning of the thirtieth of September, Daniel Winter "represented" to the Committee in New York "that the taking the said God-"frey Haines back will be attended with danger of "his being rescued by persons inimical to the cause "of Liberty;" and that body thereupon reconsidered its Order of the preceding day, and ordered "that the "said Godfrey Haines be committed to the Jail in this "City till the further order of this Committee or the "Provincial Congress of this Colony;"[3] and into the Jail, in New York, Godfrey was accordingly cast, without, however, the slightest provision for his support, while he should remain there.

The Jail, in the City of New York, when Godfrey Haines was cast into it, was confining other victims of arbitrary and unwarranted arrests who, also, had been sent to the Congress, by the country Counties; and it may be reasonably supposed that his animosities against the Congresses and the County Committees and those who favored them, were not, in the slightest degree, modified, by his association with those prisoners or by his own imprisonment. But, notwithstanding those animosities, his necessities compelled him to seek relief; and, on the fourth of October, the fifth day of his confinement, he united with his fellow-prisoners, in the following Petition, probably written by himself, addressed to the Provincial Congress, which had reassembled on the morning of that day:[4]

"TO THE HONOURABLE PROVINCIAL CONGRESS.

"GENTLEMEN: As there is Six of us Confined in "Goal by your order Charg'd with misdemeanors, we "should take it kind of you if you'd bring us to Im-"ediate tryal or provide for us in our Confinement as "we have not wherewithal to suport our ourselves. "And you will oblige yours

"CITY HALL, October y^e^ 4^th^, 1775.
"GODFREY HAINS, ADAM BERGH,
"TIMOTHY DOUGHTY, CHRISTIAN BERGH, JUN^R^.,
"JOHN DOB, DAVID DOB."

That Petition was duly presented to the Congress, on the day of its date, and was read before that body; but no action whatever appears to have been taken on it,[5] then or subsequently.

Eight days after the Provincial Congress had received and read the Petition of Godfrey Haines and his fellow-prisoners, that body received the following Resolution from the Continental Congress, which probably served to intensify rather than to ameliorate the prevailing partisan animosities; and it was certainly not well-constituted for the relief of those who were already imprisoned on similar charges:

"RESOLVED, That it be recommended to the several "Provincial Assemblies, or Conventions and Coun-"cils, or Committees of Safety, to arrest and secure "every person, in their respective Colonies, who is

[1] It is not impossible that this arrest had been made after it had become dark, on the twenty-eighth of September: it is quite clear that the Committee was in session, that the letter of transmission was written, and that Godfrey was hurried through the County, after midnight, on the following morning. Secrecy was probably necessary to ensure success, where the revolutionary faction was so insignificant in numbers, especially, as will be seen in the farther proceedings in this case, when those who were also active, in the maintenance of their own rights and properties, had been aroused.

[2] Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Veneris, 9 ho., A.M., Sep-"tember 29, 1775."

[3] Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Sabbati, 9 ho., A.M., Sep-"tember 30th, 1775."

[4] Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxi., 70.

[5] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Mercurii, 9 ho., A.M., Octo-"ber 4 th, 1775."

"going at large, as may, in their opinion, endanger "the safety of the Colonies or the Liberties of "America."[1]

Appended to the copy of this Resolution which was laid before the Provincial Congress of New York, was a memorandum, not included in the official transcript of the Resolution, and without a signature, which was in these words: "To be kept as secret as "its nature will admit;" and it was accompanied by extracts from letters which the Continental Congress had received from London, in one of which the Governor of New York, William Tryon, was mentioned; and in which, also, it was said that "it would be a "capital stroke to get possession of Tryon."[2] The same good fortune which Lieutenant-governor Colden had enjoyed, in receiving early information of what was proposed or done in the secret sessions of the Continental Congress of 1774, was enjoyed by Governor Tryon, concerning the private correspondence and the secret proposals and doings of the Continental Congress of 1775;[3] and he took refuge, first, on board the Halifax, packet, and, subsequently, on board the Duchess of Gordon, the latter lying under the protecting guns of the Asia. The prisoners in the Jail, victims of arbitrary power, were less fortunate, in their intercourse with those exercising authority, among the revolutionary faction.

There is no record of the discharge of Godfrey Haines from the Jail, in the City of New York; but, on the contrary, when the record of the proceedings of the Committee of Safety, on the morning of the twenty-ninth of September, when he was taken before that body by Daniel Winter and the guard who had brought him from the White Plains,[4] was laid before the Provincial Congress, after the latter body had reassembled, after its recess, those proceedings were officially approved;[5] and, subsequently, the further proceedings of the Committee of Safety, on the morning of the thirtieth of September, when Godfrey was committed to the Jail, in New York,[6] were also officially approved by the same Provincial Congress.[7] He was not officially released; but, very soon after his Petition had been filed, without receiving any other attention, his necessities nerved his arms;[8] and, about midnight, he broke six grates out of the window of his prison, and released himself. Hastening to the wharf, on the East River, the starved fugitive, from whom all food and drink had been withheld for more than a week,[9] he "impressed," if he did not steal, a boat; and found refuge and food on board of

[1] Journal of the Continental Congress, "Friday, October 6, 1775;" Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Jovis, 9 ho., A.M., October 12th, 1775."

[2] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Jovis, 9 ho., A.M., October 12 "1775."

[3] Compare the correspondence of Joseph Galloway and James Duane with the venerable Lieutenant governor of New York, and the knowledge of the latter, concerning the secret doings of the Congress of 1774, which the former, members of the Congress and pledged to secrecy, had communicated to him, (pages 27, 33, 34, ante,) with this later instance of secret information and copies of secret correspondence, "received from the "Fountain-Head," by Governor Tryon, enabling him to secure his personal safety by taking refuge, first, on the Halifax, a packet-ship, and, finally, on the Duchess of Gordon, the latter lying under the protecting guns of the Asia.

Judge Jones, in his History of New York during the Revolutionary War, (i., 61,) said that information was conveyed to the Governor by Egbert Dumond, a member of the delegation from Ulster-county, in the Provincial Congress; and de Lancey, in his Notes on that work, (i., 559, 560,) acquiesced in that statement. We cannot bring ourself to an agreement with those excellent authorities.

The Resolution was adopted by the Continental Congress, on Friday, the sixth of October; transmitted to the Provincial Congress, by the President of the Continental Congress, on the ninth of October; and was not laid before the Provincial Congress, until the twelfth of October, until which day Dumond could not have had any knowledge of it. But, on the tenth of October, two days before the Provincial Congress received it, Governor Tryon had received the information, "from undoubted au "thority from the City of Philadelphia," (Governor Tryon to the Mayor of the City of New York, "New York, 10th Oct. 1775;") and his subsequent statement, that he was in correspondence with "the Fountain-head," (Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, "On board the Dutchess of "Gordon New York 11 th Nov 1775,") confirmed his former statement, that the information came "from the City of Philadelphia." Having failed to secure that guaranty of protection from the Corporation of the City of New York which the circumstances led him to ask for, he went on board the Halifax, on the eighteenth or nineteenth of October, (Governor Tryon to Mayor Hicks, 'On board the Halifax Packet, 19th "October, 1775.")

As the Delegates from New York, in Philadelphia, were well-informed, not only concerning the Resolution but concerning the secret correspondence of the Continental Congress, which evidently formed a portion of the information which was communicated to the Governor, there is reason for believing that the correspondent of the Governor was a member of that Delegation; and the reader need not be told, in view of the fact that Lieutenant-governor Colden exposed the names of his correspondents, one of whom was in the Delegation of 1775, which was the particular Delegate who was undoubtedly the correspondent, also, of Governor Tryon, especially since, as was well known, the Governor's official and personal leanings were toward the Livingstons rather than toward the rivals of the latter, the De Lanceys, who had previously occupied the nearest place to the throne, in the Colony; and, especially, since the Delegate referred to was, by marriage, a member of the Livingston family.

The Memorandum which the Governor is said to have subsequently stated "was the ground of my subsequent conduct in removing on Board "the Packet," (Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, "On board the "Dutchess of Gordon New York 11 th Nov 1775,") bears, on its face, the date when he is said to have received it—"Mem. Rec[d] from N York: "the best authority Nov 2 1775 W T."—and it may have been sent to him by Egbert Dumont, as stated by Judge Jones and his commentator; but, when it was said to have been received, the Governor had surely been on the Halifax or on the Duchess of Gordon, more than a fortnight.

The name of the real author of that Memorandum, on which Governor Tryon is inconsistently said to have placed so much dependence, and the purpose for which it was transmitted to him, after he had been warned of his danger and had secured his safety, are questions which need not be discussed, in this place.

[4] See page 293, ante.

[5] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Jovis, 10 ho., A.M., October "26th, 1775."

[6] See page 293, ante.

[7] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., A.M., Oc- "tober, 27, 1775."

[8] "David Rhea says that Captain Haines told him he was put in jail "because he refused to deliver up his arms; and that his punishment "had been determined, that he should not eat nor drink until he had "delivered them up."—(Testimony of David Rhea, before the Committee of Safety—Journal of the Committee, "Die Sabbati, 10 ho., A.M., January "20th, 1776.")

[9] Haines was tried and sentenced, at the White Plains, on the twenty-eighth or twenty-ninth of September, when his sentence of starvation probably commenced to run. Six, if not seven, days afterwards, he petitioned for food, saying "he had not wherewithal to suport himself," his jailers, in the City of New York, doing nothing more than to read his Petition, and to place it on their files, (page 293, ante.) It is not probable that his long fast was continued longer than the succeeding midnight.

the Asia, man-of-war, then lying in the stream.[1] Captain Vandeput of that ship, treated him kindly; gave him an order for some oars; and evidently found a way to restore him to his home, in Rye. He was there, during the same month, engaged in "getting "out a parcel of oars for the man-of-war," in New York,[2] declaring, at the same time, that he "was "determined to have satisfaction on some particular "persons," evidently in retaliation for the wrongs which those persons had inflicted on him.[3]

The subsequent career of that unfortunate victim of Westchester-county's "patriotism" would afford material for a romance, as it has done that for dispassionate history. During the succeeding December [1775], in company with "one Palmer"—said to have been of Mamaroneck—he loaded the Sloop Polly and Ann, which he had recently purchased from Isaac Gedney, with Beef, Pork, and other Provisions; and, taking on board three quarter-casks of Madeira Wine, a package of Turnips, and other articles, all of them for General Howe, and other packages for General Ruggles, Mr. Willard, and Mrs. Ann Wood, together with Isaac Gedney, Bartholomew Haines (who was his cousin) Mr. Palmer (who was one of the owners of the cargo), and seven other persons, passengers, he sailed for Boston. He sailed from New York, on a Wednesday, the nineteenth of December, nominally for the West Indies, but undoubtedly for Boston. It appears, however, that adversity still accompanied him; and, on the following Saturday night, [December 23, 1775], the Polly and Ann was driven ashore, at Squam Beach, on the coast of New Jersey, so widely known as the "graveyard" of the mercantile marine of the world.

The savory reputation of the "wreckers" of that treacherous coast, sometimes made more treacherous by reason of the false lights displayed by those who lived there, will prepare the reader for the remainder of that sad story of adventure and of disaster—the vessel does not appear to have gone to pieces; and that and what remained of her cargo, after the "wreckers" had satisfied themselves from it, were seized by the local revolutionary Committee of Monmouth-county, and sold, not for the benefit of the owners of either the vessel or the cargo, but for whatever other purpose the Provincial Congress of New Jersey should determine; while "the Captain, Mas- "ter, and Passengers," or such of them as had not already abandoned the scene of their last affliction, after nineteen days had elapsed since the wreck of the Sloop, were ordered to be sent, duly guarded, to the City of New York, and delivered to the Committee of Safety of that Colony. As may be foreseen, Godfrey Haines was remitted to the tender mercies of those from whom he had escaped, in the preceding October.[4]

Three days after Major Henderson and his prisoners reached New York, [January 23, 1776,] "The Com- "mittee of Safety took into consideration the case of "Godfrey Haines, lately apprehended and sent here "by the Committee of Safety of New Jersey; are of "opinion that his many and mischievous machina- "tions are so dangerous that he ought to be kept in "safe custody and close jail; and that, by the Res- "olutions of the Continental Congress of the second "day of January instant,[5] they are fully authorized, "and that it is their duty to the Country, to have him "confined; and as the said Godfrey Haines lately "broke the Jail of this City, and escaped, when he "was confined there, as a prisoner,[6] and, continuing "his evil practices,[7] set off to navigate a vessel loaded "with Provisions to supply the Ministerial Army and "Navy, at Boston, they conceive it will be very "dangerous to keep or convey the said Godfrey "Haines to Ulster-county Jail, unless he is fettered "or manacled; therefore

"Resolved and Ordered, That the said Godfrey "Haines be conveyed to Ulster-county Jail, to be "there confined in safe and secure custody, in close "jail, until the further order of the Continental or "Provincial Congress, or of this Committee. And

"Ordered, That the said Godfrey Haines be sent, "manacled or fettered, under guard, to Ulster-county "Jail; and that Colonel McDougal be requested to "procure an Officer, with a proper Guard of the "Militia or Minute-men of this City, to guard the "said prisoner and the other prisoners heretofore "ordered to jail, to Kingston, in Ulster-county."[8] At the same time, a letter was written to the Ulster-county Committee, "praying" that body "that very "particular directions for keeping him in safe cus- "tody, to prevent his escape, be given as to Haines,

[1] Haines made this statement to one of the guard which subsequently conveyed him to New-York, after he had been re-captured, (Testimony of Major Henderson, before the Committee of Safety;) and he also made the same statement to David Rhea, (Testimony of David Rhea, before the same Committee: Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Sabbati, 10 ho., "A.M., January 20, 1776.")

[2] Examination of Gilbert Budd before the Provincial Congress—Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 5 ho., P.M., November 3, "1775."

[3] Affidavit of Philip Pinckney, November 1, 1775—page 301, post.

[4] This statement is based on the Affidavit of James Webb, one of the passengers; on the Proceedings of the Committee of Safety of New-Jersey, "with respect to those Prisoners;" on the Supplementary statement of James Webb; on the Testimony of David Rhea; and on the Statements of Major Thomas Henderson of the Monmouth-county Minute men, who conveyed the prisoners to New York.

[5] The reader will not fail to observe that the Committee carefully concealed the notable enactment of the Provincial Congress, of the first of the preceding September, (vide pages 287–289, ante.)

[6] The Committee made no mention of the fact that he had, then, been kept without food or water, a full week; and that, since his prayer for food had been disregarded by the Provincial Congress, he was compelled either to force his way out of the prison or to starve, (vide page 118, ante.)

[7] The only "evil practises" for which he had been condemned were "denying the authority and speaking contemptuously of the Congresses "and the Committee of Westchester-county"—Eunice Purdy had made other charges against him, which, however, had evidently been dismissed by the County Committee, (vide page 294, ante.)

[8] Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Martis, 3 ho., P.M., 23rd "Jan'y, 1776."

"as he formerly broke the Jail, in this City, and made "his escape;" and, at the same time, directing that Committee to "appoint some person whom you shall "think proper, to supply them with the necessaries of "life, at their own expense, if they can pay for them; "and if they cannot, at the public expense."[1] Agreeably to that prayer, a special Guard of Grenadiers was placed over Godfrey and his two fellow-prisoners; and the Committee, in Kingston, said, "they will be "safe, we think."[2]

The subsequent career of Godfrey Haines, as far as it is known, can be told in few words—the severity of the treatment which he had received and which he continued to receive broke down his health; and the Committee of Ulster-county was applied to, to permit him to be removed from his close confinement and to have "the liberty of the house," until he should have recovered his health and strength. Permission was accordingly given for his liberation from his manacles and his close imprisonment; and, very evidently, the sympathy of those who held him in custody was turned toward him far enough to permit him to escape.[3] We have found nothing further concerning him.

There were other arrests in Westchester-county similar to that of Godfrey Haines, one of which, that of Elijah Weeks, was followed by an attempt to rescue him, by an armed force, among the latter of whom were Isaac Gedney, Junior,[4] William Nelson,[5] Joshua Boyea, Joshua Ferris,[6] Bartholomew Haines,[7] Elijah Haines, William Haines, and John Haines, the persons who made the arrest having been Job Haddon, of Harrison Precinct, Benjamin Morrell, of New York, and Isaac Sniffen, of Rye-neck.[8]

Among those who were, also, arrested and thrown into prison, by the Committee of Westchester-county, under the provisions of the enactment of the Provincial Congress which is now under consideration, were Joshua Purdy, Caleb Morgan, John McCord, Gilbert Horton, Josiah Brown, Edmund Ward, Samuel Merrit, Philip Fowler, Gabriel Purdy, William Barker, Junior, John Besley, Isaac Brown, Bartholomew Haines, Joseph Purdy, and Jonathan Purdy; and, as an evidence of the wide-spread ruin which was inflicted on the inhabitants of the County, by the sequestrations of the real and personal estates of those who were "suspected" of being opposed to the Rebellion, there were sequestrated in the single Town of Salem, prior to the sixth of December, 1776, the properties of Ephraim Sanford, Thomas Smith, Benjamin Close, Gilbert Hunt, Samuel Baxter, Abraham Close, Job Keeler, Jonathan Wallace, Ezra Morehouse, Jacob Wallace, Samuel Wallace, Nathaniel Palmer, Nathan Osborn, Abraham Dan, Edward Jones, and George Butson.[9]

It was a reasonable consequence, under the existing circumstances, that questions should be raised, concerning the legitimacy of any such authority as the Provincial Congress had created, in these enactments, and delegated to the several local Committees, none of which were recognized by the Law of the land and all of which were antagonistic to those Laws. It was a short-sighted policy, also, even among those who were in rebellion, which inflicted penalties, especially such penalties as these, on those persons who continued, peacefully, on their respective farms, quietly pursuing their daily labors, honestly respecting the Laws of the country, and consistently recognizing and honoring the Sovereignty of the King, whom even those who were in rebellion quite as fully recognized, as their undoubted Sovereign; and these, for no other reason than for disrespectful words, concerning the several Committees and Congresses, and for the utterance of questions concerning their respective authorities. It was a reasonable consequence, under existing circumstances, we repeat, that quiet men should become excited and excitable men angry, and that all should become alarmed and indignant, when a mere handful of their neighbors, without their "consent" and without the slightest warrant of Law and without the slightest necessity, usurped and maintained such unheard-of authority as was created in these enactments; and it was equally reasonable, under the circumstances which then existed, that there should be neighborly consultations and neighborhood organizations, as well as personal efforts, for the support and protection of

[1] Letter from the Committee of Safety to the Committee of Ulster-county "In Committee of Safety, New-York, 23rd June, 1776."

[2] Letter from the Ulster-county Committee to the Committee of Safety, "Kingston, January 27th, 1776."

[3] William Elsworth, Chairman of the Ulster-county Committee, to the Provincial Congress, "Kingston, May 22, 1776;" Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Sabbati, 9 ho., A.M., May 25, 1776."

[4] Isaac Gidney, probably the same person, visited Governor Tryon, on the Duchess of Gordon, a few months afterwards, (Examination of William Sutton before the Westchester-county Committee, July 23, 1776.)

[5] William Nelson was one of those who, in the following year, "were "supposed to have gone to the British Army," (List of Sundry Persons, Inhabitants of Cortlandt's Manor, etc.: Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxvi., 594).

[6] Joshua Ferris, a son of Caleb Ferris, was one of those who went on board the Phœnix, when that ship went up the Hudson, in July, 1776, (Examination of Joshua Ferris: Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxv., 69, 85.) He, or another person bearing the same name, was a prisoner, in the Jail at the White Plains, in September, 1776, at which time he petitioned the Provincial Congress "that His Irons may be "taken off as he cannott posibly Shift Himself or get clear of the Ver-"min, with which he is Greatly Infected to the great disturbance of his "unfortunate fellow prisoners," (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxiii., 82.)

[7] Bartholomew Haines, a cousin of Godfrey Haines, was one of those who were reported to the Provincial Congress, as obnoxious to the revolutionary faction in Westchester-county, (page 290, ante;) and he was, also, one of those who were arrested and thrown into the Jail, at the White Plains, in the Summer of 1776, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxiii., 108.)

[8] Letter from the Sub-committee of the Committee of Westchester-county to the Provincial Congress, "White Plains, November 1, 1775."

[9] The names of those who were arrested and imprisoned, which are named in the text, were copied from a single Petition for relief, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxiii., 108); but there were many others. The names of those farmers, in Salem, whose Farms, Stock, Tools, Crops, Household Furniture, etc., were thus seized and sold, were taken from the same Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxv. 307, in which the properties are mentioned, in detail.

the personal and domestic and political Rights which those farmers indisputably possessed, under the Constitution and the Laws of the Kingdom—they would have been unworthy of their manhood and of their families, of their homes and of their Rights, had they failed to become excited and alarmed, to have armed and organized and fought, for themselves and their wives and their little ones, for their homes and their properties and their Rights, whenever and by whomsoever and under whatever pretence of ill-gotten authority, these might have been assailed. It was a mistake, as well as a crime, therefore, to assume authority for the arrest and imprisonment of men and for the sequestration of their properties and the impoverishment of the aged and of the dependent and helpless, without a shadow of legal authority and in audacious defiance of it; without a shadow of existing necessity, even from the standpoint of the Rebellion, for the enactment of such extreme measures; and with a reasonable assurance that a manly self-respect among those who were proscribed, would be surely aroused, not only for their own and their families' protection, but, as far as they could do it, for the suppression of that haughty lawlessness which had presumed to create and to enforce so grave an enactment of despotism. It was loudly declared to have been the most ardent wish of even the most advanced advocate of rebellion, to have secured a reconciliation with the Mother Country and a restoration of harmony and good-will among the adverse parties throughout the several Colonies:[1] how much more of wisdom there would have been displayed among those who had seized the reins of government, therefore, had they practised their hands in the work of reconciliation and harmony and goodwill among their neighbors, instead of driving the staid and the quiet and the conscientious and the law-abiding, among the latter, into active and bitter partisanship, and of spreading alarm and strife and misery and ruin over the entire County. There might have been fewer transformations of moral and intellectual pigmies into potent political giants—there might have been a smaller number of fortunes rapidly and largely increased from the plunder of neighboring better-provided-for households and farmyards—but there would have been, also, fewer outrages against the Laws of both man and of God; less occasion for bitterness among the descendants of those who were, then, neighbors in locality, if not in fact; and very much less for the faithful historian to condemn and to denounce, while reciting the annals of the American Revolution, as that Revolution was developed and seen in the agricultural and prosperous and peaceful County of Westchester, in New York. But the end of such outrages had not yet come.

While the excitement occasioned by the enactments of the Provincial Congress, authorizing local Committees to seize and imprison and disarm and deprive of their estates those who should become obnoxious to those local demagogues and against whom, by fair means or by foul, an accusation of unfriendly thoughts or words against the Rebellion could possibly be trumped up, was at its height, and while some of the inhabitants of the County were already suffering from imprisonment, attended by the most distressing circumstances, under the provisions of those enactments, the Committee of Safety, whom the Provincial Congress had left on duty, with a limited authority, during a brief recess of the latter body, still further aroused the excitement and the indignation of the greater number of the Colonists in New York, of nearly all of those within Westchester-county, by the publication of the following Resolution and Orders:

"In Committee of Safety,
"For the Colony of New York,
"September 16th, 1775.

"Whereas, a great number of the men enlisted in "the Continental Service, in this Colony, are destitute of Arms, and in order to carry into execution "the Resolutions of the Continental Congress, it is "absolutely necessary to have those troops armed: "And whereas, every method to hire or purchase "Arms, hitherto attempted, has failed to procure a "sufficient number of Arms for the said troops, and "the only method remaining is to impress Arms for "their use,

"Resolved, therefore, That all such Arms as are "fit for the use of the troops raised in this Colony, "which shall be found in the hands or custody of any "person who has not signed the General Association "in this Colony, shall be impressed for the use of the "said troops. And

"Ordered, That the person or persons who shall "have the charge of the carrying this Resolution into "execution, in each County, shall direct all the Arms "that shall be so impressed, to be collected at some "place in the County where they are impressed, and "there valued and appraised by three indifferent men "of reputation of the County, any two of whom "agreeing, shall be sufficient to ascertain the price; "that an account be kept from whom every Musket, "Gun, or Firelock, so impressed, shall have been "taken; and each such Gun, Musket, or Firelock "caused to be marked with the initial letter of the "name of the County where it is impressed and numbered, the numbers following each other, successively; and that the same be entered in a book provided for that purpose, with the name of the owner "opposite to the number marked on each Musket, "Gun, or Firelock, respectively. And

[1] "The thought that we might be driven to the sad necessity of breaking our connection with Great Britain, exclusive of the carnage and destruction, which it was easy to see must attend the separation, always gave me a great deal of grief. And even now, I would cheerfully retire from public life, forever, renounce all chance for honors or profits from the public, nay, I would cheerfully contribute my little property, to obtain peace and liberty."—(John Adams to his Wife, "7 October, 1775.")

"ORDERED, That a Certificate, specifying the value "and the mark of the Musket, Gun, or Firelock so "impressed, appraised, and marked, shall be signed "by the Appraisers and Impressers, which shall enti- "tle the owner thereof to receive the appraised value "from the Treasurer of the Provincial Congress of "this Colony: PROVIDED the same be not returned at "or before the conclusion of the present unhappy "controversy between Great Britain and the united "Colonies. And that an account, signed by the said "Appraisers and Impressers, of all such Muskets, "Guns, and Firelocks, so impressed, shall be sent, "forthwith, to the Secretaries of the Provincial Con- "gress, or either of them, to be filed. And that all "the Muskets, Guns, and Firelocks so impressed, on "Nassau Island,[1] be delivered, without delay, to Peter "T. Curtenius, the Commissary of the Provincial "Congress of this Colony; and those that shall be im- "pressed in the other Counties of this Colony, to be "deposited with their respective Committees, subject "to the order of the said Provincial Congress or Com- "mittee of Safety. And

"ORDERED, That the Captains of the respective "Companies of the Third Regiment of the troops of "this Colony, who are now in Suffolk-county, be "authorized to carry these Resolutions into execu- "tion in Queens-county. That Colonel Lasher[2] be "requested to send two or more Companies of his "Battalion, to give such assistance in Queens-county "as may be necessary, at such time and to such place "or places as Colonel McDougal and John Sloss Ho- "bart, Esq., shall direct or advise. And

"ORDERED FARTHER, That the Chairman of the "Committee and Captain Dutcher,[3] with such drafts "from the Militia as he shall think necessary, or with "the assistance of some of General Wooster's troops,[4] "be enabled to carry the said Resolutions into effect, "in Westchester-county. And that these Resolutions "be carried into execution, in every other County, by "the Chairman of the County Committee, with the "assistance of the Militia Officers, who are hereby "ordered to be aiding therein with such parts of the "Militia as each such Chairman shall think necessary. "And

"ORDERED, That the several persons who shall be "disarmed by virtue of the above Resolutions, shall "be exempted from doing duty in the Militia, as or- "dered by the Provincial Congress of this Colony. "And farther

"ORDERED, That in case any of the non-associators "aforesaid shall resist those persons authorized to "put these Resolutions into execution, they (the per- "sons hereby authorized to put in execution the "above Resolves) are hereby authorized to repel "force by force, and to take into custody such per- "son or persons so resisting, and cause him or them "to be brought before this Committee or the Provin- "cial Congress of this Colony."[5]

The real purpose of the Committee of Safety, in the adoption and publication of this Resolution and of these several Orders, was the entire disarmament of every one who, for any reason, had neglected or declined to sign the General Association; and, for that reason, every class of fire-arms, whether adapted to the uses of the Army or not, was included, in every instance, in the Orders wherein the Arms to be seized were specifically described. It will be seen, also, that the Counties of Queens and Westchester were especially noticed; and that they, alone, were selected for details of foreign troops, for the enforcement, within each of them, respectively, of the utmost requirements of the Committee's Orders—besides the local Militia, in each of the two Counties, thus honored by the Committee of Safety's malignant animosity, a large additional force of troops, from beyond the boundaries of the County, in each instance, was placed at the disposal of those who were sent, within those Counties, respectively, for the "impressment" of the Arms, in order to ensure the most complete success of the enterprise.

It must have been peculiarly galling, among those who had been accustomed to hear of the "Rights of "Man" and of the "Constitutional Rights of Engiish- "men" and all the other catchwords and maxims in the science of government—generally true, in theory, although, practically, they had been seized and employed by demagogues, in those instances, only for the advancement of personal and partisan ends—when a military force, no matter by whom commanded nor of what troops it was composed, was moved from farmhouse to farmhouse, failing to call only on those who were in favor with the Chairman of a County Committee, for the seizure of whatever "Muskets, Guns, "and Firelocks" the occupants of those several farmhouses owned or had in their possession. Not an exception was made, no matter what reason there might have been for such an exception; and everything which had a gun-lock on it, whether useful or useless for military purposes—whether a young man's fowling-piece, with which he was wont to have a few hours' sport, when squirrels and robins abounded, or to have more serious work, when foxes and more formidable marauders poached in the poultry-yards or in the sheep-pastures; or an old man's worn-out musket, a trusty friend in earlier Wars and, now, only a remembrancer of other days and other hardships—everything was doomed, by that new-formed

[1] Long Island was continued to be called "Nassau Island," long after 1775.

[2] John Lasher was Colonel of First Regiment of New York City (uniformed) Militia.

[3] William Dutcher, of what is now Irvington, was Captain of "the "Associated Company of the upper part of Philipsburgh," (ride page 282 ante.)

[4] General Wooster was encamped near Harlem, on Manhattan Island, with a large body of troops, brought thither from Connecticut.

[5] Journal of the Committee of Safety, "Die Sabbati, 9 ho., A.M., Septem- "ber 16th, 1775."

power, to seizure and, practically, to forfeiture. There was grave reason for increased discontent and excitement. There was ample reason, under the circumstances which then existed, for obstructing the execution of the Committee's Orders—indeed, there was greater reason for concealing the objects which the military force was expected to seize and "impress," under the provisions of these Orders, than there had been for the concealment of the Bay Colony's military stores, at Concord, when Lieutenant-colonel Smith and Major Pitcairn were sent to seize them, and for resisting the aggression of the Committee, than there had been for the punishment of the invader, in that instance, after his work had been finished, on the highway, between Concord and Charlestown.[1]

It is said that, in Queens-county, "the people "conceal all their Arms that are of any value; many "declare they know nothing about the Congress, "nor do they care anything for the Orders of the "Congress, and say that they would sooner lose their "lives than give up their Arms; and that they would "blow any man's brains out, who should attempt to "take them from them. We are told," the writer continued, "that the people have been collecting "together, and parading, in sundry places, armed, "and firing their Muskets, by way of bravado. On "the whole, had we the Battalion" [Lasher's] "we "believe we should be able to collect a very consider-"able number of good Arms and support the honour of "Congress; but without it, shall not—and think that "if the Battalion is sent up, the sooner the better."[2]

There are no known records of the doings of Gilbert Drake and Captain William Dutcher, in their tours of pillage, among the conservative and peaceful farmers of Westchester-county; but there appears, from a brief mention which has been made, in other connections, that the men of that County, like those of Queens-county, armed themselves, and patroled the County, in large parties, to guard against surprises; declaring their determination to defend themselves, and saying "that if any body came to "their houses to take away their Arms, they would "fire upon them."[3] It appears, also, that the declaration was fully sustained; that the united farmers proved more than a match for the local Militia and the other troops which the Chairman of the County Committee had been authorized to call for his support; and that, for the more effectual accomplishment of his purposes, that Chairman had assumed still further authority, by calling on the floating population of the neighboring Towns, in Connecticut, for reinforcements[4]—as the Chairman of the County Committee was authorized by the Committee of Safety, to call for the entire Militia of the County, already seem to have been sufficient to fill three Regiments,[5] and as many of General Wooster's command of Connecticut troops, then encamped below Harlem,[6] and numbering "about 400 men,"[7] as should be required, that opposition must have been wide-spread and resolutely maintained, in Westchester-county, which had required, in addition to all these, for its suppression, an additional force, drawn from what may be properly called the Swiss Guards of Colonial America, mercenaries, who, while they professed to have been ardent friends of Freedom, were, nevertheless, whenever they could see any possible advantage to their individual interests, constantly ready to enlist in any service, outside of Connecticut, and to become, in their new associations, the most devoted of all supporters of despotism and the most relentless of all persecutors of those, no matter of what country, who dared to question the sanctity of the assumed authority of those who employed them.

[1] Doctor Sparks noticed this outrage, in these words: "The Committee "reasoned but imperfectly from the facts of history and the principles of "human nature, when they supposed that people, with arms in their "hands, would be tempted to resign them, by such motives as were held "out. They must either be treated as friends or enemies. If friends, "their safety and interest required that the soldiers who were to pro-"tect their property and defend their rights should be armed; and the "call of patriotism would be the loudest that could be made to them. "While deaf to this call, they would not be made to listen to the Orders "of a Committee or the Resolves of a Congress. If enemies, the sense "of present danger, operating on the first law of nature, would prompt "them to keep within their power, their only sure means of defence. "In either case, the idea of taking away their arms, by a compulsory "impressment, had little to recommend it, either in policy or prudence." —(Life of Gouverneur Morris, i., 63.)

The Doctor reasoned, above, on the ground that the Order of the Committee was an isolated act, disconnected with any other of the class; and he reasoned well, on that premise; but the fact was, another Order had just been made, in secret, to seize the persons and properties of those who were obnoxious to the Committee and its subordinates; and it was considered necessary, for the safety of the marauders, to deprive the secretly proposed victims of that earlier enactment, of their means for defence, before it commenced, openly, its work of lawlessness and outrage, on the persons and properties of those who had been or who should, thenceforth, be designated as its victims.

[2] Letter from Major William Williams to the Committee of Safety. "Jamaica, September 25th, 10 o'clock, P.M."

Major Williams appears to have been a resident of Queens-county.

[3] Testimony of Colonel Gilbert Budd of Mamaroneck, before the Provincial Congress. Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 10 ho. A.M., "November 3, 1775," (vide page 302, post.)

[4] This conflict between those who were executing the Orders of the Committee of Safety, for the disarmament of those who had not signed the Association, and those, in Westchester-county, who were intended to have been the victims of the Committee's aggressive policy, has been studiously concealed by all who have written on the subject of the American Revolution; but the Provincial Congress, on the twelfth of December, gave the formal thanks of that body "to those of the In-"habitants of the Colony of Connecticut, who so cheerfully gave "their aid, at the request of the Committee of Westchester-county, "in the late suppression of the Insurgents in that County, against the "cause of Liberty." Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 3 "ho., P.M., Decr. 12th, 1775,") which is ample authority, for the statement, in the text.

[5] See pages 281, 282, 283, ante.

[6] General Wooster and his command were encamped on property belonging to Arent Bussing, near Harlem, from the eighteenth of July, preceding, (Journal of Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 9 ho., A.M., "July 18th, 1775.")

[7] "General Wooster is at Harlem, with about 400 men, which appear "to us to be unemployed," (Letter from the Committee of Safety to the Continental Congress, "In Committee of Safety for the Colony of New "York, during the recess of the Provincial Congress, New-York, "Sept. 19, 1775.")

It is proper that notice shall be taken, in this connection, of the fact that the Provincial Congress, on the twenty-fourth of October, twenty days after that body had returned to its place and to its work and thirty-eight days after its Committee of Safety had adopted and published the Resolution and Orders, "relating to the impressment of Arms," which have been thus described and denounced, passed a formal Resolution "disapproving" and, therefore, abrogating them;[1] but the mischief which had necessarily proceeded from the adoption and publication and attempts to execute that Resolution and those Orders, could not be undone; the wounds which had been inflicted, were too deep to be healed by such an emollient; and an increased and constantly increasing bitterness of feeling, between the conservative and the revolutionary portions of the inhabitants, was every where seen, scattering its baleful and ruinous influence, from one extreme of the County to the other.

The radical changes in the characters and conduct of the previously quiet and orderly and industrious and prosperous inhabitants of Westchester-county, which were produced by the succession of aggressive enactments, made and published by the Provincial Congress and by its Committee of Safety, may be seen in the following letter and in what followed it, while that Provincial Congress was in session:

"WHITE PLAINS, November 1st, 1775."

"SIR:

"The Committee of Westchester-county, having "been called together upon a request of some of their "body, upon suspicion of a plot being contrived to "carry off several of the members and some others "who had shewed themselves zealously attached to "the Liberties of this country, Mr. Philip Pinkney,[2] "(who had given very full information, to some of the "Committee, of the plot, and had offered to swear to "it, provided he was brought by the Committee by "an appearance of force, and had engaged not to be "out of the way,) upon being sent for, by some of the "guard attending the Committee, was not to be "found; whereupon some of the Committee, by order "of the whole, waited upon Mr. Pinkney, who, after "refusing to come before the Committee, and after a "great deal of equivocation, made the enclosed affi-"davit, before a Magistrate, which we have reason to "think is not the whole truth; for which reasons we "refer you to Colonel Budd[3] and Mr. Gill. Budd "Horton,[4] with whom Mr. Pinkney has conversed.

"As we are only a Sub-committee appointed to take "the examination of Mr. Pinkney and such other "persons as might be necessary, and to make a Re-"port of our Proceedings to the Honourable the Pro-"vincial Congress, we beg leave to request that Mr. "Pinkney may be sent for and critically examined, "by the Congress, respecting the above matter, and "with relation to Oars being made by the request of "Captain Vandeput;[5] and, also, that William Davis, "(who was employed in making the Oars,) and Sarah "Williams, the wife of Isaac Williams, of Westchester, "may also be sent for and examined as witnesses, "respecting them.

"We also request that Mr. William Lounsberry,[6] "Isaac Gedney, Junior, and three hired men who "work at Justice Sutton's,[7] may be sent for, on account "of what Mr. Pinckney has related, though not sworn "to, that they, among others, were Minute-men, as he "called them; that they were to be ready, at a "moment's warning, to take off some persons who "were the most obnoxious.

"We would also request, when the others are sent "for, that the before-mentioned Isaac Gedney, Junior, "and William Nelson, Joshua Boyea, Joshua Ferris, "Bartholomew Hains, Elijah Hains, William Hains, "and John Hains, be also taken and brought before "the Honourable Congress, for taking up arms to "rescue Elijah Weeks, who was brought before the "Committee upon a charge against him. Upon the "charge, we would mention the Widow Margaret "Gedney, of the White Plains, (where they left their "Arms), Job Haddon, of Harrison Precinct, Benjamin "Morrell, of New-York, and Isaac Sniffen, of Rye-"Neck, as witnesses.[8]

"For evidence to the other charges, we beg leave to

[1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 9 ho., A.M., October 24th, 1775."

[2] There is not the slightest mention of this evidently tricky Philip, in any of the contemporary records with which we have any acquaintance, except in this instance; and we suspect he was that loyalist, Philip, who fled to Nova Scotia, at the close of the War, of whom Bolton made mention. He was evidently well-fitted for a "Cow-boy;" and, very probably, he was one.

Bolton, in his History of Westchester-county, (original edition, i., 155, 156; the same, second edition, i., 248, 249,) gave a sketch and pedigree of the family.

[3] Gilbert Budd of Mamaroneck, was Lieutenant-colonel of the Second Regiment of Westchester-county Militia, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Military Returns, xxvi., 13—pages 283, 284, ante.)

Bolton, in his History of Westchester-county, (original edition, ii., 80, 81, 509; the same, second edition, 197, 715, 716,) gave an account of his family.

[4] Gil. Budd Horton, of Mamaroneck, was the only representative of that Town, in the County Committee of 1776–'7, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxxviii., 309.) He was captured and carried away, by the Royal troops or by the local loyalists, in 1777, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Petitions, xxxiii., 710.)

[5] Captain Vandeput commanded the Asia, man-of-war, then at New York. Concerning the making of these Oars, vide page 295, ante.

[6] See page 302, post.

[7] "Justice Sutton" was the "William Sutton, Esq." who was one of the signers of the call for the Meeting at the White Plains, in April, 1775, as well as one who signed the Declaration and Protest, at the same place, against the proceedings of that Meeting, (vide pages 246, 248, ante.) He was one of the King's Justices of the Peace; and one of those who were reported to the Committee on Conspiracies, in June, 1776, and ordered to be arrested, (Historical Manuscripts, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxx., 156.) He was summoned to appear before the Committee, (Ibid, xxxv., 485;) and his examination, before the County Committee, on the twenty-third of July, 1776, indicated the temper of that body against the De Lanceys, and all who were connected with that family, either by kinship or in politics, (Ibid, xxxiv., 531, 605, 537, 535.)

[8] See page 296, ante.

"refer you to Colonel Budd and Mr. Gill. Budd "Horton.

"We would not have troubled the Congress about "apprehending the above-named persons, but that "we look upon ourselves, at present, too weak to do "it, without great danger;[1] and we beg leave to sub- "mit it, whether it be not necessary, for the security "of many amongst us, as well as to prevent Provisions "being conveyed to the Ministerial Army, that a "Guard be placed along the Sound, in this County.

"We are, Sir,

"Your most humble servants,

"JONATHAN G. TOMPKINS,[2]

"THOMAS THOMAS,[3]

"JESSE HUNT,[4]

"MICAH TOWNSEND,[5]

"ANTHONY MILLER.[6]

"To NATHANIEL WOODHULL, President
"of the Provincial Congress in New York."

The Affidavit referred to in this letter was as follows:

"WESTCHESTER COUNTY, ss.

"Personally appeared before me, James Horton, "Junior, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace "in and for said County,[7] Philip Pinkney, of full age, "who deposeth and saith, that on Wednesday, the "twenty-fifth day instant,[8] being in company, he "heard one say that Godfrey Haines was determined "to have satisfaction on some particular persons,[9] and "that there was a tender expected, to take them off, "instantly; and that this Deponent was asked if he "would assist in taking off Judge Thomas,[10] private- "ly; and that they were determined to have him, if "possible"; and that there was a person to be in a "particular place, to receive him from those that took "him.

"PHILIP PINCKNEY.

"Taken and sworn before me this
"first day of November, 1775,
"JAMES HORTON, JUNR."[12]

The Provincial Congress received the letter and the affidavit, and placed them on file, without taking any other action which was recorded on its Journal, than the making of an Order that Colonel Budd and Gil. Budd Horton, who had evidently taken those papers to the Congress, should attend that body, at five o'clock, on the same afternoon.[13] At the appointed hour, those gentlemen made their appearance before the door of the Assembly Chamber, in the City Hall, in which the Congress was assembled in secret Session; and when they were admitted into the Chamber, they were duly examined—the testimony of Gil. Budd Horton, however, was evidently so entirely useless that it was not reduced to writing, and, consequently, no portion of it was entered on the Journal of the Provincial Congress. The testimony of Colonel Gilbert Budd, as it appears on that Journal,[14] is in these words:

"Col. Gilbert Budd and Gilbudd Horton, from "Westchester County, attending according to order, "were called in, and examined; and the examination "of Gilbert Budd was taken in writing, and filed, and "is as follows, to wit:

"Gilbert Budd, of Mamaroneck, says that the tories "are getting the upper hand of and threaten them, "daily, and have injured their private property, by "throwing down stone fences and cropping his horses' "tails and manes; that Philip Pinckney told him, "last Sunday, that he was in company, on the twenty- "fifth of October last, with a man who told him that "there would be bad times in Mamaroneck, before "long; and said that some of the people of "the place would be taken off; that he, Pinck- "ney, asked the man that told him, how they were to "be taken off; he answered, that they expected a ten- "der, in the harbour, in a few days; and that she "would send barges on shore, in order to carry the "people off; that he, Pinckney, further asked the "man, where they were to be carried to, and he an- "swered, 'To Gage.' Mr. Budd told Pinckney that "Gage was not there; he answered, 'To Gage's "'Army;' that Pinckney said he asked the man, who "the men were that were to be taken off; that the

[1] The puny faction which, with the aid of the military power, was exercising such a terrible authority, in Westchester-county, here confessed its weakness, when unsupported by that power.

[2] See page 284, ante.

[3] See page 283, ante.

[4] Jesse Hunt was Sheriff of Westchester-county, 1781–1785.

[5] Micah Townsend was a member of the County Committee of 1775–'6, and its Secretary; he was one of the Minute-men, at White Plains, in February, 1776; and he was in command of a Company, in the following Summer. He evidently left Westchester-county, soon afterwards, as he was in the Assembly of the State, in 1779–'80, representing Cumberland-county.

[6] Anthony Miller was Second Lieutenant of the Scarsdale and White Plains Company of Militia, in 1775, and Captain of the same Company, in 1776.

[7] James Horton, Junior, was proscribed as a Tory, and ordered to be arrested in June, 1776, (Historical Manuscript, etc.: Miscellaneous Papers, xxx., 156.)

[8] This date was, evidently, a clerical error. It was, undoubtedly, intended for "the twenty-fifth ultimo," October 25, 1776.

[9] Of Godfrey Haines, his grievances, and his threats, see pages 291–296, ante.

[10] "Judge Thomas" was Hon. John Thomas, County Judge of Westchester-county, 1755–1777, and Member of the General Assembly of the Colony, representing the county of Westchester, 1743–'75, in which latter capacity the reader has already been made acquainted with him.

[11] Although the project of carrying Judge Thomas away from his home, in 1775, if such a project was really entertained, was not carried out; a similar project, in 1777, was successful; and he was carried to New York, as Haines had been, and thrown into prison, in that City, as Haines had been, (vide pages 292, 293, ante,) and died there.

[12] The entire prostration of the Colonial Government, in New York, and its entire helplessness to protect the Colonists from the outrages to which they were subjected by the promoters of the Rebellion, is nowhere more clearly seen than in this appearance of one of those who were in rebellion, before one of the King's Justices of the Peace, to make an official affidavit concerning a plot to carry away from his home, one of the leaders in that Rebellion, by those who were not in rebellion.

[13] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 10 ho., A.M., No- "vember 3d, 1775."

[14] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 3 ho., P.M., Novem- "ber 3, 1775."

"man intimated to him that Mr. Gilbert Budd" [the witness] "and Mr. Samuel Townsend[1] were the men "that were to be taken off; and that there was another "that they would have, at all events; that Pinckney "told Budd that he asked the man, who the other "man was that was to be taken off; that the man an- "swered him that Judge Thomas was the man, who "they would have if it cost them the lives of fifty "men; that Pinckney told the said Mr. Budd that "there was a number of his, Budd's, neighbours, who "stood ready to assist the tender, in order to take "them; that Mr. Budd asked Pinckney if he knew "who those neighbours were; he answered that one "of them was William Lounsberry[2] and one, Isaac "Gedney, Junr., and all Sutton's men, alluding to "some hired servants of Sutton's;[3] that Pinckney "said he came as a friend, and advised Mr. Budd to "keep out of the way, for that he did not think it safe "for him to sleep in his house, one night. Mr. Budd "further says that he heard that Godfrey Haines said "that he was going to get a parcel of Oars made for "the man of war; that Haines came to Mamaroneck, "and that the next day, Isaac Gedney set about mak- "ing Oars; that they were making (as Budd under- "stood) by Haines's order, for Capt. Vandeput. Mr. "Budd says the tories are equipped, and constantly "in arms, walking about, at night, 6, 8, and 10 at a "time. Mr. Budd further says that it is reported that "those tories say they are determined to defend them- "selves; and that if any body came to their houses to "take away their Arms, they would fire upon them."

The Congress appears to have been in one of its temperate moods when that delegation from the chivalry of Colonial Westchester-county, bearing the missive from the Committee of that County and its kindred Affidavit, approached its doors; and for that reason, unless it was because of the shallowness of the several accusations and requests which were in the papers or of the poltroonery of those who bore them the Congress did no more than to order the letter and affidavit and examination to be filed; to charge all who knew of "this matter," "to keep the whole of it "a secret;" and to transmit a letter to the Committee of Westchester-county—the latter, the most noteworthy of all that it did, in "this matter"—of which the following is a copy:

"In Provincial Congress,
"At New-York, November 3rd, 1775.

"Gentlemen:

"We received a letter of the 1st inst., from the "Sub-committee of your County, relative to the "conduct of the people of Rye; and the Congress "have directed me to recommend to your Com- "mittee to make an immediate and strict inquiry "into the matters to which the letter refers, and "to take the examinations on oath of the wit- "nesses; and if you find satisfactory reasons to sup- "pose the persons threatened to be in danger, that "you take the proper means to protect them; perhaps "the binding over to the peace such persons as may "be strongly suspected of a design to injure the per- "sons or estates of those gentlemen, may be a useful "expedient.[4] If anything afterwards shall be thought "necessary to be done, for their further protection, "the Committee will attend to it. If you should "find the County unable to give the necessary pro- "tection, you will transmit the examinations to us, "that the Congress may take such order therein, as "may be proper. The Committee may rest assured "that this Congress will support the friends of "Liberty, to the utmost of their power.

"We are, Gentlemen, your humble servants,
"By order of the Provincial Congress,
"Abraham Yates, Jr., Pres't.

"To Gilbert Drake, Esq., Chairman
"of the Committee of Westchester-county."[5]

The suggestion which was made in this letter, that those of the revolutionary faction, in Westchester-county, whose safety was imperiled by the threats of their conservative and law-abiding neighbors, should go before the King's Magistrates and ask that the latter should be put under bonds to keep the peace towards the former, was received with disfavor by Isaac Sears, of New York, and Melancton Smith, of Duchess-county, and Doctor Lewis Graham and John Thomas, Junior—the latter a son of one of those who had been threatened with removal from the County—and an attempt was made by them to strike out from the letter that portion "which refers them" [the Committee of Westchester-county] "to the Civil Magis- "trate;" but the Congress declined to make the

[1] Samuel Townsend represented the Town of Rye, in the County Committee of 1776–'7.

[2] On the twenty-ninth of August, 1776, "one Lounsberry of Westchester "County who had headed a party of about 14 Tories was killed by a Per- "son named Flood on his refusal to surrender himself Prisoner; That in "his Pocket book was found a Commission signed by Genl. How to "Major Rogers empowering him to raise a Battalion of Rangers with the "Rank of Lieut Col Commandant. That annexed to this was a Warrant "to this Lounsberry signed by Major Rogers appointing him Captain in "one of these Companies & a Muster Roll of the men already enlisted." (Letter from the Committee of Safety to General Washington, "In Commit- "tee of Safety, Harlem, Augt 30th, 1776.")

Very probably, the William Lounsberry who is mentioned in the text was the same Lounsberry who had accepted a Commission from Major Rogers, and was killed, in August, 1776, as stated in the letter.

[3] The Sutton referred to was William Sutton, Esq., living on De Lancey's Neck, of which he was the tenant, (vide page 290, ante.)

[4] This remarkable suggestion, that those, in Westchester-county, who were in rebellion, and who were threatened with arrest by those of their neighbors who were not in rebellion, should go before the King's Justices of the Peace, and ask that those loyal inhabitants who were inclined to support the Home and Colonial Governments and the Laws and to arrest those who were in rebellion, should be put under bonds to preserve the peace toward the latter, will be duly appreciated by the reader. Whatever the County Committee of Westchester-county may have thought of it, it will be evident to the reader that the Provincial Congress, when it wrote to that Committee and made that suggestion, was not inclined to regard the men of Westchester-county who were in rebellion as entitled to very much of its respect and sympathy.

[5] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, 5 ho., P.M., Novem- "ber 3, 1775."

solicited change, only the four gentlemen already mentioned having arisen in favor of it. The letter was transmitted to the Westchester-county Committee; and nothing more was heard on the subjects referred to; and the Committee itself, thenceforth, gradually disappeared from the notice of the world.

The Provincial Congress had continued in session, closely withdrawn from the sight of its constituents, until the eighth of July,[1] when it had taken a fortnight's rest, during which period a "Committee of "Safety" was left on duty, with large authority, to administer the affairs of the new organization.[2] On the twenty-sixth of July, it had resumed its work, continuing it without interruption, until the second of September, when it had adjourned for a month,[3] during which period, a "Committee of Safety" had again administered the affairs of the new organization.[4] On the fourth of October, it had re-assembled, and resumed its work, continuing it until the fourth of November, when it adjourned, or was dissolved, without day.[5]

The dissolution of the first Provincial Congress, which occurred at about the close of the first half-year of the entire and, as far as the Colonial and Home Governments were concerned, of the undisputed, domination of the revolutionary faction of the purely aristocratic portion of the Colonial party of the Opposition and its plebean auxiliaries, over the vastly greater body of those who were its fellow-men and fellow-subjects of the Crown and fellow-colonists, within the Colony of New York,—without, however, having interfered with the administration of the public affairs of the Colony, by the Royal Colonial Government, which was continued in all else than in the protection of the Colonists and in the suppression of the revolt, which that Colonial Government had not the means for doing—affords a favorable opportunity for the careful student of the history of that eventful period to rest, and to review the progress of events, in New York, during the preceding six months; to ascertain, by comparison of its earlier professions with its later practises, how much of sincerity and how much of deceit and of fraud there had been, in the apparent devotion of that controlling faction to "the Rights of man and of Englishmen," of which it had said so much, in its earlier movements toward political supremacy; to learn its matured views concerning the arrogantly assumed prerogatives of the well-born and the contemptuously assigned mission of the lowly, the latter to nothing else than to submission, to obedience, and to labor; and to ascertain and to examine those systems of government and those methods of administration which, in the unrestrained exercise of its recently acquired, but undisputed, power, and of its seemingly cultured intellect, that revolutionary faction had practically regarded as fit and proper for the government of a "free people."

* * * * * * *

During the interval, between the dissolution of the first and the organization of the second of the series of Provincial Congresses which controlled the destinies of the Colony of New York and crowded an unwilling community into rebellion and ruin, an illustration was made, first in the County of Westchester and then in the City of New York, of the spirit of the controlling power, among the disaffected; of the shallowness of the prevailing pretensions to patriotism and personal integrity in those who were engaged in the revolt; and of the personal character of the ruffians who were employed—as they had been employed in the Stamp-act and other riots, earlier in the struggle of parties—by those who were the master-spirits, in the works of lawlessness by means of which the Rebellion was promoted and established and made respectable.[6]

At that time, there was no newspaper-press in the Colonies which was conducted with greater ability than Rivington's New-York Gazetteer; or Connecticut, Hudson's River, New-Jersey, and Quebeck Weekly Advertiser, which was published, weekly, by James Rivington, in the City of New York. It was a newspaper, in the proper sense of the word; and it published the news of the day, from every quarter of the world, regardless of their political character, with rare industry and the most liberal impartiality. It did not accord with the interests of some nor with the passions of others, however, that such a faithful recorder of the sayings and doings of every faction and of every party should be continued in the Colonies; and there were times, also, when the exposure of the double dealings of particular individuals, of high as well as of low degree, in well-printed columns, in a widely circulated newspaper, as James Rivington had done, in his Gazetteer, were distasteful to those who were thus exposed and unwelcome to those whom the culprit was serving. It was evidently determined, therefore, that James Rivington should be silenced; and that his only means for inflicting pain on the persons of those who favored the Rebellion should be taken from him.

There was, also, at that time, no one, in the Colony of New York, who possessed greater intellectual and executive abilities combined with superior scholastic attainments, than Samuel Seabury, a Missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, ordinarily known as "The Venerable "Society," Rector of the Established Church in the [1] Journal of the Provincial Congress, May 22, until July 8, 1775.

[2] Journal of the Committee of Safety, July 11, until July 25, 1775.

[3] Journal of the Provincial Congress, from July 26, until September 2, 1775.

[4] Journal of the Committee of Safety, from September 4, until October 3, 1775.

[5] Journal of the Provincial Congress, from October 4, until November 4, 1775.

[6] "This I know, a successful resistance is a 'REVOLUTION,' not a 'RE-"'BELLION.' 'REBELLION,' indeed, appears on the back of a flying en-"emy; but 'REVOLUTION' flames on the breastplate of the victorious "warrior."—(JOHN WILKES, in the House of Commons, February 6, 1775.)

Borough Town of Westchester, and Master of a Boarding-school for Boys, in the same Town. He was the friend and Pastor of Isaac Wilkins, the able leader of the conservative majority of the Opposition, in the General Assembly of the Colony; and the Manor of Morrisania was within the boundaries of his Parish; and the Morrises, brothers-in-law of Isaac Wilkins, but masquerading as leaders in the Rebellion, were, nominally, if not in reality, among his parishioners. He was learned, as was well-known: he was fearless in the declarations and support of his well-considered opinions, as was known to his neighbors and friends: that his convictions led him to support the conservative portion of the Opposition, led by his friend, Isaac Wilkins, is more than probable: that the same convictions led him to oppose, within the circle of his influence and consistently with his ministerial duties, the doings of the revolutionary faction of the Opposition, among whom his neighbors and parishioners, the Morrises, were capering, was no secret. When the press was teeming with publications, adverse to the violence of the revolutionary faction, he was improperly designated as one of the very few who had written them, with no other evidence to support the allegation than his recognized ability and fearlessness; and when "A. W. FARMER" appeared, with his practised and powerful pen, arousing the most violent bitterness of those who were in rebellion, the intellectual rustic who had written them, by common consent, was erroneously but reasonably said to have been the Schoolmaster and Parson at Westchester, while the real but unrecognized author of the obnoxious publications was generally passed, unnoticed. The political Parson, therefore, was very offensive to those of the revolutionary faction who were not his neighbors—"in justice to the rebels of East and West "Chester, I must say," he wrote, in 1776, "that none "of them ever offered me any insult or attempted to do "me any injury that I know of"—and it was evidently determined that he, also, like James Rivington, should be silenced, even at the expense of his personal liberty and of all which was dear to him, on earth.

There was one man, more than all others, who was qualified to enter on any adventure, no matter how lawless nor how atrocious, provided, and only provided, he could have an abundant force to support him and to overpower any opposition which might possibly arise to obstruct or to endanger him. He had been a privateer, in the War with France and Spain; and in the only encounter which he had had with an enemy, he had shown the white feather of cowardice, his crew having become his accusers. He was known, subsequently, as one of those blustering, reckless, law-defying leaders of the floating denizens of the docks, in New York, ready to disregard all Rights, all of every thing except their own wills, in acts of which only the traditional pirates and banditti were supposed to have been capable of performing, whenever, and only whenever, in his judgment, those acts could be done without personal risk to the aggressors, and whenever, and at no other time, those acts of lawlessness promised that the plunder to be secured therefrom would afford a sufficient compensation.

He had married the daughter of the keeper of a low, unlicensed alehouse, a resort of sailors, boatmen, stevedores, and such as they, opposite to Beekman's Slip, and that alehouse was his rendezvous;[1] and those who had resorted to Jasper Drake's, had always been his ready instruments, in whatever acts of violence in which he had ventured to engage. He had never possessed the entire confidence of the leaders of the revolutionary faction of the Opposition, in the City of New York: he had never been taken into the sanctum sanctorum of that coterie of Livingstons and of Smiths and of Scotts, whose had been the unseen master-hands by whom such puppets as he had been handled and made conspicuous: he had never been permitted to occupy any place, in Committee or in Congress, unless in minorities which, because of their comparative insignificance, were incapable of disturbing the harmony of the aggregate bodies into which they had been adroitly introduced.

At the time of which we write, he was an ignorant blusterer, as vain as he was ignorant; and he needed only, as General Charles Lee said of him, "to have "his back clapped" by some one in authority and to be shown that it would be useful to himself—if he could be vested with an office, no matter what nor how ephemeral in its character nor how "impu-"dently" bestowed, so much the better—to be ready, at short notice, to exercise his entire power, as a ruffian of the dirtiest water, in any required act of lawlessness, regardless of any Rights of Person or of Property, or of any claim which age or sex might interpose. He called himself a Merchant, in the City of New York; but he had been more conspicuous in shipping Merchandise and Provisions to the eastward, clandestinely, when such shipments to the eastward were interdicted, than in any more legitimate business. He had been a member of the recently dissolved Provincial Congress, during a portion of its existence; but, in entire harmony with his earlier proclivities, when there were threatenings of danger from the Home Government, he had abandoned the

[1] A letter from John Case, from the County of Suffolk, on Long Island, "to the Printer of the New-York Gazetteer," and published in Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 91, NEW-YORK, Thursday, January 12, 1775, narrated the method in which those who were not inclined to favor the theories and practises of the revolutionary faction were inveigled into that Tavern, and, there, subjected to the teachings of Alexander McDougal, Isaac Sears, and others of that faction; and a description of the insults and outrages inflicted on those who were inclined to object to the subject matters of those teachings, by those ale-house "patriots," especially by Isaac Sears, may also be seen, in the same letter.

The attempted reply to John Case, in which Isaac Sears subsequently attempted to raise new issues instead of meeting old ones, served only to establish, more clearly, the truthfulness of Case's original statement; and those who shall incline to pursue the inquiry, may find it in Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1674, NEW-YORK, Thursday, February 2, 1775.

City of New York; and, in the latter part of November, 1775, Isaac Sears was safely housed in New Haven, although it is evident that he continued to correspond with the leaders of the Rebellion, in the former City.

On Monday, the twentieth of November, 1775, that cowardly ruffian, Isaac Sears, accompanied with sixteen others of the same class, all of them mounted, left New Haven, in Connecticut, for the purpose of regulating Westchester-county.[1] It had become a favorite pastime, among the rowdies on the borders of Connecticut, as it has been a favorite pastime among Texan rowdies of a later period, in their country, to make depredatory raids on those who lived on the opposite side of the river-boundary; and those "border ruffians," in revolutionary Connecticut, had been encouraged to raid on the conservative farmers, in Westchester-county; to overpower those farmers with numbers and, especially after the disarming process had deprived the latter of the means for protecting themselves or their property, to rob them of whatever could be carried away; to return to their own side of the Byram-river, well-laden with whatever had pleased them best, on the farms and in the farm-houses which they had visited; and to enjoy, in their own "Christian New England," the stolen products of other men's honest and earnest toil, and to be cheered, as "patriots," by their "Christian New "England" neighbors.

The avowed purpose of that band of acknowledged "banditti"[2] was "to disarm the principal tories "there," [at East and West Chester,] "and secure the "persons of Parson Seabury, Judge Fowler, and "Lord Underhill," three residents of Westchester-county; and it is said they were joined, on their way, by other parties of men, numbering about eighty, under the leadership of "Captains" Richards, Silleck, and Mead.[3] It was not pretended that these enterprising Connecticut-men had any other warrant to engage in such an undertaking, than that afforded in the propensity of every cowardly thief to plunder those who were known to have been stripped of their means for defence, and who were, therefore, helpless. It was not pretended that any of the proposed victims, in the instance under notice, had said or done anything, in opposition to the Rebellion, which had made them amenable to the unbridled caprices of those who were in rebellion; and it was evident that, had those proposed victims thus transgressed against the "Associations" or the "rec-"ommendations" or the "Resolutions" of the revolutionary authorities, the local Committee in Westchester-county, or the Provincial Congress in the City of New York, or the Committee of Safety of the last-named body, and not an improvised and self-constituted power, in another Colony, was the proper tribunal to take cognizance of such an offence. But in such a party, led by such a ruffian, only the law of the will of the stronger possessed any authority or secured any respect; and that law of "the pirate "and the banditti," unfortunately, prevailed in the instance now under notice.

The expedition evidently moved slowly, on its way to New York;[4] and, especially after it had passed the Byram-river, it undoubtedly foraged on those who were unfortunate enough to live on the line of its march. It pillaged the farm-houses; and, at Mamaroneck, it burned a small sloop which belonged to one who was assumed to have been a friend of the Government.[5] A detachment of about forty men, under a Captain Lothrop, appears to have been pushed forward to the Town of Westchester, where, on Wednesday, the twenty-second of November, it seized the person of Nathaniel Underhill, the Mayor of that Borough, and that of the Rev. Samuel Seabury, who, as we have said, was the Master of

[1] "On the 20th of this month, sixteen respectable inhabitants of this "town, in company with Captain SEARS, set out from this place, for "East and West Chester, in the Province of New-York, to disarm the "principal tories there, and secure the persons of Parson Seabury, "Judge Fowler, and Lord Underhill." * * * (The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [New-Haven,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

Frank Moore, in his Diary of the American Revolution, (i., 349–351,) published a mutilated version of that editorial article, from the original of which the above was extracted—the other portions of the latter of which will be used hereafter—and credited it to The Pennsylvania Journal, published in Philadelphia, on the ninth of December.

[2] In the preceding September, Lord Dunmore, then at Norfolk, in Virginia, had helped himself to the type and printing-press of John Holt, in that Town; and it was said of the thief and his confederates, "a few "spirited gentlemen in Norfolk, justly incensed at so flagrant a breach "of good order and the Constitution, and highly resenting the conduct "of Lord Dunmore and the Navy Gentry, who have now commenced "downright Pirates and Banditti, ordered the drum to beat to arms," etc. (Extract from a contemporary publication, in Force's American Archives, Fourth Series, iii., 847.)

Besides the entire fitness of the words to distinguish those who were guilty of such lawless doings, a precedent for the use of those otherwise strong terms in such specific connections, is afforded in the above extract, from unquestionably revolutionary authority; and we offer no apology for applying one or both of them to those, from Connecticut, on the occasion now under notice, when Lord Dunmore was far outdone, in wanton atrocity.

[3] "On their way thither" [for East and West Chester,] "they were "joined by the Captains Richards, Scillick, and Mead, with about 80 "men." * * * (The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [NEW HAVEN] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

It is due to the respectable portion of the inhabitants of the Connecticut of that period, that mention should be made of the fact that no such names as these appear on the lists of Officers of Connecticut Companies, in 1775, which Mr. Hinman published in his Historical Collections of the part sustained by Connecticut during the War of the Revolution; and that it is very probable that these three "Captains," like that other "Captain" who led them, on that occasion, possessed no other warrant than that of "courtesy," so called, for the privilege of carrying the title.

[4] It left New Haven on Monday, the twentieth of November; but it did not reach Westchester until Wednesday, the twenty-second, and the City of New York, to which place it extended its excursion, until noon on Thursday, the twenty-third of that month.

[5] "At Marinek they burnt a small sloop, which was purchased by Gov-"ernment, for the purpose of carrying provisions on board the Asia."—(The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [NEW HAVEN,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

"* * * * and burnt one sloop belonging to persons friendly to gov "ernment."—(Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 22. "ON "BOARD THE SHIP DUTCHESS OF GORDON, NEW YORK HARBOUR, 6th Dec. "1775."

a Boarding-school and Rector of the Established Church, in the same place, the former, as was subsequently seen, only because he had signed the Declaration and Protest, at the White Plains, in the preceding April,[1] the latter, because he was more obnoxious to those who were in rebellion, in consequence of his greater intellectual power and of his decidedly greater bravery in the assertion and maintenance of his opinions and of his Rights.[2] Having accomplished its purposes in the seizures of the persons and in the plunder of the properties of the two victims, in Westchester, the detachment permitted Mr. Seabury, if not Mr. Underhill, to send for his horse; and, then, it hastened away, on the road which connected that Town with Kingsbridge. It had not proceeded far, however, when it was met by the main body of the banditti, with whom, with characteristic cowardice, was Sears; and the entire party then returned to Eastchester, where, on its way toward New York, it had already seized the person of Jonathan Fowler, who was one of the Judges of the Superior Court of Common Pleas and Colonel of one of the Battalions of the Colonial Militia, against whom, also, it seems there was no other complaint than that he, also, had signed the Declaration and Protest, at the White Plains, in the preceding April.[3]

The contemporary records do not present the circumstances which attended the seizure of the Mayor of the Borough of Westchester; but it is probable they were similar to those which attended the similar seizure of Judge Fowler and that of Mr. Seabury—the banditti undoubtedly ransacked the house and examined his papers and helped themselves to such articles of his movable property as best pleased them. From Judge Fowler's house, there were carried away a beaver hat, a silver-mounted horse-whip, and two silver spoons,[4] besides the sword, gun, and pistols which formed portions of his official equipments as a Colonel in the Colonial Militia;[5] and at Mr. Seabury's, besides assaulting one of that gentleman's daughters, thrusting a bayonet at her breast and through her cap, and tearing down her hair, the marauders cut a quilt which was in the frame, rendering it useless; examined his private papers and scattered them; and carried away a small sum of money, which was in the drawer of his desk. Of course, the Boarding-school for Boys, which he had organized and established with so much labor,[6] for the better support of his family, was broken down; and the pupils, five of whom were from Jamaica and one from Montreal, the parents of four others being in Europe, besides "others from "New York and the country," were necessarily scattered, inflicting an irreparable injury to him and to his large and dependent family.[7]

When these seizures had been accomplished and after what had been stolen had been sufficiently secured, another detachment from the main body of the banditti was sent back to Horseneck [West Greenwich, Connecticut,] as an escort and guard of the three prisoners and of the booty;[8] while the main body, itself, numbering seventy-five mounted men, moved forward, from East Chester, toward the City of New York.[9]

Where that large body of horsemen spent the fol-

[1] See pages 248–250, ante.

[2] "At East Chester they seized Judge Fowler, then repaired to West "Chester and secured Seabury and Underhill."—(The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [New Haven,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

In his Memorial to the General Assembly of Connecticut, Seabury expressly stated that he was arrested by a detachment; that the main body of the party was subsequently joined, by the detachment; and that all, then, returned to East Chester.

[3] Memorial of Samuel Seabury to the General Assembly of Connecticut, December 20, 1775.

See, also, The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [New Haven,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775; Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 66, 67; etc.

[4] Memorial of Samuel Seabury to the General Assembly of Connecticut, December 20, 1775.

[5] Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 67.

[6] The following advertisement, copied from Rivington's New-York Gazetteer, No. 97, New-York, Thursday, February 23, 1775, will clearly indicate the high character of that Colonial Westchester Boarding-school for Boys, probably the prototype of those similar institutions, in more recent days, which have made Westchester-county so widely known, in the world of Education:

"To the Public,

"SAMUEL SEABURY, M.A.

"Rector of the Parish of Westchester,

"HATH opened a School in that Town, and offers his Service to "prepare young Gentlemen for the College, the Compting-"House, or any genteel Business for which Parents or Guardians may "design them. Children who know their Letters will be admitted to "his School, and taught to read English with propriety, and to write it "with a fair Hand, and with grammatical accuracy. They will be in-"structed in Arithmetic, if required, in its utmost extent; and in the "Elements of Geometry; in Trigonometry, Navigation, Surveying, etc. "—The Latin and Greek Languages will be taught those who are in-"tended for a learned Education.

"There are already eleven Students under Mr. Seabury's Care, and as "soon as the Number of Scholars shall require it, a good Usher will be "provided: And no Care or Diligence shall be wanting to give Satisfac-"tion to those Gentlemen who shall favor him with the Education of "their Children.

"Proper attention will be paid to the young Gentlemen, that they be "kept clean and decent, and that they behave with propriety; and as "the most essential Part of Education is to qualify them to Discharge "the Duties and Offices of Life with Integrity and Virtue, particular "Care will be taken to explain to them the Principles of Morality, and "the Christian Religion, by frequent short Lectures, adapted to their "Capacity.

"Board, (Washing included) may be had, in unexceptionable Fami-"lies, at about twenty Pounds per Ann. and the Tuition will be six "Pounds, New-York Currency, and eight Shillings for Fire-wood.

"Westchester is about nineteen Miles from New York, by Land, and "about fifteen by Water; and a Water-passage may be had almost "every Day, when the Weather will permit, in good safe Boats."

[7] Memorial of Samuel Seabury to the General Assembly of Connecticut, December 20, 1775.

[8] "Having possessed themselves of these three caitiffs, they sent them "to Connecticut under a strong guard."—(The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [New Haven,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

See, also, Memorial of Samuel Seabury to the General Assembly of Connecticut, December 20, 1775.

[9] The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [New Haven,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.

lowing night is not now known—it is not in the slightest degree probable that it paid its way, in whatever part of Westchester-county it billeted itself—it is very evident, however, that it was expected by the leaders of the Rebellion, in the City of New York, since it was met and escorted into town by Samuel Broome, John Woodward, and others of their class;[1] and it is said, also, that Alexander McDougal, Peter R. Livingston, John and Joshua Hett Smith—the latter so conspicuous, subsequently, in the interviews between General Arnold and Major André and in the evident exposure of the latter to arrest—and a number of others, their confederates if not their tools, were assembled on Hanover-square, on which the Bookstore and Printing-office of James Rivington were situated, apparently and nominally for military exercises, but really for the purpose of covering and protecting the approaching banditti, in its proposed work of devastation and robbery.[2]

The column appears to have moved from Eastchester, by way of Kingsbridge and the old Boston post-road, through what are, now, the Central Park and Madison-square and Broadway and the Bowery and Chatham-square and Chatham-street, to what is, now, Pearl-street—then known as Queen-street[3]—which was the direct route to Hanover-square, the objective point of its march. With its escort of local sympathizers, its progress was not obstructed; and, on Thursday, the twenty-third of November, at noon, when it reached the Square, it "drew up, in close "order, before the printing-office of the infamous "James Rivington,"[4] those who had already assembled there, evidently for the purpose of covering it, if not for the purpose of doing more than that, should any opposition to its purposes be manifested by any one welcoming it, as their auxiliaries and confederates.

It is said that, while the main body of the banditti remained in position, in front of the Bookstore and Printing-office of the proscribed Englishman, "a "small detachment" entered the latter, and gathered "the principal part of his types," which was placed in sacks prepared for the purpose, destroying those portions which could not be taken away, and demolishing, also, his presses and other office-material.[5]

It is said that three quarters of an hour were spent in that work of reckless destruction, without the slightest attempt by either the Municipal or the Colonial authorities, legal or revolutionary, to interfere, for the preservation of the peace or for the protection of the property of the citizen or for that of the freedom of the Press; and, consequently, after its appetite for outrage had become satisfied, taking with it the type which it had not destroyed and such articles from the Bookstore as were fancied by those who entered it,[6] the banditti mounted its horses, its music striking up the tune of Yankee Doodle, and its local sympathizers in the Square and around the head of the Coffee-house Slip giving it cheers which were returned, and left the City by the same route as that on which it had entered it.[7]

[1] Minutes of the General Committee of the City and County of New York, Thursday, November 23, 1775; Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 66; Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 22, On Board the Ship Dutchess of Gordon New York Harbour, 6th Decr 1775; etc.

[2] Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 66.

[3] Manual of the Corporation of the City of New-York for 1855, 511.

[4] "The main body, consisting of 75, then proceeded to New-York, "which they entered at noon-day on horseback, with bayonets fixed, and "in the greatest regularity, went down the main street, and drew up in "close order before the printing-office of the infamous James Rivington." (The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [New Haven,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

See, also, Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 22, "On Board "the Ship Dutchess of Gordon New York Harbour, 6th Decr 1775"; Petition of the General Committee of the City and County of New York to the Provincial Congress, (vide page 134 post;) the Provincial Congress of New York to the Governor of Connecticut, "In Provincial Congress, New-"York, 12th Decr. 1775;" Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 66; etc.

[5] "A small detachment entered it," [the printing-office,] "and in about "three-quarters of an hour brought off the principal part of his types, "for which they offered to give an order on Lord Dunmore" [who had previously stolen John Holt's type and press, at Norfolk,] (The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [New Haven,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

They "entered his" [Rivington's] "house, demolished his printing "apparatus, destroyed a part and carried off the remainder of his "types."—(Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 66.)

See, also, Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 22, "On "Board the Ship Dutchess of Gordon New York Harbour, 6th Decr "1775;" etc.

[6] Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 22, "On Board the Ship "Dutchess of Gordon New York Harbour 6th Decr 1775."

[7] "They then faced and wheeled to the left, and marched out of town to "the tune of Yankee Doodle. A vast concourse of people assembled at "the Coffee House bridge on their leaving the ground, and gave them "three very hearty cheers."—(The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [New Haven,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

The Petition of the General Committee of the City and County of New York, laid before the Provincial Congress, on the eighth of December, 1775, presented the general facts of the outrage on James Rivington, while it also called for the protection of the City, by that body. The despatch of Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 22, "On Board the Ship "Dutchess of Gordon New York Harbour 6th Decr 1775," described the raid on Westchester-county as well as that on the City of New York, and narrated the blustering threats which were made by Sears, to return with "a more numerous body of the Connecticut Rioters and to take "away the Records of the Colony." The letter of the Provincial Congress to the Governor of Connecticut, "In Provincial Congress, New-York, "12th Decr., 1775," recited the outrage in Westchester-county as well as that in the City; but in such delicate terms as indicated that that body was either in sympathy with the banditti or was intimidated by those who were so. Judge Jones, in his History of New York during the Revolutionary War, (i., 65–68,) noticed the entire raid, saying that Sears "en-"tered the town at the head of about 200 men, well mounted," which, from the context, evidently included those who had gone out to meet the banditti. Gordon, (History of the American Revolution, London: 1788, ii., 121, 122.) made mention of nothing else than of the robbery of the printing-office, of which he said, "While thus employed, people col-"lected, and the street was thronged. To prevent interruption, he called "out and told them that if they attempted to oppose him, he would "order his men to fire on them; and preparation was made for doing it, "in case it should be needful. This appearance instantly cleared the "street, when Captain Sears and his party rode off in triumph, with the "booty they were pleased to take away." Dunlap, (History of New York, ii., Appendix, ccxx,) erroneously stated that the destruction of the printing-office was effected "by the Connecticut Light Horse," on the fourth of December. Bancroft, (History of the United States, original edit. viii., 275,) said Sears was "vexed at his want of influence, impatient at "being overlooked, and naturally inclined to precipitate counsels;" and in the same work, centenary edition, v., 184, the same author stated

The progress of the banditti, through Westchester-county, on its return, was necessarily slow, since it finished, at that time, the work of pillage among the farmers of that County, which it had commenced on its outward march—it left the City of New York on Thursday, at two o'clock; and it did not reach Horse-neck, where the detachment which was guarding its first collection of plunder and its three prisoners (the latter of whom, as the practise then was among that new-formed power, having been provided, meanwhile, with neither food nor shelter) had halted, until the following Monday, the twenty-seventh of November. Its progress through Connecticut appears to have been attended with the highest popular approval; many joined it, "the whole making a "very grand procession;" and, on Tuesday, the twenty-eighth of November, amidst the salutes of two cannon and the cheers of the populace, it re-entered New Haven. The procession moved through nearly every street in the Town, stopping at every corner, in order that the crowds might gaze on the victims and jeer at and insult them; and, after having quartered the latter, at their own expense, at one of the Taverns, the successful banditti, sustained by what there was of the ignorance and lawlessness of the New Haven of that period, spent the remainder of the day in "festivity and innocent mirth."[1]

The principal portion of the bitterness of the banditti appears to have been bestowed on Mr. Seabury—indeed, there was wisdom in that discrimination, since Judge Fowler and Mayor Underhill were differently constituted men, more easily intimidated and, therefore, more pliable than he, and very soon recanted and were dismissed from their confinement[2]— that Sears "deserved a high appointment in the American Navy," which he did not receive; that he was "impatient at being overlooked," etc. Not the slightest allusion is made to the doings of the banditti in Westchester-county, in either of the editions of that much-praised work. Lossing, (Field Book of the Revolution, ii., 796, 797,) stated that Mr. Rivington "aided by his Royal Gazetteer," was very influential; that he had no regard for the truth nor for "common fairness;" that Sears had gone to Connecticut "to plan schemes for the future with ardent Whigs;" that the type which was stolen from Rivington was converted into bullets; etc.; but the truth is that the Royal Gazette was not established until December, 1777, as he had stated on the opposite page of the Field Book; that Rivington published everything of news and political papers, regardless of party; that Sears had removed his family and himself to New Haven, to get out of the way of threatened danger and to pout over personal grievances; and that the printers in Connecticut were too glad to increase their limited supplies of type to convert the stolen type belonging to Rivington into bullets, for which common and far cheaper lead was better adapted. Rev. Doctor Beardsley, (History of the Episcopal Church in Connecticut, i., 302-305, and Life and Correspondence of the Rt. Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., 35-47,) appropriately noticed, in detail, the dealings of the banditti with Mr. Seabury, without, however, making the slightest mention of what was done elsewhere than in Westchester-county.

In Connecticut, from that day to this, the doings of that party of ruffians have been considered only as praiseworthy. Governor Trumbull, after having snubbed General Washington by sheltering and justifying the wholesale desertion of the Connecticut troops which the latter had denounced, (Compare General Washington's letter to Governor Trumbull, "CAMBRIDGE, December 2, 1775," with the reply, "LEBANON, December "7, 1775;" that of the former, "CAMBRIDGE, December 5, 1775," with the reply, "LEBANON, December 9, 1775"; etc.,) waited until the following June, before he paid the slightest attention to the letter which the Provincial Congress had sent to him, in December, 1775, and then only to shelter, if not to justify, the offenders. (Jonn. Trumbull to the Honble. Nathl. Woodhull, "HARTFORD, June 10, 1775.") Hinman, (Historical Collection of the part sustained by Connecticut during the War of the Revolution, 79, 80,) included that lawless raid among the notable and praiseworthy acts of Connecticut; and the following, which is the latest specimen which has met our eye, presents, at once, the satisfaction with which respectable men, of our own day, in Connecticut, continue to regard that outrage, and the character of what is circulated, in New England, as veritable history: "Some time during the War, a paper was "published in the City of New York, by one, Rivington. This paper was "professedly and to all outward appearance devoted to the British in-"terests. It was afterwards, however, known to have aided the Amer-"icans much, and was under the control of Washington himself. The "hostile appearance of the sheet, however, deceived the Americans as "well as their enemies, and about half a dozen Greenwich men re-"solved that the press should be stopped; they stole into the City, de-"stroyed the press, and bagged the type, which they brought off with "them from the very midst of a watchful enemy. Messrs. Andrew and "Peter Mead were the principal men of the expedition. It is said that "they only of the company were able to carry the bags of type from the "printing-office to the street and throw them across the backs of their "horses. After the type was brought to Greenwich, it was totally de-"stroyed, except enough to print each of the company's names, which "the veterans kept for a long time in memory of their exploit." One might readily suppose this latest tidbit of what has currency as history, was written in China or Timbuctoo; but the curious reader may find it in an elegant and expensive History of Fairfield County, Connecticut, compiled under the supervision of D. Hamilton Hurd, and published by J. W. Lewis & Co., Philadelphia, in 1881. It occupies a portion of page 378 of that handsomely printed volume, and affords a fine example of the character of what is written, concerning New Englanders and their character and doings, when the pen of the writer and the patronage of the publisher are within that pretentious portion of the Union.

[1] "On their way home they disarmed all the tories that lay on their "route; and yesterday [November 28,] arrived here, escorted by a great "number of gentlemen from the westward, the whole making a very "grand procession. Upon their entrance into town, they were saluted "with the discharge of two cannon, and received by the inhabitants with "every mark of approbation and respect. The company divided into "two parts and concluded the day in festivity and innocent mirth. "Captain Sears returned in company with the other gentlemen, and "proposes to spend the winter here, unless publick business should re-"quire his presence in New-York.—Seabury, Underhill, and Fowler, "three of the dastardly protestors against the proceedings of the Conti-"nental Congress, and who it is believed had concerted a plan for kid-"napping Captain Sears, and conveying him on board the Asia man-of-"war, are (with the types and arms) safely lodged in this town, Where "it is expected Lord Underhill will have leisure to form the scheme of "a lucrative lottery, the tickets of which cannot be counterfeited; and "Parson Seabury sufficient time to compose sermons for the next Conti-"nental fast."—(The Connecticut Journal, No. 424, [NEW HAVEN,] Wednesday, November 29, 1775.)

See, also, Seabury's Memorial to the General Assembly of Connecticut, December 20, 1775, vide page 136, post; and Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 66, 67.

[2] Although the instruments of the recantation of these two of the three victims do not appear in The Connecticut Journal, they were printed in Holt's New-York Journal, No. 1718, NEW-YORK, Thursday, December 7, 1775, and may be seen in Force's American Archives, IV., iii., 1708.

I.

"Whereas I, Jonathan Fowler, Esq., one of His Majesty's Judges of "the Inferior Court for the County of Westchester, in the Province of "New-York, did, some time ago, sign a Protest against the Honourable "Continental Congress, which inconsiderate conduct I am heartily sorry "for, and do hereby promise for the future not to transgress in the view "of the people of this Continent, nor in any sense to oppose the meas-"ures taken by the Continental Congress.

"I do also certify that, some time past, being at Court at the White-"Plains, I heard a person say, whom several people present believed to "be a Lieutenant or Midshipman of the Asia, man-of-war, that the Cap-"tain of the Asia intended to take Captain Sears up, and that there "would soon be delivered, gratis, from on board the man-of-war, great "quantities of Paper Money, in imitation of Continental Currency, and he was "prevented from enjoying a free inter-"course with his friends; forbidden the visits of "some of them, though in company with his guard; "prohibited from reading prayers in the Church, and "in performing any part of Divine Service, though "invited so to do; interdicted the use of pen, ink, "and paper, except for the purpose of writing to his "family, and then it was required that his letters "should be examined and licensed" [by the leaders of the banditti,] "before they were sent off; though "Captain Sears condescended that he should be in-"dulged in writing a Memorial to the Honourable "Assembly. He received only one letter from his "family, and that was delivered to him open, though "brought by the post." Indeed, with characteristic bravado, and entirely conscious of his influence among those, in Connecticut, who were then controlling the Rebellion, Sears told his only remaining victim—the others having ransomed themselves from the hands of their captors with cowardly-made recantations—"that they did not intend to release him, nor to "make such a compromise with him as had been "made with Judge Fowler and Mr. Underhill, but to "keep him a prisoner, till the unhappy disputes be-"tween Great Britain and America were settled—"that, whatever he might think, what they had done "they would take upon themselves and support."[1]

At that time, and, indeed, until 1818, the Government of Connecticut, under her Charter, like that of Rhode Island, was based on the Sovereignty of the King of Great Britain; and the lawlessness of the Rebellion had not been permitted to disturb the forms and formalities of either her Executive or Legislative or Judicial Departments of Colonial Government—adroitly securing the monopoly of that Government in the hands of the comparatively few by whom it was held under the Royal Charter of 1661, no matter what the result of the Rebellion might be—and all these were being carried on, in the several long-established forms, nominally in the name of the Sovereign. Knowing these facts, Mr. Seabury is said to have applied to the Magistrates, in New Haven, for protection and redress, since he was held in captivity, in that Town, by no pretense of legal process nor by any other authority than the individual will of the ruffian, Sears, who was, at best, only a sojourner in that Colony and, subsequently, was sheltered by the Governor, on that ground; but his application found no favor before those Magistrates, notwithstanding their authority was undisputed. He then sought the interference of the local revolutionary Committee, with the same result. The Governor, also, disregarded his demand; and when the banditti who continued to hold him, a captive, in the midst of that Capital-town of the Colony, consented that he should memorialize the General Assembly of the Colony, which does not appear to have been, then, in Session,[2] no benefit to the memorialist, from the Legislature of the Colony, could have been intended.[3]

While these proceedings were in progress, in Connecticut, the revolutionary authorities, in New York, were almost equally unmindful of what was due from them, in the protection of the individual Colonists from the aggressions of their neighbors, and in the support of the autonomy of the Colony, which those from Connecticut were beginning to threaten[4]—the Colonial Government and the armed vessels which

"which would be printed with the types taken from Mr. Holt, of Vir-"ginia."

"As witness my hand:

"JONATHAN FOWLER.

"NEW-HAVEN, November 29, 1775."

II.

"Whereas I, Nathaniel Underhill, of Westchester, in the Province of "New-York, did, some time ago, sign a Protest against the Resolves of "the Honourable Continental Congress, which inconsiderate conduct I "am heartily sorry for, and do hereby promise, for the future, not to "transgress in the view of the people of this Continent, nor, in any "sense, to oppose the measures taken by the Continental Congress.

"As witness my hand, in New-Haven, November 30, 1775.

"N. UNDERHILL,

"Magor of the Borough of Westchester."

[1] Memorial of Samuel Seabury to the General Assembly of Connecticut, December 20, 1775.

[2] We are not insensible of the fact that it is said that Mr. Seabury's Memorial was laid before the General Assembly, and referred to a Special Committee of seven members, of which William Samuel Johnson was the Chairman, and unto whom the Letter from the Provincial Congress of New York had been already referred, (Beardsley's Life and Correspondence of Rt. Rev. Samuel Seabury, D.D., 43;) but in his recital of the circumstances, in his letter to the Venerable Society, on the twenty-ninth of December, 1776, Mr. Seabury made mention of nothing else than of his "puting in a Memorial to the General Assem-"bly," (Ibid, 46;) and Mr. Hinman, who was Secretary of State, with the original Journals before him, in his carefully-made synopsis of the doings of the General Assembly, from the opening of the May Session, 1774, until the close of the February Session 1778, stated that the Special Session of the General Assembly, which was assembled by special order of the Governor, on the fourteenth of December, 1775, closed its business, and was adjourned by Proclamation, on the same day; that the Special Committee of which Mr. Johnson was Chairman, was appointed for an entirely different purpose; and that the Session of the General Assembly which next succeeded that which was adjourned on the fourteenth of December, 1775, was not commenced until the ninth of May, 1776. (Historical Collections of the part sustained by Connecticut in the War of the Revolution, 198, 200.) General Peter Force, who diligently reprinted all the Journals of the General Assembly, in his elaborate American Archives, made no mention of a Session of the General Assembly, between that which was dissolved on the fourteenth of December, 1775, and the ninth of May, 1776, as stated by Hinman.

What mockery there was in that grace of the banditti, therefore, when it favored its captive with permission to memorialize an Assembly which had been dissolved, six days before the Memorial was written.

[3] Memorial of Samuel Seabury to the General Assembly of Connecticut, December 20, 1775; Samuel Seabury to the Venerable Society, "NEW-YORK, "December 29, 1776"; Jones's History of New York during the Revolutionary War, i., 67, 68.

[4] Besides the unceasing attempts to encroach on the territory of New York, and, in other ways, to invade the Rights of the Colonists, in that Colony, which Connecticut and men from Connecticut were constantly making, Isaac Sears, on the occasion now under notice, with the evident purpose of throwing all the titles of properties, in New York, and all the domestic and business relations, therein, into confusion and uncertainty, in order to make the inroads of depredators more certain of success, "intimated his design speedily to revisit this Province with a more "numerous body of the Connecticut Rioters, and to take away the "Records of the Province." (Governor Tryon to the Earl of Dartmouth, No. 22. "ON BOARD THE SHIP DUTCHESS of GORDON NEW-YORK HAR-"BOUR, 6th Decr 1775.") occupied the harbor and commanded all the approaches to the City, by water, and by whom a large armed force could have been thrown into the City, to protect the inhabitants from such outrages as that which is now under consideration, meanwhile, remaining, apparently unconcerned, without raising a hand or firing a gun for that principal purpose of their presence in the Colony.

The declarations of Colonel Waterbury and Isaac Sears, on the sam subject, subsequently, will be noticed hereafter.

In the evening of the day on which the outrage on James Rivington was committed, [Thursday, November 23, 1775,] Lancaster Burling and Joseph Totten, members of the General Committee for the City and County of New York, offered a Resolution, in that body, citing Isaac Sears, Samuel Broome, and John Woodward to appear before it, to answer for their conduct in entering the City, on that day, with a number of horsemen, in a hostile manner, which the movers of the Resolution considered a breach of the Association;[1] but on the following evening, probably because it was distasteful to the greater number, Mr. Burling withdrew the Resolution,[2] rather than to see it ignominiously defeated.

Three days after the event, John Jay, with more self-respect and, certainly, with more respect for the honor of the Colony, notwithstanding he, also, appeared to take no interest in any other portion of the general subject, wrote a letter to the President of the former Provincial Congress, in which he warmly condemned the proceeding;[3] but, as has been stated, there was, then, no Provincial Congress to receive and to consider his protest.

On the fifth of December, the General Committee of the City and County of New York returned to the subject and adopted a well-written Petition to the Provincial Congress praying that that body would take measures to protect the inhabitants of the Colony from a renewal of such aggressions.[4]

Three days afterwards, [December 8, 1775,] that vigorous demand for protection, made by the local revolutionary Committee of the City of New York—the Committee of Westchester-county made no such movement, nor any other, in the matter—was presented to the Provincial Congress, by which body, after some time had been spent "in debates thereon," it was sent to a special Committee, of which John Morin Scott was the Chairman, with instructions to "report thereon with all convenient speed."[5]

Four days subsequently, [December 12, 1775,] a Report was made by the Committee, with a draft of a letter to be addressed to the Governor of the Colony of Connecticut, "on the subject matter of the Gen-"eral Committee's Petition," both of which were violently opposed by those who were most revolutionary in their inclinations. The debates were continued through two Sessions of the Congress, and various amendments were made in the letter, when it was adopted, Colonel Gilbert Drake and Stephen Ward, Deputies from Westchester-county, opposing the motion, and Colonel Lewis Graham, also a Deputy from that County, supporting it.[6]

[1] Minutes of the General Committee for the City and County of New York, "Thursday, November 23, 1775."

[2] Minutes of the General Committee, etc., "Friday, November 24, 1775."

[3] The following are his words, on the subject of the raid:

* * * "The New-England exploit is much talked of, and conjec-"tures are numerous as to the part the Convention will take relative to "it; some consider it as an ill compliment to the Government of the "Province, and prophesy that you have too much Christian meekness "to take any notice of it. For my own part, I don't approve of the "feat; and I think it neither argues much wisdom or much bravery; at "any rate, if it was to have been done, I wish our own people, and not "strangers, had taken the liberty of doing it.

"I confess I am a little jealous of the honour of the Province, and "am persuaded that its reputation can not be maintained without some "little spirit being mingled with its prudence."

[4] Minutes of the General Committee of the City and County of New York, "Tuesday evening, December 5, 1775."

The record is in these words:

"A Draft of a Petition to the honourable the Provincial Congress for "the Province of New-York, was read, and is as follows, viz.:

"'To the Honourable the Provincial Congress for the Prov-"'ince of New-York.

"'The Petition of the General Committee for the City and County of "'New-York, humbly sheweth:

"'That a body of troops,* from a neighbouring Colony, did lately "'make their publick entry into the City, at noon-day, and did seize "'and carry off the types belonging to one of the publick Printers of "'this Colony, without any authority from the Continental or this Con-"'gress, your Petitioners, or any other body having power to grant "'such authority. And being apprehensive that such Incursions, "'should they be repeated, will be productive of many great and evil con-"'sequences to the Inhabitants of such place wherein they may be here-"'after made, your Petitioners do therefore conceive it highly necessary, "'in the present situation of publick affairs, as well for the sake of inter-"'nal peace and harmony of each Colony as for the maintenance of the "'general union of the Continent, now happily subsisting, and so essen-"'tial, at this juncture, that each of the associated Colonies on the Con-"'tinent should have the sole management and regulation of its publick "'matters by its Congress or Committee, unless otherwise directed by "'the honourable the Continental Congress.

"'Your Petitioners do therefore most humbly pray, that this honour-"'able House of Delegates would be pleased to take the premises into "'their consideration, and devise some expedient to prevent, for the "'future, the Inhabitants of any of the neighbouring Colonies "'coming into this, to direct the publick affairs of it, or to destroy the "'property or invade the liberty of its Inhabitants, without the direc-"'tion of the Continental or this Congress, or the Committee of Safety, "'or the Committee of the County into which such Inhabitants may "'come, or of the Continental Generals, unless there should be an Inva-"'sion made into this Colony.

"'And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, etc.

"'By order of the Committee.'

"Ordered, That the same be fairly copied, and signed by the Chair-"man of this Committee, and delivered to the Chairman of the Con-"gress."

* It is evident, from these words, that it was, then, supposed to have been a regular military operation: that the fact was, then, unknown, that it was only an inroad of banditti, winked at, it is true, but without any authority, legal or revolutionary: that the Committee did not even suspect that the raiders were only an organized band of robbers, composed only of the floating population of another Colony.

[5] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Friday morning, December 8, "1775."

[6] Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 10 ho., A.M., Decem-"ber 12, 1775;" and the same, "Die Martis, 3 ho., P.M., Decr. 12, "1775."

The following is a copy of that very important letter:

"In Provincial Congress,
"New-York, 12th Decr., 1775.

"Sir:

"It gives us concern that we are under the necessity of addressing

The Governor of Connecticut, regarding with reasonable contempt the feeble, if not the hypocritical, outpourings of such a bashful, if not such a double-faced,[1] body as the Provincial Congress of New York then was—at the very moment when it was considering the proposition to send a letter to him, on the subject of the raid which is now under notice, it was also balancing on the tight-rope of loyalty to the King and reconciliation with the Home Government, under the leadership of Thomas Smith, one of the distinguished body of political acrobats of that name[2]—made no reply whatever to its letter, until the following June, when he adroitly turned the scale against the complaining Provincial Congress, by reminding it that the leader of the banditti was a resident of the City of New York,[3] doing business in that City, and, also, a member of the complaining Provincial Congress; that he was, therefore, amenable, directly, to the Congress itself, for what he had done; and that it was not expedient, then, to call the rest of the banditti to account[4]—a conclusion which was perfectly reasonable while the complaining Congress complacently permitted the leader of the party, who was the principal offender, to go at large, within its own jurisdiction, without question concerning it. The long process of intercolonial diplomacy, on what, in this instance, would have been an interesting topic, had the parties in that diplomatic correspondence been honest and consistent, might have been productive of useful results; but they were neither consistent nor honest; and, like the greater part of other diplomacy, it consisted of little else than empty words, really meaning nothing and, really, producing nothing.[5]

While that feeble demonstration of her "independence and dignity" was being presented by the revolutionary authorities in New York, and there was no other demonstration, by either the Colonial Government or the armed force which occupied the harbor and commanded the City, the Rector of the Parish of Westchester, as has been already stated, remained in captivity, in the hands of the banditti who had seized

"you on a subject that has given great discontent to the inhabitants of "the City and County of New-York.

"We are informed by a Petition from the General Committee, that a "body of troops from your Colony lately made a public entry into this "City, at noon-day, and seized and carried off the types belonging to one "of the public printers, without any authority from the Continental or "this Congress or their Committee.

"While we consider this conduct as an insult offered to this Colony, we "are disposed to attribute it to an imprudent though well-intended zeal "for the public cause; and cannot entertain the most distant thought "that your Colony will approve of the measure. It is unnecessary to "use arguments to show the impropriety of a proceeding that has a "manifest tendency to interrupt that harmony and union which, at "present, happily subsists throughout, and is so essential to the interest "of the whole Continent. It is our earnest desire that you would take "the most effectual steps to prevent any of the people of your Colony "from entering into this, for the like purposes, unless invited by our "Provincial Congress, a Committee of Safety, or the General Committee of one of our Counties, as we cannot but consider such intrusions "as an invasion of our essential rights, as a distinct Colony; and com-"mon justice obliges us to request that you will give orders that all the "types be returned to the Chairman of the General Committee of the "City and County of New-York. We beg you will not consider this re-"quisition as an attempt to justify the man from whom the types were "taken: we are fully sensible of his demerits; but we earnestly wish "that the glory of the present contest for Liberty may not be sullied by "an attempt to restrain the Freedom of the Press.

"The same body of troops, we are informed, seized the Mayor of the "Borough of Westchester, the Rector of that Parish, and one of the "Justices of the County, and carried them to your Colony. Mr. Seabury, "we are informed, is still detained. If such should be the case, we must "entreat your friendly interposition for his immediate discharge; the "more especially as, considering his ecclesiastical character, which, per-"haps, is venerated by many friends to Liberty, the severity that has "been used towards him may be subject to misconstructions prejudicial "to the common cause, and the more effectually to restrain such incur-"sions which, if repeated, may be productive of mischief of the most se-"rious consequence; and, as we would be exceedingly sorry to give "room for jealousies among individuals in your Colony that we are "desirous to damp the spirit of Liberty or countenance any of its "enemies among us, we propose to apply to the Continental Congress, "not by way of complaint, but for such a general regulation, on this "subject, as may as well prevent such jealousies as any future incur-"sions by the inhabitants of either Colony into the other, for the appre-"hending or punishing any enemy or supposed enemy to the cause of "Liberty, without application to the Congress, the Committee of Safety, "or the Committee of the County within the jurisdiction of which such "persons shall reside, or command of the Continental Congress.

"We are, Sir, with the utmost respect and esteem,
"Your mo. obt. servts.
"By order of the Provincial Congress.

"To the Honble JONA. TRUMBULL, "NATH'L WOODHULL, Pres't.
"Gov. of the Colony of Connecticut."

[1] It is proper to say, in this connection, that the insincerity of the Provincial Congress was never more boldly presented than in its Order concerning the disposition which was to be made of the letter which it had just ordered to be written to the Governor of Connecticut, in the matter of the raid of Connecticut's ruffians—instead of ordering it to be forwarded to the Governor, it "ORDERED, That the said letter be engrossed and signed "by the President, so as to be ready to be transmitted, WHEN DIRECTED." (Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Martis, 3 ho., P. M., Decr. 12, "1775.")

Just when the Congress "directed" it to be "transmitted," is not known.

[2] Vide page 317, post.

[3] The notice of the raid which was published in The Connecticut Journal, already copied into this narrative, clearly indicated that Isaac Sears was only a temporary sojourner at New Haven, when he made that raid.

[4] Governor Trumbull to the President of the Provincial Congress of New York, "HARTFORD, June 10th, 1776."

[5] The Provincial Congress evidently called the attention of the Delegation in the Continental Congress to the subject, as it promised to do, in its letter to Governor Trumbull; and on the eleventh of January, 1776, the Delegation wrote, in reply: "We highly applaud the spirit, "and, at the same time, respectful manner in which you have supported "the dignity and independence of our Colony, and demanded reparation "on the subject of the Connecticut inroad. An interposition, so rash, "officious, and violent gave us great anxiety, as it was not only a high "insult to your authority, but had a direct tendency to confirm that fatal "spirit of jealousy and distrust of our eastern brethren which has done "so much injury to our cause, and which every wise and virtuous patriot "should study to suppress." The Government of Connecticut, we are "persuaded, will not only do you the justice which you have required, "but adopt effectual means to restrain their inhabitants from similar at-"tempts in future. In this expectation, we shall take the liberty "to defer the application to Congress which you direct, until we are "favoured with a copy of Governor Trumbull's answer to your letter." (Philip Livingston, James Duane, John Jay, Henry Wisner, and William Floyd to the Provincial Congress, "PHILADELPHIA, 5th January, 1776.")

The Governor of Connecticut having, meanwhile, taken no notice whatever of the letter which the Provincial Congress had written to him, in the preceding December, on the 8th of March, 1776, the latter informed the Delegation from New York in the Continental Congress, of that fact, (Journal of the Provincial Congress, "Die Veneris, "10 ho., A.M., March 8, 1776;") but there seems to have been no action, on that subject, in the former body, then or at any other time.

him and carried him from his home; and he was thus held by that law-defying gang of ruffians, in one of the Capital-towns of Connecticut, in which the Legislature was, then, in session, without the slightest attempt, by the legally constituted Government of that Colony, to interfere, either for the rescue of the captive or for the vindication of the Law of the land, which had been indisputably violated by those who held him. As has been stated, the captive was not permitted to hold a free intercourse with his friends; the use of pen, ink, and paper, unless for the purpose of writing to his family, was interdicted; and his correspondence with his family was subjected to examination by his captors. As a matter of favor, however, he was permitted to memorialize the General Assembly of the Colony within which he was held in captivity, although that Assembly had been dissolved by Proclamation of the Governor, six days previously; and, because that Memorial is a portion of the revolutionary literature of Westchester-county, to say nothing of its importance as an authority in history, a place for it may be properly found in the text of this narrative.[1] It was in the following words:

"To the Honorable General Assembly of the "Gov. and Company of the Colony of Con-"necticut, now sitting in New Haven, in "said Colony, by special Order of his "Honor, the Governor.

"The Memorial of Samuel Seabury, Clerk, A.M., "Rector of the Parish of West Chester, in the County "of West Chester and Province of New York, humbly "showeth:—

"That on Wednesday, the 22d day of November "last, your Memorialist was seized at a house in "West Chester where he taught a grammar school, by "a company of armed men, to the number, as he "supposes, of about forty; that after being carried to "his own house and being allowed time to send for "his horse, he was forced away on the road to Kings-"bridge, but soon meeting another company of "armed men, they joined and proceeded to East "Chester.

"That a person styled Captain Lothrop ordered "your Memorialist to be seized. That after the two "companies joined, the command appeared to your "Memorialist to be in Captain Isaac Sears, and the "whole number of men to be about one hundred. "That from East Chester your Memorialist, in com-"pany with Jonathan Fowler, Esq., of East Chester, "and Nathl. Underhill, Esq., of West Chester, was "sent under a guard of about twenty armed men[2] to "Horseneck,[3] and on the Monday following was "brought to this town and carried in triumph through "a great part of it, accompanied by a large number "of men on horsback and in carriages, chiefly armed. "That the whole company arranged themselves before "the house of Captain Sears. That after firing two "cannon and huzzaing, your Memorialist was sent "under a guard of four or five men to the house of "Mrs. Lyman, where he has ever since been kept "under guard. That during this time your Memor-"ialist hath been prevented from enjoying a free inter-"course with his friends; forbidden to visit some of "them, though in company with his guard; prohibited "from reading prayers in the church, and in perform-"ing any part of divine service, though invited by "the Rev. Mr. Hubbard so to do; interdicted the use "of pen, ink, and paper, except for the purpose of "writing to his family, and then it was required that "his letters should be examined and licensed before "they were sent off; though on Friday last, Captain "Sears condescended that your Memorialist should "be indulged in writing a Memorial to this Hon. "Assembly. That your Memorialist hath received "but one letter from his family since he has been "under confinement, and that was delivered to him "open, though brought by the post.

"Your Memorialist begs leave further to represent, "that he hath heard a verbal account that one of his "daughters was abused and insulted by some of the "people when at his house on the 22d of November. "That a bayonet was thrust through her cap, and her "cap thereby tore from" [her] "head. That the "handkerchief about her neck was pierced by a bay-"onet, both before and behind. That a quilt in the "frame on which the daughters of your Memorialist "were at work was so cut and pierced with bayonets "as to be rendered useless. That while your Memo-"rialist was waiting for his horse, on the said 22d day "of November, the people obliged the wife of your "Memorialist to open his desk, where they examined "his papers, part of the time in presence of your "Memorialist. That he had in a drawer in the desk "three or four dollars and a few pieces of small sil-"ver. That he hath heard that only an English "shilling and three or four coppers were found in the "drawers after he was brought away. That your "Memorialist thinks this not improbable, as Jonathan "Fowler, Esq., informed him that a new beaver hat, a "silver-mounted horsewhip, and two silver spoons were "carried off from his house on said day. Mr. Meloy, "also, of this town, informed your Memorialist that

[1] A portion of this notable paper was published by Hinman, in his Historical Collections of the part sustained by Connecticut during the War of the Revolution, (pages 548–551.) Rev. E. E. Beardsley, D.D., in his Life and Correspondence of the Right Reverend Samuel Seabury, D.D., (Second Edition, 36–42,) published as nearly a complete and accurate copy of it as those who printed his book would permit him to give to his readers. It is believed that, with his kind assistance, we have the privilege of laying an entirely accurate and complete copy of the original manuscript before our readers, from the copy of that original which was furnished to him by Charles J. Hoadley, the Librarian of the State Library, at Hartford, the custodian of that paper.

[2] It will be observed that Mr. Seabury did not regard his captors as "troops" or "Light Horse" or military men, of any class: he evidently considered them as what are known as "irregulars;" and, for that reason, called them only "armed men."

[3] Horse Neck of that period is West Greenwich of this.

"he, the said Meloy, had been accused by some peo"ple of pointing a bayonet at the breast of a daughter
"of your Memorialist, desiring your Memorialist to ex-
"culpate him from the charge, to which request your "Memorialist replied that he was not at his house but
"at his school house when the affair was said to have "happened; but that a daughter of your Memorialist
"met him as he was brought from the school house,
"and told him that one of the men had pushed a
"bayonet against her breast and otherwise insulted
"her; and your Memorialist remembers that when "he left his house in the morning his daughter had a
"cap on, but when she met him near the school "house she had none on and her hair was hanging
"over her shoulders.

"Your Memorialist, also, begs leave further to "represent that after he had been eight or ten days
"at New Haven, he was carried by Mr. Jonathan
"Mix, to whose care he was committed, to the house
"of Mr. Beers, innkeeper, in said town, where were
"Captain Sears, Captain Lothrop, Mr. Brown, and
"some others, whose names he did not know or does "not recollect. That several questions were asked "him, to some of which he gave the most explicit
"answers, but perceiving some insidious design
"against him by some of the questions, he refused to "answer any more. That Captain Sears then ob"served to him, if he understood him right, that they "did not intend to release him, nor to make such a "compromise with him as had been made with Judge
"Fowler and Mr. Underhill,[1] but to keep him a pris"oner till the unhappy disputes between Great "Britain and America were settled. That whatever "your Memorialist might think, what they had done
"they would take upon themselves and support.
"That your Memorialist then asked an explicit de"claration of the charges against him, and was told "that the charges against him were:—

"That he, your Memorialist, had entered into a "combination with six or seven others to seize Cap"tain Sears as he was passing through the county of "West Chester, and convey him on board a man-of-"war.

"That your Memorialist had signed a Protest at the "White Plains, in the county of West Chester,
"against the proceedings of the Continental Con"gress.

"That your Memorialist had neglected to open his "church on the day of the Continental Fast.

"And that he had written pamphlets and news-
"papers against the liberties of America.

"To the first and last of these charges your "Memorialist pleads not guilty, and will be ready to "vindicate his innocence, as soon as he shall be "restored to his liberty in that province to which only
"he conceives himself to be amenable.[2] He considers "it a high infringement of the liberty for which the "virtuous sons of America are now nobly struggling,
"to be carried by force out of one colony into "another, for the sake either of trial or imprison-

[1] Vide pages 308, 309, ante.

[2] In our early manhood, after a careful examination of all the evidence which was accessible to us, we reached the conclusions that the celebrated political tracts of "A. W. FARMER" [a Westchester Farmer] which were published in 1774, and which created such an intense excitement among the revolutionary faction, were written by Isaac Wilkins, of Westchester, and not by the Rev. Samuel Seabury, also of Westchester, to whom they had been generally attributed. Several years afterwards, those conclusions secured the respect and deference of one whose respect and deference, in such matters, were distinctions of which any one might have been reasonably proud, (Historical Magazine, New Series, iii., 9—January, 1868;) and we have not since seen the slightest reason for revising our early judgment, in that much canvassed question of authorship.

Within a few months after the publication of those notable political essays, the satirist, John Trumbull, wrote his versified version of General Gage's Proclamation of the twelfth of June, 1775, in which, in the following lines, the well-informed author of that well-written piece very clearly indicated the person who, at that early date, was recognized as the detested "A. W. FARMER:"

> "What disappointments sad and bilkings,
> "Awaited poor departing W . . . . . s;
> "What wild confusion, rout and hobble, you
> "Made with his farmer, Don A. W."

(Trumbull's Origin of McFingal, 31, 32;) and within six months after Trumbull's publication, Samuel Seabury, in that portion of his Memorial to the General Assembly of Connecticut which is now under notice, added his very clear, very precise, and very unequivocal testimony, on the same interesting question. With these two independent pieces of evidence before him, the reader may easily ascertain with how much of accuracy that early judgment was formed.

We are not unacquainted, also, with a paper, entitled The Westchester Farmer, written by D. Williams, and published in The Magazine of American History, viii., 117—February, 1882. It contains what purports to have been an unsigned draft of a Memorial supposed to have been addressed, or intended to have been addressed, by Samuel Seabury, several years after the occurrences now under consideration, to the Commissioners for adjusting the losses of the Loyal Refugees, in which draft of a Memorial he claimed, if the paper is not something else than what it purports to have been, to have been the SOLE author of the "A. W. "FARMER" tracts, as well as of various other tracts and publications. But we are constrained to say that, whether the paper is what it purports to have been or not, and whether it was copied and delivered to the Commissioners or not, of both of which we have grave doubts, there are evidences within itself of its entire untrustworthiness, in its recital of known facts; that we do not believe, therefore, that it was written by Samuel Seabury, carefully and deliberately, if he really wrote it; and that we need more evidence than we have yet seen, that he was capable of deliberately and understandingly telling or writing unqualified falsehoods, for any purpose, either while he was in New Haven, in 1775–6, or in Lond n, after he had received his Doctor's degree from Oxford University, several years afterwards.

In view of the fact, if it is a fact, which Mr. Williams has copied from Boucher's Sermons, that a pension was granted to some other person for having done what, in this paper, was said to have been done by Seabury, it is very evident the British Government preferred to believe that Samuel Seabury was NOT the author of the "A. W. FARMER" tracts nor of the other publications named in that draft of a Memorial, referred to in Mr. William's paper; and that it acted, accordingly.

We are not insensible of the fact that a great-grandson of Samuel Seabury, in a paper which was published in The American Quarterly Church Review, for April, 1881, without any supporting testimony which any Bench in the country would have received as evidence, in any case, undertook the ungracious task of showing, by argument, that Samuel Seabury was not sincere, when he wrote the disclaimer which is now under notice; that his words, on the matter of his alleged authorship of the political pamphlets and newspaper articles referred to, were artfully intended to mislead the General Assembly, beneficially to himself; and that, in fact, notwithstanding what he and others had said and written to the contrary, Samuel Seabury was really the author of the "A. W. "FARMER" tracts! We must be excused, however, for dissenting from the conclusions of this younger member of the Seabury family, and for

"ment. Must he be judged by the laws of Connecti"cut, to which as an inhabitant of New York he "owed no obedience? or by the laws of that colony
"in which he has been near twenty years a resident?
"or, if the regulations of Congress be attended to,
"must he be dragged from the committee of his own
"county, and from the Congress of his own province,
"cut off from the intercourse of his friends, deprived
"of the benefit of those evidences which may be "necessary for the vindication of his innocence, and "judged by strangers to him, to his character, and "to the circumstances of his general conduct in life?

"One great grievance justly complained of by the "people of America, and which they are now strug"gling against, is the Act of Parliament directing "persons to be carried from America to England for "a trial. And your Memorialist is confident that the "supreme legislative authority in this colony will not "permit him to be treated in a manner so destructive
"to that liberty for which they are now contending.
"If your Memorialist is to be dealt with according to "law, he conceives that the laws of Connecticut, as "well as of New York, forbid the imprisonment of "his person any otherwise than according to law. If "he is to be judged according to the regulations of the "Congress, they have ordained the Provincial Con"gress of New York or the Committee of the county
"of West Chester, to be his judges. Neither the "laws of either colony nor the regulations of the "Congress give any countenance to the mode of "treatment which he has met with. But considered
"in either light, he conceives it must appear unjust,
"cruel, arbitrary, and tyrannical.[1]

"With regard to the second charge, viz.: That "your Memorialist signed a Protest against the pro"ceedings of the Congress, he begs leave to state the "fact as it really is. The General Assembly of the "province of New York, in their sessions last winter,
"determined to send a petition to the king, a
"memorial to the House of Lords, and a remonstrance
"to the House of Commons, upon the subject of "American grievances;[2] and the members of the "house, at least many of them, as your Memorialist
"was informed, recommended it to their constituents
"to be quiet till the issue of those applications should "be known. Some time in the beginning of April, as "your Memorialist thinks, the people were invited to "meet at the White Plains to choose delegates for a "Provincial Congress. Many people there assembled
"were averse from the measure. They, however, gave "no other opposition to the choice of delegates than
"signing a Protest. This Protest your Memorialist
"signed in company with two members of the assem"bly, and above three hundred other people.[3] Your "Memorialist had not a thought of acting against the "liberties of America. He did not conceive it to be "a crime to support the measures of the representa"tives of the people, measures which he then hoped "and expected would have good effect by inducing a "change of conduct in regard to America. More "than eight months have now passed since your "Memorialist signed the Protest. If his crime was
"of so atrocious a kind, why was he suffered to "remain so long unpunished? or why should he be "now singled out from more than three hundred, to "endure the unexampled punishment of captivity
"and unlimited confinement?

"The other crime alleged against your Memorialist is "that he neglected to open his church on the day of the "Continental Fast. To this he begs leave to answer:
"That he had no notice of the day appointed but
"from common report: That he received no order
"relative to said day either from any Congress or "committee: That he cannot think himself guilty of "neglecting or disobeying an order of Congress,
"which order was never signified to him in any way:

retaining our own well-considered opinion that Samuel Seabury was nothing else than a learned, sincere, truthful, honorable, and fearless man, incapable of such dishonorable trickery as has been attributed to him. Others are at liberty, of course, to think differently.

[1] The reader of the two preceding paragraphs, in which the captive responded to the first and fourth of the charges which his captors had presented against him, cannot fail to find evidence, of the highest character, that, in his political opinions, Samuel Seabury was, at that time, as he had previously been, in exact accord with Isaac Wilkins and Frederic Philipse, also of Westchester-county; and that he was and had been in accord with the great body of Americans, believing and maintaining that the Home Government had invaded the personal and political rights of the Colonists; that the latter had just reason for complaints and opposition to the Colonial and Home Governments, because of those grievances; that the Colonists were justified in their opposition to those obnoxious measures and to those who enacted and promoted the execution of them, as far as that opposition involved no violation of the Rights of Persons or Properties nor of the Laws of the Land; and that the Continental Congress of 1774, until it passed beyond the prescribed limits of its authority, as that authority had been specifically defined by its constituent Colonies, and until it assumed the unwarranted authority of legislation, thereby closing the open door of reconciliation with the Mother Country, for the promotion of which it had been expressly and solely constituted, was worthy of the respect and support which were given to it, by nearly every one, in the Colony. In common with the great body of the Colonists, throughout the entire seaboard, he was sincere in his convictions that the Colonies were suffering from the wrongs which had been inflicted on them by the Mother Country; and he was willing to resort to all lawful means for their relief. But when the entire machinery of the party of the Opposition was seized by those who only cared for the offices which they could secure and for the promotion of only a factional struggle for the control of the political power of the Colony, he preferred to remain among the conservatives, and to act, if he acted in any political movement, with the conservative rather than with the revolutionary faction of the party of the Opposition.

Whatever he may have subsequently become, and the persecutions to which he was subjected by those of the opposite faction of the Opposition would have soured the most amiable of dispositions and have transformed those who were more opposed to the Government than he into active "friends of the Government," when this Memorial was written, and previously thereto, Samuel Seabury, like Isaac Wilkins and Frederic Philipse and the De Lanceys and the great body of the farmers of Westchester-county and those who were not seekers for offices and official power and official emoluments, everywhere, as far as they were politically inclined, in any direction, were unchanged, conservative members of the earlier party of the Opposition to the existing, governing Ministry, without either pretending to be or being, in the slightest degree, what were then known, distinctively, as "friends of the Government," or what have subsequently become known by the technical term, as offensive as it was distinctive, of "Tories."

[2] Vide pages 231, 232, ante.

[3] Vide pages 247, 250, ante.

"That a complaint was exhibited against your "Memorialist to the Provincial Congress of New "York, by Captain Sears, soon after the neglect with "which he is charged, and that after the matter was "fully debated, the complaint was dismissed:[1] That "he conceives it to be cruel, arbitrary, and in the "highest degree unjust, after his supposed offense has "been examined before the proper tribunal, to be "dragged like a felon seventy miles from home, and "again impeached of the same crime. At this rate "of proceeding, should he be acquitted at New "Haven, he may [be] forced seventy miles farther, "and so on without end.

"Further your Memorialist begs leave to repre-"sent: That he has a wife and six children, to "whom he owes, both from duty and affection, pro-"tection, support, and instruction. That his family "in a great measure depend, under the providence of "God, upon his daily care for their daily bread. "That there are several families at West Chester "who depend on his advice as a physician, to which "profession he was bred. That as a clergyman he "has the care of the towns of East and West Chester. "That there is not now a clergyman of any denom-"ination nearer than nine miles from the place of "his residence, and but one within that distance "without crossing the Sound; so that in his absence "there is none to officiate to the people in any "religious service, to visit the sick, or bury the dead.

"Your Memorialist also begs leave to observe: "That in order to discharge some debts which the "necessity of his affairs formerly obliged him to con-"tract, he, about a year ago, opened a grammar "school,[2] and succeeded so far as to make it worth "one hundred pounds, York money, for the year "past. That he was in a fair way of satisfying his "creditors and freeing himself from a heavy incum-"brance. That he had five young gentlemen from "the Island of Jamaica, one from Montreal, four "children of gentlemen now in England, committed "to his care, among others from New York and the "country. That he apprehends his school to be "broken up and his scholars dispersed, probably "some of them placed at other schools, and that it "may be difficult, if not impracticable, again to "recover them. That if there should be no other "impediment, yet if the people of West Chester are to "be liable to such treatment as your Memorialist hath "lately endured, no person will be willing to trust "his children there. That in this case, your Memor-"ialist must lie entirely at the mercy of his creditors "to secure him from a jail, or must part with every-"thing he has to satisfy their just demands.

"Your Memorialist, thinking it his duty to use all "lawful and honorable means to free himself from "his present confinement, mentioned his case to the "judges of the superior court lately sitting in this "town. Those honorable gentlemen thought it a "case not proper for them to interfere in; he has, "therefore, no remedy, but in the interposition of the "Honorable House of Assembly.

"To them he looks for relief from the heavy hand "of oppression and tyranny. He hopes and expects "that they will dismiss him from his confinement, "and grant him their protection, while he passes "peaceably through the colony. He is indeed "accused of breaking the rules of the Continental "Congress. He thinks he can give a good account "of his conduct, such as would satisfy reasonable "and candid men. He is certain that nothing can "be laid to his charge so repugnant to the regula-"tions of the Congress, as the conduct of those "people who in an arbitrary and hostile manner "forced him from his house, and have kept him now "four weeks a prisoner without any means or pros-"pect of relief. He has a higher opinion of the "candor, justice, and equity of the Honorable House "of Assembly, and shall they incline to inquire more "minutely into the affair, he would be glad to ap-"pear at the bar of their house, and answer for him-"self; or to be permitted to have counsel to answer "for him; or, in such way as they in their wisdom "shall think best, to grant him relief. And your "Memorialist, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

"SAMUEL SEABURY.

"Dated in NEW HAVEN the 20th day of Decem-"ber, 1775."

Three days after this spirited Memorial was written —there is no record that it was ever laid before a General Assembly[3]—as the brave Memorialist subse-

